

Serials _____ DATE 30 January 1974
(Department) _____ ADDRESS 220 S. Main Volume _____

For use only _____

Number Vol. 1, nos. 1-12

Check page (include date if periodical): _____

Place microfilm the above and explain it onto the microfilm attached for vol. 1, no. 13. Return microfilm and vol. to National Security, 220 S. Main.

INDICATE SERVICE DESIRED

_____	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____
_____	_____

=====

DO NOT WRITE IN THIS SPACE

THE TEETOTALER,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL,

DEVOTED TO TEMPERANCE, LITERATURE, AND SCIENCE.

EDITED BY

GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS,

AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," "ROBERT MACAIRE," &c.

VOLUME I.

ILLUSTRATED WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS.

LONDON :
GEORGE HENDERSON, OLD BAILEY, LUDGATE HILL.

M.DCCCXLI.

22000 22 E 12

LONDON:

J. C. HENDERSON, 15, BAXTER SQUARE

178.05
TEE
32 E/12

PREFACE TO THE FIRST VOLUME.

IN bringing the First Volume of "The Teetotaler" to a close, the Editor, according to the invariable rule, begs leave to return his most sincere thanks for the favour which the journal has experienced at the hands of the public. "The Teetotaler" has acquired a considerable and most respectable circulation beyond the sphere of that world to which it is especially addressed, and has therefore enjoyed the felicity of carrying the principles of Teetotalism into those quarters where the doctrine had been previously known only by name. During the existence of eleven months, "The Teetotaler" has made many thousands of converts to the principle which it advocates; and numerous have been the letters received by the Editor from individuals who owe their present happiness and prosperity to the columns of this journal, and who have felt it to be their duty to thank while they acknowledged the source of their regenerated condition and habits.

The generality of Temperance, or Teetotal journals are the organs of particular Societies and Associations, and are merely the vehicles of reporting the progress of the bodies to which they are attached. They seldom, if ever, contain any original articles in which the principles of Teetotalism are considered, explained, or discussed in their several relations with physiology, morality, domestic and national prosperity, &c. &c.; and they are therefore by no means adapted to spread the good cause. The object of the Editor of "The Teetotaler" has been chiefly to consider the doctrine of Teetotalism in all its bearings and applications, to inculcate its efficacy in the minds of the uninitiated, and to strengthen its votaries in their adherence to the principle. With this aim, the Editor has endeavoured to render the First Volume of his journal a complete Encyclopædia of Teetotalism. The reader will find, by a reference to the Index and to the Volume itself, that Teetotalism is considered in every light in which it is possible to consider it,—that the nature and principles of Alcohol are minutely explained,—that the delusion attached to the use of intoxicating liquors is boldly and unanswerably elucidated,—that the effects of Alcohol upon every part of the human frame are developed,—that all the adulterations, to which intoxicating liquors are subjected, are exposed,—that Teetotalism and Moderation are frequently contrasted, in order to render apparent the truth of the former and the falsity of the latter system,—that the application of Teetotalism to the Working Classes is particularly and elaborately dwelt upon,—that the best medical authorities are quoted to throw additional testimony into the scale of the arguments adduced,—that every objection has been met and successfully combated in this journal. The Editor has also endeavoured to inculcate the principle of Teetotalism by means of amusing fictions as well as in serious essays and dry dissertations; and he has reason to believe that the effects of this plan have been most successful. He may therefore assert, without fear of being reproached for an undue manifestation of vanity, that he has succeeded, by his own exertions, and by the aid of some talented contributors, in presenting his readers with the First Volume of the most complete Encyclopædia of Teetotalism extant.

At the same time that "The Teetotaler" strenuously advocated the cause which its title expresses, it also supplied the reader with a Miscellany of Literature, conveying amusement, instruction, and morality at the same time. It will be perceived by a reference to the First Volume, that the subjects of the general literature of "The Teetotaler" have been most miscellaneous and diversified. The arts and sciences—biography—ethics—and sketches of men and things, have each and all received their due attention. The style, in which all the articles are written, is in perpetual reference to the cause of morality and religion, but without any ostentatious display of an extreme sanctity which is too often assumed to cover the most narrow-minded prejudices and the most inveterate malignity, rancour, jealousy, and uncharitableness.

Particular attention has been paid to the condensed Report of Teetotal news, progress and assemblies, in each number of this journal; and the aim of the Editor has been devoted to the execution of this portion of his task with impartiality and strict justice to all Societies, and all Correspondents. He has never refused the insertion of one single Report which may have been forwarded to him, whatever might be the source from which it came; and to this straightforward line of conduct he has received innumerable testimonies from those who have naturally felt disgusted at the gross partiality exhibited by other Temperance publications. The Editor has moreover sustained a vast correspondence with the leading supporters of Teetotalism in the provincial cities and towns of the empire; and, upon an average, has privately answered upwards of one hundred letters every fortnight. In a word, he has endeavoured, by the most unwearied exertions, to obtain the most satisfactory intelligence for the hebdomadal Reports of the Progress of Teetotalism, and to secure by courtesy and attention to his correspondents, a continuation of those sources of exclusive information.

The Proprietor of "The Teetotaler" has most liberally aided the exertions of the Editor to diffuse the salutary doctrine of total abstinence, as much as possible. Impressed with the conviction that the horrors of Intemperance and the blessings of Sobriety should be presented to the minds and eyes of society in all their varied hues and garbs, the Proprietor determined upon publishing this series of Lithographic Drawings which have depicted the career of the Working Man and of the Gentleman, and which have so considerably augmented the popularity of "The Teetotaler," placing it beyond the probability of competition, and increasing the sphere of its usefulness. There is scarcely a Teetotal Hall throughout the country, in which these plates are not suspended in neat frames to the walls; and the evident truths, which are developed in those pictorial histories, serve materially to assist the arguments and reasoning of the Teetotal advocates.

There is a class of men, from whom, with few exceptions, the Editor has experienced the utmost courtesy, and at whose hands "The Teetotaler" has been received with the kindest favour;—this class is the most really useful one of all those into which Society is divided, and of whose favour the most haughty Paladin might well be proud:—the Editor alludes to the Working Men; and to them does he express his gratitude for the patronage they have bestowed upon this journal. It ever has been, and ever will be, the constant endeavour of the Editor to promote the interests of the Working Men to the utmost of his power, and to use his constant exertions to minister in a satisfactory manner to their intellectual wants. Would that he could ameliorate their political condition, and raise them at once to that proud eminence in Society which they ought to occupy, and to which the Genius of Teetotalism will assuredly lead them!

The Roman Catholic Teetotal Societies, and the Honourable Orders of Rechabites, have also obtained their due share of attention in the pages of "The Teetotaler." We conceive that the former are all, collectively and individually, honoured in the veneration with which the illustrious name of FATHER MATHEW is mentioned; and the latter deserve universal commendation for the charitable views which actuate the operations of the Fraternity.

To each and to all of his readers does the Editor now once more return his thanks for past favours, and solicit a continuation of that same kind patronage to those Numbers of "The Teetotaler" which will form Volume the Second.

London, April, 17th, 1841.

G. W. M. RENOLDS.

INDEX TO VOLUME I.

ESSAYS.

BEAUTY
Instinct and Reason
Italy
National Education
Phrenology
Prejudice and Habit
Sir Walter Scott
Socialism
Wines of the Ancients, The Wines of the Moderns, The Wines of the New Testament

TALES.

A CITY Sketch
Adventures of a Foant of Type Aged Soldier, The Angela and Angelo
Aurinia the Victim Autobiography of an Artist, The Banquet, The Bashful Man, The
Biography of a Bell, The Bleeding Hand, The Bottle Imp, The
Brandy and Water
Castle of Hohenstein Cousins, The Coward, The Deadly Vengeance, The Death of Oleg, The Demon Lover, The Dissenting Minister, The Destiny
Drunkard's Progress, 1, 9, 17,
65, 73, 81, 89, 97, 105, 111
Drunken Ministers, The Eighth Voyage of Sinbad the S
Ellen Maxwell
Eugenius Garwood
Father, The Fire-King, The Forewarned, The French Characters Caricatured
Insolvent Debtors' Court, The Jupiter and Danaë
La Contessa Vertova
Last Bottle, The Legend of Bottle Hill
Madeira Merchant, The Marianne
Mary Malone
Matrimonial Speculator, The Memoirs of a Wag
Miseries of Fat, The
My First Guinea
Ninth Voyage of Sinbad the S Old Club Room, The
Paul de Walberg
Pickwick Married, 241, 249, 251, 273, 281, 289, 297, 305, 321, 329, 337
Pont Neuf, The Private Madhouses, The Public Accuser, The
Reflections in a Horsepond
Reformed Tradesman, The Scene in a Gin-Palace
Sculptor of Florence, The Strange and Perilous Adventure
The Three Crimes
Two Breweries Water Torrance and No

ARTICLES UPON TEETOTALISM.

p. 20 A Woss to Total Abstemious 54
Advantages of Teetotalism 170
Alcohol 181
An Appeal to the Manufacturers and Venders of Intoxicating Liquors 59
Arguments for Teetotalism 271
Atrocities of Publicans, The 85
Causes of Intemperance 166
Discussion between J. H. Donaldson and G. W.
M. Reynolds 5
Diseases brought on by Drinking 125
Drinking Customs 315
Drunkenness 99
Effects of Teetotalism 63
Effects of Alcohol upon the Human Frame 235
Errors of the Venders of Intoxicating Drinks 188
Examples of Intemperance 227
Facts for Water-Drinkers 258
Gleanings for Teetotalers 331
Hints for the Drunkard 230
Intemperance 4
Intemperance and its Remedy 162
Intemperance in Women 203
London United Temperance Procession 6
Means for Promoting Teetotalism 63
Mr. John Hockings' Late Proceedings 115
National Effects of Intemperance 146
Newspapers and Teetotalism 91
Notes upon Intemperance, 67, 75, 83, 102, 115,
139, 155, 171, 179
Observations on Signing the Pledge 86
Pastor's Pledge, The 125
Publican, The 139
Reports of Teetotal News, &c., 14, 22, 30, 37, 46,
55, 61, 71, 79, 87, 95, 103, 110, 119, 127, 135,
144, 152, 160, 167, 175, 184, 191, 200, 209,
215, 223, 231, 240, 247, 256, 264, 271, 279,
287, 295, 303, 312, 319, 327, 336 343
Stimulants 19, 143
Soliloquy of a Town Pump 243
Soliloquy of a Gin Glass 269
Teetotal Cloud of Witnesses, The 219
Teetotal Anecdotes 298
Teetotalism 27, 43
Teetotalism of the Turks, The 123
Teetotalism in its effects 125
Temperance Societies in America 58
Temperance Movement 99
Temperance versus Intemperance 122, 130
To the Reclaimed Drunkard 214
Uncertainty of the Existence of the Intemperate,
The 282
United Temperance Association 4
Wage versus Alcohol 278
Warning to Drunkards 222
Way to Independence, The 101
Wine Question, The 323

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letter from Dr. Larcott 23
Manchester Correspondent 38, 40
Mingay Syder 63, 95, 102, 187, 230
Elizabeth Parsons 63
J. H. Donaldson 70
H. W. Weston 96
J. V. H. 132

POETRY.

French National Airs 125, 132, 139, 147
Original Poetry, 164, 171, 179, 188, 196, 204,
212, 220, 228, 236, 244, 252, 260, 276, 282,
300, 308
Temperance Lyrics 37, 62
Water 5

LEADING ARTICLES.

p. 84 Achievements of Teetotalism, The 340
Adulteration of Intoxicating Drinks 76
Antiquity no Authority 204
Appeal to Common Sense 52
Beauty of the Earth; The;—Our Respect for the Past 52
Before and After the Pledge 132
Causes of Error, The 300
Civilising Effects of Teetotalism, The 124
Clergy of the Church of England, The 340
Delusion relative to Malt Liquors, The 12
Distressing case of the Coal-Whippers 228
Dominion of Britain, The 260
Drunkard and the Teetotaler, The;—Standard Theatre, The 60
Education 252
Education—Eminent Advocates—Union 196
Father Mathew and Teetotalism 268
History of London Teetotalism 180
Intemperance 332
Intemperance and Teetotalism 276
Ireland and Father Mathew 100
Marquis of Londonderry, The;—The Two Trees 212
Mayoralty Dinners—United Temperance Association—Prejudice 140
Moderation—The Coal-Whippers 148
Mr. Rowbotham Refuted 244
Necessity of Teetotal Union, The 30
Opposition to "The Teetotaler" 36
Opposition of the Clergy 316
Patriotism 156
Puritans and Teetotalers Compared 308
Public Discussions 220
Refutation of Calumnies 68
Regeneration of Ireland, The 93
Sensations 108
Streets of London, The 292
Teetotal World, The 285
Teetotal Life Insurance Company, The 164
Teetotalism and Commerce 236
Teetotalism a saving to the Pocket 188
Temperance Coffee Houses—The Coal Whippers 116
Tricks of Publicans 28
United Temperance Association 44
Vindication of Teetotalism 324
Whit-Monday Procession for 1841, The 172
Youths' Teetotal Societies

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Few Popular Errors Corrected 227
An Allegory 151
Address to the Queen 7
Air, The 337, 339
Alchemy 147
America & the Americans, 66, 75, 83, 98, 136, 156, 206
Anecdotes and Sketches of Japan 238
Animal Life and Heat 115
Aphorisms 287
Aristocratic Outrage 43
Balloons 230
Bedouin Arabs, The 207
Bethunes, The 181, 190
Blindness 251
Bridges of London, The 302
British Empire in the East, The 163, 171, 179
Circumstantial Evidence 299
Coffee 107
Composition 219
Convicts in Australia, The 307
Daniel O'Connell and Father Mathew 36
Delirious Tremens 132
Eastern Opium-Eaters, The 194
Edmund Keen 323
Empress Josephine, The 315
Escape from the Prison at Cronstadt 199

INDEX.

	p.	REVIEWS.	p.		p.
Extracts from "Pickwick Annual"	116			Peppercorn upon the Stomach, A	48
Fables	344			Personae Public Characters	167
Father Mathew	118, 131	A Winter in the West Indies	19	Railway Great Britain, The	287
Free and Easy, The	78	An Address to Christian Ministers	26	Reckless	335
Funeral of a Teetotaler	86	The Working Classes	27	Report of Public Discussion at Rotherham	183
George Faulkner	127	Anti-Bacchus	15	Robert Aire, A Novel	159
Grand Excursion to Dyrham Park, The	62	Bacchus	47, 63, 86, 118	Sacred Wines	279, 286
Hunger and Thirst	143	Border Herald of Temperance, The	24	Standard System of Teaching Penmanship	254
Intoxicating Liquors	109	Charles O'Malley	4	Self-Editing Latin Classics, The	263
Latude's Escape from Vincennes	214	Children's Temperance Magazine, The	24	Short-Made Shorter	143
Letters to the Working Classes	141, 150, 158	Chinese as they Are, The	32	Water and A Novel	70
Life in a Deccan Jungle	203	Chronicles of Life	16	Writings on the Rev. J. Bromley's "Observa-
Madness	21	Comic Scraps	236	tion on Totalism"	303
Matter	307	Cook, The	254	Students	151
Mechanism of Art and Nature, The	42	Cure of Spinal Complaints, The	319	Supplement to the Discussion between James
Merry England	342	Death and Fall of Alcohol, The	295	Broad F. R. Lees	183, 199
Mr. Rowbotham's Last Lecture	99	Defence of Total Abstinence Societies, A	183	Series of Lectures for Drawing, A	286
National Pride	174	Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, The	254	Totipot Shes	319
Newtonian Theory of Motion Refuted	294	Drunkard's Cloak, The	71	Totipot Examined and Rejected	102
Noctes Pickwickianae	7, 13, 21, 37, 54	Emily, a Novel	15	The Temperance Messenger, 79, 110, 143, 207,
Notes and Gleanings	101, 144, 119, 160, 290	Entomological Cabinet, The	142		223, 286, 295
Notes on Human Character	319	Every Family's Book of Health	254	Temperance Hymns	207
Observations and Gleanings	251	Facts and Observations on the Fistula	126	The Moral Advice on Corns	175
Oratorical Hints for our Advocates	61	Fermented Wine	319	Test of Human Conduct, The	175
Oriental Fragments 255, 264, 270, 278, 287, 302, 343		Fine Specimen of Teetotal Victory, A	126	Works of Julius Josephus, The	199
Our Correspondents	52	Fraser's Magazine	239
Passage from a Military Journal	331	Gipsy Chief, The	240
Periodical Literature	172	Grant's London Journal	110
Plague, The	243	Guide to the Recovery of Small Debts, A	247
Poetry	323	Hand-Book of Stenography, The	175
Poisons	69	Hints, Moral and Medical, on Teetotalism	15
Porcelain	267	Historical, Moral, and Weather Almanack, The	239
Printing	211	History of the Emperor Napoleon	39
Prisons	178	History of the Total Abstinence Pledge Question	311
Public-House Benevolent Societies	84	Ireland	175
Public Stock	187	John Chinaman	279
Punishment of Death	11, 35	Ladies' Cabinet, The	254
Pythagorean Objections Against Food	183	Last Day of a Condemned, The	23
Railroads	138	Lee's Book for all Seasons	207
Reckless, The	294	Letter to Parents, A	222
Richard Brinsley Sheridan	334	Life of Mohammed Ali, The	231
Richard Savage	267	Lion's Den, The	167
Scandal and Slander	246	London Magazine, The	31, 63
Ships of the Ancients, The	285	London Teetotal Magazine, The	47, 79
— Moderns, The	301	Magazine of Science, The	254
Sketches of our Advocates	138	Mariner's Church Magazine, The	87, 311
Specimen of German Humour	240	Master Humphrey's Clock	15
Speculations on Astronomy	189	Medical, Moral, and Christian Dissection of Tee-
Spontaneous Combustion	109	totalism, A	78
Steam and Gas	277	Modern Literature of France, The	271
Suicide	282	Monthly Magazine, The	31, 63, 143
Tattersall's	317	Monthly Review, The	63
Tobacco	11	Mudie's English Grammar	342
Trafalgar Square	146	Museum of Mirth, The	110
The Two Rivers	76	Mysteries of the Latin Language, The	263
Varieties	143, 168, 173, 240, 290	Northern Temperance Almanack, The	267
Versification	198	On Stimulants	48
Waldegrave Outrage, The	30	Pestalozzian Maxims	231
Water	166	Pastor's Pledge, The	79
Woollen Manufacture	262	Paul Periwinkle	15
Words and Language, On	338	People's Letter Bag, The	63

LIST OF PLATES.

Two Slips Illustrating "The Drunkard's
Loss," Frontispiece	1
Portrait of Editor	1
Daniel O'Connell signing the Pledge to the Rev.
Theod Mathew	36
THE WORKING MAN.
No. 1—The Temptation.	209
No. 2—The Initiation	209
No. 3—The Confirmation	209
No. 4—The Degradation	209
No. 5—The Solicitation and Detestation	210
No. 6—The Starvation	210
No. 7—The Reformation	225
No. 8—The Domestication	225
No. 9—The Recreation	225
No. 10—The Auscultation	233
No. 11—The Realisation	233
No. 12—The Consummation	233
THE GENTLEMAN.
No. 1—The Ball Room	275
No. 2—Returning from the Club House	275
No. 3—The Evening Walk	275
No. 4—The Club Room	291
No. 5—Midnight Amusements	291
No. 6—The Police Station	306
No. 7—The Race Course	307
No. 8—The Debtors' Prison	307
No. 9—Enlisted in the Spanish Legion	335
No. 10—Wounds and Destitution	338
No. 11—Signing the Pledge	338
No. 12—The Happy Result	338

Extracts from "Dickens's
Fables
Father Mathew
Free and Easy, The

P. 116
344
118, 131
78
86

REVIEWS.

A Winter in the West Indies . . .
An Address to Christian Ministers
The Working Classes

p. 19
 . 26
 . 27

P		P.	48
P	Upon the Stomach, A		86
P	c Characters		167
P	Britain, The		247
P			335

George W. M. Reynolds.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No 1.

SATURDAY, JUNE 27, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Teetotaler" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the London United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread Street: MR. J. H. DONALDSON, Hon. Sec., No. 1 Seckford Street, Clerkenwell: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER I.

VICTOR MELVILLE.

OUR English readers, who have visited Paris, are doubtless aware,—and if not, they will be relieved of their ignorance by the time they have reached the end of this sentence,—that the Chaussee d'Antin is the most fashionable portion of the French metropolis, and, since the glorious Revolution of 1830, has totally eclipsed the Faubourg Saint Germain. It is to a small room, on the uppermost story of one of the largest houses in that splendid quarter of the first city in the universe, that we intend to introduce our readers.

The room was small, but would have been decently furnished, had not the whole appearance of the chamber indicated a certain negligence or slovenliness on the part of its occupant. A bed, with disordered curtains suspended over it from a fliche nearly touching the ceiling, stood in a kind of alcove: a good Brussels carpet was stained with red wine in various parts: the blue-damask cushions of the chairs had been subjected to the same process, doubtless to match with the carpet; and a number of empty bottles stood upon the table, the chest of drawers, and even the washing-stand. The same confusion, which reigned throughout the little room, might also have been traced in the person of its inmate, who was a young man of about three or four and twenty.

This individual was sitting at the table; and from time to time he sipped the glass of Bordeaux which stood before him. A few books and papers lay, pell-mell, amongst the glasses, the corks, the remnants of cigars, and the pieces of a broken bottle, upon the table; but his eyes were turned away from them; his head leant upon his left hand; and his whole attitude indicated the profundity of the mental affliction to which he was the prey. Frequent sighs escaped his breast; and the traces of tears lingered upon his countenance. The fingers of the hand, which supported his head, played negligently with his dark-black hair; and from time to time a nervous compression of the lips bore full evidence to the infelicitous nature of his meditations. Occasionally an expression of despair appeared to settle upon his really handsome countenance; and then he ground his teeth together, and clenched the hand that hung over the arm of the chair, as if he were only waiting for the presence of a foe upon whom to wreak the passion and the vengeance that seemed to occupy his bosom. Alas! misfortune's barbed arrows pierce the hearts of the young, as well as of the old,—of the beautiful as well as of them with whom we can scarcely sympathize,—of the innocent as well as of the guilty!

"Ruined,—totally ruined!" said he, at length, musing aloud: "not a Louis left to ensure myself a meal! Ruined,—and without a friend to assist me! without a relative in the wide world to relieve me from my embarrassments! O fatal education,—dangerous acquirements, that induced me to seek after literary fame, instead of embracing some profession which might have ensured me my daily bread! Whither can I go? what can I do in this great city? 'I cannot dig: to beg I am ashamed!' O God! thought is maddening!"

As he uttered these words, he caught hold of his hair with both his hands, and pulled it violently. And, in truth, the unfortunate young man had enough to drive him to the verge of despair. Presuming upon the excellence of the education which he had received, and actuated by a desire of following the path that leads to the temple of Fame through the fertile fields of literature, he had been induced to embark the few hundreds of pounds which he possessed, in a literary enterprise that was represented as eligible to him in two points of view. He was led to believe that his capital would be productive of a considerable interest; and, in the second place, a chance was offered him of introducing his own writings to the notice of the public. For a few months he dreamt and thought of nothing but the future fame, the foundation of which he fondly imagined himself to be then laying; he had fed and existed upon hope,—that aliment which is the most nourishing, the most general, and yet the least substantial of all food! Hope creates fortunes, fabricates crowns, defeats armies, inspires the most timid with the courage of the lion: hope throws down all obstacles with the force of a battering-ram against a castle-wall; it fills the purse of the miser with gold in the great city, and the cup of the traveller with water in the desert: but the gold slips from the hand, and the water from the lip; and hope proves to be nothing more than a delusive phantom, with a will-o'-the-wisp lantern in his hand, leading its votaries along paths which terminate only in pools and marshes.

And amongst the number of the votaries and the victims of hope, was Victor Melville, the hero of our tale. He was an orphan,—he had not resided in Paris long enough to make many real friends; and his acquaintances were not likely to assist him. There was, however, one individual who would afford him sympathy and consolation for his misfortunes, and who would have given him the wealth of Golconda, had that individual possessed anything beyond sympathy to give: but this sympathy would flow from a sincere affection; and Victor felt himself less miserable as the idea suddenly entered his mind.

Under the impulse of that idea, the young man seized his hat and gloves, and hastily retreated from the little apartment, where his hopes had germinated, and where they had been so cruelly withered. When he reached the street, he was about to hire a public vehicle; but, recollecting the condition of his pocket, he determined to walk to the place which he had thought of visiting. The day was remarkably sultry; and as he proceeded at a rapid rate, the perspiration poured down his forehead. He felt thirsty, and could not resist the temptation of encroaching upon the few francs he possessed in his pocket, to procure liquor at a coffee-house, although he was already overtaken by the hand of poverty. Poverty! the word grated upon his ears, as he muttered it between his teeth, like a sound that affected his nerves; and as the idea entered his mind, it was accompanied by all the sad escort of its infelicitous associations. Hunger, the chances of a sick bed, homeless wanderings, mendicity, the iron bars of a debtor's gaol, all these were the visions that crowded with the horrors of reality, upon the mind of the poor young man, and induced him to repeat his libation ere he left the coffee-house to proceed on his way.

With no other companions than his cheerless ideas, Melville hastened along the Boulevards towards the Place Louis Quinze; and it would almost seem that he hoped to outstrip those sad companions by the rapidity of his pace. But, alas! vain was the attempt; there is no adherent to the steps of a man more faithful than misery; for misery accommodates its pace to that of him whom it accompanies, whereas happiness hurries onward, and out-steps us, seldom if ever, to be again overtaken!

Victor pursued his way along the banks of the Seine, towards Auteuil. In a short time he accomplished a long distance; and, on his arrival in that beautiful little village, which stands between Paris and the Bois de Boulogne, he proceeded straight to a small dwelling, the garden of which communicated with the wood. The house was that which might be termed a cottage; but its appearance was exceedingly neat and picturesque; and some choice flowers were culled in the garden to longing to it. Over the door hung clusters of ripe grapes, from a fruitful vine that entirely covered the front of the dwelling; and the garden was well provided with fruit-trees.

The moment Victor appeared at the garden-gate, a young female, who had been busily employed in tying up some favourite flowers for the previous half-hour, hastened to welcome him with a joy that would not have been experienced by a sister; nor did the kiss which the youth imprinted upon her chaste brow, resemble that which is usually given by a brother. The maiden was not more than eighteen years of age; but her form already possessed the voluptuous proportions of womanhood. The figure was rather inclined to embonpoint, but was so symmetrically modelled that the most fastidious could not have wished to change its proportions from those of a Hebe to the more delicate ones of a Sylph. Her feet were small, even to a fault; her ankles were beautifully turned; her hands might have been the envy of a queen; and her neck was like that of the swan. Her large blue eyes and light brown hair seemed to proclaim her to be one of England's daughters; but she was of French extraction, and welcomed the youth in the latter language. When she spoke, her lips revealed a set of teeth that were as white as the pearls of the east; and the tones of her voice possessed the peculiar softness which usually characterizes the accents of the Italian. There was a halo of innocence, and a glory of beauty about that young maiden, which, in spite of the native modesty of her disposition and the proper reserve evidenced in her manners, fascinated the beholder to such an extent, that he would almost tremble in the presence of charms seldom united in one person. Her voice appeared to touch chords which oscillated to the very heart. The glance of her eye inspired feelings which the most indifferent could not repress, nor the most experienced explain; and, in the presence of that unaffected and retiring girl, a greater awe would be felt by the libertine than that which would take possession of him at the footstool of an empress crowned with the insignia of her power.

"Louise," said Melville, as he led the fair creature towards a seat beneath an arbour of clematis and roses, at a little distance from the gate of the garden, "I was not deceived in my evil presentiments of yesterday."

"Do not tantalize me, Victor," exclaimed the beautiful girl, gazing anxiously upon her lover's countenance: "but, alas, I see no ground for hope!" she added, after a moment's pause, during which she endeavoured to read in his eyes all that was passing in his mind.

"It is too true," cried the young man; "and I am totally ruined!"

"Say not so, Victor," ejaculated Louise; "all cannot be so bad as you anticipate; you must recover some of your money, if only a little."

"Not one fraction!" said Melville, impetuously.

"Oh, do not despair on that account," cried Louise, with the consolatory manner and voice, which women know so well how to assume, even in cases of desperation where no remedy or relief is apparent: "my guardian is attached to you,—he is poor, but he has enough for us all,—you can make our house your home until happier times, and—"

Louise cast down her eyes, for she felt that a blush had suddenly suffused itself over her features.

"Dear generous girl!" exclaimed Victor, clasping her to his heart; "I care not for all the persecutions of my adverse fortune, so long as you love me! Oh, without your love, Louise, I should not be able to support this cruel, cruel blow! My hopes blasted; my resources dried up! and I,—Oh, Louise!

how shall I ever confess to you the terrible secret?"

"A secret!" ejaculated Louise, in a tone which indicated alarm; "a secret,—and connected with yourself? Oh, Victor! you surely have no secret with which I may not be acquainted?"

"Ah! Louise, it is dread, a terrible secret; a secret, the full extent of which, even when revealed to you, you cannot understand!" cried Victor, striking his brow frantically with his clenched fist.

"Victor, Victor!" cried Louise, in a voice that was scarcely audible through deep emotion, "keep me no longer in suspense, let me be the confidant of your thoughts and of your afflictions; and if this secret be anything so very terrible—"

"Terrible!" almost howled Victor, as he interrupted the beautiful girl, "yes, yes, it is very, very terrible! But you will partially understand me, Louise, when I tell you that there are hours in a man's existence, when he knows not himself, when he dares not leave himself alone with his own thoughts, when a dread for the future sits upon his mind like a remorse, and when no hope illumines his soul! In those hours, he has but one consolation, one means of solace,—for he cannot even sleep!"

"And what then are those means?" demanded Louise, now as much astonished as she was before alarmed at the strange language of her lover.

"What are those means?" repeated Victor, with a sickly smile; "what are those means, Louise?" he added in a hoarse voice, and after a moment's pause. "In those hours, when the unhappy man cannot sleep, when he dares not leave himself alone with his thoughts, and when he sees naught but horror should he glance into the future,—in those hours of anguish, of doubt, and of dread, he seeks the only consolation that is left to him; he seeks artificial joys in the bottle!"

A deadly pallor overspread the countenance of Louise, as her lover thus confessed his weakness to her. He did not notice the effect his language had produced upon her; she could not answer him; and he continued as follows:—

"I know that this habit is only contracted by those who have not a sufficiency of moral courage to support their misfortunes; and I know that such men will never be suicides, because they have not the magnanimity to die. But, alas, it is a failing of which we cannot divest ourselves at will; for, O Louise, there is such sovereign virtue in the juice of the grape, such charms in the rich red wine, that despair cannot grapple with those remedies. Alas! often and often, during the last few months, have I drowned all my miseries in complete oblivion of this world and its woes; and then, when I have awoke on the ensuing morning, feverish and more dispirited than ever, I have sworn to abandon this vicious, this ruinous pursuit. But it is impossible! I have not courage enough to remain alone without that jovial companion, whose presence can awake all the mirth and joy which misfortune has overshadowed, and whose society is full of the happiest delusions."

"Victor," said Louise, who did not altogether comprehend the impassioned language of her lover; "you must renounce that vice which you yourself condemn; you must make this house your home; you must seek no other companion than my guardian and myself; you must abjure the rich red wine which you praise so much; and—"

"And what?" cried Victor, somewhat impatiently. "Again, I say, all my hopes are defeated."

"Your hopes, in this instance, are defeated," interrupted Louise, continuing her part of comforter, "but there are still modes and means of exercising your talents, and making yourself known to the world. Others have risen to eminence in the sphere of literature, over the obstacles which they encountered: why should not you?"

"Alas! my dearest Louise," replied Victor, softening in his manner, "what can I do in Paris? I am not sufficiently acquainted with your language to write it, although I speak it tolerably fluently; because," he added with a faint smile, "I have had so good a tutress; and, therefore, in London alone do I stand any chance of seeing my desires eventually fulfilled, or of meeting with any immediate encouragement."

"You are right," murmured Louise, tears starting into her eyes, as the thought of a separation entered her mind: "your native land must be the theatre of your exertions. Perhaps you were wrong ever to have visited Paris!" she added mournfully.

"Wrong, Louise!" ejaculated Victor, "oh, no,—not since I have met you! Dearest girl, we must part for a time. O God! the idea is distracting; but the necessity is imperative! I could not consent to become a burthen upon your guardian; and I would not wed you now even were he to assent to our immediate union. I should only be connecting you with my poverty, my vices, and my misfortunes!"

"It is hard to part; but it is necessary that we should make this sacrifice of our present feelings to our future prospects," said Louise, her voice almost stifled with sobs, for she now required consolation in that hour of her troubled spirit and early afflictions.

"Dry those tears, Louise," exclaimed Victor, "or the hour of separation will be dreadful to us both! We will correspond often; I will write to you as if I were conversing orally with you; and I will make you acquainted with all my hopes, and my fears, my prosperity, and my adversity, as I do now. Perhaps, I may yet do well—could I only renounce the terrible vice which has become my habit."

"And you will not forget your own Louise?" said the beautiful girl, smiling amidst her tears at the gleam of hope thus held out; "I have heard that the ladies of your country are exceedingly beautiful, Victor, and you are very young—"

"Oh, it is cruel of you to torture me with the doubt, relative to my love, which is implied in your remarks, Louise," interrupted Victor; "I never can love any one but you; I could not live without you; for even in my debaucheries have I raved of you."

A sudden phantasy struck the poor girl, as her lover thus essayed to soothe her mind; and, as she put her whim into execution, she partially forgot her grief. She snatched a beautiful rose from the branch on which it grew, and which waved above her head; she selected two leaves which no insect nor blight had touched or spoilt; one she kissed and tendered to her lover; the other she placed upon his lips for a moment, and then consigned it to her bosom.

"Night and morning shall I look upon this leaf; and I feel that I already possess a means of consolation," said Louise.

"And night and morning shall I kiss that leaf," returned Victor, as he placed it between the leaves of his pocket-book; "and I know that the sight of it will teach me to nerve myself with a more natural and manly courage than is found in the indulgences of wine. Tomorrow I shall bid you adieu, Louise, for some time: to-day, let us endeavour to be happy in each other's society."

How rapidly flies the time when we wish it to linger; and how slowly does it pass away, when each hour conducts us nearer to some long-anticipated felicity. The young couple did not notice how the time glided on, so absorbed were they in the passion that was dearest to their souls; and it seemed as if they had only been a few moments together, when the voice of Louise's guardian was heard summoning his ward to the dinner-table. Victor accompanied her to the house, where he was cordially welcomed by the kind protector of the orphan girl; for the youth had received the conditional assent of the old gentleman to his union with Louise, as soon as circumstances should permit him to enter upon the matrimonial state.

The guardian of Louise was a retired captain in the French army. He was a man of about sixty years of age, and had passed the greater portion of his life in a camp or barracks. He had not married until he retired from active service at the age of forty-two; and a short time after his union with an amiable woman, whom he had long loved, Louise was entrusted to his care. But heaven withdrew from the hearth of the old soldier one blessing when it sent another; and the lady, in whom Louise would have found a mother, or from whom she could have at least experienced a mother's care, was snatched away to the grave at a moment when the little stranger required all her tenderness. The child was, however, reared with the greatest care by a faithful female domestic; and the old Madeleine was as proud of her beautiful young mistress, as if she had been her mother. Captain Dorvalliers possessed no other pecuniary resources than his half-pay; but the house and garden were his own; and he not only lived comfortably upon his income, but also paid annual sums to the Insurance Company in the Rue de Richelieu, for the future benefit of her whom he loved as tenderly as if she were his own daughter.

Accident had introduced Victor Melville to the old soldier and his beautiful protégée, about six months previous to the period at which this tale commences: and, although Dorvalliers would have probably been better pleased had an individual possessing a competency presented himself, as the suitor of his adopted daughter, he loved Louise too well to thwart her inclinations in a matter which might affect the future happiness of her life. He accordingly permitted the young Englishman, whose dreadful failing he had never once suspected, to visit her as her intended husband, so soon as he was informed by him of the attachment the young couple had formed for each other; and he therefore now deeply deplored the misfortune which had overtaken our hero.

CHAPTER II.

THE MYSTERY.

The dinner was served up, but was scarcely touched by either of the three individuals who sat down to it. The eyes of Louise were frequently filled with tears, as she cast stolen glances towards her lover in order to ascertain the impression the approaching hour of separation produced upon his mind. The old captain forgot his jokes, and his military anecdotes; and Victor himself was a prey to the most heart-rending affliction.

"Tonnerre de Dieu!" cried Captain Dorvalliers, after a long pause, as he dashed his hand upon the table: "we are but a sorrowful party this evening, parbleu! Louise, my dear, do me the favour to fetch a bottle of that Chateau Margéaux, you know—with the green seal on the cork. We will try if that cannot enliven us, Victor."

"I am sorry, my dear Sir," answered the youth, "that my private afflictions should affect you: but I feel the kindness of your heart, which knows how to sympathize with the cares of a fellow-creature."

"My dear boy," returned the old officer, "I should be a brute were I not to feel for you. And do you think that, even if I did not care for you, I could be happy when I see that dear girl's eyes red with weeping, and her heart ready to break?"

"I would give worlds to make her happy!" passionately exclaimed our hero.

"Let us hope for better days, my boy!" said the old soldier. "But here she is with the wine. Give me the corkscrew, Louise, dear—and mind you set the bottle down gently. There! that's a good girl. Now let Madeleine clear the table, and we will at least pass one agreeable hour together."

As the Captain thus chattered, he extracted the cork from the bottle, and filled three glasses, which Louise placed upon the table.

"This is the best wine in my cellar," resumed the captain; "and may we all be in a better humour the next time we open a bottle! Excellent, upon my soul," continued the old soldier, as he drained the glass; "I will be bound for it that Napoleon never drank better wine in his life. But he was fond of the Burgundy wines! For my part, I would give all the Burgundy in the world, for one bottle of nice cool Bordeaux! Here, girl—" added Dorvalliers, refilling his glass, "here's your health, and God bless you, my dear child!"

The captain grasped the hand of his adopted daughter, as he uttered these words, and wrung it cordially, while a tear trickled down his weather-beaten cheek. Louise rose, and imprinted a kiss upon the forehead of her benefactor; and as she leant towards the old man, she murmured the following words in his ears:—

"My dear friend—my more than father, you have only done to-day that which you have never omitted to do for years, upon the thirtieth of September: and I thank you for this, as well as for all other tokens of kindness and affection, which you have manifested towards me."

"Ah!" ejaculated Captain Dorvalliers, starting on his seat, as if he were suddenly bitten by some venomous reptile; and all the smiles which he had endeavoured to assume, in order to chase away the melancholy of his two companions, suddenly faded from his countenance, leaving behind them expressions of anger and sorrow, strangely commingled together.

"Yes," repeated Louise, gently, "this is the thirtieth of September."

"And, on this day, you are eighteen, Louise," said the old man hastily. "I had forgotten it—I did not wish to remember it—and yet for months have I vainly endeavoured to chase from my memory, the conviction that this day must come! Singular, that the anniversary should not have struck me till now, during the whole of this day: me, who have looked forward to it with anxiety for years, and who have dreaded its presence, as if it were the hour destined for my death!"

"My dear friend," exclaimed Louise, "you alarm me! What means this agitation—and wherefore do you shun the arrival of the eighteenth anniversary of your adopted daughter's birth? Oh! tell me, my kind friend; do not keep me in suspense."

"I was weak, I was foolish thus to frighten you, Louise," cried Dorvalliers, endeavouring to smile: but the attempt was as abortive as if it had been made by a man about to suffer the extreme penalty of the law.

"No—it is but fair that I should be made acquainted with your sorrows, I who share all your pleasures," cried Louise, falling upon her knees beside her venerable guardian, then taking his hand in hers, and glancing up towards his countenance in so bewitching manner, that Victor, who was a spectator of the singular scene, could have rushed from his seat and clasped her in his arms. "No—I will not suffer you to keep this secret from me," she continued in that coaxing manner which women know so well how to assume; "I am determined you shall tell me the cause of your alarm, your fears, relative to the presence of this day. On former birth-days you were invariably gay and happy, and the bottle with the green cork was produced, and my health was drunk, and Madeleine was permitted to share our happiness in the evening. Why then should the day, on which I attain my eighteenth year, be one of sorrow to you?"

"When once a woman gets a whim into her head, she is terrible till it is gratified," said the Captain, endeavouring to assume an air of gaiety. "Little fairy, I suppose I must satisfy your curiosity," he added, in a tone gradually becoming more serious as he proceeded; "and perhaps the sooner I perform an unpleasant duty, the better! Victor, this is the last evening we shall probably pass for some time together, let it then be devoted to the revelation of a circumstance which I have long concealed in my own breast, but which is my own secret no longer. That secret now belongs to your future wife; and (as I fondly hope that you will one day become her husband,) you may be safely entrusted with the same narrative which I am about to disclose to her."

Louise rose from her kneeling posture, and returned to her chair, her mind agitated with a thousand hopes and alarms as she prepared to listen to the tale which her guardian thus prefaced. Victor drew himself closer to the table; and, after a few moments of profound reflection, Captain Dorvalliers commenced as follows:—

"I am not going to weary you, as romancists and novel-writers usually do, with a long story about birth, parentage, and education: because all these have no reference to the circumstances, which it is my duty this day to reveal (so far as I myself am possessed of a knowledge of those circumstances) to my adopted daughter. It will, therefore, only be necessary to observe, that I retired from active life a little more than eighteen years ago, and at that period married a lady to whom I had been engaged for some time. She possessed a small dower, and with this we purchased the house in which I at present dwell, and where I have passed the happiest portion of my existence, in the society of you, Louise,—you whom I love as dearly, as if you were my own child. But the object of this disclosure, is to make you aware of the manner in which you were entrusted to me—how I became your guardian—and wherefore I trembled when you reminded me ere now that you were this day eighteen years of age. So now, without any further preface, let me dash in medias res, as my colonel used to observe when he broke the enemy's line, in the Austrian campaigns."

The worthy captain paused for a moment, emptied his glass, and then continued in the ensuing manner:—

"I was married to my lamented wife on the twentieth of September, 1808; and on the thirtieth of the same month occurred that which I am about to relate to you. We were sitting in this very apartment, at about nine o'clock in the evening, and conversing on a variety of interesting topics, all of which are as fresh in my memory as if they had been engraved upon it with red hot iron, when the gardener, who had been employed about the premises until a late hour, rushed into the room, exclaiming, 'There is a woman dying at the outer-gate!' I immediately fetched a lantern from the kitchen, and, accompanied by my wife, the gardener, and old Madeleine, hastened to the spot, whence low moans reached our ears the moment we had set foot within the precincts of the garden. We proceeded to the outer-gate, and there we found a female lying upon the cold ground, speechless, and apparently in the agonies of death. To raise her in my arms, and carry her into the house, was my first care; and my wife and Madeleine hastened to convey her to the best bed which we possessed. The gardener was immediately despatched to fetch a physician from Passy, for the wretched woman was about to become a mother. She was young—scarcely seventeen years of age, and beautiful—Oh! as beautiful as those heavenly beings which we dream of in the visions of the night! Her attire was costly in the extreme; and several rich jewels adorned her neck and fingers, all which baubles are still in my possession, in my own room. The physician arrived; and in a few hours you, Louise, were born. But your entrance into this world was the signal for your mother's departure from it; and she expired, without having even experienced the sweets of maternity for one short hour, and without having uttered a word, to say who she was, or whence she came."

Captain Dorvaliers paused for a moment, for the tears flowed profusely from the eyes of her who was so deeply interested in this narrative. The poor girl wept as she thought of the sufferings of her mother; and, although she had never known that mother's care, she felt that she could have loved her with enthusiasm and all the piety of filial devotion. Victor did not attempt to console his affianced bride: grief like hers was too sacred to be interrupted, even by the words of sympathy; and he remained a mute, though far from disinterested, spectator of the scene.

"For some time I was uncertain how to act," continued Captain Dorvaliers, after a long pause, "so singular appeared the circumstances under which my house had become the scene of a decease and a birth at the same moment. The physician advised me to communicate the particulars of this extraordinary adventure to the nearest Commissary of Police, in order that measures might be adopted to ascertain to whom the lady belonged, and what was to be done with her child. I immediately followed this advice, and informed the magistrate, that a lady, who had laboured under too severe an attack of indisposition to articulate an intelligible syllable during her residence in my house, had just died there, and left an infant behind her. The Commissary forthwith sent a report of my history to the Prefecture of Police in Paris, and advised me to await for a few days the result of this measure, ere I caused the body of the deceased to be interred. But my patience was not put to so long a test; for, in the course of a few hours, after the Commissary's report had been sent to Paris, an individual of noble manners, and who refused to give me his name or address, called and requested to be permitted to view the corpse. He was immediately conducted into the room where the deceased lay, and appeared satisfied that the remains were those of her concerning whom he was interested. But he was evidently in no way related to the deceased; for he demonstrated no signs of grief, and treated the whole matter, so far as he himself was concerned, with the indifference of a man who is only acting on the behalf of others.—'This lady,' said he, 'has been the victim of an attachment which separated her from her family; and that family must never be permitted to know the disgrace that has fallen upon one of its members. The child, which the lady has left behind her, has no friend nor relative to whose care it can be confided; will you undertake to rear it—to adopt it;—and a handsome stipend shall be allowed for the trouble and expense thereby entailed upon you? A handsome dower shall also be provided and ensured to her, when she arrives at the age of maturity.—I did not require long to reflect upon this proposition, although it were so abruptly made. I felt convinced that I should not myself be blessed with any offspring, as my wife was nearly my own age; and I knew that she was already attached to the infant thus thrown upon our hands. I accordingly acceded to the proposal, observing at the same time that I should be content with a very small sum until the expenses of education should accumulate with the growth of years. The stranger placed four thousand francs in my hand, declared that a similar sum would be paid annually until the child should be old enough to be sent to school or provided with governesses, when the allowance would be doubled,—and then took his leave."

"And was it thus that I was thrown upon your kindness,—with no other tie to bind me to you, than that of your own generous sympathies?" ejaculated Louise, rising from her seat, and throwing herself into the arms of the old soldier, who embraced her fervently: "Oh, my more than father, how can I ever repay so deep a debt of gratitude?"

"You have repaid it, dearest child," answered Dorvaliers: "your attention to the old man's comforts,—your affectionate disposition, your amiability, your goodness, have more than repaid me for any kindness I may have had it in my power to show you. But let me make an end of a sorrowful tale, the most afflicting portion of which is yet to come."

Louise returned to her seat, and Captain Dorvaliers took a portefeuille from his pocket, and thence extracted a letter which he laid upon the table. Victor and Louise watched him with the utmost anxiety; and, after a few moments' consideration, the old soldier thus concluded his narrative:—

"Seven years passed away, and Louise sprung up beneath the fostering care of the excellent Madeleine, who supplied the place of the mother whom she had lost. During this period, the annual allowance of four thousand francs was regularly paid by the same stranger who had first proposed to me to adopt the child; and no inquiries concerning the little girl were ever made by any one but him. Shortly after the battle of Waterloo,—that fight which decided the fate of Europe, and overshadowed the glorious star of the greatest man that the world ever produced,—I received a letter, through the post, upon the very day on which the seventh annual payment should have been made. This is the letter," continued Captain Dorvaliers, holding up the one he had extracted from his pocket-book, "and these are its contents—'A thousand thanks, generous man, for the kindness which you have manifested towards an unprotected child. Continue to act the father's part towards Louise, (for such, it is understood, is the name you have given to her,) and heaven will reward you far more than man can do. On the receipt of this letter, proceed to the office of M. Mezeray, a notary, who resides in the Rue Saint Honoré, and he will entrust you with the secret of the birth and parentage of Louise. He will moreover transfer to you the sum of five hundred thousand francs,* now lying in the Bank of France, and destined for the use of Louise, under your sole guardianship. When Louise shall have attained her eighteenth year, you may make her acquainted with that secret which M. Mezeray will confide to you; and at that age, it would be advisable that she should be comfortably settled in life by some eligible marriage, to which her property may enable her to aspire.'—Such, Louise; such, Victor, was the letter which was conveyed to me on the thirtieth of September, 1815. I immediately proceeded to the house of M. Mezeray, burning to unravel that deep mystery which seemed to hang around the nativity of my beloved protégée. But, O God! how have I survived that terrible day! the wretch, the villain, who was entrusted with the orphan's gold, had betrayed his trust;—had fled with the wealth confided to him by his clients—and had left hundreds of ruined men and women to curse his name!"

"And thus the secret was never fully revealed to you?" ejaculated Victor, in breathless suspense.

"Never!" answered the old soldier, rising and pacing the room with uneven steps. "All that I know relative to the nativity of your intended wife, Victor, I have now told you; and I have thus far fulfilled the intentions of the writer of that letter, by revealing to her on this day some of the particulars of her birth. God only knows, whether the remainder of this deep, deep mystery will be ever cleared up!"

"Ah! my dear friend," ejaculated Louise, hastening to embrace her venerable guardian, "you need not have dreaded this day, because you have done nothing for which you can reproach yourself. The villany of an unprincipled man has deprived me of my fortune; but it did not alienate your affection!"

And the beautiful girl used all her most endearing wiles and ways to soothe the old man's pain.

It is not, however, our object to extend this portion of our narrative. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing that the evening passed rapidly away—far too rapidly for the young lovers; and that the moment of separation at length arrived. The old Captain had delicately inquired into the state of Victor's pecuniary resources, during a momentary absence of Louise from the room, and had endeavoured to force a sum upon the young man. But nothing could induce our hero to admit the extremely impoverished condition of his purse, or to accept the proffered assistance; and the old officer was at length satisfied in his own mind that Melville did not require any immediate aid of that kind.

The lovers parted, with tears, sighs, vows, and whisperings of fond hopes: they promised to correspond frequently, and renewed their former pledges of unchanging affection. Still, all these devices, suggested by a vain hope of cheating adversity of a portion of her savage delight at human misery, could not divest the hour of separation of many bitter—bitter pangs; and for some time they could not tear themselves away from each other's arms.

"God bless you, my boy!" cried the old officer: "and may every prosperity attend you!"

"Farewell, dearest Victor," murmured Louise, adown whose pale cheeks poured floods of tears.

"Farewell,—farewell, my ever dear, dear girl!" said Victor; and, wringing the hand of her guardian, the youth tore himself away from the spot which contained all that he held dear in life.

To be continued in our next.

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

BY J. H. DONALDSON, HON. SEC. &c.

It being a matter of the utmost importance that the public should know our true position in the Temperance Cause, we beg to offer a few remarks upon the rise and progress of the London United Temperance Association; and in so doing it will be necessary to take a cursory view of the Temperance Reformation from the commencement.

It will be seen, by a perusal of the first Temperance Publication, that the good work commenced in America, in the year 1826, beneath the fostering care of the Rev. Dr. Beecher of Boston. Its object was the prevention and cure of Intemperance by entire abstinence from ardent spirits except for medical purposes. The following is the third Article of the American Temperance Society:—"Any person who shall pay to the treasurer of the Society five dollars annually, or who has paid or shall pay thirty dollars at one time, shall be a member of the Society; provided the donor shall subscribe to the following conditions:—I pledge myself to an entire abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, except when prescribed by a temperate Physician, in case of sickness."

* Twenty thousand pounds.

This Society spread with great rapidity; and in various parts of Europe similar Institutions were speedily formed, their views tending to the same object. In 1831, the first London Temperance Society was formed. During the first year, it numbered amongst its members some of the first Noblemen in our land, the Right Hon. and Rev. Lord Bishop of London becoming its Patron. For some few years the work appeared to go on well, until it was discovered both in England and America, that to accomplish the object of the Society, it would be quite necessary to advance a step farther, and give up the use of all intoxicating drinks. The seeds of intemperance, it was found, were alike in fermented as in spirituous liquors.

Mr. Livesey, of Preston in Lancashire, was among the first to introduce the total abstinence pledge; and his visit to London in 1835, led to the formation of the first Total Abstinence Society in the Metropolis.

The committee consisted of working men; and, after much deliberation, its members named the new Society,—"The British Teetotal Society." They then adopted the following pledge:—"I do voluntarily promise that I will abstain from ale, porter, wine, ardent spirits, and all intoxicating liquors, and will not give or offer them to others, except under medical prescriptions, or in a religious ordinance."

In 1836, the Society was re-organised under the superintendence of Mr. Janson, and the name altered for the purpose of supplanting the "British and Foreign Temperance Society." It was named by Mr. Livesey, "The New British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance;" and another pledge was added; viz, "I do voluntarily promise that I will abstain from ale, porter, wine, ardent spirits, and all intoxicating drinks, except for medical purposes or in a religious ordinance." The two pledges were commonly known by the terms "The long pledge," and "The short pledge."

About this time some interested persons joined the Society, and very soon raised themselves into office, where they began to cause a dispute in the Committee upon the subject of the pledges, a circumstance which eventually led to a separation of the two parties at the annual meeting in 1839. The one party claiming a right to adopt the American Union pledge as its standard, and the other retained the short and long pledge as formerly. From that time, until the formation of the "London United Temperance Association," the societies in London greatly languished, and in some places became almost extinct, existing only in name; while many societies in the country were in a flourishing condition, emulating each other in the good work, and bringing forth an abundance of fruit.

It is with the hope of again uniting in one bond of brotherhood, the two adverse parties in the Temperance Reformation, that the "London United Temperance Association" has been formed; and during the past six months its numbers have accumulated in such a ratio as plainly to prove, beyond all contradiction, that there is among the members, at least, a strong desire for union.

Members! will you assist in the good work? Or shall we go on as we now are? If you be in favour of union, show your desire by your adhesion to the United Society, and use your every effort to destroy the obstacles that now stand in our way. Give the friends of true Temperance to know by your example, that you really are sincere.

WATER.

BY W. T. MONCRIEFF.

Author of "Don Giovanni in London," &c.
Give me the stream—the clear—the bright—
The cool—the chaste—the pure—the free,
The stream that seeks and loves the light,
And with the earth shares sovereignty.
Give me the drink that beauty takes,
That seeks the sands to cheer the faint.
With which its thirst Devotion slakes,
And that springs from rocks to bless the saint!
Water, water give to me;—
Water shall my nectar be!

Oh! if I'd a divining rod,
To know where the stream runs hid below,
I'd rival Bacchus—the jolly God—
And a banquet make that should ever flow.
Give me the drink that comes from the sky,
That takes half the earth to form its cup,
The drink which heaven exales on high,
The stream which the glorious Sun drinks up.
Water, water still give me;—
Water shall my nectar be!

Water from coldness highly shrinks,

And hardens itself against winter's rage;—

The grape but maddens the fool that drinks

And gives the thirst it should assuage.

Water will bear us on its breast.

It yields the diamond its radiance bright;

Its murmurs lull us into rest,—

It is a fountain of delight!

Water, water, then, give me;—

Water shall my nectar be.

ANALYSIS OF THE DISCUSSION

BETWEEN J. H. DONALDSON, AND GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

ON Wednesday evening, the 13th of May last, Mr. Reynolds chanced to enter the chapel in Aldersgate Street, during the period of the weekly meeting. He had been induced by witnessing the crowd of individuals who were entering at the time, to gratify his curiosity and ascertain what really were the principles of the Teetotalers. Mr. Donaldson was lecturing at the period, and Mr. Reynolds for some time listened to him with the greatest attention. At length Mr. Reynolds, (who was himself fortified at the moment by the bastard kind of courage engendered by wine, although he had not drunk to any excess, but had merely imbibed a sufficiency, with the friends with whom he had been dining at an hotel in Aldersgate Street, to render him venturesome) determined upon challenging Mr. Donaldson to a public discussion of the principles of Teetotalism. The challenge was immediately accepted by that gentleman; and on the ensuing Saturday the first struggle took place.

It was therefore on the 16th of May that the discussion commenced.

Mr. REYNOLDS began by stating that he came before the audience, labouring under many and signal disadvantages. He had given a challenge which he was induced to consider rash, because he was altogether unacquainted with the principles of the Teetotalers—the arguments they made use of in support of those principles—and the basis on which the fabric of their Association was raised. He had never read a single work, either periodical or complete, upon the subject; he stood before them without knowing what he was about to say; and he should merely open the discussion with a few sentiments upon the subject,—of those sentiments which naturally suggested themselves to him at the moment. He should commence by observing, that the Teetotalers preached, not against the abuse of intoxicating drink only, but also against the use. They preached unexceptionable abstinence from all wines, spirits, malt liquors, &c.—a doctrine which attacked the most moderate use of those articles which he (Mr. Reynolds) considered to have become more or less necessary, through habit and hereditary custom, to the people of this country. If the Teetotalers would confine their crusade to a war against the abuse of strong drinks, no one would be more willing to join the Association than himself; but he would not consent to deprive men on a sudden of those accessories to comfort and good fellowship, which long use had rendered a necessity. There are many cases (argued Mr. Reynolds) in which a moderate use of strong drink is absolutely indispensable: after rowing from London Bridge to Richmond, the man who should drink a glass of pure water, would stand a chance of sustaining some immediate and dangerous malady, or even of becoming the victim of a sudden death; whereas, were he to use a little spirit in the water, or to partake of a glass of strong beer, those fears would be entirely superseded. The man at the plough could tell a tale which would readily refute the Total-Abstinence principle of the Association, and would prove that a moderate quantity of malt liquor is both advisable and necessary for those engaged in the laborious toils of the field. Had not English sailors (said Mr. Reynolds) been allowed a drop of exhilarating spirit previous to an engagement with the enemy, many of the most splendid victories which England boasted of, would never have been gained. Mr. Reynolds then proceeded to observe, that the Teetotalers forbade the use of all intoxicating drinks, and yet they allowed smoking and drank coffee. Were they aware of the extraordinary moral and social results produced in Europe, by the introduction of coffee and tobacco? Society had undergone, as it were, a complete revolution in consequence of these innovations; and each was equally noxious in its way. Both were possessed of intoxicating, or stupefying and somniferous properties; and the juice of the tobacco was a far more dangerous poison than alcohol. He (Mr. Reynolds) had resided upwards of eight years in France, and had travelled all over that country; he had observed, during his sojourn and travel there, that the French were the people who possessed the most sallow complexions of all the nations in Europe; and he began to consider the cause. He came to the conclusion, that this result was produced by the immoderate use of coffee, in which they indulged; and he then found, upon further investigation of the subject, that the life of a Frenchman was not, upon an average, so long as either that of a Prussian, an Englishman, a Dutchman, a Belgian, or an Italian. No nation in Europe (unless it be the Germans), makes so great an use of tobacco as the French; and this habit, together with that of coffee-drinking, were in his (Mr. Reynolds') opinion, the causes of this shortness of life. And yet the Teetotalers allowed both coffee-drinking and smoking! If they preached against the use of one thing which possessed intoxicating properties, why did they not preach against another? Again, if the total use of wines and spirituous liquors were abolished, what would replace that conviviality in society which was encouraged and sustained by them? Take away (said Mr. Reynolds) the glass of wine, and you rob society of its charms! You introduce another system, which is cold and cheerless; and you take away that one which is jovial, gay, and exhilarating. On a winter's evening, what would be the fire-side, unless the heart were made glad with a generous glass! And on Christmas Day, when the poor man as well as the peer, is surrounded by his family—his wife, his children, and his friends,—when the cares of one year are nearly over, and he fondly anticipates that the next will dawn with joy and good fortune for him,—how cheerless would be his board, were not the bowl or the bottle upon it? He (Mr. Reynolds) did not argue in favour of the abuse of drinks; all he said was to maintain the necessity of their use.

Mr. DONALDSON rose to reply. He said he should answer the arguments of his opponent in a categorical manner, and he did not dread the results of that inquiry. He knew that Teetotalism could stand the test of all investigation; and he was delighted at that opportunity of arguing the point with one who had come forward, as much in the capacity of a seeker after information, as in that of an opponent. Mr. Reynolds had said that the Teetotalers attacked the use, as well as the abuse, of ardent spirits, wines, &c. They did so; and he would tell Mr. Reynolds wherefore. Temperance Societies had been first established, and they permitted the very moderate use of intoxicating drink. The use, however, soon returned to the abuse, and experience in a very short time convinced those philanthropists, who had entered upon the task of reclaiming drunkards, that nothing but a total abstinence would ensure the regeneration of that fallen portion of society. Man is weak—temptation is strong—and he who is allowed to taste one glass, could be readily persuaded to taste a second. This would lead to a third, and the temperance-man would relapse into the drunkard. Teetotalism removed the temptation, and experience had justified the theory. As for Mr. Reynolds' argument, that drink became more or less necessary to people, he had never heard anything more at variance with fact; there being at that time upwards of eight hundred people present, who had suddenly changed their habits—had signed the pledge-book on a sudden—had relinquished their custom of drinking on a sudden, and none of them had suffered by their abstinence. The reaction had killed none: on the contrary, they were all ready to declare that their health, their spirits, and the general tone of their constitutions, seemed to have experienced a grand change for the better. Mr. Reynolds had then said that strong drinks, or malt liquor, were necessary for those who had just accomplished any violent exercise, and for the labourer in the field. This was incorrect. In any case, a man who is perspiring with the effect of toil, should rest for a few minutes before he drinks; and then water, tea, or coffee—ginger-beer, or lemonade, will quench the thirst far better than intoxicating drink. It is a mistake, (said Mr. Donaldson) to suppose that strong drink is necessary, either on occasions of excessive heat or cold. In the former circumstance, it increases the heat under which an individual may be labouring; in the latter, it produces only an evanescent warmth, and is succeeded by a more severe chill shortly afterwards. He (Mr. Donaldson) was very glad that it had fallen to his lot to meet the antagonist (Mr. Reynolds) then present; because Mr. Reynolds had argued against smoking, and he (Mr. Donaldson) was vehemently opposed to the same habit. He did not see the necessity of smoking, and certainly, could not understand the delight of it; but, at the same time, he must defend the use of coffee, which possessed none of those qualities that were ruinous to the stomach and destructive to the intellect. Those properties were alone possessed by the alcohol which existed in all wines, spirituous and malt liquors; but neither coffee nor smoking could produce the same pernicious results. As to the change, which a total abstinence from intoxicating drinks would introduce into society, he (Mr. Donaldson) for one declared that that change would be all for the better. Domestic comfort did not exist in the indulgences of the glass, but in the love and tenderness of our wives and children, and that home was the happiest where the drunkard was not. The wife, whose husband came regularly home to his family, after the cares and toils of the day, received him with smiles; and that conduct was far preferable to the excitement of the glass. Far more joyous also was it, on the Christmas evening, which Mr. Reynolds extolled so highly, for the family of the poor man to reckon up all that had been saved during the year that was within six days of its close, by the abstinence from drink observed by a husband and a father; and the presence of the thousands of little comforts purchased by the money of those savings, was a far more grateful and a more pleasurable prospect than the steaming punch-bowl, or the half-emptied bottle. In those cases, man possessed a natural flow of good spirits, and required no artificial stimulant. Mr. Donaldson then took a physiological view of the question, and described the effects produced upon the stomach, and upon the human frame in general, by the use of intoxicating drinks. He concluded by an earnest hope that the result of the discussion would be beneficial to Mr. Reynolds individually, and to the grand cause of Teetotalism generally.

The discussion was then postponed until the following Saturday, (May 23rd,) when it was resumed at the Aldersgate-street chapel, as before.

Mr. REYNOLDS said, that during the week which had elapsed since he had last the honour of addressing the audience from that platform, he had considered the subject of Teetotalism with the greatest attention. He now felt convinced that it was not necessary to attack the doctrines of Teetotalism in respect to their abstract sense, but to consider them with regard to their application to the present condition of society. Tobacco and coffee had produced the greatest possible changes in the social world, and had exercised an equal influence on the moral one. It would therefore be necessary to consider the extent to which the innovations of Teetotalers would reach. What amusements would they supply in a country where the public ones were so dear, as substitutes for the places of entertainments to which the poor flocked? or how would they have the rich pass their evenings? Society was not prepared to receive such sudden changes. A particular system in respect to society, required centuries to test its excellence; for fifty years, for example, although a long period in the life of man, is nothing (argued Mr. Reynolds) in the existence of a society or a system. Let the Teetotalers (continued Mr. Reynolds) content themselves by making converts to the principle of Temperance in the use of intoxicating drinks; and, in the course of time, they might venture upon the wholesale doctrine which they now preached. He (Mr. Reynolds) was not opposed to any society of individuals, whose plan was the repression of the pernicious habit of drinking, but he could not admit so sweeping a reform as that advocated by the Teetotalers. Society was progressive only by degrees, and all reforms ought to take place in the same gradient manner. He (Mr. Reynolds) only advocated the cause of moderate and gradient reform in these respects, and he believed that his arguments were founded upon truth. The Teetotalers, doubtless, thought pretty well as he did; only they were more fanatic and enthusiastic. Already does the world begin to feel assured, (said Mr. Reynolds) that, though all truths must of necessity converge to the same point, they need not take the same direction; but they are like rivers, fed from one source and flowing into one bosom, which, if seen only at particular points, would give us little reason to suppose their origin and end the same. For it is the powerless eyes of intellect, which, unable at once to pursue their mighty range, mistake the deviations from the course for the course itself, and judge of the little sinuosities of the little sections which their restricted vision can command. But as the sphere of that vision becomes enlarged, (continued Mr. Reynolds) and as the chart of knowledge embraces an ampler space, we shall often smile at the ignorance which kept us timid and distrustful on the banks of some forbidden stream, on whose waters we shall then be floating with security and joy, confident of being wafted through some unknown outlet, into the great ocean of truth—an ocean which stretches from earth to heaven!

Mr. DONALDSON rose to reply. He said that in any way, either in its abstract sense, or on general principles, he was ready to defend the doctrines of Teetotalism. He had seen so many beneficial effects, resulting from the application of those doctrines to society, that he could not for one moment allow them to be deemed premature in that application. Society, like an individual, could not reform its abuses too suddenly; and if Mr. Reynolds advocated such gradient measures of reform as were practised in the Houses of Parliament, they might all just as well have no reform at all. Where there was any viciousness in society, it was necessary to eradicate it at once, and not let it gangrene by the dilatoriness of the remedy applied. No one could deny the fact, that intoxication prevailed to an immense extent in this country. The peace of families was thereby destroyed—the jails, the work-houses, and the hospitals were filled with the victims of that terrible vice; the pawnbrokers drove a thriving trade; and the greater portion of the lower classes were literally in rags. What was it that spread such devastation over a lovely land? what had stamped the mark of care upon the cheek of the tender wife? and what had driven young men to the criminal prisons of the country, and sent young women to walk the streets? The use of strong drinks! Could any one, then, dare assert that the means of suppression were premature? Why, the Teetotalers had been for upwards of nine years at work; and experience had taught all who had embarked in the cause, that nothing but Total-Abstinence could ensure a certain reformation. Society was slowly progressive in the arts and sciences, and in the elements of civilization; but society is no more to be tested by the supposed plan of the gradience of reform, in such respects as those of morality, than is the individual. A man may repent of his vice, and reform himself of a sudden, and he is esteemed the more for the courage displayed by his resolution, and the strength of mind which is manifested by his future forbearance from relapse. So was it with society; the same rule applied to the whole as to the sectional, or fractional part. One might as well assert that a particular link in a chain would stand a certain test; but that all the links taken together in a mass would not. Society was ever ready to receive the impressions of salutary reform; and the most salutary of all reform that could be applied to it (said Mr. Donaldson) is that of abstinence from intoxicating drinks. As for the assertion, that all truths converged to the same point, he (Mr. Donaldson) perfectly admitted the truth of the sentiment; but that Mr. Reynolds's statement, that doubtless he and the Teetotalers entertained pretty well the same opinions upon the subject, only seen in different shades of light;—that such a statement was the truth, he denied. From Mr. Reynolds's simile might be deduced the idea, perhaps, that he (Mr. Reynolds) would recommend the Teetotalers to practice their barks upon the small streams, before they launched forth into the great ocean of truth. If such were Mr. Reynolds's meaning, he (Mr. Donaldson) would assure him that those barks had been practised first in the small streams; and that the pilots of those barks had now acquired sufficient skill to avoid any quicksands, rocks, or shoals, which might menace them in the great ocean. He (Mr. Donaldson) was one of the pilots—he had hoisted his Union Jack—he would fight beneath it until life should fail him—he would never desert that banner—he would never fly from the ocean of truth, however boisterous might be the billows thereof; but he would defend the principles of Teetotalism to the last gasp. Mr. Donaldson then proceeded, as on the former occasion, to take a physiological view of the question, and to explain the disastrous effects produced upon the constitution by the use of intoxicating drinks. He quoted many instances to support his arguments: appealed to those who had felt the beneficial effects of the doctrine of Total-Abstinence; and wound up by expressing a hope, that the cause might soon mark its present opponent (Mr. Reynolds) in the ranks of its defenders.

Mr. REYNOLDS was about to reply to this speech, when the lateness of the hour compelled the meeting to adjourn. On Saturday, the 30th of May, Mr. Reynolds was incapable of attending, in consequence of having been compelled to proceed to the Continent on the previous Thursday: but on Saturday, the 13th of June, he once more appeared on the platform of the Aldersgate-street Chapel. On this occasion he spoke as follows:—

"I have lately had leisure to consider the subject, which originally brought me hither, with the utmost attention. I have searched encyclopedias, philosophical dictionaries, and medical works, with a view of ascertaining the effects of wine, spirits, and malt liquors, taken even very moderately, upon the constitution. I have devoted to the subject the serious attention which it deserved; and the result of my investigation has compelled me to admit, that the principles of Teetotalism are correct, and are founded upon truth. I might prolong this discussion for many weeks, by adducing those arguments which are supplied by the figures of rhetoric, and the ample funds of mystification; but I conceive it to be much more honourable—more manly, and straightforward,—much more becoming a gentleman—a literary man, and one who professed himself to be rather an inquirer into the principles of things, than an opponent to them,—I say, that I consider myself to be acting a far more manly and honourable part by coming forward, and confessing that I am beaten by the force of conviction. Even, if I were not, I do not see, upon mature consideration, that I have any right to cavil at the principles and opinions of an institution, which has a purely humane and philanthropic aim in view; for, ladies and gentlemen, if the Teetotalers err, they at least err upon the right side. Under these circumstances, I shall at once yield to the force of conviction, and admit that I can no longer contest the rectitude of your principles in a fair, candid, and impartial manner. I sincerely thank Mr. Donaldson for the step which his arguments have induced me to take, and I at once sign the pledge-book of The London United Temperance Association!"

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE PROCESSION.

As the London United Temperance Association was formed for the express purpose of promoting the Union of all the friends of true Temperance, it was highly gratifying to the Committee to behold, on Whit-Monday last, the Grand United Procession, and in order to lay before our readers a correct account of that day's proceedings, we shall here give an impartial statement of the order of the day. We take our information from the published reports of the two Societies, concerning their own portion of the line, and giving our own account of the London United Temperance Association, present to our readers the only authentic record of the Grand United Temperance Procession.

The day was fine and beautiful, and at a very early hour the true friends of Temperance were to be seen, in all directions, preparing for the general muster. At seven o'clock most of the Branches were in a state of readiness; and by nine o'clock the larger divisions were in marching order. The whole body, consisting of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, and the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, formed into one line about half-past eleven o'clock in Russell-Square. The Society for the Suppression of Intemperance had previously marched from Finsbury Circus, through the principal portion of the City, including Finsbury Square, Pavement, Moorfields, Princes street, Bank, Mansion House street, Poultry, Cheapside, Newgate street, Holborn. They then proceeded through Museum street, Hart street, Bloomsbury square, Bedford place, into Russell square. The whole line then proceeded through Keppel street, Store street, Alfred place, Chancery street, Tottenham court road, Goodge street, Charles street, Mortimer street, Portland street, Devonshire street, Portland place, Langham place, Regent street, Quadrant, Piccadilly, St. James's street, Pall Mall, Charing Cross, Whitehall, Parliament street, Bridge street, Westminster Bridge. Here the London United Temperance Association left the General Procession, and proceeded according to the printed arrangements along the Westminster road, Borough road, High street, London Bridge, King William street, Princes street, Moorgate street, Fore street, Jewin street, to Aldersgate street chapel—the rest continuing the route as follows: York road, Stamford street, Blackfriars road: where several more of the Societies branched off to their respective localities. The remainder proceeded through Holland street, Gainsford street, Union street, Borough High street, Wellington street, London Bridge, Gracechurch street, Bishopgate, from whence they repaired to their appointed places of meeting.

The following may be considered as the only correct account of the order of Procession.

The New British and Foreign Temperance So

took the lead, as per ballot. West London Auxiliary. Leader, Richard Walkden, Esq., President of the Auxiliary—Eight gentlemen on horseback—Band of musicians in their uniform—Members with wands four abreast—Banner of the Auxiliary, with inscription: "Wine is a mocker," "Peace on earth, goodwill to men."—Members on foot—Banner of the Youths' Temperance Association, "Peace and Plenty."—Members with wands—About seventy youths—Three small banners—Youths with wands—Banners of the St. Pancras Temperance Society—Members on foot—Banner of Westminster Temperance Society—Members on foot—Large banner with inscription, "Universal love to man."—About one hundred members on foot—Banner of Lambeth Friendly Temperance Society—Rehabites with wands—Members on foot—Twenty carriages, average eight in each—Two horsemen—Band of Music—Thirty members with wands—Two hundred members on foot—About fifty youths—Small banner, for ditto—Nine coaches with Members. Chelsea Branch.—Banner well fixed in a Van—Two coaches, with small banners, held by Balfour and Currie—Twenty-two carriages and flags—Twelve vans, averaging twenty-five each, with small union-jack flag to each.

North London Auxiliary.—Omnibus from the Waltham Branch, full of members, and banner, beautifully decorated—Chaise with members—Five gentlemen on horseback—Large banner of the Auxiliary, floating majestically on a car; orange colour, and written in silver letters, "Freed from England's Curse."—Band of musicians, on car—Members with wands, on each side—Splendid carriage, and four greys and postilions, with W. Janson, Esq., President of the Society, supported by several of the Executive Committee—Elegant light carriage, with four beautiful horses and postilions, with the Advocates of the Society, Messrs. Cluer, Holker, Whitaker, and Cassell—Members on each side—Four small banners, carried on carriages—Eight carriages, with members, &c.—Four small banners, "Peace and Concord," "United, we conquer," "Touch not, taste not, handle not," "Goodwill to men."—Banner of the North London Tailors' Association—Members with wands—Van, with members—Members on foot, four abreast.

The London United Temperance Association.

Gentlemen on horseback.

Members with wands.

Band of Music.

Members on foot—Twelve small banners with the following mottoes,

"Peace and concord."

"Truth and justice."

"Religion and piety."

"His eye is on us."

"Temperance."

"Industry."

"Plenty."

"Union is strength."

"Friendship and union."

"Down with thy tyrants."

"Law and obedience."

"We are but a spark, but shall kindle to a flame."

Superb Banner of the Temperance Union in a van.

Carriage with four horses and Postillion.

Containing John Bilton, Esq., the President, and family.

Eleven Carriages with a silk union jack in each, and Members on foot with wands by the side of the carriages.

Two vans with Members.

South London Auxiliary.—Gentlemen on horseback—

Banner, in a van—Band—Coach-and-four, with American

Delegates—and J. Meredith Esq., Vice-President of the Society—Seven coaches, well filled—Members, with wands—Three vans—Members on foot—Banner of the Bernmondsey and Rotherhithe Branch—Vans—Members on foot—Splendid band of Musicians—Members on foot, with wands—Ditto. Stamford-Street and New-Cut branch.—Splendid Banner—Union Jack—Several Carriages and Vans—Members on Foot—South London

Catholic Association—Conductor on Horseback,—

"Banner, "South London Catholic Temperance Society."—Military band—Members, on Foot, very numerous—Carriage with six horses, containing the Rev.

T. Doyle, M. Foristal, Esq., and two Gentlemen—Two

Carriages and Four—Banner, surmounted by a Cross, and St. George and the Dragon, beautifully painted on green silk.

East London Auxiliary.—Shadwell banner—Sixty members and Rehabites on Foot, with wands—Band of music—Rich Banner of Auxiliary, with the pledge written in full—Twenty-four members with wands—Six coaches—Small banner—Three vans.

British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance. Two Horsemen—Three Trumpeters on Horseback—Splendid Crimson Banner, Inscription in Gold, "British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance. President, the Right. Hon. Earl Stanhope."—Eighteen Gentlemen on Horseback—Band of the Scots Fusiliers. City and North of London Aux- iliary.—Very large and richly painted silk Banner with number of allegorical Devices—Members on Foot,— with Banners—Clerkenwell and Pentonville branches.

Members on Foot—with Banner "Be wise as Serpents, and Harmless as Doves"—Members. Youths' Society.—

Committee with wands—preceded by their Officers—

—Banner "Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youths' Tee-total Society"—Members on Foot. Farringdon Branch.—Gentlemen on Horseback—Banners, "Total Abstinence the handmaid of Religion"—the pledge of the Society; the Royal Standard, the Union Jack, &c.—Members—Youths. London Coal-Porters' Association.—Splend silk Banner, the Coal-Porters' arms, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Finsbury and Hoxton

Youths' Association. Musical Band—Banner, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it."

Southern Counties Order of Rechabites.—Red Banner, with Tent and Palm tree, motto, "We drink no wine."

South London Auxiliary, Kent Street Branch.—Members on foot. Banner, "United, firm, and free." Dept- ford Branch.—Members on foot Clapham Branch.—

Members on foot. Vauxhall Branch.—Members on foot

Each of the above had a variety of neat banners.

Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence

Association.—Large green silk banner, with Jesus conversing with the women of Samaria, painted on one side, by J. Henley, Esq., R. N.: motto on the top,

"Give me to drink," on the other side a large cross in silver, on which was written the pledge, with motto on the top, "On earth, peace to men of good-will;" at the bottom, "Metropolitan Roman Catholic Association, founded by John Giles, January 28, 1840."

—Members on foot, to the number of upwards of one thousand; many of them bearing wands, painted green, with ball and cross, at the top, gilt with silver—General director on horseback, with polished mahogany wand, silver ball and cross at the top—Conductor with a staff, painted green and tipped with silver, having a solid brass

figure of a young cupid emerging from a full blown rose—Carriage, containing Anthony Walgovel, Esq.,

the Treasurer, and Mrs. Giles, the wife of the founder—

Four vans—Military Band.

Hackney Auxiliary, Haggerstone Branch.—Banners and flags—Members—Banner and Band—Carriage, with

Dr. Oxley, the treasurer; Norton S. Townsend, M. D., representative of the Total Abstinence Society of Physicians and Surgeons at New York; Mr. R. M'Curdy,

&c.—Eighty-six carriages—Mr. J. Pascoe's van, with Printing Press, motto, "May the liberty of the Press never be turned into licentiousness." There was in the van an immense round of beef, with bread, &c., which was distributed pretty liberally throughout the route.

Waltham and Camberwell Association. Four horsemen

—Military band—Large and handsome banner—Members on foot, with scarfs—Blue and white banner—

Carriage-and-four—Eleven carriages—Sixteen vans—

Several banners interspersed—Mr. G. G. Smith, with the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Society, in a van.

The children frequently sang during the day—Some gentlemen on horseback brought up the rear.

The numbers in the procession have been calculated variously from twelve to twenty thousand. The line was so often broken that it was difficult to count with exactness. But there were many hundreds of our members who did not join in the procession, but who preferred viewing us from suitable situations, or from windows engaged for the purpose. The greatest order and decorum was maintained, and but few accidents occurred. That some idea of the length of the whole line may be formed, we may just mention that it took nearly an hour and a half to pass any given point. It is said to have occupied nearly three miles in length. The progress was slow, for it had to pass through as dense a mass of human beings as was perhaps ever congregated on a public occasion. A mass which contemplated the procession with various feelings: a mass which included hundreds and thousands of poor deluded men and women, whose appearance and demeanour gave full proof that they had not been operated upon by Teetotal principles. The procession terminated about four o'clock.

A variety of meetings were held in various parts of the metropolis in the evening, most of which were nu-merously attended, and many signatures obtained.

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the London United Temperance Association lost no time in demonstrating their attachment to Her Majesty; they having on the 13th inst., in the name of the members, presented to Her Majesty, an Address of congratulation, on her escape from the late murderous attempt of Edward Oxford.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

The Humble Address of the London United Temperance Association.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN.

We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the London United Temperance Association, beg leave humbly to approach your Majesty's throne, to express our horror and indignation at the late atrocious and treasonable attempt against your Majesty's sacred person, and our heart-felt congratulations to your Majesty, and to our country, on your Majesty's preservation from so great a danger.

We acknowledge with the deepest humility and gratitude the arm of the Lord arresting the arm of the assassin, and trust that our endeavours to establish true Temperance, or Total-Abstinence from all Intoxicating Drinks, may tend to establish your Throne in peace, order, sobriety and righteousness, and to the abolition of a great portion of the crimes which afflict our land.

We desire to express to your Majesty the deep concern which we feel at there having been found within your Majesty's dominions a person capable of so flagitious an act, and that we make it our earnest prayer to Almighty God that he will preserve to us the blessings which we enjoy under your Majesty's just and mild Government and continue to watch over a life so justly dear to us.

JOHN BILTON, President,

H. W. WESTON,

J. H. DONALDSON,

Honorary Secretaries.

To which Her Majesty has been pleased to return the following most gracious answer, through her principal Secretary of State for the Home department.

WHITEHALL, June, 17th, 1840.

Sir,—I have had the honour to lay before the Queen the loyal and dutiful address from the London United Temperance Association.

And I have it in command to assure you that Her Majesty is deeply sensible of the loyalty and affection of Her faithful subjects.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

NORMANBY.

H. W. Weston Esq., 12, Basing Lane.

NOCTES PICKWICKIANÆ.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. I.

Mr. Pickwick.—Sam, you may give me your opinion of that Madeira which came in this morning, if you like.

Sam.—Can't be done, Sir, as the wery old donkey observed to the costermonger, vich wanted him to trot ten mile an hour.

Mr. Pickwick.—Can't be done! and why not, Sam?

Sam.—'Cos I've jined them water-drinkin', beer-excludin', moral-reformation, out-an'-out sober fellers as calls 'emselvs Teetotalers.

Mr. Pickwick.—Indeed, Sam! How came you to do that? You really surprise me.

Sam.—Des-say I does, Sir, but can't help it; truth must come out some day or another, vich was the remark made by the pie-man when he was detected in having cut up his domestic cat to make pork-sauces of. But I'll jist tell you, Sir, how all this come about.

Mr. Pickwick.—Do, Sam. You may sit down.

Sam.—Wery much obleeged, Sir. Well, Sir, t'other night I met a friend o' mine—a wery nice nisan as gets his livin' by bonnetin'—

Mr. Pickwick.—Making ladies' bonnets, I presume, Sam?

Sam.—Lor, Sir—how exceedin' green you air, to be sure. Why, this young feller as I was a speakin' on, acts as bonnet to ngaming house—a sort o' decoy-duck you know, Sir; an' a wery nice young man he is for a limited number at a tea-party—wery. Well—I meets him close agin' Aldgate pump, and sees him drinking away at the wery wholesome element as flows from that there pump, jist as if he was a lunatic.—"Bill," says I, "wot rum rig is that there all on a sudden? If you aint got no money, say so," says I, "and I'll lend you a tanner to pay for a pot o' half-and-half."—"Thankee kindly," says he; "but I doesn't do that now."—"Do what?" says I.—

"Why, drink beer, or hale, or sperets," says he, shudderin' at the bare mention o' the thing as a mad dog does at water.—"Come, none o' that gammon," says I; "p'raps you'd like to persuade me next that you breakfastesses, lunches, dines, teas, and sups at this here pump. But I can't cram in every thing so wery easy, as the alderman said ven they asked him to take his ninth plate o' turtle-soup."—"I tell 'ee wot, Sam," says my friend Bill, "it ain't no use a talkin': there wasn't a feller as enjoyed his glass o' grog or his pint o' half-and-half more than I did; but then the old woman didn't get nothin' o' my money on Saturday night. The little ones was in rags, and the cupboard was always empty. All my clothes was lent on a mortgage deed to my father's brother—"

Mr. Pickwick.—Why couldnt he say his uncle, Sam?

Sam.—'Cos it ain't genteel, Sir. Howsomever—this young man, as I am a talkin' on, told me such a piteous tale of his miseries while he was a drunkard, and how he'd often lived for whole weeks on nature and sometimes had the salt without the taters—and how he turned Teetotaler—and how he soon got all his little comforts about him agin—and how he paid off his mortgages with his father's brother—and how his family is now genteelly dressed—and how he comed every mornin' to Aldgate pump on his way to his work, to get a draught on that very celebrated bank cashed,—that I determined to go with him to a Teetotal meeting that very same night. "Better late than never," says I to myself; and that was also the remark made by the chimney-sweep ven he washed his face on Christmas-day.

Mr. Pickwick.—And did you go to this meeting, Sam?

Sam.—Did I not—that's all! to be sure I did; an' a very tidy one it was too. First one feller with a wooden leg gets up, and tells the people that he never knowed wet health and happiness was till he signed a pledge-book, as they calls it. He seemed a wery nice kind of a man, and made a wery excellent speech. Then comed a calico-printer from Sturford; an' he drew a most afflictin' pickter of his case afore he was reclaimed, for he'd been a terrible hard-drinker, sure-ly. Then comed three or four others; an' a wery great impression they made upon the audience, as Van Amburgh said ven all his lions and tigers jumped down into the pit o' the theatre. An' then comed that young gen'leman with spectacles on, as wrote the wery celebrated account o' our adventures, doin's, and sayin's in France, under the title o' Pickwick Abroad, you know, Sir. Wery much surprised I was to see him there—

Mr. Pickwick.—Why, Sam?

Sam.—'Cos I thought all literary men was lusting tellers. I heard talk o' von o' them chaps as had a certain task given him to do, three hours to do it in, an' a bottle o' champagne to cheer his sperets while he was a-doin' it. But when the person as give him the job, went to see if it was done, he found that it wasn't begun, an' that the literary gen'leman was so drunk under the table, he'd been sick upon the paper on which he ought to have wrote.—"Vy, my eyes," says the wisor, "blowed if you've ever touched that there little job as I give you at all!"—"Not touched it!" hiccups the literary gen'leman;—"vy, don't ye see that I've been poring over it?"

Mr. Pickwick.—Not bad, Sam. But let me hear the result of the meeting.

Sam.—With wery great pleasure, Sir—as Jack Ketch said, ven the gen'leman asked him to make the rope long. Well, Sir—I see and heard a good deal at that Teetotal meeting in Aldersgitt-street, to vich I'm alludin'; an' blessed it vonce or twice I did n't vipe away a tear, as the soldier said ven he turned upon the hill, you know, Sir. At last I could n't stand it no longer: I jumps up—starts out o' the pew where I was a-sittin'—bolts up the stairs to the platform—knocks two old vimen un' a rayther stout gen'leman down in the hurry and confusion o' the moment—snatched a pen out o' the hands o' von o' the fellers as was sittin' on the platform, and writes the name o' Samuel Weller down in the pledge-book.

Mr. Pickwick.—I cannot blame you, Sam, for the step you have taken. The Institution is doubtless a philanthropic and humane one, and must do much good.

Sam.—So then there immortal lines as I wrote to my wife, and which the gen'leman in spectacles copied into his book, page 352, must be altered in a certain way.

Mr. Pickwick.—How?

Sam.—I'll jist read them wery remarkable lines to you, Sir, with the amendment. These is 'em:—

MR. WELLER TO HIS WIFE.

There aint no place, my dearest Mary,

Vere I don't think of thee.

Ven you're lookin' up the kitchen aircy

With a hinsant on your knee.

Oh! when you're gazin' through the vinder

To watch for my return,

My heart, vich your charms has made a ciuder,

To wery dust will burn.

Dear Mary, I'll ever think of you:—

Ve haven't a deater friend than our wife.

As the gen'leman said as was transported for life

For havin' married two!

To Dulwich I shall baste so nimble

When Pickwick gives the word:

And, seated by the kitchen chimbley,

I'll tell you all I've beard.

So, Mary, in a glass o' water

I'll drink myself an' you;

For to you I'll stick like bricks and mortar,

And I'll toast the babbies too.

But best friends must part, through some mishap;

As the mouse observed, with a troubled mind,

When he was forced to leave half of his tail behind.

As he escaped from the trap!

Pickwick.—I approve of the alteration, Sam. You may leave the now. But—Sam!

Yes, Sir.
Mr. Pickwick.—When you lay the cloth for dinner to-day, don't put any wine or beer upon the table. I'll jist try this Teetotal system for a week or two. I'll then tell you what I think of it.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE BOTTLE IMP.

BY THE PRINTER'S DEVIL.

RECLINED on a luxurious couch, by a blazing fire, sat the Lord of Ellistone. Twice had he filled the cup with wine; and then, with unconscious gaze fixed on the flickering flame, sat motionless. The sun had set some hours, and through the richly-curtained window twilight had stolen in, and blended all things in one indistinct outline, save where the towering flame lighted up the room, and disclosed the disturbed countenance of the proprietor.

Starting from his reverie—again he filled the cup. "All all is gone," he cried: "the last mortgage now awaits my signature, leaving the Lord of Ellistone nothing but his name. What blighting spirit has thus cast its blasting influence on all my family; leaving me, their poor descendant, the unenviable task of reading to the world the black catalogue of all their woes?" Under the influence of the temporary excitement, too hastily dashing down the bottle, it broke,—and, drop by drop, the wine stole over the table side, and formed a crimson pool. Childishly gazing on the effects of his rashness,—time stole away—the last spark of the fire was reflected in that purple stream, and all was darkness.

Suddenly starting from his reverie, he was horror-struck on perceiving through the gloom two piercing eyes of flame glaring on him. By degrees the outline of a figure became manifest: and, by its approach, transfixed the noble Lord. Then, rivetted as a statue to its base, he heard in mournful voice the spirit's complaint.

"Know, tyrant, that for twenty years have I, by cruel enchantment, been held in that bottle, and immured in the darkest dungeon of this castle. My companions have, one by one, been taken from me; but ere our eternal separation, in foul conspiracy, we pledged revenge:—full well we've kept that bond,—and thorn after thorn we've planted in thy breast; and I, the last of my race, have lived to finish the deed. 'Tis done! tyrant!—behold thy tormentor,—let my name be seared on thy heart;—ALCOHOL! THE BOTTLE IMP!"

NOTICE TO OUR READERS.

We shall in future devote a portion of our Journal to A LIST OF ALL LONDON TEETOTAL MEETINGS. Reviews of New Books, Miscellaneous Information, and an Analysis or abridged Report of the speeches delivered from the platform of the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Saturday evenings, with the names of the speakers, &c. These features are excluded from our first Number, in consequence of the necessity of publishing a correct and unaltered account of the Whit-Monday Procession. "The two Brewers," by Mr. H. W. Weston, Hon. Sec. shall appear in our next.

HART'S LONDON TEMPERANCE HOTEL AND COFFEE-HOUSE, 129 Aldersgate-street. Established 1875.

This house has been established for the accommodation of Commercial men, Families, and others, visiting the Metropolis, on business or pleasure. It is centrally situated, and contiguous to the Post-office, St. Paul's, the principal Coach and Railway offices. To those who study quietness, comfort, cleanliness, and economy, this Establishment affords superior advantages to that of the Tavern, or Public-house. To those kind friends who have hitherto so liberally supported the above Establishment, the proprietor, Mr. Hart, returns his most sincere thanks, and hopes by the extensive enlargement, and other improvements he has lately made in his premises, combined with strict attention to the comfort of his guests, to merit a continuation of their patronage. To those resident in Town, this house has many attractions: Teetotalers may meet with kindred spirits; others may find mental recreation, as well as personal refreshment in the following list of Publications or Newspapers.

COUNTRY PAPERS.

Liverpool Mercury	Dublin Weekly Registrar
Norwich Mercury	Dublin Weekly Herald
Leeds Mercury	Edinburgh Journal
Manchester Guardian	Sheffield Iris
Bath and Cheltenham Gazette	Cambridge
Birmingham Gazette	Aylesbury News

LONDON NEWSPAPERS.

Morning Times	Evening Standard	Western
Chronicle	Sun	Patriot
Morning Herald	Courier	Record
Post	Globe	Watchman
		Dispatch

PERIODICALS.

Blackwood	Baptist	Athenaeum
Frazer	Westonian	Mechanics' Magazine
Metropolitan	Edinburgh Journal	Penny Mechanic and
New Monthly	Penny Magazine	Chemist
Eclectic Review	Saturday Magazine	Humphrey's Clock
Bentley's Miscellany	London Saturday	Poor Jack
Monthly Chronicle	Journal	Tower of London
Evangelical	Tales of the Border	&c. &c.
	The Teetotaler
	Teetotal Magazine and Literary Miscellany
	Temperance Journal
	Temperance Intelligence, &c.

PERSON'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Lately published in two volumes, post 8vo., price 2s., cloth.
THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE.
By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.
This work contains critical notices upon the following eminent French Authors, with Select Tales from their best productions:
Victor Hugo. Frederic Soulie.
Eugene Sue.
De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.
Paul de Kock. Jules Janin.
Merimee. Alexandre Dumas.
Nodier. Michel Masson.
Ricard. De Jouffroy.
De Lamartine. De Berenger.

In a few days will be published (Cheap Edition.)
THE LAST DAY OF A CONDEMNED.
Translated from the French of Victor Hugo.
By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

In the Press (Nearly ready)
SISTER ANNE.
A Novel translated from the French of Paul de Kock.
By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.
With Illustrations by ALFRED CROWEVILL.
GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, OLD BAILLY.

WORKS BY G. W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.
MR. TEOG, having purchased the copyrights of the following popular Works, the whole of which are Stereotyped, is enabled to offer them at reduced prices.—

PICKWICK ABROAD,
Or the Tour in France.
With Forty-one Steel Engravings, and Thirty-three beautiful Wood Cuts.
Now Sold at 12s.—Originally published at 21s.

GRACE DARLING,
Or the Heroine of the Fern Islands.
With Twenty Steel Engravings.
Now Sold at 4s.—Originally published at 6s.
Printed for THOMAS TEOG, 73, CHURCH-LANE.

London United Temperance Association.
EXCURSION TO RICHMOND.
The Committee have engaged the well known Superior Steam Packets

ECLIPSE AND VIVID,
For an Excursion to RICHMOND, on Monday, the 26th of July, 1840. The Members and any Friends wishing to accompany them will meet at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street, at eight o'clock on the above morning, and walk in procession to Queen's-hill-pier with the Splendid Banners, Flags, and Band, used in the late procession, and embark at nine o'clock precisely. Proceed to Richmond, hold a large Meeting, and dine in the Park, and return to the Delightful Foxhall Pleasure Gardens, Foxhall Pier, which are engaged for the Evening to Tea, where there will be a Grand Concert D'EETE, by first-rate performers.

The President, John Bilton, Esq.; George W. M. Reynolds, Esq., Author of Pickwick Abroad, &c. &c. and Editor of the Teetotaler; and Messrs. Curry, Balfour, Crump, and Gawthrop, the Advocates, will be of the party.

Tickets, Tea included, 3s. 6d. each. The number being limited to 400, early application must be made to secure them.

Tickets may be had of the Secretaries, Mr. Weston, 12 Basing-lane. Mr. J. H. Donaldson, 1 Seckford-street, Clerkenwell; and of the following Members of the Committee, Messrs. Caudle and Marriot, 3, Paul's-head-court, Newgate-street; Mr. Clark, 7 Chews-ride, Little-moorfields; Mr. Higby, 16, New-court, Milton-street; Mr. B. Kirby, 8, Benjamin-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Crump, 1 Red-lion-market, White-cross-street; Mr. Griffiths, 49, Southampton-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Gawthrop, 39, Fore-street, Cripplegate; Dennis's Coffee-house, Jerusalem-passage, Clerkenwell; Thompson's Union Coffee-house, Golden-lane. Mr. Brown, 4 Curran-road; Mr. Adkins, Curtain-road; and at Aldersgate-street Chapel, every Wednesday and Saturday Evening, from 8 to 10, of the Excursion Committee.

The Steamers will call at Hungerford-market, at Westminster-bridge, and Chelsea-pier, for convenience of friends in these vicinities, going and returning.

E. BROWNE, Cabinet, Upholstery, and Looking-Glass Ware-Rooms, Nos. 3 and 4, Curtain Road, Shoreditch, London.

The trade and others supplied on the lowest terms, for prompt payment.

DENNIS'S Jerusalem Temperance Eating-House, Coffee and Reading Rooms, No. 6, Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell Green.

C.D., the person who painted the large Banner for the City Central and North London Auxiliary for the grand procession, the workmanship and materials of which (silk excepted) he gave to the Society, as acknowledged in their last report, begs to inform the friends of true temperance that he has opened the above House, and earnestly solicits their patronage and support. He assures them that nothing shall be wanting on his part to render them comfortable, should they favour him with their custom.

A commodious room for Committee-meetings, and a Temperance Social Meeting every Saturday evening, at eight o'clock.

BABINGTON'S ELIXIR OF RHUBARB.

Too much praise cannot be given to the individual who, having an inclination to drunkenness, joins the Temperance Association, but the difficulty is found great, owing to the weakened state of the stomach; but if the justly celebrated medicine "Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken for a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit-drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success in all diseases arising from Indigestion; namely, Bilious Head-aches, Diarrhoea, Spasm, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., by J. KIRK, proprietor, 72, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Faringdon-street, and all respectable Chemists.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers.
All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid to the care of the Printer.

London.—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No 2.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Teetotaler" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the London United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-lane, Bread Street: MR. J. H. DONALDSON, Hon. Sec., No. 1 Seekford Street, Clerkenwell; MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER III.

THE DILIGENCE.

With a heavy heart Victor returned on foot to Paris. He entered the gay city by the Faubourg du Roule a few minutes before midnight; and from many of the houses by which he passed, issued the sounds of music and the echoes of mirth. As he passed along the Faubourg Saint Honoré, numbers of splendid equipages swept by, carrying their wealthy owners from the theatres, or the fashionable circles where they had passed the evening, back to those dwellings in which every luxury awaited their slightest signal. In those carriages were beautiful women, with diamonds on their arms and necks, and bird-of-paradise feathers on their brow; and elegantly attired men, who had probably lost or won a few minutes before, at some game of chance, that amount which would have made our young hero happy. And, as he contemplated those gorgeous equipages, and caught a glimpse of their inmates as a lamp threw its glare upon the carriage-windows, a murmur of discontent escaped his lips, and he wondered wherefore a few were born to happiness, and so many to misfortune.

Like many others of the same age, before they have profoundly studied the volume of human nature, a perfect knowledge of which can only be acquired by matured years, and whose chapters and paragraphs may be perused in every scene into which we are daily thrown, like many others, Victor knew not at this period, that human happiness and misery are parcelled out with due equity, and that the man, who appears to be the most to be envied, has his private and secret griefs, as well as he whose lot outwardly seems deplorable in the extreme. If the wealthy individual be afflicted with sickness, the poor one enjoys health; no one is ever satisfied with his lot; and the most fortunate in one sphere invariably envies the position of a successful man in another. But no one should dissert upon this subject after Horace; because no one can explain the discontentment of the world so well: and he, who, in a moment of despair, complains against his fate, would do well to peruse the essay which commences with the words, "Qui fit Mæcenas, &c."

Victor Melville pursued his way up the Boulevards, to the Rue Lafitte, where he resided. The porter of the house, in which he lived, gave him a light as he passed by the little lodge in which that individual dwelt; and the young man ran hastily up a narrow staircase, until he arrived at the sixth story. There he took a key from his pocket, and opened the door that led into the little apartment which he had occupied since his arrival in Paris. The contents of that chamber were all his worldly possessions; and he had made up his mind to dispose of them, to defray the expenses of his journey to England, and ensure the means of procuring a lodging and a meal on his arrival in London. A tear stole down his cheek as he contemplated the sacrifice he was thus forced to make; for, on the first day when he had purchased those few things, he had surveyed them with a sentiment of pride and satisfaction, although he had not lately thought of keeping them in proper order. Alas! it grieves us to be compelled to confess, that, in spite of his good resolutions so recently expressed to Louise, he drowned his regrets and his cares in the red juice of the grape, ere he retired to his couch!

He, however, awoke at an early hour, and fancied himself obliged to take a dram to enable him to commence his struggles against the world. The old portress who lighted his fire and prepared his breakfast, was thunderstruck when she was informed of his intention to leave Paris; and she proceeded with a sorrowful countenance to execute the last order of her English lodger, which was to procure the immediate attendance of a broker.

"I am desirous of disposing of all my furniture this very morning," said Melville to the broker, who soon made his appearance; "I gave about a thousand francs for it only a few months ago."

"You know, Sir," said the broker, who was one of the polite French tradesmen of the old school, "that property never fetches that which it cost. But I shall not be very hard upon Monsieur: I will give a hundred and fifty francs upon the spot, and—and—not keep Monsieur waiting one moment."

"Six pounds for that which cost forty," mused Victor aloud in English: then, after a moment's pause, he said, addressing himself to the broker in the vernacular tongue spoken by that individual, "You offer me very little: it is a great sacrifice which I make."

"Mille pardons, Monsieur!" cried the broker; "but the sacrifice is on the other side! I tender fifty francs more than the real value of the goods; and I think you cannot hesitate to throw your sketches and paintings into the bargain."

"Give me two hundred francs—eight pounds in English money—and I close with you at once!" said Victor, disheartened at the mediocrity of the man's offers.

"To oblige you, I will; but only to oblige you," returned your broker; "upon my honour!"

The youth was compelled to accept this sum; and even this was not paid to him until all the goods were safely stowed away in a covered van which the broker proceeded to fetch from his own premises. Victor then paid his little debts, packed up his clothes, corded his own trunk, and, at the proper hour, carried it on his shoulder to the gate where he consigned it to a ticket-porter. His pride constrained him to admit the necessity of this extravagance; and as the clock struck five, he and the commissioner entered the great Diligence Yard of the Messageries Royales, in the Rue Notre Dame des Victoires.

The young man found, upon inquiry, that there was exactly one place still free; and this was in the rotonde, or hindermost department of the vehicle. This division of the triple coach, which forms a French diligence, is also the cheapest. It was therefore with feelings of satisfaction that Victor took possession of the place he had been fortunate enough to secure. In a few minutes after he had entered the vehicle, the conductor ascended to the top, the postilion mounted his horse, and the ponderous machine was set in motion.

There were six persons in the rotonde of the diligence. On the right hand of Victor sat a gentleman, whose age might have been estimated at about six-and-twenty, and whose garments might have been supposed to have owed their origin to the year I. He wore large bushy black whiskers; and his dark hair hung in lanky masses over an especially greasy coat collar. The coat itself was of light green, with brass buttons; the waistcoat beneath it was buff; and whether there was anything at all beneath the waistcoat, no one could venture to assert, because a large black stock concealed the shirt, if there were one, or the place where there ought to have been one. This gentleman's trousers were of shabby black, and were stretched over a pair of half-boots by means of thin straps. Upon his hands he wore a pair of old black gloves, which had been cunningly contrived to admit the fresh air to the fingers; and when he required to blow his nose, he invariably turned his head as much round as possible, took off his hat, and thence extracted an article which only a capacious fancy could have taken for a handkerchief. For the rest, this individual gazed upon his fellow-travellers with a patronizing air, but was exceedingly polite to every one whenever he made an observation or listened to one; and as he seemed to be a person of considerable information, Victor was far from displeased to discover that he was an Englishman.

On the left hand of our hero was an old English lady; and opposite to her was her daughter. Both were exceedingly vulgar—the former very ugly, and the latter rather pretty; and each had a very good opinion of herself. The other two inmates of the rotonde were French gentlemen, whom it is not necessary to describe.

"Going to Calais, Sir?" said the English gentleman with the shabby attire, to Victor.

"I am," was the answer; "and thence to Dover."

"So am I!" ejaculated the stranger.

"Where do you put up at Calais?"

"I really have no choice," replied Melville.

"We'll go to the first hotel. Believe me, it is always the best plan to patronize the best hotels. They would do any thing for me at Dessein's; and I am well known as an Apicius in my way."

"I shall be most happy to place myself under your guidance," observed Victor. "Do you go as far as London?"

"London! of course I do," ejaculated the shabby gentleman, as if he were surprised at the doubt implied by the question. "So do you—eh? Well, we'll travel together all the way. There's nothing like society; Alexander was miserable without Clitus; and if Brutus had not been left alone in his tent, he would not have seen the ghost which gave him an appointment at Philippi."

"You are fond of the classics, doubtless, Sir," was the remark ventured by Victor Melville, after a pause.

"Fond of them!" exclaimed the stranger, almost insulted by the mere idea of the possibility that he should not be so; "fond of them! Why, they are meat, drink, lodging, and fire to me."

Melville could not help thinking that if they played the part of a tailor and bootmaker also, it would not be amiss: he however surveyed his new acquaintance with considerable respect,—a sentiment that was encouraged by the literary predilection manifested by his great veneration for the classics.

"There, ma, I knowed what it would be!" exclaimed the young lady, at this crisis, to her mother, in consequence of a peasant leaping up on the step behind the vehicle, and grazing into the rotonde: "I knowed we should be compelled to put up with all kinds of unpleasantness, riding in this part of the diligence."

"Well, my dear Betsy," answered the parent, in a conciliating tone, "there was no other places to take, and you're awear that your pa expects us. What a perwoking thing it is, that Balls couldn't percrastinate his marriage, till he'd gived us time to get home. But them pawn-brokers always does things in such a hurry."

"Yes, yes; I know all about it," cried Miss Betsy, bestowing a violent kick upon her mother's toes, at this betrayal of the calling professed by Mr. Balls, in consequence of whose nuptials, it appeared that the two ladies had been suddenly compelled to return to their native city; which, indeed, they should never have left, as they were not the most favourable specimens England could have sent abroad to foreign climes.

"Lor, Betsy, do mind my corns!" exclaimed the poor old lady, screwing up her mouth in agony: "my feet isn't so hard as your'n. But, what was I a saying of? Oh! we was talking of Balls's marriage, with your cousin Henrietta Maria. I dare say there 'll be a strong muster of very gen-teel people at the veddin. Balls thinks of giving up the pawn-broking business, and going into the wine way. I wonder at that: it ud be all very well if so be he'd been a bankrupt, 'cause all bankrupts nat'rally turns wine or coal-merchants; but to give up such a business as he's got! Why, I think he said that he never lent less than fifty pounds on flat-irons alone, every Saturday night of his life!"

"I am sure he's not my cousin reglarly!" cried Miss Elizabeth, who had in vain endeavoured to arrest the progress of this torrent of words, by such small obstacles as winks, nods, kicks, and 'hems,' were likely to throw in the way; but all her attempts were as unavailing as if she had essayed to build an embankment at the mouth of the Orinoco; for her mother never ceased speaking until she had exhausted the topic.

"Ah! a wedding is a fine thing!" cried the shabby gentleman, who seemed anxious to form every one's acquaintance, to effect which aim he had already begged a pinch of snuff of one of the Frenchmen, and trodden on the toe of the other, in order that he might have an opportunity of begging his pardon: "a wedding is a fine thing! Appollodorus has left us a splendid description of the union of Ataulphus and Placidia, at which Attalus, the ex-Roman Emperor, was present."

"Yes, I recollect reading of it in the papers," observed the young lady, with an affected tone.

"The deuce you do!" exclaimed the stranger, taken somewhat aback by this announcement; but, instantly recollecting himself, he added, "I never was at more than one wedding in my life, and that was when my old grandmother, who was in her dotage, married a third time. She threw herself away upon a young fellow of seventeen!"

"Or rather he threw himself away upon her," said Victor, smiling at this anecdote.

"No, he got plenty of money; and she had been very handsome," rejoined the gentleman. "Paris, you know, could have only loved Helen for the renown of her beauty, as she was upwards of sixty when she ran away with him; and my grandmother was only seven years older."

In such conversation as this was the time wiled away, until the travellers alighted to sup at Claremont. Had Victor been prudent, he would have saved the few francs to be disbursed upon this meal, and satisfied his own appetite with a bun or a roll purchased at a baker's shop: but he could not resist the temptation of finding an excuse to partake of a bottle of wine with his companions; and he accordingly took his place at the table d'hôte. The shabby gentleman seemed perfectly well acquainted with the landlord, and the domestics of the inn, and was treated by them with the utmost respect. A bottle of champagne, besides the ordinary wine, was served up to him; and, to increase the mystery in the eyes of Victor, not a fraction was demanded of him, when the rest paid each his account. Our hero was not, however, as yet sufficiently acquainted with the shabby gentleman to demand an explanation of this phenomenon; and the shabby gentleman, on his part, did not seem to observe that the circumstance had attracted any particular attention.

The travellers resumed their places in the diligence; and, as it was now quite dark, they could only hear, and not see each other. One of the French gentlemen profited by this circumstance, to consign his wig to his pocket, and substitute a white cotton night-cap as a tegument for his head; and the other smoked a cigar out of the window, Miss Betsy having declared that she was a great admirer of the smell of tobacco-smoke in the open air. The old lady chattered about her London acquaintances—Mr. Balls the Pawnbroker—the way to serve up a sucking-pig—the best remedy for a cough—the delights of Paris—the fatigues of travelling—and a variety of matters equally interesting, but too numerous to categorise; and when she was thoroughly tired of making noise with her tongue, she tried what her nose could do in the way of snoring, to the unmitigated disgust of her daughter.

Victor and his new acquaintance sustained a miscellaneous conversation with Miss Betsy for some time; and then they sank off to sleep one after the other. When they awoke in the morning, just at that chilly hour at which the dawn begins to assert its empire over this hemisphere, they all wondered that time had passed away so rapidly; and the old lady, who had not ceased snoring throughout the night, declared most solemnly that she had never slept a wink.

At about ten o'clock they arrived at Amiens, where they were to breakfast; and here Melville remarked a repetition of that which had so essentially astonished him at Claremont, in respect to his new acquaintance. The shabbily-attired gentleman was treated with the utmost respect; and it was evident that, if he were ever so much in want of a shirt, he was by no means put to his shift on his road to Calais. Indeed, the best of every thing was served up to him; and of all the guests at the breakfast table, he alone received a card, setting forth the excellencies of the hotel, from the hands of the landlord. Melville was still compelled to put the bridle of patience, upon the steed of curiosity; he however hoped that a short time would elucidate the mystery; for he could not conceive how a man, whose personal appearance was not calculated to command credit for a penny loaf, was thus enabled to eat and drink of the best, without disbursing a fraction at the inns at which he stopped.

During that day, Victor and the shabby gentleman became much more intimate with the two English ladies, than they had previously been; and the mother actually carried her condescension so far as to say, "that she should be delighted to see them at her house in London." She then inserted her hand into a large bag, which she called a "ridicule;" and, from amidst a miscellaneous collection of hard-eggs, biscuits, cakes, lozenges, a smelling bottle, and a handkerchief, she drew forth two cards, one of which she presented to Victor, and the other to the gentleman in the shabby attire. On these cards, which were about the size of those used to play with, were printed in very large type, these words: "Mrs. TERRYWHIST, Number 2, Terrywhist Terrace, Camden Town."

"That's the name of our place, gentlemen," said the old lady, with a complacent smile. "My husband built the terrace, you see; and we occupy one of the houses."

"Mr. Terrywhist is then an architect, I presume, ma'am," said the shabby gentleman.

"No, Sir, he is not," was the reply.

"A surveyor, probably, ma'am?"

"No, Sir."

"Oh! I see—a builder," cried the shabby gentleman, determined to guess on.

"No, Sir, nor yet a builder," said the lady.

"A speculator?"

"No, Sir."

"What then, ma'am?" asked the stranger.

"A bricklayer, Sir," was the answer.

"Retired from business with a large fortune," immediately super-added Miss Elizabeth Terrywhist. "It was with the greatest difficulty that we could prevail upon pa to give his name to the terrace, he is so exceedingly dewoid of pride. He even wanted to call it after an old uncle of ours, from whom we've considerable expectations; but we wouldn't hear of it."

"Hear of it—no!" echoed the old lady.

"What a pretty address it would have been to give 'MR. TERRYWHIST, Tunks' Terrace.' To be sure, Tunks is a name as well as another; and may be a very ancient one for anything that I know; but at the same time Tunks' doesn't sound by no means aristocratic; so that's the reason we rejected the name of Tunks, and gave our own which is Terrywhist."

"And very right you were too," said the shabby gentleman, endeavouring to elongate his coat-sleeves, between the cuffs of which and his gloves there were large portions of the wrists left bare. "The ancients gave the names of illustrious men to their streets; and I do not see wherefore the moderns should not imitate them."

At about four o'clock the travellers reached Saint Pol, where they stopped to dinner. At the table d'hôte, on this occasion, as on others, the shabby gentleman commanded the respect of the landlord; and Victor thought that he must be either a nobleman in disguise, or a swindler travelling upon promises. The stranger was not however solicited to disburse a centime for his expences at the hotel; and the landlord even solicited a favour at his hands at parting.

"Do not forget, Sir, to recommend my establishment as strongly as you have hitherto done," said he; "and have the kindness to inform your friends that I have diminished my charges, and that I have ceased to send in weekly bills. Nothing will induce the English to come to my house more than long credit; and, if one or two take me in, those who pay will make up for the loss. There is excellent sporting in this neighbourhood."

"I shall not forget what you have just told me," said the shabby gentleman. "Next year, at precisely the same time, I shall pass this way again."

The travellers returned to the diligence; and Melville was more than ever at a loss to solve this mystery. The object of his wonder did not, however, notice the sensation which he had created in the mind of the young man; and no one else had observed that which had so profoundly excited the curiosity of our hero.

At about five on the second morning, the diligence entered Calais. By the advice of the shabby gentleman, the two ladies repaired to Dessein's Hotel, whither they were accompanied by that individual and Melville. Three bedrooms were immediately put in requisition; and for a few hours they all slept off the fatigues of the long journey from Paris. They breakfasted together in the coffee-room; and there, as elsewhere upon the road, did the shabby gentleman escape without being even solicited for payment. As soon as breakfast was dismissed, the little party proceeded to the quay, where they embarked on board a steam-packet bound for Dover.

On the road from Paris Victor had not found much leisure to indulge his gradually increasing propensity to the most demoralizing and degrading of habits—drinking. But the moment he arrived on board the vessel, the excitement of travelling having passed off, and the monotony of the sea being essentially calculated to awaken unhappy sensations in the mind of the young man—he hurried into the cabin, and sought a deceptive and evanescent felicity in a glass of strong liquor. All his good resolutions vanished from his memory as he imbibed the exhilarating fluid; he bestowed one sigh upon Louise, but did not choose to remember her kind counsel; and as soon as the glass of brandy-and-water was disposed of, he could not resist the temptation of ordering a second. The cheeks of the young man became flushed, his eyes sparkled with unnatural lustre, and he felt himself inspired with that brutal species of courage which defies alike the sorrows and the temptations of this world. He rose from the seat in the cabin, and with a light heart—though still with a lingering consciousness in his bosom of having done wrong—ascended to the deck of the vessel.

"This shall positively be the last time that I will drink in the morning," said he, as the fresh air of the sea fanned his heated countenance. "O Louise! your image henceforth shall fortify me to dare all the evils which fate may have in store for me!"

(To be continued in our next.)

TOBACCO.

THE discovery of a nauseous and poisonous weed, of an acrid taste, disagreeable odour, and evil properties, exercised the most extraordinary influence upon the social condition of all nations. It has become an article of universal commerce; its culture has spread with far more rapidity than that of the really useful plants; and even the courtesies of fashion have consecrated its use. When the weed was originally discovered in America it was in great vogue amongst the Indians, who also used it in a medicinal form, and cured many diseases with it; but its introduction into Europe by Sir Walter Raleigh was attended with the utmost ridicule and persecution. James I. wrote his well-known "Counterblast" against it: Pope Urban VIII. excommunicated any one who was convicted of taking it into churches; the Ottoman government instituted severe penalties against those who used it; and the Persians condemned its patrons to death. But this insidious weed nevertheless became an object of universal luxury; and probably this result was not a little owing to the very enactments which were made in respect to the usage of tobacco.

It is generally supposed that the word Tobacco took its origin from the circumstance of the plant having been imported from Tobago; but this opinion is erroneous; the name being the word used in the Haytian tongue to designate the pipe with which the plant was smoked.

We need scarcely observe that tobacco is a strong narcotic, and, if taken inwardly, is powerfully emetic. The decoction, powder, and smoke are used in agricultural pursuits to destroy insects.

Tobacco plants are raised at the commencement of the spring, in a new, fertile, and soft soil; and as soon as each plant has acquired four leaves, it is transferred to a field, where it is set in earth that has been well-prepared. The greatest care must be taken in scrutinizing the leaves of the plants every morning and every evening, with a view of destroying a certain worm that preys upon them. When the plants reach the height of about half a foot, the mould is heaped up around them; and the tops are cut off the moment a plant has put forth eight or nine leaves. This method renders the leaves large and thick. The period when the plants are fit to be cut is proclaimed by the brittleness of the leaves. When they are cut, they are permitted to lie for some time in the field previous to being carried to the drying-shed, where they are suspended by pairs, upon lines, with an interval between them, so as not to touch each other. They then remain in that condition to dry and evacuate all their moisture. As soon as they are sufficiently dried, the leaves are stripped off the stalks and are made into small bundles, each of which is tied round with a leaf. These bundles are heaped up and covered with blankets. Great care is taken not to suffer them to be over-heated; and, as soon as they have been exposed several times to the air, in order to suffer all the heat to escape from the heap, the tobacco is ready to be stowed away in the casks for exportation.

When tobacco is being manufactured into the article fitted for use, the leaves are first cleansed of any dirt which may be upon them; and all decayed parts are carefully cut away. The leaves are then moistened with salt-water; and, when they are dried again, and the mid-rib or tendons of the leaves are removed, they are cut into pieces and crisped in an oven, or before a strong fire. The last operation is to wind them into cords, or twist them into rolls. The growers' duty is then performed; it is the tobaccoist who cuts the leaves into shreds fitted for smoking.

The use of tobacco is most injurious to the constitution, and destructive to the intellect. Both smoking and snuff-taking ruin the memory, deaden the energies of the imagination, and produce those lethargic results which are essentially inimical to the toil of either the hands or the brain. Smoking creates an unwholesome heaviness of slumber at night, and attacks the nervous system with all the virulence of an inveterate enemy. Snuff-taking produces an evanescent excitement in the region of the brain, which causes the worst effects by reaction. Frequent sneezing is peculiarly hurtful to the frame, it being caused by a violent convulsive motion of the muscles of respiration, which is preceded by a deep inspiration that fills the lungs, then forces the air violently through the nose, while the lower jaw is at the time closed, and shakes the head and whole body. This violence is considerably augmented by the exciting nature of snuff in the nostrils; sneezing being always caused by some irritation affecting the inner membrane of the nose. Sneezing, if very often repeated, creates an accumulation of blood to the head. The custom of blessing people when they sneeze is very ancient; Aristotle mentions it, and admits his ignorance of its origin. The French peasants exclaim until this day, on those occasions, Le bon Dieu vous benisse! Sneezing at religious ceremonies was considered a good omen by the ancients.

Snuff is divided into three principal sorts. The first is granulated; the second is an impalpable powder; and the third is the bran or coarse part remaining after sifting the second sort. Snuff is prepared by grinding the tobacco in a mill. Several snuffs are, however, now made of aromatic herbs, or other foreign materials; and probably these are the most wholesome. Grimstone's Eye-snuff is far less pernicious than the light Scotch; for the finer and more insinuating is the powder, the more noxious it is, on account of the facility with which it comes in contact with the pituitary membrane of the nose.

Smoking and snuff-taking both encourage thirst—both affect the breath—and both produce somniferous effects which are materially prejudicial to the constitution. Smoking causes an accumulation of earthy particles around the teeth, and forms tartar, especially about those parts of the teeth which are least exposed to the action of the food: viz., the lower and inner parts near the gums. The gums then gradually separate from the teeth, which immediately decay and render the breath offensive even to disgust.

But the principal evil caused by smoking is the inducement to drink which accompanies it. This inducement is not readily gratified by such beverages as tea, coffee, water, or lemonade; but stronger potations are usually required. Smoking produces a species of heat throughout the frame, and encourages a feverish sensation: the cheeks glow with internal fire; and an unnatural tranquillity is created in the mind notwithstanding this kind of corporeal excitement. That tranquillity degenerates into lowness of spirits and a general feeling of uneasiness and dissatisfaction; and the votary of smoking is compelled to return to the habit once more to acquire a serenity of disposition. This uneven flow of the spirits is ruinous to mental happiness and physical health.

All causes of excitement should be religiously avoided. Drinking strong liquors, smoking, and snuff-taking are illegitimate sources of gratification, which abridge the life of man, destroy his happiness, and unfit him for his avocations and social duties. An individual, with a calm conscience, does not require those excitements. Happiness and misery are generally phantasies of our own creation; and a determination to feel contented with our lot is a sure remedy against the attacks of the latter. Cowards alone seek oblivion of their cares in the bottle or in the evanescent enjoyment of smoking; the brave man meets his adversity face to face, and usually conquers or surmounts it. We do not hesitate to express our hope that we shall see the day when smoking and snuff-taking will be successfully included in the indulgences prohibited by all the disciples of Tectotalism.

THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH:

Observations suggested by the probable execution of Courvoisier on Monday next.

Under the impression that the life of a human being is probably to be offered up as a holocaust to the sanguinary laws of this country, on Monday morning next, we consider that there can be no better opportunity to avow our opinions relative to this punishment of death than the present; and we earnestly solicit the attention of our readers to the ensuing observations, confident that our sentiments will be shared by all who possess one single feeling of humanity, and all who entertain a just notion of the rights of individuals. We appeal to the world against the enactments of a sanguinary—a brutal—a demoralizing—an arbitrary law; and we shall now proceed to convince even the most dabbons on the point, that, for many reasons, the system of executing criminals is a bad one, in respect to society, in respect to the laws of God, and in respect to the culprit himself. If we succeed in doing this, we earnestly hope that an exertion will yet be made to save the unhappy man who is now languishing in the condemned cell of that prison, against the doors of which

It is as yet the intention of the Government to erect on Monday next the dread paraphernalia of the scaffold.

We have no right to take away that which we cannot give; we should not curtail, as a punishment, that life which we cannot extend, as a reward. Let the system of reward and punishment be fairly balanced; and as we have no control over life in respect to a plan of reward, let us not interfere with it in respect to a measure of punishment. If we adopt the atrocious doctrine of retaliation, and cry out "Blood for blood"—why do we not preserve that law in all its details, and say "An eye for an eye?" &c. The punishment inflicted should never be so great as the crime committed; and society should not undertake to enact the part of the avenger. Let society chastise to ameliorate man, but not punish to avenge. Society exists between two points: chastisement is above it—vengeance is beneath it. Nothing, either so great or so insignificant, suits it. If it be argued that we must remove from the sphere of society an individual who has violated its laws by the commission of a murder, it may be replied that perpetual imprisonment will suffice. Again,—if it be argued that the punishment of death is necessary for the sake of example, a decided negative may be returned. The sight of an execution demoralizes and brutalizes the multitude; and when it is over, the crowds retire to the public-houses, where they arrange schemes of villany which are suggested by the particulars of the deed for which the culprit has been just hanged. All sensibility is destroyed by witnessing executions. Scarcely are the unhappy wretches "turned off," when the crowds commence all kind of practical jokes, such as tripping each other up, knocking hats over eyes, throwing baskets over the heads of the multitude, &c. The public-houses in the neighbourhood of the Old-Bailey, drive a glorious trade on the days of executions!

If examples be required, then let the legislature revive all the tortures practised in the Spanish inquisition; or let the condemned again be dragged in a jolting cart, sitting upon his coffin, through the dense crowds of spectators, to Tyburn-tree. Examples only disgust the good, and brutalize the bad. To the former they are useless; to the latter they are prejudicial.

We maintain that man has no right to shed man's blood. He knows not into what world he is hurrying the wretched sinner; for it is ridiculous to assert that heaven can be won, and pardon gained by a penitence which is forced upon the culprit by the prospect of speedy death—a penitence of probably only ten or a dozen days to wipe away a whole existence of sin! In those states where the punishment of death has been abolished, the mass of capital crimes has gradually decreased. The "parliament" of Otaheite has abolished the punishment of death; and civilized England still continues to inflict it!

If society wish to avenge itself, are not the horrors of the penal settlements a sufficient chastisement for the worst crime? To toil in chains, for many hours during the day, up to the knees in water, and fed only on the coarsest fare, separated from home, children and friends, without a hope to cheer the future, and with reminiscences of former happiness to sadden a retrospection over the past—Oh, is not all this a punishment? or will nothing but the horrors of the scaffold suffice this avenging society? Many a man would rather be put to death at once than sent to the worst part of the penal settlements; transportation is then an adequate punishment for even the crime of murder!

But society is not intrinsically thirsty after blood. Does society claim the blood of this Courvoisier who, we fear, will be executed on Monday next? Does any individual, who forms a member of society, demand his blood? Does the family of his victim demand his blood, for the sake of mere vengeance? Who then demands his blood? The government! But the government will not make an example of him—because the spectacle of an execution affords no example,—or, if any, a most demoralizing one.

Probably when this Courvoisier goes forth to the scaffold, the chaplain will assure him that his penitence has secured him the pardon of the Almighty. Either this is a mockery—a perversion of the meaning of the doctrines of rewards and punishments—or else man refuses that pardon which God gives. A penitence of a fortnight—a penitence that is forced by the near approach of death—a penitence that is not spontaneous—to pave the way to heaven! But if such an opinion were not preached by the chaplain of Newgate, the injustice, the enormity, the monstrosity of the measure of taking away life would be immediately apparent. The world would exclaim to the government, "How dare you destroy a soul, as well as a body! How dare you hurry a man out of this world into another where he will be condemned to everlasting misery? What right have you thus to dispose of an immortal soul?"

If a fortnight's penitence in Newgate suffice to gain heaven, then a death-bed repentance will also suffice; and, according to this precious doctrine, a man may sin all his life, so long as he makes up his mind to repent when he sees his end approaching! If this be the case, then does the doctrine of rewards and punishments encourage crime, rather than suppress it.

Suppose this Courvoisier were sent to labour for the remainder of his natural life in the penal settlements, he would have time to repent in a manner which would ensure the safety of his immortal soul, and yet he would at the same time undergo a severe, a terrible punishment for his delinquency. Society would be satisfied—the family of his victim ought to be satisfied—and the government would inflict a salutary chastisement, which, while it convinced the world that a man may not sin with impunity, would be the means of turning a soul—an immortal soul into the way to heaven.

The Editor of this Journal, for one, protests against the inhuman ferocity, the palpable injustice, and the demoralizing practice of taking away human life upon the scaffold. The government, which puts such an impious measure into practice, represents the whole society of a nation, and acts for that society. That society is guilty of the crime of murder so long as it permits its government—or, in other words, its executive—to continue the horrible exhibition on the public scaffold. What, then, should be done? Why, let every individual who can think rightly upon this point, protest against the penalty of death, and thus absolve himself from implication in the crime of which society is guilty. The Editor of the "Teetotaler," here protests against the law of punishment of death—he publicly declares, that, as a member of English society, he does not assent to its use—he washes his hands of that which he deems a heinous sin on the part of any society or government—he will not suffer himself to be considered implicated in the commission of that sin—he calls upon that government, which represents him, together with millions of others, to renounce a power which no sentiment of humanity or justice could have conferred—he implores his fellow-countrymen also to enter their protest against this law of murder—and he now lays aside his pen with a feeling of satisfaction, convinced that the blood of next Monday's victim (if a victim to a barbarous law he be made) will not fall upon his head, in its pouring forth upon the mass of those who will slaughter him through the medium of their representatives!

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1840.

DISTRESSING CASE OF THE COAL-WHIPPERS OF WAPPING.

We earnestly solicit the attention of our readers to the exposure of the infamous conduct of the publicans of Wapping, in respect to the Coal-Whippers of that district, a full account of which is contained in our Report of the Meeting of the London United Temperance Association at the Aldersgate-street chapel, on Saturday evening last. Were we to relate only one moiety of the horrors of the system pursued by these blood-sucking publicans, to our friends at the West-End of this vast metropolis, they would imagine that we were reciting some highly-wrought scene taken from a forth-coming romance or melodrama. But all that the three speakers from the Coal-Whippers' Association uttered on Saturday last, is strictly adherent to truth. We have inquired into the particulars of their statement; and we have gathered fresh proofs of its veracity in the course of our investigation. That so infamous a monopoly should be permitted to exist in the vicinity of this metropolis, is derogatory to the honour of Englishmen. Were a Frenchman—a Belgian—or even a German, who is the son of despotism, to be informed of the nature of this monopoly, a laugh of incredulity would be the only reply. The monopoly has the welfare of the publican in view; and the trophies of that welfare are raised upon the physical and moral ruin of the unfortunate Coal-Whippers.

It appears that an Office was lately established in Wapping, with a view of suppressing that monopoly, the captains of ships being compelled to apply at the Office for labourers, and not to the publicans. But the publicans and the captains have one common interest; they are allied together in the nefarious scheme of extorting the greater portion of the Coal-Whipper's wages from him, as the price and condition of a continuation of his employment; and thus the salutary effects of the establishment of an Office, have been entirely subverted.

The system adopted by the publicans of Wapping is simply this. A Coal-Whipper applies to a publican for a recommendation to employment in emptying a collier. If the applicant can afford to purchase large quantities of liquor, he finds immediate encouragement at the hands of the publican; and so long as the poor victim will consent to expend a considerable portion of his hardly-earned wages upon the infamous beer that is made expressly for individuals of that fraternity, he continues to find work. But the moment he objects to deprive his family of their bread and to fill the coffers of the publican, his services are dispensed with.

The Coal-Whippers labour at a very severe employment with sufficient ardour to deserve all the wages which are paid to them; but if they be compelled to pay upwards of a half of those wages to the publicans, whose good favour alone gives them employment, upon what can their families subsist? or how can they place any thing aside to provide for the contingencies of sickness or of a temporary want of work? We believe that this is the only country in the universe where the labourer has to pay a heavy tax for the privilege of obtaining employment; where he is compelled to purchase work at a ruinous per centage upon the wages thereof!

The three members of the Coal-Whippers' Association, who addressed the meeting on Saturday evening last, spoke with considerable feeling, and with an eloquence which flowed from the heart. It will be seen that one of them was discharged from work because he would not consent to bribe the publican, through whose agency he obtained employment, with a larger sum than half-a-crown per diem. The blood of the philanthropist boils when he reflects upon the atrocious system pursued by the mercantile proprietors of public-houses in Wapping; and human nature revolts at the deeds of a set of men who are enriching themselves in a manner which a highwayman would scorn to adopt. We look upon the highwayman as a far less dangerous character than the publican who thus traffics in the sweat of the human brow; and we can assure the latter that the unparalleled villany—the cold-blooded cruelty—the merciless despotism of his conduct shall meet with the most uncompromising exposure at our hands. We shall return to this subject next week, and shall in the meantime endeavour to collect instances of oppression to confirm the truth of these statements.

THE TWO BREWERIES.

By H. W. WEST, Hon. Sec. &c.

In a Market Town, not one hundred miles from the Metropolis, and situate in one of the loveliest of our Counties; where all appeared serenity and peace, two large Breweries, or moral volcanoes, reared their enormous heads, and spread their desolating poisons through a large and industrious population of between seven and eight thousand individuals. The blackening volumes of smoke from the long funnels of the Breweries, daily indicated the coming miseries to the deluded population, who had followed the notions of thousand of years, and the customs of their forefathers, faithfully believing that all physical energy depended upon intoxicating stimulants.

The writer was brought up in a Public-house, supplied by one of the great Brewers; and during the years of his childhood, he looked on and beheld with disgust and horror, the excesses committed by individuals of all classes, from the peasant to the most respectable tradesmen—to the clergy—the magistrates—the parish authorities—in fact to nearly every individual in that community. Large volumes might be written upon the accidents, ruin, bankruptcy, misery, disease and death, occurrent in this town, were not the horrors of intemperance already too well known, to require recapitulation. The writers' object is, however, only to prove that malt liquor is a great source of drunkenness, and that the mere abstinence from spirituous liquors, or ardent spirits, will never have the desired effect of removing the national sin of intemperance—Teetotalism being the only efficient remedy.

Let us return to the Breweries, and endeavour to trace the consequences of the traffic in alcoholic stimulants, not to those especially who drink them, but to the manufacturers, and generally to all those, who, perhaps, in unthinking ignorance, continue in a traffic fraught with moral evil.

Let us call one of these Brewers, Mr. Stalwort, and look to his career. As a Brewer he owned about thirty public houses, and was a man of large capital; he died worth £50,000, which enormous sum he had gained by his trade. His life was far from being a happy one; nor did his death-bed resemble the latter end of the righteous man, for he was deprived of his mental faculties, long ere he departed from the scenes of misery, which his establishment had originated. One of his sons, whom he had placed in one of the most dashing regiments in the army, became a spendthrift, a gambler, and a drunkard. He squandered the handsome fortunes of two amiable wives, who perished prematurely, through the trouble brought on them, by their mistaken husband. One of his children was a cripple for life. This individual was about to fly his country, when he was arrested upon a process of outlawry, and thrown into one of the strong prisons on the coast, where he was supplied with funds by his broken-hearted old mother. In the prison he pursued his course of drunkenness, upon the principle of "a short life and a merry one," but one night, in a state of intoxication, he fell over the balustrades of the ponderous prison staircase, broke his neck, and met with instantaneous death. He was buried within the prison walls, unpitied and unfriended, not one of his wealthy relatives having attended to witness his interment.

A brother of this poor wretch entered into the wine and spirit trade; and under the direction of the great brewer, his father, all the poor publicans were not only compelled to deal with him, but also to take whatever goods he offered them, and at any price he pleased to put upon them, under pain of receiving notice to quit their establishments. This son of brewer Stalwort, amassed considerable wealth; but he was not a happy man; and met a premature death by a fit of apoplexy.

Another son of old Stalwort was, as many sons of brewers are, a clergyman of the Church of England, and curate of a parish. On the Sabbath-day, while he was urging his hearers to religion and morality, and above all, warning them against the dreadful crime and consequences of intemperance, he could hear the maltsters who were occupied in his father's malt-house; for let it be generally known that malt cannot be made without being worked on the Sabbath-day. This good minister often presided at benefit club-feasts held in his father's public-houses; thus undoing during the week, more than all the clergy of the place could effect on the Lord's day.

Old Stalwort was a miller, and could monopolize so as to raise the price of corn at will. Once upon a time he was detected in what is called "running a wetting," or making malt without knowledge of the excise, for which he was fined by the Excise Office in the sum of £12,000 at one fell swoop. He had, however, doubtless made more by his knavery than this sum; the poor, the rich, and the Government, all suffering by this great man. Other calamities befell his family besides those here enumerated; but we shall, however, pass them over while we look a little to the other great brewery, and observe some of the movements of Mr. Swipes.

Mr. Swipes never thought "small beer of himself." He was a proud, haughty, and severe man, and commanded a trade by the monopoly of about twenty-six of the public-houses of the town.

One lovely spring sabbath morning, men were seen running affrighted, and staring about the streets; the whole town was in a dreadful state of agitation; and the news spread on wings of lightning, that poor "Swipes had blown his brains out." It was too true; and whether he could no longer reflect on the miseries his business had caused his fellow-creatures, or whether the phantoms of the poor drunkards, who had been made so by his liquor, rendered his life a burden to him, too true it was he had destroyed himself. This aim he had effected, not by the slow poison of the fires of alcohol, but the less destructive, yes, less destructive, article of gunpowder! His family left the town and dwelt in seclusion, far away from the scene of the dreadful suicide. The brewery was purchased by a gentleman, and given as a portion with his daughters to his two sons-in-law; one of these sons-in-law died in a madhouse, his malady being brought on by drunkenness; the other has almost destroyed his health by drinking; and teetotalism is gradually destroying his business.

Mr. Stalwort, and Mr. Swipes, their sons and their friends, were leading men, and in fact had the majority in the old corporation of the town; they were magistrates, and licensed those houses which they pleased. They were also justices of the peace, but they suffered every species of iniquity to be committed in their houses. They were Trustees of Charities; and they took from the Charities many of their Public-houses at a nominal rent. They seldom allowed their Publicans to get rich; but when those individuals came to want, the Brewers by virtue of their Corporate power, charitably found them an asylum in an almshouse, in preference, and to the exclusion of others, who were equally, if not more deserving. In a word, these Brewers were the lords of the vicinity, and of course drunkenness, for the sake of selling their commodities, was encouraged by them.

NOCTES PICKWICKIANÆ.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. II.

Old Weller.—Vy, Samivel, it's impossible! I'd rayther not believe it, Samivel. You ai'nt no child o' mine to go an' forswear all kinds o' lush in that ondacious manner. 'Spose it is right to give up drinking, Sammy, 'spose it is, ve can't carry that measure, 'cos, if ve did, wot 'ud become of the landlords?

Sam.—Wot a odd curiosity you air now, with your 'cos an' yer vy! There's plenty for the landlords to do—all the busses is n't regularly caddled yet, and there's lots o' wery super-hexcellent, out-an'-out, fashionable crossings not as yet perwided with sweepers. We'll give 'um work, as the gentleman said, when he invented the tread-mill.

Old Weller.—You're a undutiful little boy, Sammy, to aggravate your father in his old age, by givin' up good beer and bustin' yourself vith Adam's ale. Howsomever, you von't persuade me to jine you, Samivel; unless I does as my old and pertikler friend, John Buggins, the tripe-man, used to do.

Sam.—Wot was that?

Old Weller.—I'll jist tell'ee, Sam: only let a man, as is rayther stout, have breathin' time in his old age. Vell; this John Buggins was a wery great friend to the distiller an' the 'bakkinst, Samivel; but at length he swore a terrible hoath he'd turn Teetotaler. He vent an' made his mark in the pledge-book—an' a wery great cross it were, 'cos he couldn't write; an' as he vent home again, he was so nation pleased vith his-self for the exceedin' prudent step he'd taken, that he rewarded his-self with a quartern o' gin at the wery first public he come to.

Sam.—He was a cut-an'-outer, he was! Whigs an' Tories is nothin' to him in respect to principle.

Old Weller.—It ai'nt perlite to interrupt a gentleman, Sam; you ai'nt got no more manners than a hog. Perlitiness is everything, as the pastry-cook said, when he took the first bite out o' the pork-pie, to see if it was good, afore he handed it to the lady. But—as I was a sayin'—this John Buggins, Bakvire, turned Teetotaler. Von day I went to call upon him, an' he axed me to stay for dinner. "Wery much obleeged," said I; "I don't care if I does." "I don't drink, you know," he says, says he; "but you shall have plenty o' good lush, old feller." "All right," says I; and down to dinner we sat. A pot o' porter was stood by me, an' a precious great decanter o' water near my friend Buggins. "My eyes, Jack," I says, says I, before the cloth was removed, "what a precious lot of water you do drink, to be sure!" "Ah, I do," he says, says he, turnin' up the whites of his eyes like a duck in a storm, Samivel, and shaking his head wery gravely: "water," says he, "is the best o' all the helements, the wery best. I loves it dearly;" and as he said them words, he tossed off a tumbler o' the likar without stoppin' to draw breath. Blowed if he didn't smack his lips too as if it wos wery nice; an' arter dinner he vent out, filled his bottle agin, come back, and begun drinkin' more fiercer than ever. He, however, give me some precious good rum, an' so I didn't care wot he did. Howsomever, he drank about two glasses o' water to every one of my grog, an' wery sprightly and gay he got too. "This rum is not bad," said I, with the hidear o' temptin' on him to jine me in a glass. "No," says he, "I'll stick to my water, this blessed water, vich is the most wholesomest drink we can have. Natur gived it to us, and natur knows best, old feller, wot's good for us. Wot could ve do vithout water? How could the brewers brew their beer vithout it?" "Ai'nt that rayther a singler question for a Teetotaler, Jack?" says I. "Not at all," says he, an' then up he got, out he went, and he come back agin vith some more hot water and rum for me, an' another decanter o' stuff for his-self. "Jack, you'll bust," said I. "No I shan't," says he. "Your voice is already wery thick," says I. "I've got a cold," says he. "But your heyes is wery excited," I says, says I. "That's the nat'ral glow o' health, consekvent on drinkin' nothing but water," he says, says he. "But blessed if you can sit up in your chair," says I. "I'm rayther sleepy," says he. "There you go!" says I; an' down he fell on the carpet as clean as a whistle.

Sam.—That was a rum go, I should rayther think, vich wos the observation made by the gentleman, ven his wife was delivered o' two little niggers.

Old Weller.—Niggers, or not, Samivel, Jack Buggins tumbled down on the floor, an' began cursin' and swearin' like a dog-cart driver ven the new Police bill come into hope-ration. I well nigh busted my sides vith laughin'—an' my sides isn't wery easy ones to bust neither. "Wot's the matter, Jack," says I. "Drunk!" says he, in a wery straight forward manner; an' so he wos too, 'cos he'd been a drinkin' cold gin an' water all the blessed evening. Vell, I puts him to bed, tucks him up, an' leaves him alone in his glory, as some versifyin' feller said about another feller as wos buried vithout a coffin.

Sam.—There's black sheep in all flocks, as I heerd the parson say one day, an' your Jack Buggins was one on 'em. When a man once says he'll sign his name, or make his mark in witness of a pertickler thing, let him stick to his word like a man.

Old Weller.—Wot's all this here gammonin' about, Samivel? Wot 'ud become o' all them nice little publics along the road-side, if so be the coachmen was to give up stoppin' there to take their drops as they're in the habit o' doin'? What 'ud become o' them chaps as seems to live by largin' about the doors of the places vere the coaches stops, and as stares arter the vehicles ven they're long out o' sight? An' wot 'ud become o' them pretty young gals as draws the liquor? O Samivel, Samivel, wot a aggrawatin' little boy you air to go an' sign that there temperance hoath-book? I shan't survive it, Samivel, as the old lady observed to the doctor ven he desired her to leave off her grog.

Sam.—Wot a old pickter it is, talkin' away like a eight-day clock, as if you was never goin' down. Try the plan yourself, old feller, an' you'll soon see the consekvences.

Old Waller.—Well, Samivel, I'll take your advice for vonce. I'll go an' give this here business my wery pertickler attention, an' I'll think on it over a glass of purt an' a pipe.

(To be continued in our next.)

INTEMPERANCE.

There are now three criminals in Newgate, whose names have lately obtained a tolerable share of infamous reputation, and whose crimes may be traced to the baneful effects of intoxicating drinks. Courvoisier acknowledges, in his confession to Mr. Sheriff Evans, that he had not drank beer for a week previous to the night on which he committed the dreadful crime for which he is condemned to death, and that on that evening the ale produced an intoxicating effect upon him. This effect we may very readily suppose to have hardened him as to the compunctions of his conscience—excited him to perpetrate the deadly deed—and encouraged him to the awful task of taking away the life of a kind and venerable master. Gould had been drinking at a public-house on the evening when he robbed—and perhaps murdered—Mr. Templeman; and Bailey attempted to murder a whole vessel's crew, when he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. These are three terrible examples, and should be well considered by those who are at all addicted to the use of spirits or malt liquors.

More crimes are planned in public-houses than in any other places of resort in the British dominions; and strong drink has sent more men to the gallows than the fury of revolutions, or the persecutions of political parties.

Let us only reflect for a few moments upon the condition of the three men now in Newgate, and to whom we alluded above. Gould and Bailey will be sent to the worst district of the penal settlements, where they will be compelled to toil in chains for the remainder of their lives. They will be subjected to every privation—every arduous labour—every caprice of the petty tyranny of their overseers—and every degradation which man can invent to punish criminals of so desperate a character. Far—far across the seas will they linger out the remainder of their existence—bearing the mark of Cain upon their brow—separated from their homes, their relations, and their friends—placed beyond the very barriers of civilization—and consigned to a living tomb, where they will have to regret hour after hour, and minute after minute, all that they have left behind them. Often—often will they sigh, however hardened they may be, after that country which witnessed and avenged their crimes; and terrible must be the prospect of a continuous scene of misery, whose only termination is the tomb!

And now what is the condition of Courvoisier? He knows that his very minutes are numbered—that, as the clock strikes eight on Monday morning, he will be conducted forth to the scaffold—that he will walk from his cell through several dark and dismal passages to that door upon whose very threshold stands the gibbet—that he will ascend the steps to the platform of the horrible machine—that he will see myriads and myriads of human beings crowding around to behold his dying agonies—that he will be placed upon a drop which will soon glide from beneath his feet, and leave him suspended in the air—that the few minutes during which he will stand upon that drop will comprise whole years, aye, centuries of the bitterest, bitterest agony—that his attentive ear will catch even the sound caused by the finger of the executioner, when he touches the bolt of the drop an instant before he draws it aside—and that his soul will be yielded up in the agonies of strangulation. All this he knows, and the dread routine of the whole ceremony assumes an historical exactitude, a palpable shape, a frightful reality in his mind. It must be terrible for him to think upon what he is, and upon what he was. He has not a hope left to him in this world, he will be cut off in the bloom of his years; he must bid adieu for ever to all the pleasures, the enjoyments, the delights of society, and of life? How must he dread that fatal morning when he will be compelled to walk forth to the scaffold,—when the close air of the prison will be suddenly varied by the fresh breeze of heaven as he steps forth from that low dark door to the foot of the gibbet—and when he will raise his eyes to see the black and ominous framework, with the chain hanging from the cross-beam, and his own coffin beneath the drop! Oh! all this is terrible—terrible to reflect upon,—sufficient to deprive the strongest mind of its reasoning faculties, and to paralyse the boldest with excess of horror!

And yet the path to that scaffold is prepared by intemperance; and the voyage to those penal colonies, which separate man from all he holds dear, is brought about by the same cause! Is it necessary to extend this description?

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Meeting of Members at Aldersgate-street Chapel,—on Saturday Evening, June 27th.

MR. WILSON, upon being called to the chair, said, that in consequence of the important and interesting matters to be introduced that evening, he should not trespass on the time of the audience.

MR. GAWTHORPE observed that the Teetotalers had entered upon a warfare against that vicious habit which was undermining the moral and physical welfare of society. The arguments of truth were upon the side of the Teetotalers,—the dictates of reason—the views of pure philanthropy—and the smiles of heaven. They would not be deterred by the efforts of their opponents from proceeding in their task; and no one need dread the results. Strong drink is not necessary to man; on the contrary, it is essentially injurious in every respect. It ruins health—empties the poor man's purse—robs the tender wife of all happiness—and provides for its votaries naught but rags and degradation. Mr. Gawthorpe then proceeded to draw a most affecting, but true picture of the demoralized condition of the lower orders of the people, amongst whom the vice of drinking made such deadly havoc; but he at the same time expressed his delight to find that Teetotalism was making such rapid progress in the British dominions. If Howard, the philanthropist, were alive now, how would he rejoice to see the good works of Teetotalism; for, during the space of about seven years, upwards of four millions and a half had signed the pledge-book.

DANIEL BROWN, from the Coal-Whipper's Association, requested permission to address the meeting. He said he should call attention to the dreadful condition of himself and his fellow-labourers. Coal whippers begin their work with drink, because they are compelled to apply to the publicans in Wapping for employment. They are obliged to disburse large sums in the purchase of spirits and beer, if they want to get work. No one present had an idea of what coal-whipper's beer was. It was a disgusting beverage compounded on purpose for them; and very frequently were they compelled to strain it through their handkerchiefs, before they could drink it. On other occasions, this beer was so execrable that they could not drink it, but were constrained to wash the deck of the vessel with it; and yet they were compelled to purchase it, if they wished to continue in those places which the publicans had procured for them, and which were at the disposal of those publicans. No one else could drink that beer, to which he alluded, save the coal-whippers, who lost their taste through drinking so nauseous and deleterious a compound. The old coal-whipper, unfitted for work, and overtaken by the diseases brought on by a life of intemperance, was sent to a charitable asylum, or to a hospital, there to end his miserable days, without a friend! Oh! no one then present, save himself and companions, knew all the horrors of a coal-whipper's existence! The publicans were the task-masters, the despots, the unrelenting tyrants, who robbed them when they gave them work, who robbed them while they continued in their situations, and who deserted them in their old age, or in the time of sickness. The publicans of Wapping are blood-suckers, and heaven's vengeance will fall upon them. They have all combined—the galling links of one grand oppressive chain—to shackle the labourer, and destroy him, mentally and bodily. There is no such degraded being in existence as a coal-whipper.

GREEN ABRIDGE, another coal-whipper, was permitted to express his wrongs from the platform. He said that the coal-whippers were desirous to relieve themselves from a life of intemperance. The condition of the poor degraded coal-whipper is at present worse than that of the negroes in the West Indian Islands. All that he acquired by the sweat of his brow—the hard earned fruits of his severe labours, passed into the till of the publican. The coal-whippers then present had seen the dreadful effects of drinking. All their relations before them were drunkards—their fathers and their grand-fathers, and their brethren now are drunkards.

He (the Speaker) had seen his brothers and sisters dying for that bread which could have been purchased by the coin that had been disbursed in the house of the publican. Five thousand souls at Wapping were kept in a condition between starvation and despair, which few could conceive. And yet the publicans arrogantly declare that the coal-whippers of Wapping cannot release themselves from this ignominious state of thralldom! In order to remedy this evil (if possible) the legislature had enacted that the coal-whippers should be paid on board of ship; but still the choice of employing labourers remained with the publicans, who took very good care only to hire those who would expend two-thirds of their earnings in the public-houses. Maddened by intoxication, the coal-whippers commit crimes, and the law punishes them for that which others have forced them to do. Gentlemen's dogs are lodged far better than the poor degraded coal-whippers, who after a short life of ineffable misery, are brought to an early grave, carrying to that last home the marks of intemperance upon their brow. Very few coal-whippers out-live the age of forty; and if it be true that the drunkard cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, how terrible is it to reflect upon their doom! He (the Speaker) implored the London United Temperance Association to assist the coal-whippers cause—to destroy the vile monopoly practised by the publicans of Wapping—and to assist in the work of regenerating a large number of their fellow-creatures.

HENRY BROWN, a third member of the Coal Whipper's Association, then demanded permission of the Chairman to say a few words to the meeting. He was a discharged servant; and he was discharged—not for any fault of his own—but because he would not have more than seven pints of beer each day from the publican who gave him work. He had worked two days at the unloading of a collier, and was then turned away because he could not afford more than half-a-crown a day out of his wages for the liquor of the publican, who charged ninepence per pot for the infamous trash which he called beer! Eighteen months ago, the Coal Whippers' Association had petitioned the Common Council for some measure of relief, and Mr. Hobler was retained as their attorney. Mr. Stevens, a publican in Bishopsgate Street, had taken up their cause like a man, and had advocated it nobly in the debates of the Common Council. The matter was however referred to Mr. Labouchere, the President of the Board of Trade, in whose hands it now remained.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS rose and declared that such a complication of villainies and horrors had not come beneath his notice for some time. He felt indignant that his native land, which, with France, stood at the head of civilization, should be the scene of deeds so foul—so disgraceful to the human race—so derogatory to the noble and independent spirit of man. He however felt certain that Mr. Labouchere, who was an upright and a humane man, would immediately adopt measures to remedy so crying an evil, and he sincerely hoped that the London United Temperance Association would on its part take into prompt consideration the terrible predicament of so large a body of men. Teetotalism, said Mr. Reynolds, should not only exert itself to reform the drunkard, but to throw down all these barriers, whether moral, physical, social, or political, which interposed themselves between the drunkard and the road of temperance. He did not hesitate to stigmatize the publicans of Wapping—that is to say, those who dealt in that infernal traffic of human health, and human labour, as the most unprincipled set of men that disgraced a free land; and he called upon all who then listened to him, to exert themselves in suppressing so infamous a monopoly. So far as he was concerned, he would immediately take the subject into his serious consideration, and he would promise the meeting that a full and complete exposure of the whole system pursued by the publicans in Wapping, should appear in the forthcoming number of "The Teetotaler." He then begged to introduce to the notice of the meeting, a young gentleman who had just commenced his career as an author, and had experienced great success with the publication of his first poem—"Ninian." This young gentleman was Mr. John Wilson Ross, who is highly connected; his father being the Attorney-General at Jamaica, and his relatives holding high offices either in the army or navy. The object of Mr. Ross's presence that evening on the platform, was to sign the pledge-book of the London United Temperance Association.

MR. J. H. DONALDSON, Hon. Sec., then addressed the meeting. He called the attention of the audience to the of Wapping; deplored that so atrocious a system should be permitted to exist in civilized England, which had granted emancipation to slaves in the West Indies; and proposed that a subscription should be immediately set on foot to aid the Coal-Whippers' Association in their laudable cause of freeing themselves from a system which entailed upon them all the horrors and consequences of intemperance. It was truly lamentable (said Mr. Donaldson), that because many of the coal-whippers had wives and children depending upon them, they dared not risk the chance of losing their work by speaking out boldly. What! was it now hay-making season; and he (Mr. Donaldson) would recommend his brother Teetotalers to make hay while the sun shone. There is not a Teetotaler present who would refuse to contribute his mite towards the proposed subscription. He would set the example by setting apart a certain sum weekly for the benefit of the coal-whippers' cause; and he knew that that example would be speedily followed. He (Mr. Donaldson) had wept for the sufferings of the poor negro in far-off lands; and he had now to weep for the miseries of a large portion of his fellow-countrymen at home. Mr. Donaldson then proceeded to paint, in striking and vivid colours, the evils of intemperance, and concluded by urging the members of the London United Temperance Association to assist the unfortunate coal-whippers to the utmost of their power.

Mr. JACKSON, of Cheltenham, next addressed the meeting, and gave an eloquent description of the success of his labours, both as a minister of the gospel, and as an advocate in the cause of Teetotalism.

Mr. WESTON, Hon. Sec., Mr. ADKINS, Mr. FALLSHAW, and Mr. SWEATON, father of the talented advocate of the same name, then addressed each a few words to the meeting, which separated shortly before eleven o'clock, after having commenced a subscription for the benefit of the coal-whippers' cause. (See Advertisement.) It is but fair to observe, that Mr. JOHNSON was the first to call the attention of the London United Temperance Association to the case of the Wapping coal-whippers.

REVIEWS.

Hints, Moral and Medical, on Teetotalism, Temperance Societies, Gin-drinking, and Opium-eating. By J. WHITE; Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, in London. 1 vol. 18mo. pp. 34. London: J. W. Southgate.

The author starts with a modest hope "that his readers will look upon his words as hints, and hints only;" and yet he assumes throughout his work a tone of authority which rather suits the arbitrary lawgiver. Mr. White advocates a temperate use of liquors, whether spirituous or fermented, but deprecates the abuse. So does any other sensible man deprecate the abuse of strong drink, and therefore Mr. White need not flatter himself that he has recorded some wonderfully original opinion. He then goes on to make the following observations:—

"Yet, when these friends of mankind, these total abstinence men, not only assert that total abstinence is the reclamer from, and the preventive to, the immoderate use of strong drink; but that it is also a virtue in itself; and that the temperate use of stimulating drinks is hurtful, not only because the use leads to the abuse; but that the temperate use only is essentially injurious to body and mind—they set themselves in array against the opinions, tastes, appetites and desires of the immense majority of mankind, from the earliest ages—they set themselves in array against the present practice of mankind; against the practice of the healthy, the moral, the intelligent; they set themselves in array against the written word of divine and human authority—and they set themselves in array against a host of medical men, who have declared that the temperate use of spirituous drinks is not injurious to health. And in doing this, they raise up enemies to their cause, and what is worse, they blind themselves to truth—to the true nature of their objects, and the true means by which they might be effected."

To this precious rhodomontade—a rhodomontade which involves the author in as comfortable a little dilemma as any ignoramus who attempts fine writing, is sure to fall into—we simply reply, that the generality of sweeping reforms are opposed to the opinions, the tastes, and the habits of a large majority of society,—that no medical man with a grain of sense, or one idea of honesty, can possibly advocate even the most moderate use of spirituous drinks as a custom,—and that the Teetotalers raise up no enemies amongst those whose opinions they value. A few obstinate, self-willed, and short-sighted individuals (like the sapient Mr. White, whose lucubrations we are now noticing), may oppose the total-abstinence principle, and affect to argue against it; but the candid, the lucid, and the enlightened investigator, although he may have shared the error for the moment, will speedily acknowledge the efficacy and justice of the principle of Teetotalism.

As soon as Mr. White has very coolly informed us that Teetotalism is against the experience of all medical men, he as readily contradicts himself by proposing that all persons who join Temperance Societies, shall "abstain wholly from spirituous drinks, fermented or distilled," for the first year. What an absurdity is this! If a man can abstain from drinking for a year, then he manifests a sufficiency of resolution to relinquish the habit altogether; and if a medical adviser admit the propriety of Total Abstinence for a year, then must he acknowledge the propriety of Total Abstinence altogether. Thus does this learned Mr. White, this medical man, who contents himself with hints—supply us with arguments to refute his own positions.

It is merely a work of supererogation to repeat the answer which the Teetotaler has ready for the advocates of simple Temperance measures; but as Mr. White does not seem to be acquainted with that answer, we shall inform him that the use soon leads to the abuse of intoxicating drinks, and that experience has already proved the absolute necessity of Total Abstinence. To avoid sin, we must be altogether removed from its contiguity. He who steals a penny will pilfer a pound, if an opportunity occur. Who can draw the line of demarcation, and assert what quantity of wine or spirits constitutes the temperate use. One man may take a bottle, while another could not exceed a glass.

As soon as this gentleman has talked, or rather written, as much nonsense as he can well cram into twenty pages of print, he proceeds to recommend to all individuals who are accustomed to drink gin, a certain Tincture of Hop, which he instructs his readers how to take. Now what is a tincture? A tincture is a solution of any substance in spirit of wine; rectified spirit of wine being the direct menstruum of the resins and essential oils of vegetables, and by which those active principles are totally extracted from most vegetable matters. It will therefore be seen that Mr. White wishes to found a Substitution Society; or, in other words, that he is endeavouring to introduce one kind of poison into vogue instead of another. We know not whether he be serious, or whether he be indulging in a sly laugh at the drunkard, when he so quietly observes that no one should take more than four tea-spoons full of this Tincture of Hop in one day!

We must not forget to observe that Mr. White has asserted that which is at variance with truth, when he declares that the medical profession are opposed to Teetotalism. He does not know, probably, that the doctrines of Teetotalism have been approved of by the leading men of the profession; and that of upwards of a hundred medical gentlemen who have attested the efficacy of these principles with their signatures, are the following,—George Birkbeck, M.D.; James Blundell, M.D.; Sir Benjamin Brodie, F.R.S.; W. F. Chambers, Physician to the Queen, and to the Queen Dowager; Sir James Clarke, Physician to the Queen; J. B. Clutterbuck; J. T. Conquest, Physician to the City of London Lying-in Hospital; Bransby Cooper, F.R.S.; D. D. Davis, Physician to the Duchess of Kent; Marshall Hall, F.R.S.; Herbert Mayo, F.R.S.; C. Aston Key, Surgeon to Guy's Hospital, &c. &c. Will this self-sufficient purveyor of "hints," now venture to assert that Teetotalism has not able advocates amongst the leading men of the medical profession—that its doctrines are at variance with medical experience—and that it is a hot-house plant which must speedily fade? But we cannot afford to waste any more time upon the specimen of wasted paper and print now before us.

Charles O'Malley: by HARRY LORREQUER. Illustrated by Philz., parts 1, 2, and 3. Dublin: W. Curry: London: W. S. Orr.

This is a very clever publication, in monthly shilling parts; and will form, when completed, an excellent companion to the "Confessions of Harry Lorrequer," by the same author. The tale is purely Irish; Irish character is depicted to the life by the graphic pencil of this writer; and in his conceptions of the humorous and witty, he is peculiarly happy. There is a vigour of description in "Charles O'Malley" which will render the work essentially a national one, and cause it to be ranked among the standard works of fiction of the Irish library. Occasionally the fidelity of description leads the author into minuteness; and that work of detail appears to be prolix to any one save a real Irishman; but, on the whole, "Charles O'Malley, the Irish Dragoon," is one of the most humorous, and the best written of the various periodical works now issued from the press.

Master Humphreys' Clock: by BOZ., parts 1, 2, and 3., with numerous wood-cuts. London: Chapman and Hall.

So long as Charles Dickens devoted himself to descriptions of characters solely humorous and laughable, he was unequalled; but the moment he took up his pen to compose pathos, or sentimentality, he experienced a most signal failure. His "Sketches" are masterpieces of graphic delineation in the humorous strain; they evince a depth of observation which few of the many thousands who daily circulate through the myriads of veins of this mighty Babylon, dare even pretend to possess; and his "Pickwick Papers," although replete with contradictions and errors of all kinds, would alone confer the honours of immortality upon him. "Nicholas Nickleby" was a sad, disjointed, uneven, badly strung together, kind of a book; but "Oliver Twist," again, is an excellent tale. "Master Humphreys' Clock" is a most decided failure—at least in a literary point of view; for, as far as it regards a commercial one, it is sufficient to observe, that the great popularity of the name of "Boz," would procure a sale for a new edition of "Jack the Giant Killer." The plan upon which "Master Humphreys' Clock" is built, is bad; and the mere fact of introducing Mr. Pickwick and the Wellers once more into a tale, manifests a barrenness of imagination, or else a clap-net view, which really surprises us. Boz is decidedly capable of better things than the samples we have now before us; for it is impossible that a mind, which seemed but a year or two ago to be literally overflowing with imaginative powers and humorous conceptions, should have suddenly become impoverished to the extent which is indicated by the hebdomadal contents of "Master Humphreys' Clock."

Emily: a Novel. By MRS. MABERLY. 3 vols. post 8vo. London: Henry Colburn.

This is one of the best novels lately issued from the press. It is full of the doings, the peculiarities, and the characteristics of fashionable life, and shows, from page to page, those delicate touches which, even were not the name of the fair authoress upon the title page, would immediately lead us to suppose that the book was the production of a lady of elegant mind, and of considerable accomplishments. The reader feels deeply interested in the fortunes of the beautiful heroine, of whom we are favoured with a portrait in the first volume; and so well is this sympathetic feeling sustained by the fair authoress, that we found it difficult to lay aside the book until we arrived at the conclusion. Especially is the interest of the reader excited towards the end of the second, and throughout the third volume, during the narrative portions of which Mrs. Mabery has recorded many sweet sentiments, many true observations, and many shrewd remarks. "Emily" is not one of those mawkish fashionable tales over which the reader takes a dozen naps before he arrives at the end of the first volume; it is a really clever and well executed novel, and gives promise of much more brilliant achievements in the field of literature, should the fair authoress continue the campaign she has so successfully commenced.

Paul Periwinkle: by the Author of "Cavendish," &c., parts 1—14. Illustrated by Philz. London: Printed for Thomas Tegg.

This is a tale of the sea, and is continued from month to month with considerable humour and spirit. That abominable system of pressing sailors which is practised in this country, is fully explained, and indeed exposed, in "Paul Periwinkle;" we only hope that this circumstance will attract the attention of the Government to so unjust and shameful a measure, so that some other scheme may be substituted in case of a naval war. Wherefore could not the French system of conscription be applied to this nation; or how long are the rich and powerful to remain exempt from all the contingent evils of active service, and the poor and obscure to be converted into slaves? The author of "Paul Periwinkle" possesses a vast fund of wit and humour; and upon this he is not niggardly in the draughts he draws for the behoof of his readers.

LORD WALLINGTON received the pledge, on the 23rd instant, at his beautiful seat called Ardrey Castle, from the hands of the Rev. Theobald Mathew. Mr. O'CONNELL, M.P., acknowledged himself to be the friend of Teetotalism, in a speech which he made to a numerous audience on Saturday Evening last.

AN INVITATION has been sent to the Rev. THEOBALD MATHEW, to honour with his presence the Excursion to Richmond on the 20th of this month.

WEEKLY LIST OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

HOLD IN AND NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

Chair taken at 8 o'clock unless otherwise announced.

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society holds two large meetings every Wednesday and Saturday, at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, at 8 o'clock, and on Monday at the School Room, Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell.

SUNDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. Service at 11 and half-past 6—Sunday-School at 2 o'clock.

Temperance Room, Young-st. Kensington. Prayer Meeting at 8.

King-st., Lambeth-walk, at 9.

Cumberland Market, 9.

Public Prayer Meeting, Rockingham House, at 8.

New Cut, Lambeth, half-past 4.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. Preaching—Morning, at 11. Evening half-past six.

Ditto, Fenn Chapel, Clare Market, at 11.3. & half-past 6.

Borough Market, at 7 in the morning.

White Stiles, King's Road, Chelsea, 8.

IN THE OPEN AIR.

Open space, Saffron Hill, at 8 o'clock.

Red Lion Market—Opposite the Mins Houses, Mile End Road—Islington Green—Notting Dale—Broadway, Westminster, at 9.

Behind Brunswick Terrace, Well-st., Hackney—Clerkenwell Green—Islington Green—Starch-green, near Shepherd's-bush—Open Space, Cartwright-street.

Rosemary-lane—Salisbury-st. Portman Market, 8.

Opposite the Mins Houses, Mile End Road—Stepney Green, at 4.

Weymouth Terrace, Hackney Road, at 6.

MONDAY.

School Room, Aylesbury-st., Clerkenwell, L. U. T. Asso.

Angel Alley, Bishopsgate, Metro. Roman Catholic Asso.

Robinson's School-room, Whiting-st., Waterloo-road.

The Chapel, Castle-st., Saffron Hill.

School-Room, Orange-st., Chapel, Leicester-square.

School-Room, High-st., Stokenewington, at half-past 7.

School-room, Deyrell-st., Chapel-yard, Dover-road.

Temperance Hall, Chelsea, New-rd., back of Staines-st.

Temperance-room, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fleet-st., Prayer meet.

William-st., Chapel, Portland-road.

Southwark Academy, Union-st., Borough. Females at 6.

Public-meeting at 8.

School-room, Hare-st., Bethnal-green. Youths only.

Enon Chapel, New Church-st., Portman Market.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel.

Soho Branch, at Orange-st. Chapel School Rooms.

Mariners' Church, Wellclose-square.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.

TUESDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.

School-room, opposite the Workhouse, Bethnal Green.

Baptist Chapel, Northampton-st., Somers' Town.

School-room, London-lane, Hackney.

Ebenezer-chapel, Old-st., Bethl.

Mr. Lyons's School Rooms, No. 44, Ratcliffe-highway.

Meeting of Members for Roman Catholics only.

Temperance-room, back of Kentish Waggoners, Kent-st. Bo.

Catholic Free School, George-st., St. Giles.

Derby-st., School-room, Rosemary-lane.

South London Temper. Hall. Roman Catholic Asso.

Temperance Room, Young-st., Kensington.

School-room, York-st., Walworth. For Females only, 6.

Rockingham House, New Kent Road.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.

School-room, Gravel-st., Fenny Square.

WEDNESDAY.

Providence Chapel, Prince-st., Great-garden-st White.

Temperance-Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.

British School Room, Stratford, half-past 7.

Chelsea Temperance Hall.

THURSDAY.

School-room, Little Chambers-st. Goodman's Fields.

School-room, Oxford-buildings, Oxford-street.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel, London United Temperance.

Haggett-stone. Infant School-room, near the Bridge.

Chelsea Temper. Hall. Catholic Total Abstinence Soc.

Temperance Hall, R. H. H. at 8.

Ivy Lane, Hoxton. Females only at 6. Pub Meet. 8.

Temperance-rooms, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fetter-lane. Females at 6. Public Meeting at 8.

Wesleyan Chapel, Aldersgate-st., Shepperton-st. New North Road, Islington.

Pepperell's Coffee-house, Whitecross-st. Females only 7.

Mr. Knight's School-room, Cambridge-rk. Youths only 4.

Rockingham House, New Kent-road. Youths.

Fisher-st. School Room, Red Lion Square.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster, 6 to 7.

For Females only. Public Meeting at 8.

East-field-st., Limehouse Fields. Youths.

Bayham Terrace Chapel, Camden Town.

Wesleyan Chapel, Wandsworth, 7.

Chapel, Aldersgate-st.

Chapel House Academy, Vauxhall Row.

Wesley Association Chapel, Giffin-street, Deptford.

Mr. Lyons's School-rooms, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meet. of the Catholic Association.

Mariner's Church, Wellclose-square.

South Lon. Temper. Hall, near the Elephant and Castle.

School-room, 514, Union-st. Borough. Females only.

from 6 to 8, for Males from 8 to 10.

35, Drury Lane. Reckabite Tent (Star of Temperance.)

School-room, Nelson-st., Windmill-lane, Camberwell.

Females only at 6, Public Meeting at 8.

School-room, Manor-road, Parrock-st., Gravesend.

Temperance Rooms, Paradise-st., Rotherhithe.

Mariners' Church, Wellclose-square.

British School Room, Ship Yard, Wardour-st.

British School, George-st., Regent-st., Lambeth-walk.

Chelsea Temperance Hall.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.

FRIDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.

Wesleyan Chapel, Webber-st., Blackfrs. Membs. Meet.

Broker-row, Mint, Borough.

Subscription School-room, Church-st., Islington.

School-room, Wick-st., Hackney.

Angel-alley, Bishopgate. Females at 6, Public Meet. 8.

Zoar Chapel, Upper Ogle-st., Fittery-square.

School Room, London-lane, Hackney. Youths only 7.

Williams's Coffee-house, Staines-road, Hounslow.

South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catho. Asso.

School-rooms Charles-st., Dalston.

Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch. Youths

only at half-past 7.

Enon Temper. Chapel, St. Clement's-lane, Clare Markt

Wesleyan Chapel, Webber-st. Blackfr's-rd. Mem. Mtng.

SATURDAY.

Lyons's School-room, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Social

Meeting of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Asso.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel, London U. T. Temperance Asso.

Rockingham House, New Kent Road.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway Westminster.

Any of the above Meetings may have the Assistance of Advocates on application to Mr. J. H. DONALDSON,

Honorary Secretary to the London United Temperance

Association, 1 Seckford Street, Clerkenwell.

The Secretaries of the various Societies are particularly requested to correct the above list.

RECHERITE MEETINGS.

South London Temperance Association.

July 1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the good Samaritan, Temperance Coffeehouse, Camden-street, Islington.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

1st — Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.

REYNOLDS.

Mr. Reynolds, having purchased the copyrights of the following popular works, the names of which are stereotyped, he shall offer them at reduced prices.

PICKWICK ABROAD.

Or the Tour in France.

With Forty-one Steel Engravings, and Thirty-three beautiful

Wood Cuts.

Now Sold at 12s.—Originally published at 21s.

II.

GRACE DARLING,

Or the Heroine of the Fern Islands.

With Twenty Steel Engravings.

Now Sold at 4s.—Originally published at 6s.

Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, CHEAPSIDE.

MR. HENDERSON'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.—

Lately published, in two volumes, post 8vo., price 16s. cloth.

THE MODERN LITERATURE OF

FRANCE. By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

This work contains critical notices upon the following eminent

French Authors, with Select Tales from their best productions:

George Sand. Frederic Soulie.

Victor Hugo. Eugene Sue.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

De Balzac. Jules Lacroix.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No 3.

SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Teetotaler" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the London United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by Mr. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread Street: Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: Mr. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and Mr. WILSON, Printer, 5S, Red Cross Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER IV.

ARRIVAL IN LONDON.

"And pray what is taking you to London, my dear sir?" inquired the shabby gentleman of our young hero, as they sat upon the deck of the steam-packet together. "Are you compelled to proceed thither upon business; or are you merely returning from a continental tour?"

"I am going to London to do what many a man has done before me; to find that which seems to throw itself in the way of some, and to fly away from others as if they were the pestilence; to seek after a thing which I have vainly sought elsewhere," answered Melville: "in other words, I am going to London to endeavour to make my fortune."

The shabby gentleman bestowed a look of extreme curiosity, mingled with commiseration, upon our hero; and then shook his head gravely.

"You tremble for me, in the pursuit of my object," said Melville, with a bitter smile. "But everything had a beginning; and some lucky accident has often effected that which real talent and perseverance could never have achieved. You will laugh when I tell you the nature of the profession in which I am about to embark, and in which I have already entered as an apprentice," continued Melville, induced by the recklessness which is imparted to the soul by drinking, to make a confidant of his travelling acquaintance: "I aspire to the honours of literary renown, and I seek after the gold paid for the outpourings of genius."

"Gold—the gold!" ejaculated the shabby gentleman, with a satirical laugh: "the copper, you mean! Who ever associated the name of an author and the word gold in the same breath, unless he meant to represent two parallel lines which never meet?"

"I knew that you would laugh at my scheme," said Melville, "but your own feelings appear interested in the matter of which we are speaking."

"I recollect!" cried the shabby gentleman, slapping one of his hands upon his knees, as a sudden idea seemed to start across his brain: "we have been travelling a hundred and seventy miles together, and do not as yet know each others' names. What is yours?"

"Victor Melville," replied our hero.

"And mine is Tibbatts—Titus Tibbatts, at your service," said the shabby gentleman.

"What the author of the Guide to Paris?" cried Melville, to whom the name was somewhat familiar.

"The same," was the answer. "I have been a literary man myself for some years; but to tell you the candid truth, cannot earn a penny otherwise than by my Guides to the Continent. The occupation is pleasant enough, if it were only a little more lucrative. I live at the best hotel in Paris for nothing, during my residence there; and, on the road, I am not troubled with any bills at the tables d'hôte."

"I cannot comprehend the meaning of this exemption from such unpleasant demands," said Melville.

"Oh! the reason is very simple," returned Mr. Titus Tibbatts. "When we are told that Hannibal softened the Alpine rocks with vinegar, we do not believe a word of the story; but when I assure you that all I do, in return for my breakfasts and dinners, is to recommend the several establishments, at which I feed, to my fellow-countrymen in my Guides, you may readily believe the assertion."

"I do not doubt your veracity," said Melville: "and, indeed, I noticed the fact of your escaping without any demand for payment at the several hotels upon the road, and my curiosity was materially awakened."

"But let us speak of your intentions," said Mr. Tibbatts, after a pause. "You are going to London to set up business as an author; and you hope to live upon the profits. Your stock-in-trade is your brain. But if you possessed, the coal-mines of the north, and had not the means of working them, you would continue a poor man. However, let us see! Do you know any one to take you by the hand in London,—any Mecenas to recommend you to public notice?"

"Not a soul," was the reply.

"Are you acquainted with any publisher, who will probably take an interest in you at the commencement of your undertaking?" pursued the catechiser.

"Not one," answered Melville.

"Any printer who will use his types as a matter of speculation in your behalf?"

"None."

"Have you the necessary funds to publish a first work, and trust to that foundation as the basis of future success?"

"I have scarcely enough to maintain me for a week after my arrival in London."

"Then in the name of heaven," exclaimed Mr. Titus Tibbatts, "how do you hope to do any good? You had better hire yourself as porter to a warehouse, sweep a respectable crossing, ring a church-bell, or turn costermonger at once, than pursue this mad scheme. Trust to my experience—believe an old hand—and renounce all idea of continuing in a career which can only lead you to want and misery, unless you have friends, money, or interest to help you on."

"There have been instances where persevering men have forced themselves upon public notice," said Melville; "and their abilities have been recognised as soon as they procured a fair hearing. Do you pretend to tell me, that if I write a good book,—I merely speak for the sake of example,—submit it to a publisher, and demand an impartial opinion, that I shall not obtain one?"

"You will not be judged according to your own merits," answered Mr. Tibbatts. "I know all that you say, is said and argued by every beginner in the literary sphere; and then, in a few years, they found out their mistake,—as I did."

"Every literary aspirant does not experience the same fate," remarked Melville; "or else there would be no good authors in existence."

"And you think that you may probably prove one of the exceptions?" said Titus, somewhat bitterly: "but I see—excuse me—that you have the failing which I possess!" then, in his habitually goodnatured tone, he added. "You behold me—you behold my garb—this old coat, these gloves, and these pantaloons; and then," he added in a lower tone of voice, "I have totally lost the confidence of my washerwoman for a long—long time. Well—I am an author: I began as you do, full of hopes; I speedily experienced the most galling disappointment. I struggled on for some time, as a contributor to periodicals: I then attempted a novel, but could never find a publisher, or even a printer for it; so I took to drinking to drown care, and to writing Guides to support myself, and this occupation just sustains a narrow partition between existence and starvation."

"Your picture is most melancholy," said Melville, shuddering as he remembered that he also had been already compelled to take to drinking: "I shall however give the profession, which I have marked out for myself, a fair trial, and—"

"And when you find yourself in the work-house or debtor's gaol, you will call to mind the advice I gave you on board this vessel," added Mr. Tibbatts.

"I am resolved to follow my own inclinations," said Melville, somewhat impatiently.

"My advice is perfectly disinterested," returned the shabby gentleman; "and to convince you of the truth of my assertion, I will afford you all the assistance I possibly can on our arrival in London."

In the meantime Mrs. Terrywhist had laid herself down on a sofa in the cabin; and from the bed a lurch of the vessel speedily removed her to the floor, where she fell, with all the weight of a carcase by no means sylph-like. Her daughter declared in the most positive terms, that, for her part, she was sure of never reaching Dover alive; and yet, in spite of this conviction, the young lady, probably through some idiosyncrasy of disposition, expressed her intention, in the same breath, of writing a long account of her vexations and sensations, on her arrival at home.

All things must have an end, save those whose principles belong to eternity, and not to time; and so the voyage from Calais to Dover terminated at last. Mrs. Terrywhist was hoisted out of the vessel in a most interesting state of helplessness; and Miss Betsy did not feel "herself" again, until she had looked in the glass at the York hotel, to which the four travellers proceeded; for our hero and the poor author determined to continue their attentions to the ladies until their arrival in London. A slight collation was ordered; and, in spite of the late sea-sickness, Mrs. Terrywhist and her daughter paid their respects to the cold fowl with peculiar enthusiasm, sustained a very animated discussion with a pigeon-pie, and then exchanged a few civilities with some bottled porter. On this occasion a bill was presented to Mr. Tibbatts, as the landlord of the York Hotel did not require a puff in a continental Guide; and the poor author disbursed his reckoning with a deep sigh, but in coin extracted from a very shallow purse. Four places were taken in a night coach for London, as the anticipated nuptials of Mr. Balls, the pawnbroker, did not admit of any delay on the part of the ladies; and the pecuniary circumstances of the gentlemen were equally potent inducements for celerity of travelling, in order that the expences of a night at an hotel in Dover might be eluded.

Victor, who had slept during the greater portion of the night, awoke at about six o'clock in the morning, just as the coach entered the vast metropolis of England. He had at length arrived in that city, where he was to toil for bread, and where he hoped to procure the means of being one day happily united to his beloved Louise. But what an abyss seemed to yawn between him and the fulfilment of this fond anticipation! He shuddered to think of his desperate position in the world—a position that was rendered more hopeless by the terrible habit incurred by our hero; and closing his eyes once more, as if he could thus cast a veil over his thoughts, he endeavoured to expel the gloomy ideas which took possession of his soul. But the essay was a vain one, for the natural ardour of youth was checked by the reaction arising from the use of strong and stimulating drink; and while a desire for that stimulant filled his mind, a melancholy cloud hung upon his countenance.

The coach stopped in Gracechurch Street; and Victor's first care, as soon as he had alighted, was to procure a vehicle to take the two ladies to their own home.

"Mind, we expect to see you both at Terrywhist Terrace," said the elder of the fair travellers.

"Coriolanus visited his enemy," observed Mr. Tibbatts, "and surely we may call upon our friends."

"I shall not forget your kind invitation," answered Melville; and the hackney-coach, in which the two ladies and their nine trunks were packed, rolled slowly away from the door of the Spread Eagle.

"What are you going to do with yourself?" demanded Mr. Tibbatts, shouldering a small portmanteau, and looking our hero fixedly in the countenance.

"I shall seek for some cheap lodging for the moment," was the reply, delivered with some hesitation; for the poor fellow scarcely knew what he was to do.

"Come along with me," said Titus: "you cannot be better off elsewhere than in the place where I live, and where there are always two or three rooms to let."

Without any farther hesitation, Victor imitated his fellow-traveller's ease of manners, with respect to carrying his own portmanteau; and Mr. Tibbatts led the way towards the abode, which, when at home, his presence and a rush-light illuminated between them.

Bartholomew Close, consisting of a square and its purlieus, is in the vicinity of Aldersgate-street and of Little Britain; and is entered from the former by a lane called Westmoreland buildings. The traveller, who walks down St. Martin's Le Grand on the left hand side of the way, from Newgate-street, will see a flight of three or four steps, leading to an alley; and if the aforesaid traveller will turn up this alley, take a slight curve to the right at the end, then walk straight on again for a few paces only, he will see on his left hand, and opposite a picture-shop where valentines are exhibited all the year round, as if there were no other day but the fourteenth of February, an archway leading to a narrow and dirty court called Albion-buildings. On a little board, which is nailed up against the wall of the arch-way, is painted a mangle with white posts, yellow body, black rollers, and a green handle; and a few letters, scrawled in yellow on the bottom of the board, indicate that mangling is done at one of the houses up this alley or court. The houses themselves are large and high, and their landlords are very much prone to letting lodgings and taking people in without asking them many questions, and turning them out in an equally unceremonious manner when they do not pay. The doors of these houses usually stand half-open, day and night; and when any one calls upon an individual in a particular floor, he gives as many raps with the knocker as correspond with the number of the aforesaid individual's room. When the postman calls at either of these dwellings, he gives his usual double knock; and then the whole multitude of tenants of that particular abode, rush to the door as if they were in expectation of a messenger from the house of Commons to say that the Corn-Laws were just repealed.

The most prominent specimens of animated nature that frequent Albion buildings, are the domestic cats which sit in the window-sills, and the ragged boys who play upon the pavement. Very often a dead dog lies in the gutter, beneath the arch-way, for upwards of a month or six weeks, none of the denizens of that happy republic thinking it worth while to remove the nuisance. None of the tradesmen in the vicinity are found to have that faith in the inhabitants of Albion-buildings which is ample enough to remove mountains; but the people who thrive most by the custom and patronage of these inhabitants, are the alehouse-keepers and the pawn-brokers. The office of tax-gatherer is almost a sinecure in respect to Albion-buildings; and none of the individuals dwelling in that respectable locality care much about the water being cut off, because they use very little of this refreshing and salubrious article, either internally or externally. Gentlemen in their shirt-sleeves, with a beard of a week, and linen of double that age, frequently vary the sameness of the scene by smoking their pipes at their doors; and a stranger would imagine that the pavement of the court must be very bad or uneven, as, towards night, many of the inhabitants of Albion-buildings when they return to their happy homes, feel it impossible to sustain themselves on their legs.

It was to Albion-buildings that Mr. Tibbatts conducted Victor Melville; and it was into a house of Albion-buildings that Mr. Tibbatts turned, when he arrived in that respectable and respected court. Throwing open the door of Number 22, as if he were quite at home, which indeed he was, Mr. Tibbatts continued to lead the way, up a very dirty and dark staircase, as far as the fourth story, where he was the sole tenant of a very comfortable apartment, commanding a beautiful view of the stacks of chimneys opposite, and only separated from the starry vault of heaven by the tilings.

The room itself was characteristic both of place and owner. A tent-bedstead, without any curtains, stood in one corner; an immense chest occupied the middle, and supplied the place of a table; and on a real table, near the window, were the papers, writing materials, and books pertaining to Mr. Titus Tibbatts. A few pictures of ladies with gorgeous costumes, and gentlemen in blue coats, yellow trousers, red waistcoats, and purple stocks, graced the wall over the black wooden mantelpiece; the ladies being intended to represent celebrated actresses, and the gentlemen eminent highwaymen and murderers.

"Well, here we are at last!" exclaimed Mr. Tibbatts, throwing himself upon a chair, and motioning to Melville to do the same: "Diogenes was rejoiced when he returned to his tub; and why should not I be pleased to welcome my own home once more, humble as it is?"

"It seems very comfortable," observed Victor, by way of saying something, although he shuddered as he glanced at the chilly appearance of the bed without curtains.

"Oh, yes," answered his new friend, quite seriously, "it does very well for a bachelor, you know. But let us get some breakfast first, and then think of hiring a room for you."

"With pleasure," said Victor; and Mr. Tibbatts proceeded to light the fire, fetch some water from the common pump, lay the cloth, wipe the cups and saucers, and, in a word, perform all the light and pleasing duties of a thrifty housewife. He then hastened to the baker's, where he procured a loaf; to the grocer's, where he bought a quarter of an ounce of tea and four eggs; to the milkwoman's, where he disbursed a half-penny upon milk; and concluded his toils by purchasing half-a-pound of fourteen-penny butter at the shop which he usually honoured with his custom for that article, bacon, and cheese.

The luxuries thus speedily acquired, were soon converted into edible or potable food; and Mr. Tibbatts very philosophically observed, that "if the things weren't first-rate, at all events they were paid for." The two gentlemen accordingly ate, with a good appetite, and the viands rapidly disappeared from the table, or rather, the chest. When this meal, which was seasoned by a good appetite and Mr. Tibbatts's edifying conversation, was despatched, the founder of the feast proposed "to shed a tear." Melville replied to this singular offer in no other manner than by a good long stare; but Mr. Tibbatts speedily explained his meaning by extracting a bottle from the corner of his cupboard, and pouring a part of the contents into two egg-cups, for of wine glasses he had none. Victor, whose nose was immediately assailed by the odour of gin, gladly welcomed the appearance of the baneful stimulant; and while, with flushed countenance and eyes that sparkled with unnatural lustre, he swallowed two or three drams one after the other, his companion raised a laugh by the observation, "That it was a pity to waste any thing."

These little matters being settled, Mr. Tib-batts proceeded to the top of the stairs, and roared out the name of "Mr. Robus," as loudly as he could bawl. The whole house echoed to the din of that magic sound; and in a few minutes, the person thus adjured slowly ascended the staircase and entered the apartment. He was a stout man, very ugly, as all good and honest landlords are and should be; and seemed to possess all the native candour and frankness of a true Briton.

"Mornin', gen'lemen," said Mr. Robus, quietly taking a seat near the fire; "cold weather this, for the time o' year."

"Yes, it is," observed Victor.

"That's right, Mr. Robus, make yourself at home," said Mr. Tibbatts, encouragingly.

"So I do," said the landlord; and, in order to convince the two gentlemen of the truth of his assertion, he helped himself to a glass, or rather an egg-cup of gin without any farther ceremony.

"My young friend here wants a room, Mr. Robus," said Tibbatts, after a pause, during which the landlord's heart had time to expand beneath the delusive influence of the liquor; "can you accommodate him?"

"Can I?" repeated Mr. Robus; "why, if it's to oblige you, Mr. Tibbatts, I'd give him up my own room and welcome. You've been a good customer to me, and we hasn't no bother in getting the rent when Saturday comes round. I'm sure I've had a many authors living in this house, and none as come down so reg'lar as you. There's that gen'leman as has the two best rooms in the house, on the first floor, and as drinks his eight or nine pints o' fourpenny-ale every day as reg'larly as clock-work, doesn't behave hisself near so honourable as you, Mr. Tibbatts: so here's a health to ye, Sir, and thank'ee kindly for all favours. Your health, sir."

And as he uttered these words, the worthy landlord helped himself a second time to gin; thus treating his stomach to another dram, doubtless to reward it for its forbearance in not having craved any breakfast that morning.

"But you have a room, Mr. Robus?" said Mr. Tibbatts interrogatively.

"I have, sir, an' a wery nice un it be too," answered Mr. Robus. "It's well aired, and ain't at all damp. Indeed it's on'y been vacant three weeks come next Tuesday; the last tenants was an Irishman and his family. There was eleven on 'em and a pig lived for ten months in one room; so I'm blowed if it can be damp after that."

Victor thought this reasoning somewhat too conclusive to be pleasant, and he inquired if Mr. Robus had a vacant room in which only a fraction of that number of inhabitants had dwelt. A reply was immediately given in the affirmative; and the landlord led the way to an apartment situate beneath that which was owned by Mr. Titus Tibbatts.

"There's a room!" cried Mr. Robus, in a tone of the deepest admiration, as he ushered Victor and the poor author into a chamber, the floor of which was as black as that of a coal-cellar, and the wainscoted walls as dirty as if they had never been acquainted with water.

"It is indeed!" exclaimed Victor, in a tone of the most unmitigated disgust: but aware of his poverty, and glad to find himself in the vicinity of a friend even so poor and miserable as Mr. Tibbatts, he at once agreed to become the weekly tenant of the lodging in question. The sum of three shillings and sixpence, being the rent for the first term of seven days, was immediately paid in advance; and Mr. Robus declared, with a terrible oath, "that they should wash down the bargain with a drop of blue ruin at his expence." The three individuals accordingly proceeded to an adjacent gin-palace; and that was the first time that Victor had ever entered such a scene of iniquity and horror in the English metropolis.

The gin-palace was fitted up in the most costly style. No expence had been spared to render it attractive; and the services of a very pretty girl had been secured to attend at the bar. Decked out in her meretricious garb, she resembled the liquor which she disbursed so plentifully; for she was attractive to a superficial glance, but polluted and dangerous in character. At the bar were two or three old women, with deep wrinkles upon their brows, with emaciated arms, squalid and dirty appearance, and clothed almost in rags. These wretches were drinking a measure of gin between them; and they lapped up the fiery drink as if they were imbibing the fabled elixir which would, it was supposed, restore its possessor to youth and beauty.—Youth! drink had hurried those miserable females on to a premature old age:—beauty! the same cause had undermined every trace of those attractions which they possessed in their early days! At another part of the bar were three or four ill-looking men, whispering amongst themselves, casting suspicious looks around, and every now and then passing a pewter quart measure of beer from one to the other. It was easy to perceive that they were plotting something which they were afraid for others to overhear, and of which they were ashamed! Every crime emanates from the gin-palace.

A woman entered the house at the same moment as Victor Melville and his companions: she had a child in her arms. She called for a glass of gin; she drank it all but a few drops, and those she gave to her child. That child was not two years old! It was thus that the wretched mother was teaching her offspring to feel an early relish for that drink which conducts its votary through all the various mazes of misery and crime,—those paths which terminate only at the door of the workhouse, or the foot of the gibbet. Unhappy mother! she was preparing the way for the ruin or the untimely end of her own son!

Victor's unpleasurable feelings at the spectacle were soon succeeded by others of delight at the liquor, of which he was so freely partaking. He forgot that he was a gentleman, and that he was associating with those who were only leading him into the paths of degradation and disgrace; he also forgot his own Louise, in the society of the boon companions of the bottle.

Two or three hours passed away; and Victor forgot all his cares in the temporary delights of the glass: but if he forgot his cares, he also ceased to remember his duties; and, in the broad day-light, did he issue from the public-house, his brain confused, his sight almost failing him, his cheeks bloated and red, and his legs unsteady! This was the first time that he exposed his failing in public: but he was in London; he had been to a gin-palace: and who can retain either his integrity or his honour, when he has passed two hours in a London gin-palace?

Under the auspices of Mr. Tibbatts, who was not quite so much affected by the liquor he had drunk as his new acquaintance, the apartment was not only very soon washed out, but also provided with a bed, a table, a washing stand, and four chairs, for the hire of which Melville had to make a small deposit. This he did after having had the necessity of so doing impressed upon his mind several times; and Mr. Tibbatts agreed, in his name, that the same amount should be forthcoming weekly. As soon as these arrangements were completed, Victor, (with shame and sorrow be it said) retired to his couch at half-past four in the day-time, in a perfect state of ebriety; and Mr. Tibbatts returned to the gin-palace to finish the evening with his particular and intimate friend, Mr. Robus.

(To be continued in our next.)

STIMULANTS.

A GREAT deal has been said and written by Teetotalers relative to the medical use of ardent spirits and wines; and as we consider it necessary that our readers should be made acquainted with the real nature and effects of stimulants, we shall at once proceed to show how far they are necessary or useful, and in what they ought to consist.

Stimulants are all those medicinal substances which, applied either externally or internally, have the property of accelerating the pulse and quickening the vital actions. They are amongst the most valuable and important of medicines, and are perhaps more frequently the direct means of saving life than any others. But, as stimulants are exceedingly powerful, their terribly injurious effects, when misapplied in the slightest degree, have been even more prejudicial to mankind than their best use has been beneficial. In fact, it may be said that the abuse of this one class of medicines, under the names of cardiacs, cordials, alexipharmics, &c. &c., was the cause of more numerous deaths during the dark ages of medicine than the sword and pestilence united. The dreadful mortality of the small-pox and of fevers during the middle ages, and even during the earlier parts of the last century, were mainly owing to the administration, by nurses and physicians, of strong cordials and heating stimulants of all sorts, the tendency of all of which was to increase the violence of the disease; although they were intended merely to expel the noxious and poisonous humours from the system. But, happily for mankind, a more cautious use of these articles has been introduced, and they are now the constant means of preserving, when properly applied, the life which they were formerly so quick to destroy.

Stimulants are either simple or direct in their operation, as the external application of heat, in all forms, dry and moist, by friction, &c., the application to the stomach of hot liquors, spices, camphor, hartshorn, warm and aromatic gums and oils—as mint, cardamom, cajeput, ginger, assafoetida, red pepper, spirits of turpentine, &c.; or they act first as stimulants, but afterwards produce effects of a different character, as is the case with all which are termed diffusible stimulants—such as wine, brandy, and spirits of all sorts, opium, &c.; all of which are highly stimulant at first, and in small quantity,—but afterwards, and when taken in larger doses, produce exhaustion, debility, sleep, and death.

The first class of stimulants here mentioned are, upon the whole, the most safe; and should be invariably used in preference to the last, when they can be had, in all cases of suspended animation, from cold, drowning, suffocation, &c. Spirits—or the second class of stimulants—produce, at times, a temporary relief from pains, spasms, &c.; and in these cases only should they be used somewhat freely, as they cannot do much hurt while the violence of the disease subsists. They should not however be resorted to, unless the pain be very urgent, or the debility be so great as to endanger life.

Spirits are too frequently applied in case of severe attacks of spasms. It is true that the chief remedies of spasm are two-fold; viz., those which excite any sudden or violent emotion; and tonics or stimulants, and medicines styled, from the effects, antispasmodics. When spasm depends on irritation, the cause must be investigated, and if possible removed by the appropriate remedies, if within their reach. If the cause cannot be ascertained, we must endeavour to lessen irritability by anodynes, of which the principal are camphor, hyoscyamus, and opium. A sudden turn, the apprehension of a severe operation, on the return of a fit, or an unexpected surprise, have also succeeded. Dashing water in the face, touching a person unexpectedly with something cold, and throwing up a cold elystr, have, from the same principles, been effectual. Electricity also probably acts by the surprise and terror which it excites: but a recourse to wine or spirits should, in most cases, be religiously avoided. Metallic tonics might be used, such as iron, copper, mercury, arsenic, silver, and zinc. Each is often effectual, and each has its temporary reputation. Arsenic, copper, and silver seem the most generally useful. The action of other stimulants need not be pursued, except so far as mercurials and some of the metallic tonics may produce this effect.

Spasms, be it also observed, are not a little encouraged by drinking; as they spring from irritation and debility,—especially from the latter, though both are sometimes combined; but what produces either irritation or debility more than habits of intoxication?

There are three occasions in which spirits have been thought to be necessary and useful; viz., in very cold weather,—in very warm weather,—and in times of hard labour.

In the first place, there cannot be a greater error than to suppose that spirituous liquors lessen the effects of cold upon the body. On the contrary, they always render the body more liable to be affected and injured by cold. The temporary warmth they produce is always succeeded by chilliness. If anything, besides warm clothing and exercise, be necessary to warm the body in cold weather, a plentiful meal of wholesome food is at all times sufficient for that purpose. This, by giving a tone to the stomach, invigorates the whole system, while the gentle excitation created by digestion adds considerably to the natural and ordinary heat of the body, and thus renders it less sensible of the cold.

In the second place, it is equally absurd to suppose that spirituous liquors lessen the effects of heat upon the body. So far from it, they rather increase that heat. They add an internal heat to the external heat of the sun; they dispose to fevers and inflammations of the most dangerous kind; they produce preternatural sweats which weaken, instead of an uniform and gentle perspiration which exhilarates the body.

In the third place, there is neither strength nor nourishment in spirituous liquors. If they produce vigour in labour, it is of a transient nature, and is always succeeded with a sense of weakness and fatigue. The more simply life is supported, and the less stimulus we use, the better.

General Jackson, of America, was once asked if soldiers needed the stimulant of ardent spirits. He replied that he had observed, in arduous duty and severe cold, that those performed the one and endured the other the best who drank only water; and the venerable army-surgeon, Dr. Jackson, of our own country, (than whom no man can be looked upon as better authority,) gave it as his opinion that ardent spirits deteriorated the health of the man, and that their entire disuse was calculated to promote the health as well as the comfort of the soldiery. By a recent regulation of the English government, the usual supply of spirits to soldiers on foreign stations is discontinued, instead of which they have a small increase of pay. This alteration is acknowledged by Sir Henry Hardinge to have been occasioned by the valuable information communicated on this subject through the medium of the Dublin Temperance Society.

It is notorious that in what is called the "training" of that most detestable and brutal class of men—the pugilistic combatants, or prize-fighters—the use of ardent spirits is entirely interdicted, from a correct and well-founded opinion that the use of such stimulants prevents that accession of muscular strength which they deem so important in actual combat; and if such degraded and abandoned wretches as these for a time relinquish their most favourite liquor, when neither motives of real morality nor true philosophy can be supposed to influence their conduct, it must be necessarily inferred that from experience these trainers have found out that the use of ardent spirits produces a deteriorating effect upon the natural energies, and impairs the physical strength. The fact is, that whether taken moderately, habitually, or excessively, ardent spirit is calculated to lessen the bodily strength, and render a man more unfit for any service in which activity and energy are required.

The habit of indulging in the stimulant of spirituous potations, impairs the inclination for any weaker beverage. The Chinese have a proverb to the effect, that "the man who does not love tea covets rack." Even the particular kind of intoxicating liquor to which a person is addicted may frequently be surmised from the physiognomy. Indulgence in wines produces turgidity of the eyes, and a dark red inclining to purple hue of the complexion. Gin gives a leaden colour, deadness of the eye, emaciation, great depression of spirits, and diminution of muscular power. Brandy produces a peculiar ferocity of temper, and forms the finished ruffian.

There are but two cases, that can occur, in which spirituous liquors as drams, should ever be recommended by medical men: these cases are when faintness or a stoppage to the circulation of the blood has been produced, or when the body has been long exposed to wet weather, and more especially if cold be joined with it. In the first place we comply strictly with the advice of King Solomon, who confines the use of "strong drinks" only to him that is ready to perish; and in the latter case a very small quantity of spirit will obviate debility and prevent fever.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Moderation's" request cannot be complied with, in consequence of the peculiar view he wishes to take of the subject. The Editor regrets that he cannot avail himself of "an address to the Ladies."

D. H. is sincerely thanked for his kindness. The idea is sweetly pretty. We must however inform him, in reference to another portion of his letter, that pronunciation has but little influence over the orthography of English words: ex. gr. strong—tongue; plough—enough—tough,—&c. &c. The Editor is sorry that he cannot insert the lines; but he has resolved to introduce as little poetry as possible into the columns of The Teetotaler.

W. W. F. is thanked for his communication. We shall be happy to receive any contributions with which he may favour us.

Private answers have been sent to Mr. George Wilson, Sheffield. —A. B. C., Doncaster. —M. L. X., —T. T., Dover. —"A Naval Officer," —"An Old Drunkard and young Teetotaler," —and "Vindex."

To several of our correspondents we reply, that those readers who dwell in small towns, at a considerable distance from the metropolis or from large country-towns, will find it more convenient to order the Monthly Parts of The Teetotaler. Each Monthly Part will contain four Numbers of the paper—will be stitched in a neat wrapper—and will be charged ninepence.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Teetotal progress, and the transactions of Teetotal Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We solicit the correspondence of the heads of all Teetotal Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

ERRATUM.—Number II. In the first page, third column, 16 lines from the top,—for "your broker," read "the broker."

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 6d.
Every succeeding line 4d.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JULY 11th, 1840.

Mr. J. H. DONALDSON tendered his resignation, as Honorary Secretary to the London United Temperance Association, to the General Committee, on Wednesday, July 1st.

The General Committee assembled at the Chapel in Aldersgate-street, on Friday evening, July 3rd, at eight o'clock precisely.

It was unanimously resolved by the General Committee that Mr. DONALDSON's resignation should be received, and that he should be forthwith requested also to withdraw his name from the list of members of the General Committee.

"THE TEETOTALER" has experienced a success and a share of favour at the hands of the public, the extent of which has encouraged the really disinterested disciples of Teetotalism to continue their exertions in the grand cause with renewed energy. The same success has quite astonished the malignant enemies who have vainly endeavoured to injure the sale of a publication which has purely disinterested and philanthropic aims in view. Those shareholders, who have liberally advanced their money to found an enterprize which will tend to the amelioration of their fellow-creatures, will not only reap the proper reward for their generous outlay, but will also be shortly enabled to devote a portion of the profits of their journal to the London United Temperance Association. Thus the treasury of the Association will not only receive a benefit from the establishment of the publication; but a part of the proceeds will be set apart for the purpose of printing a large number of the paper for gratuitous circulation amongst the poor.

All new enterprises find enemies in some quarter or another; and those enemies, in the zeal of their malignity, do not hesitate to step far beyond the boundaries of truth. Thus has it occurred that a few evil-disposed and malignant individuals have exerted themselves to circulate a number of false reports relative to the manner in which this journal is conducted, its object, and the ultimate destination of its proceeds. These enemies are of two kinds. The first class embraces those who belong to other societies and associations; and the latter class comprises those who hoped to obtain active and lucrative employment upon the establishment of The Teetotaler, but whose selfish views were disappointed. Both classes, however enthusiastic they may appear in the cause of Teetotalism, morality, and religion, demonstrate their hypocrisy, the baseness of their minds, and the jealousy of their dispositions, by the opposition they offer to a philanthropic enterprise. But the unjust man shall not triumph in his turpitude, nor the slanderer effect an evil purpose with his venomous tongue: the hypocrite and the deceiver shall be themselves deceived; and the contempt of all good and conscientious men shall inflict upon the selfish and the envious the most galling chastisement which the grovelling natures of the latter can receive.

The Teetotaler is essentially a philanthropic, a moral, and a Christian publication. It is philanthropic, because its object is to amerce the conditions of men, by reclaiming them from the paths of intemperance and dissipation; it is moral, because every article which it contains has some salutary aim in view, and advocates some good purpose; and it is Christian, because it inculcates those principles which are closely allied to the charities and virtues taught by the Gospel. As yet, we have adhered faithfully to this plan: and our readers may rest assured that we shall not deviate from it.

There is no character more thoroughly contemptible than the slanderer. The slanderer necessarily deals in falsehood and deceit, and will stop at no crime which may tend to gratify his malignant propensities. Nothing is more beautiful than religion, coupled with sincerity: nothing is more revolting to the mind than an affectation of religious feeling, beneath which all is shallowness and hypocrisy. The slanderer seeks the hospitality of an individual—learns all the little secrets and peculiarities of opinion possessed by his entertainer—affects to play with his children—breaks bread with him (a circumstance sacred even amongst savages)—and then departs to commence his work of defamation against the very man who received him as a friend. The slanderer obtains the confidence of individuals under a solemn promise, ratified with an oath in the sight of heaven, not to abuse that confidence; and then he hastens to divulge to his brother slanderers all he has heard. Hence is it that the slanderer is usually a hypocrite,—because he endeavours to conceal his selfishness and malignity beneath the cloak of religion. He is naturally an unhappy man—his conscience is an evil one—and his pillow is covered with thorns. The success of others is galling to him: their misfortunes are by him construed into crimes. He is uncharitable in all his sentiments and opinions: his bosom is filled with bitterness and gall. But when the slanderer attacks an establishment undeniably humane, or an individual who is exerting himself strenuously in a good cause,—when he shoots forth his spite against the former, and his venom against the latter, he resembles the viper that turns to gnaw at a file!

These few observations will serve two purposes. They will convince our friends that The Teetotaler is not a merely "money-making speculating;" and it will show our enemies that we are aware of the base designs they have meditated and are meditating to annoy us. We repeat, that the readers of The Teetotaler shall find its contents to be invariably moral, harmlessly amusing, and truly Christian in the most liberal meaning of the phrase; and that a word shall never appear in its columns, which may call a blush to the cheek of the most fastidious, or militate against the religious sentiments of the most punctilious.

The subject of the law of the penalty of death is at present occupying a considerable share of public attention; and we are happy to perceive that the observations which we submitted to the public in the last number of The Teetotaler, did not fail to produce a certain effect. They have been copied into several of the provincial journals, and translated into two of the leading French newspapers; and they formed the topic of conversation in several coteries political meetings. We were also honoured by a letter from Mr. FITZROY KELLY, assuring us that that gentleman would devote his attention to those observations. Mr. KELLY has embarked in a noble and a generous cause; and we could only wish that his view of the question was as little circumscribed as our own. We request the attention of the reader to our notice of a new English version of Victor Hugo's celebrated work—Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné. That notice will be found amongst our Reviews of New Books in this Number of our journal.

We see, by a statement in the Morning Herald, that a dinner was given at Paris, on Wednesday last, by twelve hundred of the liberal party, in which amongst other toasts, "The Abolition of the Punishment of Death" was given and much approved of.

MADNESS.

How wonderful is the human intellect—what vast combinations can it accomplish—and how varied are the fruits of its efforts! The human intellect can leave the earth, and seek food for its contemplation in the boundless regions of space—it can cast roads over mighty rivers—it can propel the stately ship against the course of the waves and the direction of the winds—it has invented machines to arrest the flight of the winged bird on his aerial voyage—it has determined the size of the planets, their distances, and distinctions—it has overcome a million obstacles to its advances in the paths of scientific acquirement—and it has produced those works which astonish even itself. If we look at the mechanism of a watch, or the arrangements of a steam engine—if we contemplate such a gigantic edifice as Saint Paul's—if we survey the bridges which are built across the wide and rapid Thames—if we behold in the shops of this metropolis all the articles of use and luxury which are there displayed—and, then, if we reflect upon the one grand fact, that all we see is the result of human calculation, and human skill, how boundless should be our admiration of human intellect!

How terrible is it, then, to destroy the energies and powers of that intellect by the effects of intoxicating drinks,—how dreadful is it to ruin that exquisite capacity of combination and arrangement which can accomplish so much, and perform that much so well. And yet do millions daily indulge in those pernicious drinks which deaden the powers of the intellect, rob the brain of precision, and affect the imagination to such an extent, that its meditations are perverted to ridiculous subjects and idle phantoms. Yes—madness is the most terrible of the thousands of evil results produced by drinking. The intellect, which might plan an edifice like Saint Paul's—which could arrange the combinations of a watch—which is able to perfect all the minute details of the steam-engine—which can raise a mass of masonry in a compact and useful style, like Waterloo Bridge—and which fills the shop with things to please the palate or the eye—that wonderful intellect is destroyed by the use of alcoholic drinks! And then, the man, who might have shone in society as an engraver—an architect—a mechanic—an artisan—or a lover of science,—the man, who might have created a glorious name for himself, and amassed a large fortune for his children—the man, who had all before him that was bright and prosperous—that man frequently becomes the inmate of a mad-house!

And then, in that mad-house, the intellect which imagined the curious and delicate combinations of the watch, turns to weaving straws—the man, who gave himself up to the most abstruse astronomical calculations, scrawls a few unmeaning lines upon the walls, with a coal, or a piece of chalk,—the orator, who once had delighted and convinced crowded audiences with his lucid and eloquent reasoning, makes the corridors and passages of the asylum echo to the din of his howlings,—and the countenance of the female, who once was famed for her personal beauty, is there twisted into hideous contortions. The human intellect is like a gentle but bright flame—it burns clearly so long as it is properly treated; but, if fed with spirits, it will blaze up for a short time with a lustre temporarily increased to a furious glow—and then the flame dies away for ever.

If a visit to the criminal prison would afford a striking example of the dreadful results of intoxicating drinks, how much more efficacious would be a walk through the sad inclosures of a mad-house. The wasted forms of miserable lunatics—the howlings of despair—the blasphemous language of those who are unconscious of what they say—the wretched attempts of the madmen to amuse themselves, attempts which in spite of the solemnity of the scene, frequently encourage laughter by the extent of their folly,—and all the dreadful associations of an intellect which is divested of its powers of discrimination and perception, will at once produce a salutary effect upon the mind of him who visits the asylum that contains such horrors. The lamp of reason becomes extinguished; and the chamber, which it once illuminated with its glad rays, is rendered full of fantastic shapes and terrible visions, in the sickly light which lasts so long as a spark remains to cast a fitful and partial glare around.

Madness is a hurricane of the passions and the feelings, into which the deluded imagination is plunged: madness is the parent of suicide, of violent death, of misery, and of woe. At one moment its victims, led on by every brilliant and sanguine hope, ascend to the seventh heaven of joy and delight, and in the next, they are plunged, under the influence of the same illusions, into the deepest hell of despair. As the worm preys upon the cold corpse that is consigned to the grave, so does madness gnaw at the heart; and as the one destroys the physical lineaments of its victim, so does the other abrogate all those moral characteristics and features which ennoble the soul of man.

The calm sea of July is like the mind of the sane and rational man, on which float thousands of ideas in regularity and order, under the guidance of an intelligence that knows full well the guardian pilot's duty: but the boisterous ocean of winter, when December's bleak winds impel the vessels, on a stormy sea, to dash in wild confusion against each other, and when the guidance of intelligence no longer directs the hand of a cautious pilot, may be but too well likened, in its dark and turbulent commotion, to the unsettled state of the mind of the mad one.

Madness is not like its sister plagues, which issued coevally from the box of Pandora; for madness is too jealous—too suspicious of itself to admit of self-contemplation. Madness blinds the eyes of its victim to truth: its monitors are delusion, deceit, and falsehood.

But madness is hereditary in a family, even as habits of intoxication are handed down from father to son by the mere force of example. And to see that madness approaches—to know that it has cast its horrible spells around the hearts of one's ancestors—to feel that time is only maturing the germinations of its poisonous influence, as it ripens the fruits of the earth—to be aware that it has marked us as its prey, of which it will not be disappointed—and to perceive its approach, gradual but sure, as the lapse of years—Oh! this is terrible indeed! The individual, who is the victim to intoxicating drink, and who knows that his father went mad from the same cause, dreads the approach of that terrible madness himself. He dreads its presence night and day; and every trifling aberration of the intellect, and every throbbing of the brain, he construes into a warning of its presence.

By day does he dread the approach of madness? Oh! yes, the very shadows of the trees as he walks abroad, seem horrid forms distorted into shapes of mockery and unholliness. The rays of the sun appear to operate upon his brain, and rob it of all its moisture. The busy scenes that are being enacted around him, seem all founded upon the principles of madness. Even in sacred places—in churches—the celestial music, the anthem, the voices of the choristers, only form a strange jargon which resembles the gibberish of insanity in his ear. Music to him is fraught with the melancholy of madness—silence with the loneliness—noise with the distraction—society with the confusion—solitude with the dread of that lingering, ever-present, constant thought—Madness!

And by night,—heavens! how acutely is the dread of becoming mad felt by night! The shadows of darkness are distorted by a feverish imagination into appalling shapes—dreadful apparitions hover around the bed of him who dreams of madness—his night-gown is a winding-sheet—his couch a coffin—his curtains funeral drapery. Reflection is so acute during the silence of the night, that thought is a species of physical—it is more than a moral—pain; and, should a storm arise, the artillery of heaven seems to carry the violence of a mad deity upon its wing.

The way to madness is paved by intemperance, and madness is frequently hereditary in a family only because bad habits are also hereditary. If the father went mad through drinking, the son dreads the mad-house for himself, and seeks an oblivion of the terrible idea in the bottle. Then the effects of liquor soon produce the very result which was so much dreaded, and which abstemiousness, aided by moral courage, would have avoided. The gin-palace is but the porter's lodge at the entrance to the mad-house or the criminal gaol; it has two doors: one leads to the cell of a lunatic asylum, and the other to a dungeon in a felon's prison. But of all the sad effects of drinking, madness, as we before observed, is one of the most appalling!

NOCTES PICKWICKIANÆ.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. III.

Mr. Pickwick.—Sam.

Sam.—Sir.

Mr. Pickwick.—I'm decided, Sam.

Sam.—Wot, sir, to have that there corned leg o' pork biled for dinner to-day?

Mr. Pickwick.—No, Sam; not exactly that.

Sam.—I hope you ain't arter changin' that broad-brimmed tile o' your'n for von like a chimbley-pot, or leavin' off them celebrated black gaiters, or makin' a hobject o' yourself in your old age with trousers, instead o' them yaller tights. If so be that them there's your determinations, I for von puts my weto upon it. Beg pardon, sir, but must speak my mind, as the street-sweeper observed ven he said that the dustman was no gen'leman.

Mr. Pickwick.—You need not be alarmed, Sam; I am not going to change my costume, nor any part of it. My resolution relates to another and more important matter.

Sam.—I hope you ain't a-goin' to stand for a borough, sir; 'cos every low feller tries to get into Parliament now a-days. It ain't genteel, sir.

Mr. Pickwick.—You can't guess, Sam, what I am alluding to.

Sam.—Blessed if I can't though! I've got it now. You're a goin' to spekulat on paper, are you?

Mr. Pickwick.—What! Me turn stationer, Sam?

Sam.—Commit your mental spekulations to paper, sir, I mean; or in other words, turn author.

Mr. Pickwick.—No, no, Sam; that I shall never do.

Sam.—Vell, sir; you're right again; 'cos every fool writes his book now-a-days. If a feller on'y goes to Calais and back, he takes up three volumes with the pertiklers. Travels is all the go. There's on'y two things as sells vell at present; and them's novels an' Germans. They give a guinea an' a-half for a novel, and thirty thousand a-year for a German. But if a German's worth all that, wot must an Englishman fetch?

Mr. Pickwick.—Why, nothing at all apparently, Sam, if I understand your allusion. But you are a long time guessing this mystery of my resolution. Do you recollect our conversation of the other day?

Sam.—Since I've bin a teetotaler, sir, my memory hasn't been troubled with no necessity to exert itself. Pump water makes a clear head; wines is in, wits is out.

Mr. Pickwick.—You have mentioned the very thing which—

Sam.—Ah! I knows wot you're up to, sir; now, I think you told me to get a copy o' that there song as I was a speakin' about t'other day; the song vich is 'sposed to be a dry log—

Mr. Pickwick.—A what, Sam?

Sam.—A dry log, sir; a vay of expressin' the conversation between two individuals.

Mr. Pickwick.—A dialogue, you mean, Sam.

Sam.—Vell, sir, a dying log, if you like it better. But it's a dying log then between a lady an' a little beggar-boy in the street. So here goes;—recollect, sir, the lady speaks first, an' then the little boy.

"Pray who's the little boy that is dancing so nimbly? Come, Mary, bring a half-penny down!"—"Please, ma'am, I'm the feller as swept your chimbley; An' I'm wery much obleeged for the brown."

"Alas! how his schooling has been neglected! But perhaps his kind father's deal?"—"No, ma'am, he a tinker as is wery much respected, An' this mornin' he's drunk in bed."

"Perchance 'tis a motherless child that they've fixed on To dance? Does your mamma live still?"—"Yes, ma'am,—at this moment she's stayin' at Brixton, With a gen'l'man as keep a mill."

"Poor child! he is miserably clad—how shocking! Not to give him some clothes were a sin."—"Thank'ee, ma'am,—but I doesn't want no shoe nor stocking, I'd rayther have a quartern o' gin."

Mr. Pickwick.—That song calls to my mind more forcibly than any thing else, the horrors of drinking, and the depravity of those parents who set so terrible an example to their offspring. My resolution, Sam, is to embrace the principles of Teetotalism.

Sam.—Hooray! hooray! Pickwick and temperance for ever! Wot'll my old father say now? Blowed if he won't go into apoplectic fits. But all must follow the leader, as the young lady said ven she jumped off the Monument.

Mr. Pickwick.—I feel happy, Sam, that I have come to this wise determination.

Sam.—Now you'll go an' speechify down at the chapel in Aldersgitt-street. There's some wery nice men as speaks there; 'specially a black von, as always is a svearin' that he's the only vite un there. Blowed if it isn't a wery pleasant sight to see with ones' own wisual organs such a lot o' workin' men, all well dressed, and lookin' as if they had plenty o' bacon to eat, altho' they ain't got no gammon. Spereted fellers they is too, sir—wery spereted: they come down t'other day in a wery 'andsome manner to set up a paper o' their own.

Mr. Pickwick.—Let us proceed to Aldersgate-street chapel, Sam: I am in a hurry to sign the pledge-book of the London United Temperance Association.

(To be continued in our next.)

MISCELLANEA.

In the city of Bordeaux, in France, fifteen millions of eggs are used for clearing wine annually. Thus a great quantity of the most nutritious aliment is perverted every year to the most illegitimate of uses.

Before the year 1730, the malt-liquors in general use in London, were ale, beer and twopenny; and it was customary for the drinkers of malt-liquor to order a tankard, or pint of half-and-half,—that is, half of ale and half of beer, or half of ale and half of twopenny, or half of beer and half of twopenny. In course of time it also became the practice to order a pint or tankard of three-thirds; meaning a third of ale, of beer, and of twopenny, and thus the publican had the trouble to go to three casks, and turn the three cocks for a pint of liquor. To avoid this inconvenience and waste, a brewer of the name of Harwood conceived the idea of making a liquor which should partake of the same united flavours of ale, beer, and twopenny. He did so, and succeeded, calling it porter; and, as it was a wery nourishing beverage, it was found suitable for porters, and other working people; hence it obtained the name of porter.

Green copperas, which is a rank poison, is used in the preparation of porter by the publicans. Mr. Partington, the editor of a popular Encyclopædia, has frequently ascertained its presence by the most infallible chemical tests.

Water is an essential constituent in the organization of all living bodies. When taken into the stomach, water acts by its temperature, its bulk, and the quantity absorbed by the lacteals. Water about 60 degrees gives no sensation of heat or cold; between 60 and 45 degrees it gives a sensation of cold, followed by a glow and increase of appetite and vigour; below 45 degrees the sensation of cold is permanent and unpleasant, and it acts as an astringent and sedative; above 60 degrees it excites nausea and vomiting, by partially relaxing the fibres of the stomach, for when mixed with stimulating substances it has not these effects.

THE FIRE KING.

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

No sooner had he closed his eyes in sleep, than, with the rapidity of lightning, the Fire King descended on expanded wings of raven black, and seated himself on the heaving breast of his victim.

"Long, long," the demon cried, "have I waited; now, no delay. Away! away!" Then, as if under the influence of some powerful magnetic attraction, he felt his body was following the awfully mysterious being. Frantic with the thought, he clung with anguish to the bed—but bed, nay room and all, away they flew through boundless space, quicker than bullet from the cannon's mouth. Then, far from the influence of this earth's centre, the room began a frightful whirl. His burning eyes protruded from their sockets, and his hair "like quills upon the fretful porcupine" stood on end. But, horror still! with the velocity of thought—thousands of miles in a second—he fell—down! down! And, as he descended, the air grew hotter—till, horror upon horror! he found he breathed flames! Yes; there he was in the palace of the Fire King! surrounded by beings of frightful shape, but whose bodies, being transparent as glass, showed the liquid fire, as they drank from flaming cups, stream down their throats, enter their stomachs, burn their hearts; and as it fired their blood, and danced along their veins, it emitted a pale blue flame.

"One subject more," the fire-king exclaimed: "now for his inauguration." Suddenly thrown down, the Demon seated himself on his burning breast—his hot hands held his victim's arms, while the imps, with horrid delight, seized the awful cup, and stifled his shriek by the fiery draught. As it entered his lips, he felt it dry up his blood—burst the arteries—and scorch his brain. But, gasping for breath, in his extremity he shrieked aloud for help; his yells resounded through the hollow cave; and, in a moment, all was darkness; the demons had fled and he was alone. Gradually recovering possession of his faculties, he began to grope around him,—'twas all a dream. But he never forgot the letters that flamed upon the tyrant's brow,—COGNAC, THE FIRE KING!

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Meeting of Members at Aldersgate-street Chapel,—on Saturday Evening, July 4th.

MR. JOHNSON, upon being called to the chair, observed, that notwithstanding Teetotalism had made so much progress, its enemies were still numerous and vehement. Their principal objection was that it subverted the present system of social amusements and recreations, and tended to turn the mind of man to other pursuits. Teetotalism (he said) is not an individual question—it is a general one. It must be considered, not only in its application to the individual, but to the world at large. It was a question of paramount importance to society, as it would purge that society of its crime, and banish many a source of care from the domestic hearth. Drinking makes the homes of the poor miserable in the extreme. Intemperance has also produced the greatest national calamities. Wherefore should we not consider the question of Teetotalism in a political sense? The political situation of the country is influenced by the habits of the people. If we had a sober constituency, we should have honest members returned to parliament; and the result of this would be that we should have better laws. Sobriety and consistency would introduce immense moral changes into the destinies of this great nation.

SERGEANT ATHERLEY next addressed the meeting. He said that he always preached Teetotalism whenever he had an opportunity: whether with friend or foe, he invariably introduced the subject into his conversation. He always wrote about it, too, as often as occasion presented itself. The chairman had made some able observations relative to consistency. He (Serjeant Atherley) would not give a fig for a man who was not consistent. It was useless to preach that to which a man would not act up. He advocated the principles of not giving a friend liquor. That which was poison to him, was poison to another. Were he even a moderate drinker, he would not dare teach the necessity of total abstinence. His text was the single recommendation—"Try it." Many who tried, afterwards continued to practise Teetotalism.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, called the attention of the meeting to those enemies to the London United Temperance Association, who had exerted themselves to the utmost to injure the sale of The Teetotaler journal. He was however happy to inform the meeting that that enterprise seemed to promise the most ample success; and he declared that the malignity of enemies should not succeed in injuring that publication. It was a pity that men who professed principles of Teetotalism, and who pretended to be embarked in a philanthropic cause, should sacrifice honesty and justice to party feelings and sentiments of private pique. Mr. Reynolds, after having exposed the conduct of one individual in particular, who had dealt largely in scandal, slander and malignity, at his expense and at that of the journal, said that he should treat that individual and all his partizans with the contempt they deserved. He (Mr. Reynolds) was a gentleman by birth; his father, Sir George Reynolds, now deceased, was an officer of high rank in the British Navy; his grandfather was Captain Dowers, late governor of Deal Hospital, and he had an uncle now alive, who was also a Post Captain in the Royal Navy: he was a gentleman by education, for he had been brought up at the Military College, at Sandhurst, and could have obtained a commission in one of the first regiments if he had chosen; and he hoped that he was a gentleman in conduct. At all events he should conduct himself like a gentleman in respect to that Society, and would maintain the same line of behaviour in respect to The Teetotaler. After having categorically refuted many of the malicious assertions made by the individual before alluded to, Mr. Reynolds proceeded to read an Essay upon Teetotalism which he had written in the July number of the Monthly Review, one of the longest established and most respectable magazines of the day.

CAPTAIN LOWES then addressed the meeting, relative to the case of the Wapping Coal-Whippers. The greater portion of that which appeared in the last number of The Teetotaler was correct; but some assertions (he said) were not quite true. He felt persuaded that government would do nothing for the Coal-Whippers: neither would the Common Council of the City of London. The captains of the colliers, against whom great complaint had been made, were not so much to blame as had been represented. They were the servants of the owners, and were compelled to obey the commands of their superiors. He however concurred with the truth of the general principle, that the Coal-whippers were an ill-used body of men, and that some means should be adopted to assist them.

MR. JOHNSON, (the Chairman) asked if a deputation to the owners in the North, would effect any beneficial aim?

CAPTAIN LOWES said he thought a deputation would do good. A lieutenant in the navy had some time ago established a general reference office for the Coal-Whippers of Wapping, but he had converted its object into a means of profit for himself. Captain Lowes concluded by observing that three hundred pounds were paid upon the average every day, as wages to the labourers at Wapping; and of that sum upwards of one hundred pounds were expended—necessarily expended—in drink amongst the publicans.

MR. NOBLE then addressed the meeting at considerable length in favour of the unhappy Coal-Whippers. The Coal-Whippers had established meetings to agitate their cause, and meetings did not succeed. The Coal-Whippers were all drunkards against their will.

GEORGE APPLEGATE requested permission to address the meeting. He observed that Captain Lowes had spoken of the case of the Coal-Whippers according to the dictates of his own (Captain Lowes') upright mind and generous feelings. But Captain Lowes had yet to learn the extent of the horrors comprised in the case of the degraded Coal-Whippers. The publicans are in the habit of bribing the captains of colliers to let them (the publicans) have the monopoly of supplying men to work the ships. The publicans are too influential a body, to have their monopoly wrested from their hands, save by an enactment of the parliament. Let an application be immediately made to the Common Council of London, to ascertain whether that Council will assist the Coal-whippers, or not. Let an affirmative or negative reply be given at once. Suspense increased the evil complained of. If the Common Council will not act, then the government must be applied to; and if the government will not act, then five millions of Teetotalers will agitate in behalf of the two thousand Coal-Whippers of Wapping.

DANIEL BROWN, after having respectfully solicited permission of the Chairman to address the audience, observed that a deputation to the North would be productive of no beneficial effects. Something however ought to be done, and done speedily. He and his children had often been four-and-twenty hours without food. The money which he had been compelled to disburse in the public-houses, would have amply provided for him and his suffering family.

CAPTAIN LOWES informed the meeting that the generality of the publicans of Wapping were decayed tradesmen, sent from the North by the owners of the colliers. He (Captain Lowes) thought that a meeting at Exeter Hall should be got up to agitate the cause of the Coal-Whippers; and he begged to open a subscription for that purpose by the contribution of a sovereign.

A subscription was then collected for the benefit of the Coal-Whippers, and for the purpose of hiring Exeter Hall for the object suggested by Captain Lowes. MR. H. W. WESTON, Hon. Sec., intimated to the meeting that Exeter Hall should be secured as speedily as possible to promote the philanthropic aims in view.

CONFERENCE OF THE BRITISH TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Tuesday, June 30th, the sixth annual conference of the British Temperance Association commenced, when the following delegates assembled at the Temperance Hall, Little Bolton, where they remained in deliberation some time.

L. HEYWORTH, Esq., of Liverpool, President.
MR. G. GREIG, Leeds, Secretary.

Bolton, J. Rothwell, H. Boyle, and J. Cunliffe—Bolton, Youths, R. Knowles, jun.—Leeds, J. Andrews, jun., and J. Kershaw—Huddersfield, J. Baker and J. Swann—Dukinfield, Mr. Bell—Birmingham, J. Stubbin and J. Hockings—Bury, Rev. F. Howarth and Rev. W. Roseman—Ottley, T. Barker—Todmorden, J. Greenwood—Rochdale, Mr. Swift and Mr. Booth—Preston, Thomas Swindlehurst and Mr. Charnley—Pocklington, F. Hopwood—Stockport, J. Harrison—Colne, J. Laycock—Oldham, J. Wild—Macclesfield, J. Taylor—Wigan, Rev. W. Roaf—Lancaster, T. R. Lees—Lees and Shaw, T. Micklethwaite—Hull, R. Frith—Newcastle-upon-Tyne, G. Dodd—Burnley, J. Winterbotham—Halifax, J. Smith—Rotherham, T. Wigfield—Rawtenstall, J. King—Manchester, S. Hague—Dublin, H. Brown—London, W. Gawthrop, (From the London United Temperance Association)—Agents, E. Grubb and J. Millington.

In the evening, at eight o'clock, the first of a series of four public meetings in connection with the conference took place in the hall. After a hymn in praise of sobriety had been sung, accompanied by the temperance band, Mr. J. Wright, of Bolton, introduced J. Stubbin, Esq., of Birmingham, into the chair.

Mr. Stubbin made a most eloquent speech, in which he made several observations upon the rapid rise of Teetotalism, and the popularity of the principle as evinced by the crowded state of that hall. Mr. Swindlehurst, of Preston; Mr. James Millington; Mr. George Dodd, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; Mr. James Teare; and Mr. H. Boyle then respectively addressed the meeting.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

The body of the hall was again nearly filled; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., president of the British Temperance Society, took the chair, and addressed the assembly at great length in reference to the chemical properties of alcohol, and its effects upon the human system. Mr. Swan, of Huddersfield, spoke for some time; he was followed by Mr. Andrews, of Leeds, and Mr. Greig, secretary of the association.

THURSDAY EVENING.

At five o'clock there was a tea-party at the hall in "honour of the delegates." Between four and five hundred individuals sat down and partook of the repast. The members of the Society of Rechabites, preceded by the Temperance band, walked in procession from their place of meeting, the Temperance Hotel, Black Horse-Street, to the hall. At eight o'clock, R. Knowles, Esq., president of the Bolton Temperance Society took the chair. The hall was crowded in every part. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, the Rev. W. Roaf, of Wigan, Mr. J. Baker, of Huddersfield, and Mr. J. Hockings, of Birmingham. A gentleman from Ireland then said a few words; thanks were voted to the chairman and the meeting adjourned until

FRIDAY EVENING.

Mr. R. Firth, editor of the Hull Temperance Pioneer, presided over the meeting. After an appropriate speech from the chair, the meeting, which was again numerously attended, was addressed by Messrs. Lees, of Lancaster, Wild, of Oldham, Gawthrop, (the delegate from the London United Temperance Association,) and Hockings, of Birmingham.

SATURDAY EVENING.

The meeting was on this occasion presided over by the Mayor of Bolton, Robert Heywood, Esq.

NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

This society held a grand meeting on Monday evening, July 6, at Exeter Hall. Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P., addressed the meeting at great length, and assured those present that so soon as Father Mathew should inform him that, consistently with his political safety, he might sign the pledge-book, he would cheerfully do so. He declared that Father Mathew intended to visit Manchester very shortly, and would, he had no doubt, also repair to London. Several members of the New British and Foreign Society addressed the meeting, besides two American clergymen, one of whom made a desperate but well deserved attack upon the English Clergymen for not advocating the cause of Teetotalism. Mr. Greig, the Secretary, made an eloquent speech, which he however spoilt by an appeal to Mr. O'Connell to sign the pledge at once—an appeal that was as inconsistent with courtesy, good taste and sound judgment, as it was rendered tiresome by the verbosity and fulsome adulation which characterised it. Upwards of four thousand Teetotalers were present on this occasion. Mr. O'Connell was reading The Teetotaler journal during a portion of the time when he was not occupied in speaking.

Westminster Friendly Temperance Society.—A public meeting of the above society was held at the Royal York Theatre, Westminster, on Monday, the 22nd of June. J. F. Maguire, Esq. of Cork, in the chair. The meeting which was very numerous and respectable, was addressed by Messrs. Reddy, O'Leary, Curry, Wild, Williams, jun., Willshaw and Carpenter, all of whom powerfully advocated the cause. The chairman closed the meeting with a very animated speech which lasted more than an hour. The cause is rapidly advancing in Westminster. At the close a great number signed the pledge.

The Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youths' Teetotal Society intend to hold a meeting on Friday evening, July 17, at 7 o'clock precisely, at Aldersgate-street Chapel, when Sir Culling Eardley Smith, bart., the president, will occupy the chair.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TEETOTALER.

SIR,—It is with feelings of exultation that I welcome—aye, a thousand times welcome—the young Teetotaler; from the appearances of which it is easy to perceive that it is intended to be not merely a chronicler of meetings, but a journal of interest. Such a paper will not fail to insinuate itself into the good graces of the inhabitants generally of the metropolis and the provinces, and to command attentive examination. It promises to supply to the thousands, who are not altogether in love with the Temperance publications previously in being (which nevertheless are excellent in their way, as far as they go) an enlivening journal of instruction; and to those who have never perhaps thought it worth their while to purchase or peruse any of our Temperance papers, it bids fair to prove alluring and attractive. In short, "The Teetotaler" is a publication, the want of which has been long and seriously felt; and it matters not by what hands or by what party that want is supplied. The subject of Teetotalism is worthy the brightest and noblest genius—the profoundest talent. Can even a thoughtful person forbear to lament, especially on the sabbath, to observe the many groups of half-clad, half-fed, wretched-looking individuals that are to be seen in all the poor and thickly populated localities, doling out to the publican the money they have laboured for?

Most of the objections urged against Teetotalism originate in self-love and pride. "If a man likes to enjoy his glass," says one, "why should he not continue to enjoy it?" Here is self-love predominant. He sets up his own little foolish likes in opposition to a whole community; and in his own person keeps up the custom by which so many are made to suffer, because he likes. Ask the same man whether Teetotalism has done wonders or not; and he will say "Yes!" Another says, "If a man has no confidence, and is obliged to bind himself to Total Abstinence he must be a man of weak mind." Pride is here again predominant—a paltry, very frequent, favourite excuse for getting rid of the thought of giving up the half-pint. The man of weak mind is he who has not courage enough to relinquish his glass. Could the society, which has done wonders, ever have been brought to bear upon the public mind, or have at all existed, without some agreement of persons?—As every man, who seriously signs the promise to abstain, must previously have made up his mind to do so, I look upon the signing to be;—1st. a man's earnest that the principle is good, and a recommendation of it to others; 2nd. an act done for the purpose of strengthening and encouraging those who may be called the steam-engines of Teetotalism; and 3rd. as tending to steel his own fortitude to bear up against the allurements of the old-fashioned gin and beer-drinking folks whom he must fall in with.

Your insertion of this letter, will oblige, Sir,
W. LURCOTT.

REVIEW.

The Last Day of a Condemned. Translated from the French of Victor Hugo, by G. W. M. REYNOLDS. pp. 96. London: George Henderson.

We shall content ourselves for the present with laying a few extracts from this work before our readers. The first extract shall be from the Preface: it is as follows:—

In the south of France—towards the end of September, 1831,—we do not precisely remember either the day or the place of execution, nor the name of the convict—the gendarmes went into a prison, where a man was quietly playing at cards, and told him that he must die in two hours—an announcement which made him shudder from head to foot, because for the previous six months he had been forgotten. He had ceased to reflect upon the possibility of death; but he was now shaven,—his hair was cut,—he was handcuffed,—and he was confessed. He was then consigned to the care of four gendarmes, who conducted him through the crowd to the place of execution. Up to this period there was nothing very much out of the common; for it is in this manner that the thing is managed. When the cavalcade reached the scaffold, the executioner received the convict from the hands of the priest—bound him to the plank—turned him down to the horizontal position—and then let the axe fall. The heavy triangle of iron moved with difficulty, fell sluggishly in its grooves upon the neck of the culprit, and only wounded without killing him. The man gave vent to a terrible cry.

The executioner once more raised the axe, and let it fall a second time—when it again failed to accomplish the dread purpose. The convict howled hideously—the crowd became clamorous. The executioner drew up the hatchet again with the hope of completing the work this time. There was no better result! The third blow caused a third stream to flow from the nape of the convict's neck, but did not sever the head. Let us abridge this recital. The knife was drawn up and suffered to fall five times—five times it wounded the condemned—five times the condemned roared beneath the blow, shaking his head violently, and exclaiming, "Mercy! Mercy!" The multitude took up stones, and, in its justice, began to hurl them at the executioner. The executioner jumped from the scaffold of the guillotine, and concealed himself beneath it, protected by the horses of the gendarmes. But this is not all. The convict, finding himself alone upon the scaffold, had risen up from the plank,—and there, a horrible object—with his head, half-severed, hanging over upon one shoulder—he implored the people, in a feeble voice, to hasten and release him from his position. The crowd, full of commiseration, were upon the point of forcing their way through the rank of the gendarmes and hastening to the assistance of the convict, who had already five times submitted his head to the axe of death; but, at that moment, one of the executioner's assistants—a young man of about twenty—ascended the scaffold, told the sufferer to turn himself round while he untied him, and, profiting by the posture of the dying man, who gave himself up to him without distrust, leapt upon his back and began to cut through all that remained of his neck with a kind of butcher's knife. All this was done: all this was seen? Yes!

The preface proceeds to enumerate arguments against the law of the punishment of death. The following passage must not be omitted from this notice:—

"We are sometimes inclined to believe that those, who advocate the penalty of death, have not maturely reflected what that penalty is. A just idea of its nature will however be obtained, if we place in one scale the most enormous crime we can think of, and in the other the monstrous right which society arrogates to itself, of taking away that which it did not give, thus inflicting a penalty which is the most irreparable of all irreparable penalties!

Every case of capital punishment, must involve one of the following alternatives:—

First—the man whom you condemn to death, has no family—no parents—and no relatives in this world. In this case, he has perhaps received no education,—no instruction,—no cultivation of his mind, nor of the good qualities which might exist in his bosom;—then, by what right do you kill that miserable orphan? You punish him because his infancy was passed like a wild-flower in a field, without support, and without attention. You reproach him with the very isolation of his position in which you left him. You convert his misfortune into a crime: no one taught him to discriminate between good and evil deeds. That man is ignorant—his faults must be attributed to his destiny, and not to him. You kill an innocent being!

Secondly—the individual, whom you send to the scaffold, has a family. Then, do you imagine that the blow, which kills him, does not strike elsewhere? do not his father, his mother, and his children, bleed also? Yes—when you kill him, you slay a whole family; and here again you murder the innocent!

Preposterous and blind penalty which—turn whithersoever it will—strikes the guiltless!

That man, who is culpable, and who has a family, may be locked up for life. In the depths of his dungeon, he may still work for his family. But how can he assist them to live from the bottom of his tomb? And can you reflect, without a shudder, of what will become of those little boys and little girls whom you deprive of their father—in other words, of their bread? Do you reckon upon that family to supply, in the course of fifteen years or so, the galleys with males, and the penitentiaries with females? Oh! the poor innocents!

The following description of the last ceremony will show the terrible state of the human mind, when under the dread anticipation of an awful death. This portion of the auto-biographical narrative is supposed to be written in the Town-Hall of Paris just before the execution of the writer—that execution being ordered for four o'clock p. m.:—

It was three o'clock precisely when I was informed that it was time to depart from the Conciergerie. I trembled—as if I had been thinking of anything else for the previous six hours—six weeks—six months. The announcement produced an effect upon me, as if it were not expected.

They made me traverse their corridors and descend their stairs. They pushed me between two doors in a passage on the ground floor,—a sombre, narrow, and arched passage, scarcely lighted by a day of rain and mist. A chair was in the middle of the place. They told me to sit down upon it; and I sat down.

Near the door and along the walls there were some people standing, besides the priest and the gendarmes;—and besides them, there were three men!

The first, who was the tallest and oldest of the three, was stout and had a red face. He wore a frock-coat and a battered three-cornered hat. It was he!

It was the executioner—the agent of the guillotine. The two others were the servants of the servant of the guillotine!

Scarcely was I seated, when these two others drew near me—behind—like cats; and then I suddenly felt the chill of steel amongst my hair; and the creaking of the scissars grated in my ears.

My hair, cut at hazard, fell in tufts upon my shoulders; and the man with the three-cornered hat brushed them gently off with his great hand.

The people spoke in whispers around me.

There was a dreadful din without, like a murmuring which undulates in the air. I at first thought that it was the river; but, from the shouts of laughter which burst forth, I discovered that it arose from the crowd.

Suddenly one of the executioner's men took off my jacket; and the other seized my two arms which hung negligently by my side, and drew them behind my back. I then felt a cord turning gently round my wrists which were thus drawn together. At the same time the other assistant divested me of my cravat. My linen shirt—the only relic of my former self which remained—made him hesitate, as it were, for a moment; and he then began to cut away the collar.

At that horrible precaution—at the sensation of the steel which touched my neck—my elbows vibrated, and I suffered a low moaning to escape my lips. The hand of the executioner trembled.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said he. "Have I hurt you?"

Those executioners are kind-hearted men.

The crowds were shouting louder than ever without.

The fat man, with the red face, gave me a handkerchief, steeped in vinegar, to scent.

"Thank you," said I, in the loudest accents that I could call to my aid: "I do not require it; I am very well."

One of the assistants then stooped down and tied my feet together, by means of a thin cord, which was however so long as to permit me to take short steps. The end of this cord was then fastened to the one which confined my hands.

The fat man then threw the waistcoat over my shoulders, and tied the sleeves together beneath my chin. All that he there had to do was then done.

The priest drew near to me with his crucifix, saying, "Let us depart, my son!"

The assistants supported me beneath my armpits; I rose—I walked; but my steps were feeble, and my limbs bent as if I had two knees to each leg.

At that moment the outer folding-doors were opened. A furious clamour, and the cold air, and the white light struck upon my senses even in the shade. From the depth of the passage leading to the gates, I suddenly distinguished, all in a moment, and through the rain, thousands of heads of the multitude congregated upon the great stair-case of the Palace of Justice. On the right hand, level with the threshold, was a rank of mounted gendarmes: in face of me was a detachment of soldiers drawn up in a line, and on the left, was seen the back part of a cart, against which a ladder of rude workmanship was placed. Oh! hideous picture—which seemed, from the spot where I stood, to be set in the frame afforded by the prison entrance!

It was for that dread moment that I had retained all my courage. I advanced three steps, and appeared upon the threshold of the gates.

"There he is! there he is!" exclaimed the multitude. "He is coming out at last!"

And those who were nearest to me clapped their hands. Much as the King is loved, his birth-day is less a cause of delight than was my presence on this occasion!

We shall conclude this quotation in our next.

WEEKLY LIST OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS, HELD IN AND NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

Chair taken at 8 o'clock unless otherwise announced.

THE LONDON UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society holds two large meetings every Wednesday and Saturday, at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, at 3 o'clock, and on Monday at the School Room, Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell.

SUNDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. Service at 11 and half-past 6—
Sunday-School at 2 o'clock.
Temperance Room, Young-st. Kensington. Prayer Meeting at 3.
King-st., Lambeth-walk, at 9
Cumberland Market, 9.
Public Prayer Meeting, Rockingham House, at 3.
New Cut, Lambeth, half-past 4.
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. Preaching—Morning, at 11. Evening half-past six.
Ditto, Enon Chapel, Clare Market, at 11, 3, & half-past 6
Borough Market, at 7 in the morning.
White Stiles, King's Road, Chelsea, 3
IN THE OPEN AIR.
Open space, Saffron hill, at 8 o'clock.

Red Lion Market—Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile End Road—Islington Green—Notting Dale—Broadway, Westminster, at 9.

Behind Brunswick Terrace, Well-st., Hackney—Clerkenwell Green—Islington-green—Starch-green, near Shephard's-bush—Open Space, Cartwright-street, Rosemary-lane—Salisbury-st. Portman Market, 3.
Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile End Road—Stepney Green, at 4

Weymouth Terrace, Hackney Road, at 6
Shepherdess Fields, Islington, London United Temperance Association, at 3

MONDAY.

School Room, Aylesbury-st., Clerkenwell, L. U. T. Asso.
East London Temperance Hall, Church-row, Bethnal Green-road, L. U. T. Association.

Angel Alley, Bishopsgate. Metro Roman Catholic Asso.
Robinson's School-room, Whiting-st., Waterloo-road.
The Chapel, Castle-st., Saffron Hill.

School-Room, Orange-st. Chapel, Leicester-square.
School-Room, High-st., Stokenewington at half-past 7
School-room, Deverell-st., Chapel-yard, Dover-road.
Temperance Hall, Chelsea, New-rd., back of Sloane-st
Tempece-room, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fleet-st. Prayer meet.
William-st., Chapel, Portland-town.
Southwark Academy, Union-st., Borough. Females at 6,
Public-meeting at 8.

School-room, Hare-st., Bethnal-green. Youths only
Enon Chapel, New Church-st., Portman Market.
Aldersgate-st. Chapel

Soho Branch, at Orange-st. Chapel School Rooms.
Mariners' Church, Wellclose Square.
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.
Rayner's Temperance Coffee Room, Broadway, Westminster. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8

TUESDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.
School-room, opposite the Workhouse, Bethnal Green
Baptist Chapel, Northampton-st., Somers' Town.
School-room, London-lane, Hackney
Ebenezer-chapel, Old-st. Road.

Mr. Lyons's School Rooms, No. 44, Ratcliffe-highway
Meeting of Members for Roman Catholics only
Tempece-rm., back of Kentish Waggoners, Kent-st. Bo.
Catholic Free School, George-st., St. Giles.

Derby-st., School-room, Rosemary-lane
South London Tempece. Hall. Roman Catholic Asso.
Temperance Room, Young-st., Kensington.
School-room, York-st., Walworth. For Females only, 6.
Rockingham House, New Kent Road.
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.
School-room, Grafton-st., Fitzroy Square.
Providence Chapel, Princes-st., Great-garden-st. Whitel.
Temperance-Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.
British School Room, Stratford, half-past 7.
Chelsea Temperance Hall.

Jerusalem Coffee-ho., Jerusalem-pass., Clerkenwell. Youths

WEDNESDAY.

School-room, Little Chambers-st. Goodman's Fields.
School-room, Oxford-buildings, Oxford-street.
Aldersgate st. Chapel, London United Temperance
Haggerstone. Infant School-room, near the Bridge
Chelsea Tempece. Hall. Catholic Total Abstinence Soc.
Temperance Hall, Hampstead.

Ivy Lane, Hoxton. Females only at 6. Pub. Meet. 8.
Temperance rooms, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fetter-lane. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8.

Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide-sq., Shepperton-st. New North Road, Islington.

Peppercell's Coffee-house, Whitecross-st. Females only 7.
Mr. Knight's School-rm., Cambridge-rd. Youths only, 7
Rockingham House, New Kent-road. Youths.

Fisher-st. School Room, Red Lion Square.
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster, 6 to 7,
For Females only. Public Meeting at 8.

Eastfield-st, Limehouse Fields. Youths.
Bayham Terrace Chapel, Camden Town.
Wesleyan Chapel, Wandsworth, 7.

THURSDAY.

Chapel, Aldersgate-st.
Union Coffee-house, Golden-lane.

Chapel House Academy, Vauxhall Row.
Wesley Association Chapel, Giffin-street, Deptford
Mr. Lyon's School-rooms, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meet.
of the Catholic Association.

Mariner's Church, Wellclose-square
South Lon. Tempece. Hall, near the Elephant and Castle.
School-room, 51, Union-st. Borough. Females only from 6 to 8, for Males from 8 to 10.

School-room, Nelson-st., Windmill-lane, Camberwell,
Females only at 6, Public Meeting at 8.
School-room, Manor-road, Parrock-st., Gravesend.
Temperance Rooms, Paradise-st., Rotherhithe.

Mariners' Church, Wellclose-square.
British School Room, Ship Yard, Wardour-st.
British School, George-st., Regent-st., Lambeth-walk.
Chelsea Temperance Hall.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel
Rayner's Temp. Coffee-rooms, Broadway, Westminster

FRIDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.
Wesleyan Chapel, Webber-st., Blackfrs. Membs. Meet.
Broker-row, Mint, Borough

Subscription School-room, Church-st., Islington.
School-room, Wick-st., Hackney.

Angel-alley, Bishopsgate. Females at 6, Public Meet. 8.

Zoar Chapel, Upper Ogle-st., Fitzroy
School Room, London-lane, Hackney. Youths only 7.
Williams's Coffee-house, Staines-road. Youths only.
South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catho. Asso.
School-room, Charles-st., Dalston.
Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch. Youths
only at half-past 4.

Enon Tempece. Chapel, St. Clement's-lane, Clare Market

SATURDAY.

Lyons's School-room, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Social
Meeting of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Asso.
Aldersgate-st. Chapel. London U. T. Temperance Asso.

Rockingham House, New Kent Road.
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.
Rayner's Temp. Coff.-rm. Broadway, Westminster. Social-meet.

RECHABITE MEETINGS.

Southern Counties Brotherhood of Rechabites.

July 13th.—"Tent of the good Samaritan," Temperance Coffee-house, Camden-street, Islington.

—16th.—"Tent of Jonathan," 73, Turnmill-street.

—17th.—"Tent of John the Baptist," 74, Blackman-st, Boro.

—23rd.—"Tent of the Star of Temperance," 35, Drury-lane.

THE METROPOLITAN CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION will hold a Meeting every Tuesday Evening, at the Chapel in Aldersgate-street.

"THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS," A

TALE.—As I am now satisfied with the public contradiction I have given to the malicious report circulated by a certain individual, relative to this tale; and as he offered a reward to discover the author of a scurrilous libel scrawled upon a copy of "The Teetotaler" journal in his rooms, and which libel referred to me,—I hereby give notice, that I shall not prosecute the action for defamation, &c., which I had instructed my solicitor to commence against the individual here alluded to.

GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

London United Temperance Association.

EXCURSION TO RICHMOND.

The Committee have engaged the well known
Superior Steam Packets

ECLIPSE AND VIVID,

For an Excursion to RICHMOND, on Monday, the 20th of July, 1840. The Members and any Friends wishing to accompany them will meet at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street, at eight o'clock on the above morning, and walk in procession to Queenhithe-pier with the Splendid Banners, Flags and Band, used in the late procession, and embark at nine o'clock precisely. Proceed to Richmond, hold a large Meeting, and dine in the Park, and return to the Delightful New Fauxhall Pleasure Gardens, Fauxhall Pier, which are engaged for the Evening to Tea, where there will be a Grand Concert D'ETE, by first-rate performers.

PRESIDENT.—JOHN BILTON, ESQ.:

George W. M. Reynolds, Esq., Author of Pickwick Abroad, &c. &c. and Editor of the Teetotaler; and Messrs. Curry, Balfour, Crump, and Gawthrop, the Advocates, will be of the party.

Tickets, Tea included, 3s. 6d. each. The number being limited to 400, early application must be made to secure them.

Tickets may be had of Mr. Weston, Secretary, 12, Basing-lane; of the following Members of the Committee, Messrs. Caudle and Marriott, 3, Paul's-head-court, Fenchurch-street; Mr. Clark, 7, Chews-ride, Little-moorfields; Mr. Higby, 16, New-court, Milton-street; Mr. B. Kirby, 8, Benjamin-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Crump, 1 Red-lion-market, White-cross-street; Mr. Griffiths, 49, Southampton-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Gawthrop, 39, Fore-street, Cripplegate; Dennis's Union Coffee-house, Jerusalem-passage, Clerkenwell; Thompson's Coffee-house, Golden-lane; Mr. Brown, 4 Curtain-road; Mr. Adkins, Curtain-road; and at Aldersgate-street Chapel, every Wednesday and Saturday Evenings, from 8 to 10, of the Excursion Committee.

The Steamers will call at Hungerford-market, at Westminster-bridge, and Chelsea-pier, for convenience of friends in these vicinities, going and returning.

DENNIS'S Jerusalem Temperance Eating-House, Coffee and Reading Rooms, No. 6, Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell Green.

C.D., the person who painted the large Banner for the City Central and North London Auxiliary for the grand procession, the workmanship and materials of which (silk excepted) he gave to the Society, as acknowledged in their last report, begs to inform the friends of true temperance that he has opened the above House, and earnestly solicits their patronage and support. He assures them that nothing shall be wanting on his part to render them comfortable, should they favour him with their custom.

A commodious room for Committee-meetings, and a Temperance Social Meeting every Saturday evening, at eight o'clock.

BABINGTON'S ELIXIR OF RHUBARB.

Too much praise cannot be given to the individual who, having an inclination to drunkenness, joins the Temperance Association, but the difficulty is found great, owing to the weakened state of the stomach; but if the justly celebrated medicine "Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken for a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit-drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success in all diseases arising from Indigestion; namely, Bilious Headaches, Diarrhoea, Spasm, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., by J. KING, proprietor, 72, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Farringdon-street, and all respectable Chemists.

A GENTLEMAN of steady habits can be accommodated with a FURNISHED APARTMENT, on the Ground Floor, in a pleasant neighbourhood, within a quarter of an hour's walk of the Bank.—Terms 6s. per week. Apply to X. Y. Z., at the Printer of this Paper.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers. Price 9d.

To THE TRADE.—Back Numbers changed.

London.—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No 4.

SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Teetotaler" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red Cross Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS TO THE GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND.

	£.	s.	d.
Mr. John Bilton, President of the United Temperance Association, 1, King's-road, Gray's-inn	5	5	0
Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds	1	1	0
Mr. J. Wilson, 58, Red Cross-street	1	1	0
Mr. H. W. Weston, 12, Basing-lane	1	1	0
Mr. Brown, Curtain-road	0	10	6
Mr. Furnival, 155, Minories	1	0	0
Mr. H. Wheeler, Sydney-square	0	5	0
Mr. W. Wheeler, 1, St. Mary Axe	0	5	0
Mr. G. Wagner, 18, Charlotte-street, Bedford-square	0	10	6
Mr. R. T. Hills	0	5	0
Mr. W. Winsor, 8, Basing-lane	0	10	6
Mr. James Moxey	1	0	0
	12	14	6

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER V.

THE PUBLISHERS.

OUR hero awoke at an early hour; but his head ached, and his brain appeared to be on fire. As he recalled to mind the circumstances of the preceding day, and reflected upon the excess of which he had been guilty, he was ready to tear his hair with rage. He felt that he had done very wrong—that he had disgraced his name and his station in life—and that he had lowered himself to a level with those wretches who may be almost said to dwell in the infamous dens of the publicans. The image of his Louise flashed across his mind; and he for a few minutes seriously meditated upon the means of breaking himself of the evil habit which he had contracted. He knew his own weakness—he was aware that if he once began to taste the inviting liquors of which he was so fond, he should continue his potations; he had not sufficient command over himself to drink in moderation; and he also felt that even drinking in moderation was a most pernicious indulgence.

In the midst of his ruminations, Mr. Tibbatts entered his room.

"How have you slept?" asked that gentleman, whose eyes were very red.

"Tolerably well," answered Victor "but—"

"But you were terribly drunk last night," added Tibbatts with a loud laugh.

Melville shook his head mournfully.

"A truce to all nonsense of that kind!" ejaculated the shabby individual: "cheer up, my dear fellow—always dread reactions. The ancients universally drank a cup of Setine in the morning after a debauch upon mighty Falernian."

And as he uttered these words, the tempter slowly drew a small case-bottle from one pocket, and a wine-glass without a stand, from the other, while Victor watched his motions with mingled feelings of delight and alarm. Mr. Tibbatts poured out a glass of the liquor which was contained in the bottle. It was brandy; and as soon as the dram reached the olfactory sense of the young man, who was making such rapid progress in the evil paths of intemperance, he endeavoured to persuade himself that his exhausted frame required a powerful stimulant. Strange and fatal mistake—which has raised a powerful barrier between many a drunkard and the ways of reformation!

Melville accepted the glass from the hands of Mr. Tibbatts—swallowed its contents—and all his good resolutions fled for that day!

Mr. Tibbatts shortly after left the room; and our hero proceeded to dress himself, with an unusual degree of attention, for he had already digested in his own mind the plan he intended to adopt. The full particulars of this scheme he did not communicate to his new friend, who would only have thrown cold water upon it: having therefore merely informed Mr. Tibbatts that he had a little business to attend to, he consigned two or three manuscripts, nicely folded up in white paper, and bound round with red tape, to his pocket; and then sallied forth, literally in search of adventures. Elated by the spirituous liquor which he had drank, he suffered himself to indulge in hopes of success, as he journeyed along the streets towards Paternoster-row.

The classic region, to which our hero sped, is a narrow, dirty lane, between Saint Paul's Church-yard and Newgate-street. It is chiefly inhabited by booksellers, the richest of whom, for the most part, possess the least attractive-looking establishments. A butcher, a tailor, a haberdasher, and a coffee-house keeper have intruded themselves into this paradise of publishers; and a splendid toy-shop forms one of the corners towards Cheapside. Perhaps the proprietor of this last-named establishment entertained the impression that, as so many in the same street undertook to cater for the wise, there was at least room for one who might supply food to the frivolous; or else he intended his enterprize to be an existing satire upon the numbers of silly people, who, fancying themselves to be either authors or judges of books, repair to the emporiums of knowledge, whereas their real destination should be the warehouse for childhood.

In the vast store-rooms of the publishers of Paternoster-row, are preserved the choicest treasures of human intellect; for all English books, now in print, and the best of foreign languages, can be there obtained: it is an imperishable mine of wealth; and as soon as one vein of the rich ore is exhausted, the printing press soon replenishes it again. It is scarcely possible for a mere spectator, however superficially he may be accustomed to examine into the philosophy of things, to reflect, without an extraordinary interest, upon the silent action of that machinery which moves a world. Those sombre and dingy-looking houses, in the windows of which there are a few soiled volumes scarcely ever disturbed, possess a scope so vast, and produce results so mighty, that their proprietors and their agents (the authors) may consider themselves the arbiters of the destinies of the moral world, and the fibres of the heart of the intellectual universe, upon which are directed all the streams of thought that sustain the harmony and connexion of its social action.

To that classic region did Victor Melville direct his steps. He had made up his mind to address himself to one of the presiding genii of the locality; and, as he walked down the Row, he glanced anxiously into each bookseller's shop, to select the one that best suited his phantasy. The first was filled with clerks—and so he did not venture into that: another was empty at the moment, and he did not choose to trouble the proprietor to leave his private apartment to talk to him; a third was well attended with customers; and a fourth was only occupied for the instant by an old man, with very large spectacles hanging half-way down his nose. There was something kind and benevolent in the old man's countenance; and, after having walked three or four times up and down the front of the shop, our hero mustered up all his courage, and darted into the literary sanctum.

The old man raised his eyes from off a newspaper which he was perusing, and waited for the youth's orders.

"I have called to know if you require any assistance—that is, any literary aid—any one to write anything for you," stammered our hero, while the bookseller surveyed him with the most profound astonishment.

"Who sent you?" enquired the bookseller sharply.

"No one," was the reply. "I know no one—and that was the reason which induced me—"

"Oh! I see," interrupted the bookseller, speaking in a milder tone; "you are a young aspirant to literary honours, and you go about to look for a job. My dear Sir, you do not understand how these things are managed."

"Indeed I do not," cried Victor, almost bursting into tears: "I beg your pardon for having disturbed you—but—I thought—I did not know—"

"You knew that I published a monthly magazine of literature and the fine arts," again interrupted the bookseller, his tone now becoming quite kind and even encouraging, "and you thought you would apply to me. Well—there is no harm in that—you haven't killed me," continued the old man, seeing that Victor was about to make some reply, for the real truth was that our hero was perfectly unaware of any such periodical work being issued from that particular house; "but these applications are usually addressed to the Editor."

"And who is the Editor, Sir?" enquired Victor.

"Ah! that's another thing," said the publisher. "But what can you do? have you any new idea to work out? or do you want general employment?"

"I must candidly confess, that I am an entire novice in these matters," returned Melville.

"So I perceive," said the publisher drily: "then what do you want, my dear Sir—and what can you do? You doubtless had some plan to propose, when you called upon me?"

"I have brought some specimens of what I can do," answered Victor, taking one of his manuscripts from his pocket; "and allow me to inform you that I was lately engaged upon a journal in Paris."

"Oh! then you have written something in your life which has appeared in print," observed the bookseller, with a good-natured smile; and as at that moment his shopman entered, he desired Melville to walk into the parlour adjoining the shop—an invitation which was immediately accepted.

"This is a specimen of my poetry," said Victor, tendering a song which he had copied out three times on some former occasion, in order to avoid any erasure or alteration in the caligraphic part of the performance.

"Ah! poetry—poetry!" exclaimed the old man, somewhat impatiently: "quite a drug in the market—no good now—unless it's of a certain kind. However, let me see it; perhaps it contains some new idea."

The bookseller adjusted his spectacles, turned himself in his chair in order to catch the light upon the paper, and, in a sort of murmur to himself, read the following stanzas, which had cost the young aspirant so many hours to compose and to copy out fairly:

COLUMBUS AND HIS MARINERS.

Over the billows frantic
Of the turbulent Atlantic,
When the waves are white and tempests roar,
And the sea-gull skims the waters o'er,
As if it sought for a long lost shore,
The Spaniards ride
In their joy and pride,
And seek for a clime o'er the ocean wide,
Where their banner may wave as unshackled and free
As the wing of the bird on the tall forest-tree.

Upon the ocean cheerless,
Still of death and danger fearless,
The hardy mariners track their way;
Their path is mark'd by the foaming spray,
And around their prow the meteors play,
While mermaids roam
In their ocean home,
Or ascend to the brim 'mid surf and foam,
In a sudden alarm that intruders should dare
To explore the wild waste of that solitude there.

So long from us concealing,
And reluctantly revealing
Those far-off-isles where summer suns reign,
The genius of earth essay'd in vain
To preserve a spot in her domain
Where Nature's throne
Should exist alone,
And with no other law but Nature's own;
For the Christian invaders sped over the wave,
And establish'd their sway with the lance and the glaive.

"Well—that's not so very bad," said the bookseller, as he returned the poem to the author; "but I have one person employed to write all the poetry for my magazine, and he does it for a guinea a month. The fact is, we only just want a bit here and there to fill up pages; but no one ever reads it. It isn't the right sort of poetry for the present taste."

"Not the right sort?" ejaculated Melville: "then, pray, what is, Sir?"

"Ah! you should know all these details, if you want to embark as an author," returned the old publisher. "But I have nothing to do for a quarter of an hour or so, and I don't mind if I devote that time to you. Your poetry, I say, is not the right sort: the new style, lately introduced by one or two celebrated authors, is the only one that now takes—especially amongst the ladies."

"Could you afford me a specimen of that style which possesses such attractions for the fair sex?" asked Victor; "it must doubtless be very beautiful!"

"Oh! I have a specimen ready at hand," said the good-natured old man; "this is a song that will appear in one of the chapters of a continuous tale, now publishing in my magazine; I calculate that it will make a great hit;" and with this curiosity-exciting preface, the bookseller proceeded to read the following specimen of the new style to our hero:—

SONG.

Flare up, I say, my jolly friends,
And pass the bing^a gaily:—
Who cares a rap if all this ends
Some morn at the Old Bailey?
"A short life, and a merry one,"
Should be our constant maxim;
And he's a fool that gives up fun
Because remorse attacks him.

Here Ned has forks^b so precious fly,
And Bill can smash the flimsies;^c
No trap^e to Jim could e'er come nigh,
For he so fleet of limbs is.
Bob is the best to crack a crib,^f
And Dick to knap^g a fogle;^h
And I can wag my tongue so glib,
A beakⁱ would wipe his ogle.^k

Who are so happy then as we—
Each with such useful knowledge?
For Oxford University
Can't beat the floating college;^l
To parish prigs^m one gives degrees,
To travellersⁿ the latter;
But I would sooner cross the seas^o
Than in a hum-box^p patter.^q

Each state in life has its mishaps—
Kings fear a revolution;
The knowing covey dreads the traps,
And both an execution.
Death will not long pass any by—
Each chance is duly raffled;
What matters whether we must die
In bed, or on the scaffold?

It would be impossible to describe the profound astonishment—the unfeigned, unaffected, ineffable wonderment—the mute surprise, with which our young hero listened to this effusion. The bookseller read it with the utmost gravity and seriousness, and explained each word or idiom, as he proceeded, according to the references in the foot-notes. Victor for a moment fancied that he was dreaming—that the publisher was in joke—or that he did not hear aright. But when he reasoned with himself, and felt convinced that it was no delusion—that liquor had not as yet quite destroyed his powers of discrimination—and that the bookseller profoundly admired the song he was reading, our hero's marvel was extreme. It exceeded all powers of description.

"Well, what do you think of that?" demanded the publisher, as he laid aside the paper, when he had brought its contents to a conclusion.

- | | |
|---|-----------------------------------|
| ^a Brandy | ^b Fingers |
| ^c Handy—skillful | ^d Pass off bad notes |
| ^e Police-officer | ^f To commit a burglary |
| ^g Steal | ^h A handkerchief |
| ⁱ A judge or magistrate | ^k Eye |
| ^l The hulks | ^m Clergyman |
| ⁿ People condemned to be transported | ^p Pulpit |
| ^o Be transported | |
| ^q Preach | |

"Think!" cried Victor, not even attempting to disguise the real state of his feelings, "why—that it is impossible for ladies to read such stuff."

"Ah! there you are mistaken, my dear Sir," interrupted the bookseller; "you will permit me to know how to cater for the taste of the public better than you. This song, Sir, will be set to music—read—sung at the theatres—sung at parties—sung in the street—and will form the topic of conversation at every fashionable house at the West-End for at least three days. Eh! and it will create highwaymen, and make many an honest man a rogue, too!"

"You surprise me!" ejaculated Melville.

"Ah! and so was every one surprised when they found this style of poetry taking as it does," continued the bookseller. "But it is not only the poetry, it is the prose also. A good murder, a highway-robbery, or something horrible or unnatural, will be certain to obtain readers; so if you can do anything in that way—a short tale, for instance, for the magazine—I would willingly give you every encouragement that lay in my power."

As he uttered these words, the bookseller rose from his seat, and Victor, in obedience to the signal, hastened to take his leave of the kind-hearted old man, whom he sincerely thanked for the advice and information thus seasonably afforded.

By no means disheartened at the result of this interview, and having indulged himself with a glass of wine at the Chapter Coffee House, in obedience to that habitual craving after liquor which existed in his system, Melville continued his walk along Paternoster Row, and resolved to sound the opinions of some other publisher. He accordingly entered another shop; and, on this occasion, the brandy and wine had fortified him with an air of assurance which immediately procured for him the attention of the proprietor, by whom he was invited to step into the office attached to the premises. The bookseller, in whose presence he now found himself, was a middle-aged man, with a stern and austere countenance, and a mouth that seemed only made to eat and never to smile with.

"I have called respecting a drama which I am desirous of publishing," said Victor, extracting another of his manuscripts from his pocket.

"Upon what terms did you propose to publish the work?" asked the bookseller.

"Oh! I should like to dispose of it altogether—for a small sum," replied Melville bashfully.

"Dramas don't do now-a-days, observed the publisher," shaking his head, "unless they are written by well-known authors, or contain some remarkably new feature."

"I flatter myself that the style of this is perfectly new," suggested Melville.

"Is it an adaptation from the French?" was the next inquiry.

"Oh! no—it is purely original," was the answer.

"Then I am afraid it has not the slightest chance of success," said the bookseller. "Every thing connected with the drama must be French, or it will fail. Is it in verse—blank verse, I mean?"

"You can look at it," said Victor, unfolding the manuscript. "It is in blank verse, and contains several songs adapted to popular airs."

"Of course it is of a serious tendency," said the publisher, glancing his eye over the Dramatis Personæ.

"Yes—the title tells you that much," answered our hero: "I have called it The Bandit's Doom: it is entirely melodramatic—full of horrors to interest the public—serious throughout—and calculated to convey an excellent moral to the mind. Shall I give you an outline of the plot?"

"Oh! no; I thank you," answered the bookseller, returning the manuscript to our hero; "I could not entertain the idea for a moment. To write a tragedy entirely serious is to create it with the elements of destruction at once. There is only one chance for your drama; and that is the introduction of another character."

"What character would you have me introduce into my tragedy?" demanded Victor, determined to attend to the hint about to be thrown out, if possible.

"What character must you introduce?" repeated the publisher, astonished that his meaning had not been before comprehended,—"Why, a fool to be sure."

"A fool in a tragedy!" ejaculated Victor.

"Certainly; a fool or a clown," answered the bookseller. "You must follow public taste, sail with the tide, or how can you expect your books to sell?"

Victor bade the publisher good morning, and issued from the shop with a sorrowful countenance and a heavy heart. He reflected in his own mind that, before he could attempt to set himself up as a writer, he must first ascertain the precise nature of public taste: he now began to understand that the author does not form that taste, but that he should constitute himself its caterer; he should enact the part of the menial, and not the master of the public; and must write in accordance with the ideas of the world, and not with his own. The author never forms public taste: he however frequently hits upon some idea which immediately gratifies a point in that taste; but he is no more the modeller of the taste itself, than the cook who invents a new dish is the master of the appetite of him whom it happens to suit. These convictions stole into the mind of the young hero of our tale, as he retraced his steps up Paternoster-row towards Cheapside, with a view of addressing himself to the most eminent publisher of useful works in London.

The vast establishment to which Melville, now bent his steps, was soon reached; and, on inquiring if he could obtain an interview with the principal, he was at once ushered into a neat little office, where he was cordially received by the eminent publisher the moment he stated the object of his visit. Melville, thus encouraged, proceeded to relate his views and his wishes in respect to a literary career.

The publisher surveyed our hero with considerable interest, and appeared to reflect for a moment.

"What are you doing now?" he inquired in a kind tone of voice, for he was pleased with the youth's frankness and honesty.

Victor immediately detailed the particulars of his visits to the two publishers in Paternoster-row.

"They are right in all they told you, young man," said the wealthy patron of letters with whom our hero was conversing; "only they omitted the comments which would have rendered all they said intelligible. The bookseller is as much the slave of the public as the author; and the ridiculous idea that we can force our volumes down the throats of an unwilling audience, or, in other words, push the book in spite of the public, has obtained too general a belief to be easily abrogated. Books usually stand upon their own merits; and the same means of giving publicity to their titles and authors are within the reach of all. Some people imagine that one bookseller can sell books better than another: this is, however, only true in a few instances, and must not be taken as a general rule. If a house keep private travellers, or have extensive agencies, it may justify that assertion; but the principal portion of all books pass through the hands of four or five great establishments, and in that way proceed to the various libraries or reading societies where the demand for them exists."

"This is a mystery with which I was not acquainted," said Victor. "Is it very difficult now-a-days for a young man to obtain employment in the literary world,—I mean," he added, after a pause, and with a blush, "supposing he is not altogether deficient in talent?"

"Yes,—it is very difficult to succeed in that profession," answered the publisher: "that is to say, the chief difficulty consists in getting a start. Literary popularity is often acquired in the most eccentric and extraordinary ways. There was a time when the editor of a powerful critical periodical could make or destroy the reputation of an author. But now, unless the aspirant begin with some very novel and original idea, he must commence the profession with the same material that is required as a basis for every other—namely, money; and, without a sufficiency of this to publish his first work at his own expense, he had better embark in any other trade or profession rather than endeavour to build his fortune upon his talents; unless indeed, he possess some friend in the shape of a publisher to take him by the hand."

"Your description is far from consoling," said Victor, with a profound sigh.

"I should not have taken the trouble to make you acquainted with all these particulars, did I not wish all young aspirants well," said the publisher. "There is something about you which has pleased me; and, without making a single inquiry concerning you, I will this moment take you as a clerk into my establishment, if you want a situation. I am convinced my confidence will not be misplaced."

"Sir,—I thank you—a thousand times, I thank you," murmured Victor, his voice almost choked by the emotions which this generous offer had stirred up in his bosom: "I am a total stranger to you; and you kindly offer me your protection! Really,—I am ashamed to decline,—but I am resolved—and then there is a failing—"

"Enough, enough!" interrupted the worthy bookseller; "you may probably think better of it before long. When you are without a shilling, come to me; the place shall be still at your service."

Victor wrung the hand of the generous publisher, and hurried away from the house, with tears in his eyes. The hour was now late,—he had promised his new friend, Mr. Tibbatts, to dine with him at five,—and he accordingly returned as rapidly as he could walk to Bartholomew-Close. He vowed as he proceeded thither that he would relinquish his evil habits and render himself worthy of the name of a gentleman: we shall see in our next chapter how he kept this resolution.

(To be continued in our next.)

TEETOTALISM.

(Abridged from The Monthly Review for July.)

It is extraordinary that, notwithstanding the importance to be now attached to the Teetotalers as a body, so little notice is bestowed upon them by the leading publications of the day. The newspapers occasionally devote a few lines to describe the transactions or the movements of some sect of this vast whole; but, farther than that, we do not see the principles of teetotalism either tested or reviewed in any monthly or quarterly magazine. Let us therefore reserve to ourselves—at least for the present—the honour of this study of initiation; and let us proceed to examine the question with candour, justice, and impartiality. It is a duty we owe, not only to our readers, but also to the institution itself, to devote a considerable space in this publication to a body whose doctrines are gradually forcing themselves into a notoriety which will soon compel the newspapers and the magazines to awake from the lethargic slumber in which they at present seem wrapped up, so far as they relate to this grand subject—doctrines which threaten to undermine the present system of society, and introduce new manners and new customs,—doctrines, which, like the word of Jesus, have sprung from a few, and which, like the tree in the parable, have now gained growth and acquired strength.—Doctrines, in a word, which, if tested by the fact of the increasing number of their supporters will eventually triumph over the opinions of all opponents, and render the occupation of the wine merchant, the toils of the labourer in the vineyard, and the trade of publicans, at once unnecessary and useless.

The teetotalers recommend a total abstinence from all liquids of an exciting and intoxicating character. We have often been told that spirits, for instance, are more or less necessary to the human frame. As we intend to argue the question with the utmost impartiality, we will not refer to the teetotalers for reasoning in support of their own principles; nor will we, on the other hand, here rely upon our own judgment. We will refer to a third authority, and let that be our judge. To what authority can we better refer than to an Encyclopædia of the acknowledged merits of that one which is edited by Charles F. Partington? Turning, then, to the article headed Spirits, in his work, we find the following words:—"Among the principal disorders produced by spirituous liquors are the following; sickness at the stomach, dropsy, obstruction of the liver, madness, the palsy, and apoplexy." Here is a hideous picture—here a dreadful development of the miseries of drinking—the danger of using ardent spirits. Dr. Rush has declared that it is not extravagant to suppose that spirituous liquors destroy more lives than the sword. War has its intervals of destruction: but spirits operate at all times and seasons upon human life, and not unfrequently upon persons who are exempted from the dangers of war by age or sex. If we look to the effects of spirits upon property, we shall find that among the inhabitants of cities they produce debts, disgrace, and bankruptcy; and among farmers and other classes of society, they produce idleness and ruin. Hence it is evident—at least so far—that the system of abstinence is a good one.

The injurious effects of spirits are at once a grand argument on the side of the Teetotalers;—the fact that we are the children of habit, naturally leads us to concur with the assertion that we could as well induce ourselves by practice to drink water as intoxicating drinks;—and the circumstance of the practices of adulteration suggests the prudential and safe method of abstaining from anything which is liable to be rendered unwholesome and poisonous to suit the sordid interests of dishonest tradesmen. Thus, considered in respect to the individual, Teetotalism must be deemed a prudential and a philanthropic measure—an useful institution—a wise project—and a system calculated to diminish the prevalence of disease of all malignant kinds.

In every street of London, save a few—a very few, at the West-End; there are several gin-shops; and to those palaces of woe flock thousands of aqualid, miserable, indigent beings, to expend in the noxious drink the half-pence they rob from their starving children; and in those vile dens are sacrificed health, reputation, fortune, and honour; and from those emanate nearly all crimes. London is a strange compound of grandeur and squalor; it is a mass of contradictions and of discrepancies—riches and poverty—vice and virtue—cleanliness and filth. In no city in the world is turpitude more prevalent amongst the juvenile portion of the lower classes. In our occasional nocturnal rambles through the Dædalian mazes of this vast metropolis, we encounter with disgust hundreds of young girls whose years do not amount to anything like maturity, plying their loathsome trade in the most shameful manner. Heavens! what corruption must there be in a city where vice and profligacy commence so early.

But all this woe and crime emanate, either directly or indirectly, from drinking. Fathers and mothers ruin themselves by that baneful vice; and their sons people the prisons, while their daughters throng the public streets. Then those sons and those daughters drink in their turn; and they hand down the frightful habit as the only legacy, besides a tarnished name, which they bequeath to their progeny. The system of gin-drinking in London is the most baneful that can be possibly encouraged or tolerated. In a statistical calculation made some time ago, it appears that the fourteen largest gin-shops in the English metropolis were visited, during one week, by—

142,553 men;
108,493 women; and 18,391 children;

making a total of 269,437 persons.

Now, if the population of London and its environs be one million and a half, and nearly fourteen of the myriads of gin-palaces—those which are so numerous in the metropolis—nearly two hundred and seventy thousand in one week, the mind does not dare contemplate the probable amount of intoxicating liquor drunk in this vast Babel.

A few arithmetical calculations may not be here misplaced, because nothing illustrates argument so well as the combinations of figures, where these combinations enable us to make reasonable deductions. An individual, who during forty years of his existence—say from the age of fifteen to fifty-five—drinks one quart of beer per day, consumes in those forty years 3,650 gallons of beer, and expends a sum of about two hundred and forty pounds. That sum would enable his children to open a shop, and lay the foundation of competency, if not of fortune. A man who drinks a pint of wine a day, for forty years, consumes 7,300 bottles in that time, thus expending a sum of not less than fourteen hundred and sixty pounds. This sum, if he were rich and his family were provided for, would found a hospital or endow a charitable asylum. The man, who for forty years, drinks only two penny-worth of gin every day will have wasted at the end of that period an aggregate of one hundred and twenty-one pounds, a sum which would save many a son from the prison and many a daughter from a hideous traffic in the public streets!

It would appear from the professions of the Teetotalers, that, in one sense they endeavour to correct many of those evils which are undermining society in England. They are aiming a mortal blow at the vice of drinking; would to God that they would shame the government out of the system of encouraging that baneful vice in order to swell the amount of the revenue! Now that we have a female upon the throne, let her legislate for the honour of her sex, for there are thousands of unfortunate beings of the same sex as herself, who are a prey to the vice of intoxication. If one thing can degrade the female sex more effectually than another, it is the disgrace attending ebriety; and yet in the poor quarters of this vast metropolis may we daily and hourly encounter females labouring under the effects of spirituous liquors in the open streets—morning as well as evening. Every virtue disappears before that baneful vice—honour, integrity, and respectability become annulled and forgotten. Intemperance leads to prostitution, adultery—the workhouse, or a prison—and suicide, or the gallows. Intemperance works its way, as the perpetual dripping of water hollows the stone—and in the end it arrives at the very vitals of the body, as well as the character and the fortune of its votary. Those who are accustomed to drink in the morning will soon become habitual drunkards. In vain do they endeavour to persuade themselves that they require such stimulus—in vain do they attempt to extenuate their conduct to themselves. Time will show them that the vice becomes more attractive as they plunge the more deeply into it—and the more ruinous as they gradually cease to think of avoiding it.

The progress that is made in drinking resembles the progress made in all other crimes. From stealing a penny, the thief gradually increases his system of plunder, and at length purloins hundreds of pounds. So it is, that from one glass, unseasonably drunk each day, the self-deluding and deluded victim suffers himself to indulge by degrees more liberally in that which is becoming a more attractive, if not necessary, habit; and he ends by presenting to his friends the sad example of a degraded drunkard. Hence is it that the Teetotalers preach total abstinence; because we must place ourselves beyond the reach of temptation. If we do not steal the penny at first, we shall not purloin the pound afterwards: if we do not drink the one glass, we shall not covet a bottle.

Such are the arguments in favour of Teetotalism; and we must candidly admit that they are based upon sound sense and philanthropy. The Teetotalers argue against the use of intoxicating drinks, because use leads to abuse; and, although this principle pays but a bad compliment to the strength of mind and powers of self-control possessed by man, we cannot say that it is wrong. We must therefore pronounce Teetotalism to be a humane, a wise, and a prudential institution,—a system that will purge the social world of many of its sources of crime, root out the germs of many a disease, inculcate habits beneficial to industry and to the intellect, and the progressive march of civilization and refinement; enable the poor to find time to read and to think for themselves; encourage the blessings by extending the means of education, protect the weakness of youth, annul a source of evil which feeds vicious propensities; check crime by diminishing the chances of meeting to plot, and of acquiring false courage to execute, schemes of villany; restore happiness to many a fire-side, and diffuse upon the community in general a halo of happiness and contentment.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received the following letter from Uxbridge:—

To the Committee of the Teetotaler.

I am determined not to subscribe to the Teetotaler, it will not be for me.

Yours &c., JOHN HULL.

We have only to inform this sapient correspondent of ours that we never did send him The Teetotaler; and that we are very glad he does not intend to subscribe to it, as it is evident he could not understand its contents if he were to read it. We presume that his note (which is a shabby piece of dirty paper, fastened with a wafer) is written with a malignant view; but we do not hesitate to assure him that we despise all his manoeuvres to injure us. He knows but little of the charities of christianity, and will find that even his endeavours to prevent a poor man of his town from selling The Teetotaler, will not prevent its circulation in Uxbridge. The inhabitants of Uxbridge are too enlightened and too independent to be swayed in their opinions by so prejudiced, so illiberal, so malignant, and so illiterate a man.

A person of the name of Jameson, who is employed by the New British and Foreign Temperance Association to sell their tracts, &c., has asserted that the action against a certain individual for the malicious report relative to the "Drunkard's Progress," was stayed through the determined resolution of this Jameson and others to oppose it. A more impudent falsehood was never uttered: the Editor of The Teetotaler never heard of this opposition to it until after he had decided upon abandoning the action; and even if he had, he certainly should not have listened to the opinions of men who cannot be supposed, either by education or condition in society, to understand such matters. This man Jameson, is like the fly upon the cart-wheel, that exclaims, "Oh! what a dust am I kicking up." We believe the fellow talks of religion, &c.: we should advise him to study Christian charity, and to keep his tongue from evil speaking, lying, and slandering. Such a man as this we dismiss with contempt: were he an equal, we should quote the words of Sir William Draper to Junius, and say "Cease, viper, thou blest against a file!"

D. D.'s "LACONIC" in our next.

N. N. H.'s "LINES ON INTemperance" are too long or they should be inserted with pleasure. We do not however seek for poetic contributions.

"Clara" is declined with thanks.

"THE LONDON TEETOTAL MAGAZINE" for July, and several other publications already received, shall be noticed in our next.

A Teetotaler, Edinburgh, is thanked for his kind letter, and for his donation to the Coal-Whippers.

"NOTES PICKWICKIANE," No. IV, in our next.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Teetotal progress, and the transactions of Teetotal Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We solicit the correspondence of the heads of all Teetotal Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 6d.
Every succeeding line . . . 4d.
ERRATUM.—No. 111. Page 20, third column, 20th line from the bottom,—for "speculating," read "speculation."

21, Paternoster-row.

It is requested that persons in the country, who may wish to subscribe to "THE TEETOTALER," will order it through some bookseller, news-vender, or stationer, in preference to a direct application to the London publisher; as the journal, not being stamped, does not pass free of postage through the Post-office.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JULY 18th, 1840.

It will be seen that we have this day published a list of the contributions to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, connected with the establishment of The Teetotaler. To those who have thus generously stepped forward to aid us in supplying the poor man with a journal which inculcates the principles of Teetotalism, we return our most sincere thanks; and we fervently hope that the example thus nobly afforded, will be followed by those who know how to appreciate the blessings of total abstinence from the poisons which deprive intelligent man of his reasoning faculties, and reduce him below the level of the brute. The next list of donations will be published in Number 8. of The Teetotaler.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION is daily collecting numbers of new disciples beneath its banners, and is progressing in a manner which can leave no doubt as to the fact that it is shortly destined to stand at the head of all Teetotal Societies in the British dominions. One of its delegates, MR. GAWTHORPE, who was the only emissary from the London Societies at the meeting of the British Temperance Association at Boston the week before last, has experienced the most flattering reception at the great manufacturing towns, where he is occupied in furthering the philanthropic views of the United Temperance Association. In the name of that Association, we sincerely thank our brethren in the same cause at Manchester, Bolton, Oldham, &c., for the kindness which they have vouchsafed to MR. GAWTHORPE, who has expressed himself most feelingly upon that subject in his Reports to the Secretary of the United Temperance Association. We implore the Teetotalers of the great manufacturing towns to take advantage of the presence of our delegate amongst them, and adopt such measures as may tend towards the formation of a strict bond of union between themselves and the society which MR. GAWTHORPE has the honour to represent. "Union is strength"—"Unite and prosper"—are two mottoes which are blazoned upon the banners of the United Temperance Association. Let the societies at Birmingham—at Manchester—at Leeds—at Sheffield—and elsewhere, adopt the same mottoes upon their oriflams; let them join the Association which has established this journal for their use; their defence, their edification, and their representation; let them act in concert with their London brethren; and let them constitute themselves the great local branches or sections of the United Temperance Association. Let them adopt this name—let them found their hopes upon the word "Union"—and let them increase their importance and their power by belonging to that society which has its head-quarters in the English metropolis, and whose interests are represented and defended by The Teetotaler journal.

THE General Committee of the United Temperance Association held a meeting, at the Aldersgate-street chapel, on Friday evening, July 10th.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS was called to the chair.

It was resolved that a certain sum of money be immediately devoted to the object of printing tracts for the furtherance of the principles of the Association; and that a depôt for the aforesaid tracts, for pledge-books, medals, &c., should be forthwith established at the chapel, the doors of which will be kept open from nine in the morning until seven in the evening, the moment these projects are realized. Other improvements were resolved upon by the Committee; and four gentlemen were appointed to carry out these views, of which a detailed description will be shortly given in "The Teetotaler."

MR. REYNOLDS gave notice that, at the next meeting of the general Committee, he should move "that the word London be henceforth omitted from the denomination of the society," as that word seemed to imply a principle of exclusion with reference to the branch societies of country towns. From the observations, which fell from the gentlemen present on this occasion, it was evident that this motion would be unanimously agreed to: the word London is accordingly omitted in any mention of the name of the society in this number of The Teetotaler, the denomination henceforth being THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—(From a Correspondent.)—

As a reclaimed character was passing through Milton Street, Cripplegate, a few evenings ago, in his shirt sleeves, the following conversation took place between some young men who were standing together:—

"Here comes a Teetotaler."—"Who is he?"—"I don't know, I never saw him before!"—"Then how do you know he is a Teetotaler?"—"Because he is a Snob, and has got a clean shirt on in the middle of the week."

Who will now say that Teetotalism is not in some measure associated with the idea of comfort and respectability? ONESIMUS.

THE LEGEND OF BOTTLE-HILL.

WE are induced to extract the following legend from a popular work, though our analysis must take off much from the ease and spirit with which it is told:—

In the good days when the little people, most impudently called fairies, were more frequently seen than they are in these unbelieving times, a farmer, named Mick Purcell, rented a few acres of barren ground in the neighbourhood of the once celebrated preceptory of Mourne, situated about three miles from Mallow, and thirteen from "the beautiful city called Cork." Mick had a wife and family; they all did what they could, and that was but little, for the poor man had no child grown up big enough to help him in his work; and all the poor woman could do was to mind the children, to milk the one cow, and to boil the potatoes, and carry the eggs to market to Mallow; but with all they could do, 'twas hard enough on them to pay the rent. Well, they did manage it for a good while; but at last came a bad year, and the little grain of oats was all spoiled, and the chickens died of the pip, and the pig got the measles—she was sold in Mallow and brought almost nothing; and poor Mick found that he had n't enough to half pay his rent, and two gales were due.

"Why, then, Molly," says he, "what'll we do?"

"Wisha, then, mavourneen, what would you do but take the cow to the fair of Cork and sell her," says she; "and Monday is fair day, and so you must go to-morrow, that the poor beast may be rested again the fair."

"And what'll we do when she's gone?" said Mick, sorrowfully.

"Never a know I know, Mick; but sure God won't leave us without him, Mick; and you know how good he was to us when poor little Billy was sick, and we had nothing at all for him to take, that good doctor gentleman at Ballydalin come riding and asking for a drink of milk; and how he gave us two shillings; and how he sent the things and the bottles for the child, and gave me my breakfast when I went over to ask a question, so he did; and how he came to see Billy, and never left off his goodness till he was quite well."

"Oh! you are always that way, Molly, and I believe you are right after all, so I won't be sorry for selling the cow; but I'll go to-morrow, and you must put a needle and thread through my coat, for you know 'tis ripped under the arm."

Accordingly, on the morrow, Mick departs with his cow;—

'Twas a fine day, and the sun shone brightly on the walls of the old abbey as he passed under them; he then crossed an extensive mountain tract, and after six long miles he came to the top of that hill—Bottle-hill 'tis called now, but that was not the name of it then; and just there a man overtook him. "Good morrow," says he. "Good morrow, kindly," says Mick, looking at the stranger, who was a little man, you'd almost call him a dwarf, only he was not quite so little neither; he had a bit of an old, wrinkled, yellow face, for all the world like a dried cauliflower, only he had a sharp little nose, and red eyes, and white hair, and his lips were not red, but all his face was one colour, and his eyes never were quiet, but looking at every thing; and although they were red, they made Mick feel quite cold when he looked at them. In truth he did not much like the little man's company; and he couldn't see one bit of his legs nor his body, for though the day was warm, he was all wrapped up in a big great coat. Mick drove his cow something faster, but the little man kept up with him. Mick didn't know how he walked, for he was almost afraid to look at him, and to cross himself for fear the old man would be angry. Yet he thought his fellow-traveller did not seem to walk like other men, nor to put one foot before the other but to glide over the rough road, and rough enough it was, like a shadow, without noise and without effort. Mick's heart trembled within him, and he said a prayer to himself, wishing he hadn't come out that day, or that he was on Fair-hill, or that he hadn't the cow to mind, that he might run away from the bad thing—when, in the midst of his fears, he was again addressed by his companion.

The stranger, finding that he is going to sell his cow, offers to become the purchaser, and to give an empty bottle, which he produces, in exchange; this proposition is of course received at first with scorn, but after some admirable dialogue Mick finally consents, and the little man leaves him with the following directions.

"When you go home, never mind if your wife is angry, but be quiet yourself, and make her sweep the room clean, set the table out right, and spread a clean cloth over it; then put the bottle on the ground, saying these words; 'Bottle, do your duty,' and you will see the end of it."

Mick accordingly goes home, muttering prayers, and holding fast the bottle.

"Oh! but I'll take care of that." So he put it into his bosom, and went on anxious to prove his bottle, and doubting of the reception he should meet from his wife! Balancing his anxieties with his expectation, his fears with his hopes, he reached home in the evening, and surprised his wife, sitting over the turf fire in the big chimney.

"Oh! Mick, are you come back? Sure you were n't at Cork all the way! What has happened to you? Where is the cow? Did you sell her? How much money did you get for her? What news have you? Tell us every thing about it."

"Why, then, Molly, if you'll give me time, I'll tell you all 'bout it. If you want to know where the cow is, 'tisn't Mick can tell you, for the never a know does he know where she is now."

"Oh! then, you sold her; and where's the money?"

"Arrah! stop awhile, Molly, and I'll tell you all about it."

"But what bottle is that under your waistcoat?" said Molly, spying its neck sticking out.

"Why, then, be easy now, can't you," says Mick, "till I tell it to you;" and putting the bottle on the table, "That's all I got for the cow."

His poor wife was thunderstruck. "All you got! and what good is that, Mick? Oh! I never thought you were such a fool; and what'll we do for the rent and what—"

"Now, Molly," says Mick, "can't you hearken to reason? Did'n't I tell you how the old man, or whatsoever he was, met me—no, he did not meet me neither, but he was there with me—on the big hill, and how he made me sell him the cow, and told me the bottle was the only thing for me?"

"Yes, indeed, the only thing for you, you fool!" said Molly, seizing the bottle to hurl it at her poor husband's head; but Mick caught it, and quietly (for he minded the old man's advice) loosened his wife's grasp, and placed the bottle again in his bosom. Poor Molly sat down crying, while Mick told her his story, with many a crossing and blessing between him and harm. His wife could not help believing him, particularly as she had as much faith in fairies as she had in the priest, who indeed never discouraged her belief in the fairies; may be, he didn't know she believed in them, and may be he believed in them himself. She got up, however, without saying one word, and began to sweep the earthen floor with a bunch of heath; then she tidied up every thing, and put out the long table, and spread the clean cloth, for she had only one, upon it, and Mick, placing the bottle on the ground, looked at it and said, "Bottle, do your duty."

"Look there! look there, mammy!" said his chubby, eldest son, a boy about five years old—"look there! look there!" and he sprang to his mother's side, as two tiny little fellows rose like light from the bottle, and in an instant covered the table with dishes and plates of gold and silver, full of the finest victuals that ever were seen, and when all was done went into the bottle again. Mick and his wife looked at every thing with astonishment; they had never seen such plates and dishes before, and didn't think they could ever admire them enough, the very sight almost took away their appetites: but at length Molly said, "Come and sit down, Mick, and try and eat a bit: sure you ought to be hungry after such a good day's work."

"Why, then, the man told no lie about the bottle."

Mick sat down, after putting the children to the table, and they made a hearty meal, though they couldn't taste half the dishes.

"Now," says Molly, "I wonder will those two good little gentlemen carry away these fine things again?" They waited, but no one came; so Molly put up the dishes and plates very carefully, saying, "Why, then, Mick, that was no lie sure enough: but you'll be a rich man yet, Mick Purcell."

Mick and his wife and children went to their bed, not to sleep, but to settle about selling the fine things they did not want, and to take more land. Mick went to Cork and sold his plate, and bought a horse and cart, and began to show that he was making money; and they did all they could to keep the bottle a secret; but for all that, their landlord found it out, for he came to Mick one day and asked where he got all his money from—sure it was from the farm; and he bothered him so much that Mick told him of the bottle. His landlord offered a deal of money for it, but Mick would not give it, till at last he offered to give him all his farm for ever: so Mick, who was very rich, thought he'd never want any more money, and gave him the bottle: but Mick was mistaken—he and his family spent money as if there was no end of it; and to make the story short, they became poorer and poorer, till at last they had nothing left but one cow; and Mick once more drove his cow before him to sell her at Cork fair, hoping to meet the old man and get another bottle. It was hardly day-break when he left home, and he walked on at a good pace till he reached the big hill: the mists were sleeping in the valleys and curling like smoke wreaths upon the brown heath around him. The sun rose on his left, and just at his feet a lark sprang from its grassy couch and poured forth its joyous matin song, ascending into the clear blue sky,

"Till its form like a speck in the airiness blending,
And thrilling with music, was melting in light."

"Mick crossed himself, listening as he advanced to the sweet song of the lark, but thinking, notwithstanding, all the time of the little old man; when, just as he reached the summit of the hill, and cast his eyes over the extensive prospect before and around him, he was startled and rejoiced by the same well-known voice: "Well, Mick Purcell, I told you, you would be a rich man."

"Indeed, then, sure I was, that's no lie for you, sir. Good morning to you, but it is not rich I am now—but have you another bottle, for I want it now as much as I did long ago; so if you have it, sir, here is the cow for it."

"And here is the bottle," said the old man, smiling; "you know what to do with it."

"Oh! then, sure I do, as good right I have."

"Well, farewell for ever, Mick Purcell: I told you, you would be a rich man."

"And good bye to you, sir," said Mick, as he turned back; "and good luck to you, and good luck to the big hill—it wants a name—Bottle Hill. Good bye, sir, good bye:" so Mick walked back as fast as he could, never looking after the white-faced little gentleman and the cow, so anxious was he to bring home the bottle. Well, he arrived with it safely enough, and called out as soon as he saw Molly—"Oh! sure I've another bottle!"

"Arrah! then, have you? why, then, you're a lucky man, Mick Purcell, that's what you are."

In an instant she put every thing right; and Mick looking at his bottle, exultingly cried out, "Bottle, do your duty." In a twinkling, two great stout men with big cudgels issued from the bottle, (I do not know how they got room in it,) and belaboured poor Mick and his wife and all his family, till they lay on the floor, when in they went again, Mick, as soon as he recovered, got up and looked about him; he thought and thought, and at last he took up his wife and his children; and, leaving them to recover as well as they could, he took the bottle under his coat and went to his landlord, who had a great company: he got a servant to tell him he wanted to speak to him, and at last he came out to Mick.

"Well, what do you want now?"

"Nothing, sir, only I have another bottle."

"Oh! oh! is it as good as the first?"

"Yes, sir, and better; if you like, I will show it to you before all the ladies and gentlemen."

"Come along, then." So saying, Mick was brought into the great hall, where he saw his old bottle standing high upon a shelf: "Ah! ha!" says he to himself, "may be I won't have you by and by."

"Now," says his landlord, "show us your bottle." Mick set it on the floor, and uttered the words: in a moment the landlord was tumbled on the floor; ladies and gentlemen, servants and all, were running, and roaring, and sprawling, and kicking, and shrieking. Wine cups and aalvera were knocked about in every direction, until the landlord called out "Stop those two devils, Mick Purcell, or I'll have you hanged."

"They never shall atone," said Mick, "till I get my own bottle that I see up there at top of that shelf."

"Give it down to him, give it down to him, before we are all killed!" says the landlord.

Mick put his bottle in his bosom: in jumped the two men into the new bottle, and he carried them home. I need not lengthen my story by telling how he got richer than ever, how his son married his landlord's only daughter, how he and his wife died when they were very old, and how some of the servants, fighting at their wake, broke the bottle; but still the hill has the name upon it; ay, and so 'twill be always Bottle-hill to the end of the world, and so it ought, for it is a strange story!

THE WALDEGRAVE OUTRAGE.

Under the influence of intoxicating drinks, Earl Waldegrave and three of his aristocratic companions lately committed a most diabolical outrage upon the person of one of those individuals who watch the safety of our lives and property. If a poor man had set upon a policeman, and beaten him almost to death, he would have been hand-cuffed—dragged to a watch-house for the night—brought up before a police magistrate in the morning—committed for trial, and condemned to death, if the policeman died. There was a convict, of the name of Bailey, the other day in Newgate, who with difficulty escaped an ignominious death upon the scaffold: and he would have been executed, had not his victim recovered.

What line of conduct was pursued with regard to Lord Waldegrave and the only one of his associates who was arrested with him? They were both admitted to bail, in the sum of two hundred pounds each! Supposing this policeman should die; they would have the power of proceeding to the continent, and escaping the dangers and ignominy of a trial, the forfeiture of two hundred pounds to them being a matter of the most perfect indifference.

Now, if the poor man in a similar case were to request to be admitted to bail, he would most probably meet with an indignant refusal at the hands of the magistrate, and an assurance that "so desperate a ruffian should be severely punished for his atrocious conduct;" but if he were by any accident admitted to bail, would the magistrate suffer him to enter into his own recognizances in the sum, for instance, of five shillings? No—of course not; because, the magistrate would say, the delinquent would not surrender to take his trial when so paltry a sum was alone at stake.

And yet the two hundred pounds to the Earl of Waldegrave are no more than the five shillings would be to the poor man. Then, how is the justice of this country distributed? One word will answer that question: the rich man is afforded facilities of escaping the vengeance of the law, which never, never are conceded to the poor man.

Now should this policeman expire in consequence of the injuries he has received from the hands of those aristocratic miscreants, would Lord Waldegrave be tried for his life? Would he be served as Bailey was? Would he be treated as any poor man would be? Would he pass one hour in Newgate? Would he stand the chance of an ignominious death, and be indebted for a reprieve to the Home Secretary? and would he be sent for the remainder of his life to the penal settlements? We boldly answer that he would not! We openly affirm that the case would be hushed up. We undisguisedly declare, that he would not even share the fate of Medhurst—and be condemned to three years' imprisonment. We will even go farther—he would not be put upon his trial.

William Lees, with great provocation, murdered his wife in a fit of passion, and when labouring under the effects of intoxicating drink, and he was hanged. Medhurst, without reasonable provocation, and in a state of perfect sobriety, murdered his school-fellow, and he was imprisoned for three years. If the policeman, in Lord Waldegrave's case, die, Lord Waldegrave will be done nothing to. These are the three stages of justice: there is the justice for the poor man—there is the justice for the gentleman—and there is the justice for the nobleman.

Let us proceed a little farther in these observations upon English justice. The Marquis of Waterford and the Earl of Waldegrave frequently amuse themselves with the aristocratic recreation of wrenching off knockers, pulling down bell-wires, carrying off pump-ladders, and beating policeman. They are occasionally conducted to the station-house, after a desperate resistance. On the following morning they plead intoxication to the magistrate. The magistrate releases them with a fine, and a permission to "speak to" the policemen whom they have beaten, or the house-holders whose knockers they have wrenched off; and the money of these aristocrats ensures their release from the hands of justice. In similar circumstances, the poor man would be sent to the treadmill.

How differently these things are arranged in France. There the more elevated by birth, wealth, or education, may be the delinquent in any case, the more heavily is he punished, because it is supposed that he ought to have a better idea of good behaviour than the poor man. There no felony is allowed to be compromised by bail; but the King's Procurator demands the same justice in respect to the peer, which he would ask against the peasant.

From the foregoing observations, relative to the aristocratic outrages committed in this country, the poor man will learn to appreciate the blessings of Teetotalism. Teetotalism places him beyond the chances of following the degrading and disgusting examples of those high-born reprobates who disgrace the names which they bear; and Teetotalism will eventually prove that the aristocrat, the educated, and the wealthy will have to take the example which is set them by the lower orders. Teetotalism is a reformation which is eminently honourable to its disciples, because it commenced with those who were not urged to it by the arguments taught by the refinement of education, but who embraced it from the conviction of their own humble but honest minds. Yes—it is a grand spectacle when the lower grades of society thus set a grand and noble example to the upper classes,—when the poor man teaches the rich one the road to happiness and contentment,—when the uneducated overcome all the sophistry of the learned, in respect to this one grand principle of social reformation,—when the cottage of the labourer can boast of that purification which has not yet reached the mansion of the patrician,—when a grand impulse is given by the masses, and is rapidly working upwards to the palaces of the great,—and when a lesson of forbearance and morality is taught, not from the pulpit of cathedrals and great churches—not from the benches of the House of Commons—not from the bosom of learned societies—not from the columns of the newspaper—but from the platforms of Temperance Associations!

BRANDY-AND-WATER.

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

"Three hundred and forty-four pounds!" slowly ejaculated Ephraim, closing his heavy ledger, as he sat on his high stool, in his small, dark counting-house. "Three hundred and forty-four pounds ten shillings;—it can't be done by to-morrow," he muttered in an under tone:—"a renewed bill too,—my fate is too truly sealed:—nothing for me, in my old age, but a prison and a grave!" Then Ephraim laid his head in his hands—the tears gushed through his fingers, and his whole frame was shaken with the violence of his grief.—'Twas a piteous sight, to behold the poor old man, as the light of the candle shone on his glossy, bald head, fringed with a few grey hairs.

But there he sat—unconscious of anything around—till the lusty bawl of the watchman, "Past twelve o'clock," aroused him. "Well, well!" he exclaimed:—"some people say, we are only the wheels of a mighty machine, and cannot avoid our destiny:—but there is one comfort left.—Yes,—one that has often cheered my fainting spirits:—and I never needed it more than at the present." And, stepping from his stool, he took a little key from his pocket, and proceeded to unlock a small mahogany box. Two black bottles and a glass lay snugly enconcealed in their separate partitions; and as Ephraim took them out, he held them up before the light of the candle,—and his little eyes twinkled as he beheld the second one was nearly full. The first, with a look of compunction, he slowly replaced;—'twas water!

"No—no!" said he, "nothing in your way to-night;—my grief has no allay, and my liquor shall have no adulteration." He then proceeded to fill the glass with the sparkling liquor;—'twas brandy. First a gentle sip—and then a deeper draught,—and a smile began to play around his lips, and his eyes to sparkle.

"Ah, well do I remember, when my poor wife was alive, bless her soul! how often would she and I sit here together; and she would say, as I mixed my glass of brandy,—'A little more water, Eph,'—a little more water!' But, poor dear soul, when she died, I left off water by degrees,—and, at last, altogether. Ah! there stands the very bottle her little hand used to lift, and, while my head was turned, partly empty in my glass. She went,—God be thanked,—before ruin had cast its detestable shadow over all my hopes; but she would often prognosticate, and say:—'Eph, dear, do leave off that brandy,—you know the love of it increases with you!' And then I would pat her cheeks, and say, 'Yes, my dear, and so do the cares of business too.'—Ah, well,—here's to her memory!"—and glass after glass were as quickly emptied as filled.

Hours had passed away,—and there was the old man fast asleep, with his head laying over his ledger, and the candle burning with a long snuff that prevented its more than half lighting the dusky apartment. "Past two o'clock," again bawled the watchman. It slightly disturbed him; and slowly opening his blood-shot eyes—in a moment they seemed transfixed with some awful vision. Yes, there it was!—the two bottles had left their places—moved closer to each other—their corks had taken the shape of heads—their bodies of human beings; and, with arms akimbo, they seemed in earnest conversation. Then, with breathless anticipation, he listened, and fancied he heard the following conversation:—

"Yes, poor old soul," said the brandy bottle; "You see I am his only comfort, as I told you the other day. Poor, dear old man! how often have I cheered his spirits, and revived him when fainting with despair,—whilst you do nothing to alleviate his sorrow."—"You, you!" cried the water-bottle, quite indignant; "you are the very villain that has filched the money from his pocket—the cash from his till—and now left him nothing but dismal horrors for his portion." Now Master Brandy, at this, got quite hot, and fiery red in the face,—and resorted to abuse:—"You,—a nasty, low-lived, pale-faced fellow,—an associate of milksops and babies,—the parent of scrofulous diseases,—fit for nothing else but to make tea, and other slops:—you dare to speak thus to a gentleman bred and born.—Away!"

But the water-bottle kept himself quite cool, and, looking as serene as the moon, gently said; "Repress your ire, my fine fellow, for one moment, and read the truths deduced from that ledger;—how many of those bad debts are to be laid to your charge: which of us serves him most disinterestedly; and, by the bye, I doubt very much, with all your bounce, whether you are paid for." Now, at this, Brandy blushed to his very neck, for his spirit was up.—"Yes, yes," said he, "you may well serve him for nothing, you mean, cadaverous looking fellow; turn to your family connexions and look at mine—look at all the statesmen, heroes, orators, and generals that have been my acquaintances. Of course," holding his head two inches higher, "they must pay for my acquaintance."—"You need not brag so much about your acquaintance," said the other calmly, "I believe I can boast of belonging to a far more ancient and honorable family. I came pure from the hands of the Creator of all things, and our family has retained its purity, but you and your race are an illegitimate branch—nothing but bastards, the servants and offspring of the devil."

Now at this, Brandy could no longer hold himself, but literally burst with rage, and some of the spirit coming in contact with a spark from the candle, the whole room was in a blaze.

"Past three o'—! Fire! Fire! Halloo! Halloo!" resounded through the streets. Quickly the engines arrived, a rush of water was poured on the devouring element, the old man was saved,—and the last sentence heard between the contending parties, was uttered by the water bottle, when with a cry of exultation, as the rush of his own element came into the room, he said, "Now, who set the house on fire? and who saved it?"

The old gentleman certainly, had a bother with the insurance company, for they disbelieved his story—and insinuated (perhaps maliciously,) that he must in a drunken fit have broken the bottle, and accidentally dropt the candle in the liquor—but they nevertheless paid the insurance—he proceeded with his business—amassed a fortune—and as before he drank his brandy without any water, he now drank the water without any brandy.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association.

On Tuesday evening, the 7th of July, this association held its first grand meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, which was crowded to excess with a large body of Roman Catholics and of Members of the Society of Friends.

Mr. JOHN GILES, the founder of the association, was called to the chair. This gentleman, in a very neat and appropriate speech, expounded the advantages of Teetotalism, and detailed the objects of the Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association.

Mr. WADDICK then addressed the meeting, and impressed upon those present the necessity of stating, on occasions of public speaking, who each orator was, whence he came, and how he got his living, in order to show the world that they were all honest men.

Mr. JAMESON, of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, said that, so far as his humble efforts would avail, he would do all that lay in his power to promote the objects of the Catholic Association.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, of the United Temperance Association, expatiated upon the blessings of Teetotalism. He declared that nearly all crimes emanated from the public-house, and considered Teetotalism to be the only means of reforming the morals of Society. He was proud to address the Catholics and the members the Society of Friends on that occasion, because, from his long residence in France, some of the most pleasing reminiscences of his life were connected with a nation professing Catholicism; and secondly, because the Society of Friends advocated a measure which he (Mr. Reynolds) strenuously supported. He alluded to the total abstinence of the punishment of death.

Mr. NUNN, from Stratford, next addressed the meeting in a speech replete with humour.

Mr. GREEN, Editor of the Intelligencer, said that he was determined to be present at that meeting, in order to witness the progress made by the disciples of Teetotalism. Mr. Green then expatiated eloquently upon the blessings of the grand principle, and the necessity of supporting it.

Mr. MAC CURDY, of Belfast, expressed the lively interest which he felt in the welfare of the Metropolitan Catholic Total Abstinence Association.

Mr. GILES, the Chairman, wound up the business of the evening in a very able oration, in which he strenuously impressed upon those present the necessity of paying frequent visits to the places of Teetotal assembly.

Thanks were then voted to the Chairman; a number of songs were taken; and the meeting separated, the organ playing the favourite air of "Saint Patrick's Day in the Morning."

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Meeting at Aldersgate-street Chapel,—on Saturday Evening, July 11th.

Mr. WESTON, Honorary Secretary and Treasurer to the Association, was called to the chair. He addressed a few words to the meeting, requesting those present, who were not Teetotalers, to listen with great attention to the speakers, whom they would hear upon the platform that evening, and to weigh with impartiality the arguments that would be adduced in favour of Teetotalism.

Mr. EALES then addressed the meeting. He said that he had tried the principles of Teetotalism for thirteen weeks before he definitely signed the pledge-book; and, at the expiration of that period, he had unfortunately succumbed to the force of temptation. He had however determined upon reformation once more, and had signed the pledge-book. He then considered himself to be bound by a solemn moral obligation, and had never broken the vow he had ratified with his signature.

The Rev. Mr. ADENEY said that experience had taught him that even the most moderate use of intoxicating liquors was deleterious to the human frame and to the human intellect. He felt convinced that intoxicating liquors did not contain anything strengthening. A glass of wine does not equal in solid substance, a grain of wheat. Substantial solids are alone nourishing. What a claim (observed Mr. Adeney) have these societies upon Christians! The Rev. Gentleman concluded a very eloquent speech with a powerful appeal to those, who were not Teetotalers, and were then present, to sign the pledge.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, next addressed the meeting. He hoped that, as there was now a female upon the throne, the legislature would adopt some measures to check the dreadful progress of intemperance—if not for the sake of English men, at least for that of English women. The legislature should countenance Teetotal Associations, and assist their humane exertions. If the female portion of the community of the lower orders would abstain from drinking, the male portion would soon follow the good example. Women naturally possess a great moral influence over men; and hard must be that husband's heart, which will not yield to the tears and the prayers of a wife. Let the wives set a good example to their husbands—then let these wives implore their husbands to abstain from their habits of intemperance—and the tears of women will affect much in that glorious cause.

"What lost the world, and bade a hero fly?

The timid tear in Cleopatra's eye!

Oh, let the soft triumph be forgiven—

How many lose for her not earth, but heaven!"

If woman possess the influence—the magic influence, thus described by Byron, let her use it in behalf of the drunkard's salvation. Teetotalism was making grand and gigantic progress, and the excellence of its principle would be soon universally acknowledged. With the alteration of one word, a line of Pope's "Essay on Man," might be converted into one of the most appropriate maxims of Teetotalism:—

"A sober man's the noblest work of God."

Mr. DONALDSON then addressed the meeting. He said that no one could deny the rapidity of the progress now made by Teetotalism. Any one who walked through the streets might hear something said upon Teetotalism. The Teetotalers were determined to attack the enemy in all his strong holds, and root him from the earth. He, (Mr. Donaldson) would continue a Teetotaler, until it should please God to call him away from this sublunary stage of being. Philanthropy commanded us to exert ourselves in the cause—Christianity commanded us—morality commanded us—our duty towards each other commanded us. He (Mr. Donaldson), should abstain from intoxicating drink, for the sake of himself—for the sake of the world—for the sake of the Church—for the sake of example.

Mr. JOHN GILES, secretary to the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association, remarked, that the grand principle to be observed by Teetotalers is union. Union is strength,—and union will lead them on to prosper. Mr. O'Connell has declared that Teetotalism is a hammer which will be used amongst the Irish to knock down political parties.

Mr. CLOSE, of Stratford, addressed the meeting at considerable length in support of the principle of Teetotalism. He declared that he had never known what true happiness was until he had signed the pledge-book.

Mr. JOHN SPARROWE BENSTEAD addressed a few observations to the meeting previous to signing the pledge-book. He signed it solely on the score of moral principle, because he was not addicted to any habits of intemperance which it was necessary to reform; but he signed it, he repeated, for the sake of example—for the sake of his relations and friends—for the sake of those who were dependent upon him. Mr. Benstead then signed the pledge-book amidst the most tremendous cheering.

Mr. SMITH, of Stratford, said that a man under the influence of intoxicating drink, was not in his right senses. He himself had been a most inveterate drunkard; and he was now a Teetotaler. He hoped that the United Temperance Association would soon hold a grand meeting at Exeter Hall.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS observed that such was the intention of the Association.

Mr. SMITH, in continuation, said that he was delighted to hear this intelligence. It would be a grand spectacle for three or four hundred reclaimed drunkards to present themselves upon the platform of Exeter Hall, as testimonies to the excellence of Teetotal principles.

GEORGE APFLEGATE, the member of the Coal-Whippers' Association, requested permission to address the meeting. He said that Mr. O'Connell, M.P. had consented to take the chair in case the United Temperance Association should determine to hold a meeting at Exeter Hall on behalf of the coal-whippers.

Mr. CERRY, of Chelsea, then addressed the audience, and furnished several anecdotal illustrations of the efficacy of Teetotal principles. He also alluded in most feeling terms to the terrible condition of the unhappy coal-whippers.

The platform has seldom been so crowded with the able advocates of Teetotalism, as on this occasion. Amongst those who were there present, but who did not address the meeting, were Messrs. Wilson, Sims, Adkins, Crump, Grimshaw, Glenn, (of Hackney,) Falshawe, Parsons, John Wilson Ross (the author of "Ninian," &c. &c.), Johnson, &c.

THE TRIUMPH OF PRINCIPLE.

THE annual Trade dinner or Weigh-Goose was given by Mr. Clay, printer, of Bread-street-hill, to the persons in his employment, amounting to about fifty in number, at the Rose Tavern, Gravesend, on the 6th instant. According to former usage a bottle of wine was placed beside each; but Mr. McCulloch desired the waiter to take away the one intended for him, and supply him with a glass of ginger-beer in its place. This excited some jeering remarks from the rest, which were heard by Mr. Clay, who sat at the head of the table. This gentleman desired Mr. McCulloch to come and sit by him, and taking his glass of ginger-beer immediately drank his very good health. Mr. Clay then, in a short but pithy speech expressed his admiration of the Temperance cause, and stated he hoped that Teetotalism would soon spread over the universe; then turning to Mr. McCulloch, he said, "I cannot sufficiently express my admiration of the individual beside me, who possesses moral courage sufficient thus to stand aloof from the usages of those who differ from him." R. G. IBBETT.

REVIEWS.

The London Magazine, Charivari, and Courier des Dames. With Three illustrations by Leech. Number for July. London: Simpkin and Co.

This periodical is a new candidate for public favour, this being only the sixth publication of the work. Its contents, in respect to literary merit, are very uneven. "The Diurnal Revolutions of Davie Diddledoft" are excellent,—full of shrewd and caustic observation,—and replete with interest. "Dancing amongst the ancient Egyptians" is a clever paper; "The Bristol Banker" is the greatest trash ever penned. The coincidence of a conjugal infidelity and a murder in the house at the same moment, does not even seem probable in a romance, where almost any monstrosity is recorded as truth. The "Hymn to Nature" is very beautiful. We quote five stanzas as a specimen:—

"We bless you," says the Moon—"source of all light!"

"We also bless you," say the countless stars,
And the mysterious comet cries—"Amen!"

The dense clouds gather, and aloud exclaim,

"We are his dark pavilion in the sky,
Here spring his sky-convulsing arrows forth!"

"Upon my viewless pinions," saith the wind,
The balmy-breathing wind—"he floats along!"

"I am his breath," proclaims the zephyr soft.

"Shall I be silent?" saith the teeming earth,
"Whose parched lips drink up the pearly dew?"

The dew replies—"I rear thy frailest flowers."

"We flourish and rejoice," say the young flowers:
"We court thy crystal drops, which every morn Gladly we yield unto the glorious sun."

We neither envy the heart nor the head of the man who wrote the notice upon D'Israeli: we cannot admire these malignant sketches of living characters, where truth is sacrificed to a jest, and sincerity of opinion to a merry conceit. The Charivari contains some good "hits."

The Monthly Magazine. EDITED BY JOHN A. HERAUD, Esq. Number for July. London: Sherwood and Co.

Our old friend, the Monthly Magazine, is the learned magazine, par excellence, under the management of Mr. Heraud. All its articles are of sterling merit; but whether so much learning produce commensurate profits, is another consideration. Mr. Heraud is decidedly a talented writer—deeply imbued with a love of all that is German—and strongly attached to dissertations upon subjects, the mere names of which have never reached the ears, much less the intellect, of half the readers of periodicals of this kind. The contents of this number are varied. There is a very clever paper upon "Cousin's Electricism,"—an article in which the great French philosopher is ably considered. "Reginald de Baillaunce," is a very clever tale. The "Persian Reminiscences" are particularly amusing. Of "Peter Pindar's Pic-Nic" we shall only say that if Dr. Walcott really did write the poem, he must either have been half-witted or drunk (forbid it, Teetotalism!) at the time. It possesses the similitude of his former pieces; but all the spirit is crushed out. We extract the following just observations from a paper upon her Majesty's late escape:—

The loyalty of the English people is so jealous of its character, that it will not permit the supposition that the perpetrator of such an act, as the one which now suggests these few remarks, could be in his proper senses at the time of its committal. No sane Englishman can be so disloyal as to aim at the life of his sovereign;—such is the dogma of the national loyalty. To this sentiment the young villain will probably be indebted for his worthless life. The milder punishment also will most likely succeed in subduing the passion for regicide which the more severe might have a tendency to excite. Against a monarchy, which proves that mercy is the brightest jewel in its crown—none but the most hardened would yield to the impulse of imitation, in contriving measures of destruction. No, no! the life of the Queen is safe from any new attempt, as the result of the present. There may, of course, be other causes in operation.

[We now conclude the extract, commenced in our last week's Number, from "The last Day of a Condemned," By VICTOR HUGO.]

The cart was a common one, with a miserable-looking horse, and a driver clad in a blue smock ornamented with red stripes, like those of the inhabitants of the marsh in the vicinity of Bicêtre.

The officer gave the word of command. The cart and its cavalcade were set in motion, as if they were thrust onwards by the oscillations of that living ocean.

We proceeded very slowly.

The quay, on which the Flower-Market is situate, embalmed the air:—it is a market-day. The flower-girls left their stalls to gaze upon me.

Almost opposite the square tower which forms the corner of the Palace of Justice, there are several public-houses, the first floors of which were crowded with spectators who were rejoiced at having secured such excellent places,—especially the women that were amongst them. The day's work will be a good one for the tavern-keepers.

Tables, chairs, scaffoldings, and carts were hired in all directions. Every place was groaning beneath the weight of spectators. Those who trafficked in supplying their fellow-creatures with a sight of human misery, exclaimed, "Who wants a place?" I suddenly became irritated against those people, and felt a strong inclination to cry out, "Who will take mine?"

In the meantime the cart advanced. At every step which the horse took, the crowd was thinned behind it; and, with my haggard eyes, I saw them rush onwards to other points of view in the path which I was taking.

At the turning of the bridge, some women commiserated me for being condemned to die so young.

We then entered upon the fatal quay. I began to see nothing more—to hear nothing more. All those voices—all those heads at the windows, the doors, the gates of shops, and on the arms of lamp-posts,—those greedy and cruel spectators,—that multitude of people that all knew me, and of whom I knew not a soul,—that road which was paved and walled on either side with human images,—all these rendered me inebriate, as it were—in-sensible—stupid. Oh! it is impossible to bear the weight of so many glances all pressing upon you at the same time!

I tottered to and fro upon the bench, not even paying any further attention to the priest or his crucifix.

And the cart proceeded—onwards—onwards; and the shops passed—and inscriptions and signs succeeded each other, painted or gilt—and the people laughed and tripped about in the mud,—and I did not attempt to control my feelings, but gave way to their violence like those who are in a dream.

Suddenly the series of shops, which occupied my eyes, was cut short by the angle of a square: the voice of the crowd became more mighty, more boisterous, and more joyous still. The cart stopped suddenly, and I nearly fell with my face upon the planks. The priest supported me.

"Courage!" said he.

A ladder was then placed to the back of the cart; he offered me his arm—I alighted—and then I advanced a step. I endeavoured to take another step, but could not. Between the two lamp-posts upon the quay I had caught a glimpse of something which was dreadful to behold.

Oh! it was the reality!

I stopped, as if already convulsed with the blow of the axe.

"I have a last declaration to make!" I exclaimed feebly.

I was accordingly conducted hither.

I demanded permission to commit to paper my last wishes. My hands were unbound, but the cord is here—again to bind them; and the rest is below!

A judge—a commissary of police—or else a magistrate of some kind or other, has just been to see me. I implored my reprieve of him, joining my hands together, and dragging myself upon my knees before him. He asked me, with a fatal smile, if that were all that I had to say to him?

"My pardon! my pardon!" I repeated, "or—at least—allow me five minutes more. Who knows but that my pardon will come yet? It is so horrible at my age to die thus! Such things have been seen as pardons being sent at the last moment. And whom would they pardon, if they would not pardon me?"

That abominable executioner has just whispered to the magistrate to inform him that the deed should be accomplished at a certain hour, that he is responsible—that it moreover rains—and that the iron stands a chance of rusting.

"Oh! for pity's sake—another minute to see whether my pardon will not arrive; or I shall defend myself—I will bite!"

The magistrate and the executioner have left the room. I am alone—alone with the gendarmes!

Oh! that horrible populace, with its hyena-like yells! Who can say that I shall not escape from the horrible fate which the crowds have met to gaze upon? Who knows that I shall not be saved? Oh! it is impossible that my reprieve should be withheld!

Ah! the wretches! Meseems that they are ascending the staircase—

FOUR O'CLOCK.

WEEKLY LIST OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS. HELD IN AND NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

Chair taken at 8 o'clock unless otherwise announced.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society holds two large meetings every Wednesday and Saturday, at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, at 8 o'clock, and on Monday at the School Room, Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell.

SUNDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. Service at 11 and half-past 6—Sunday-School at 2 o'clock.

Temperance Room, Young-st. Kensington. Prayer Meeting at 3.

King-st., Lambeth-walk, at 9

Cumberland Market, 9.

Public Prayer Meeting, Rockingham House, at 3.

New Cut, Lambeth, half-past 4.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. Preaching—Morning, at 11. Evening half-past six.

Ditto, Enon Chapel, Clare Market, at 11, 3, & half-past 6

Borough Market, at 7 in the morning.

White Stiles, King's Road, Chelsea, 3

IN THE OPEN AIR.

Open space, Saffron hill, at 8 o'clock.

Red Lion Market—Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile

End Road—Islington Green—Notting Dale—

Broadway, Westminster, at 9.

Behind Brunswick Terrace, Well-st., Hackney—Cler-kenwell Green—Islington-green—Starch-green, near Shepherd's-hush—Open Space, Cartwright-street,

Rosemary-lane—Salisbury-st. Portman Market, 3.

Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile End Road—Stepney

Green, at 4

Weymouth Terrace, Hackney Road, at 6

Shepherdess Fields, Islington, United Temperance Association, at 3

MONDAY.

School Room, Aylesbury-st., Clerkenwell, United T. Asso. East London Temperance Hall, Church-row, Bethnal Green-road, United Temp. Association.

Angel Alley, Bishopsgate. Metro. Roman Catholic Asso. Robinson's School-room, Whiting-st., Waterloo-road.

The Chapel, Castle-st., Saffron Hill.

School-Room, Orange-st. Chapel, Leicester-square.

School-Room, High-st., Stoke-newington at half-past 7

School-room, Deverell-st., Chapel-yard, Dover-road.

Temperance Hall, Chelsea, New-rd., back of Sloane-st

Tempee.-room, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fleet-st. Prayer meet.

William-st., Chapel, Portland-town.

Southwark Academy, Union-st., Borough. Females at 6,

Public-meeting at 8.

School-room, Hare-st., Bethnal-green. Youths only

Enon Chapel, New Church-st., Portman Market.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel

Soho Branch, at Orange-st. Chapel School Rooms.

Mariners' Church, Wellelose Square.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.

Rayner's Temperance Coffee Room, Broadway, Westminster. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8

Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton-street.

TUESDAY.

Aldersgate-street Chapel. Catholic Association.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.

School-room, opposite the Workhouse, Bethnal Green

Baptist Chapel, Northampton-st., Somers' Town.

School-room, London-lane, Hackney

Ebenezer-chapel, Old-st. Road.

Mr. Lyons's School Rooms, No. 44, Ratcliffe-highway

Meeting of Members for Roman Catholics only

Tempee.-rm., back of Kentish Waggoners, Kent-st. Bo.

Catholic Free School, George-st., St. Giles.

Derby-st., School-room, Rosemary-lane

South London Tempee. Hall. Roman Catholic Asso.

Temperance Room, Young-st., Kensington.

School-room, York-st., Walworth. For Females only, 6.

Rockingham House, New Kent Road.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.

School-room, Grafton-st., Fitzroy Square.

Providence Chapel, Princes-st., Great-garden-st. Whitel.

Temperance-Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.

British School Room, Stratford, half-past 7.

Chelsea Temperance Hall.

Jerusalem Coffee-ho., Jerusalem-pass., Clerkwl. Youths

School-room. Ship-yard, Wardour-street. Females every 2d and 4th Tuesday in the month.

School-room, Johnson's-st., Tower-street, Westminster-road. Females at 6. General Meeting at 8.

WEDNESDAY.

Aldersgate st. Chapel. United Temperance Association

School-room, Little Chambers-st. Goodman's Fields

School-room, Oxford-buildings, Oxford-street.

Haggerstone. Infant School-room, near the Bridge

Chelsea Tempee. Hall. Catholic Total Abstinence Soc.

Temperance Hall, Hampstead.

Ivy Lane, Hoxton. Females only at 6. Pub. Meet. 8.

Temperance-rooms, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fetter-lane. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8.

Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide-sq., Shepperton-st. New

North Road, Islington.

Pepperell's Coffee-house, Whitecross-st. Females only 7.

Mr. Knight's School-rm., Cambridge-rd. Youths only, 7

Rockingham House, New Kent-road. Youths.

Fisher-st. School Room, Red Lion Square.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster, 6 to 7,

For Females only. Public Meeting at 8.

Eastfield-st, Limehouse Fields. Youths.

Bayham Terrace Chapel, Camden Town.

Wesleyan Chapel, Wandsworth, 7.

Albert Coffee-rm. 1, Crown-court, Crown-st., Finsbury.

Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton-street. For Youths.

THURSDAY.

Chapel, Aldersgate-st.

Union Coffee-house, Golden-lane.

Chapel House Academy, Vauxhall Row.

Wesley Association Chapel, Giffin-street, Deptford

Mr. Lyon's School-rooms, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meeting of the Catholic Association.

Mariner's Church, Wellelose-square

South Lon. Tempee. Hall, near the Elephant and Castle.

School-room, 51, Union-st. Borough. Females only

from 6 to 8, for Males from 8 to 10.

School-room, Nelson-st., Windmill-lane, Camberwell,

Females only at 6, Public Meeting at 8.

School-room, Manor-road, Parrock-st., Gravesend.

Temperance Rooms, Paradise-st., Rotherhithe.

British School Room, Ship Yard, Wardour-st.

British School, George-st., Regent-st., Lambeth-walk.

Chelsea Temperance Hall.

Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel

Rayner's Temp. Coffee-rooms, Broadway, Westminster

Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch.

FRIDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.

Wesleyan Chapel, Webber-st., Blackfrs. Membs. Meet.

Broker-row, Mint, Borough

Subscription School-room, Church-st., Islington.

School-room, Wick-st., Hackney.

Angel-alley, Bishopsgate. Females at 6, Public Meet. 8.

Zoar Chapel, Upper Ogle-st., Fitzroy-square

School Room, London-lane, Hackney.

William's Coffee-house, St. S.-road,

South London Temperance Hall. Roman

School-room, Charles-st., Dalston.

Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch.

only at half-past 7.

Enon Tempee. Chapel, St. Clement's-lane, Clap-

SATURDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. United Temperance Asso.

Lyons's School-room, 44, Ratcliffe-highway.

Meeting of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic A.

Rockingham House, New Kent Road

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.

Rayner's Tem. Coff.-rm. Broadway, Wstmr. Mem.-meet

Temp. Cof.-rm. 86, Waterloo-rd., Lambeth. Mem.Mee-

RECHABITE MEETINGS.

Southern Counties Brotherhood of Rechabites.

July 23rd.—"Tent of the Star of Temperance," 35, Drury-lane.

—27th.—"Tent of the good Samaritan," Temperance Coffeehouse, Camden-street, Islington.

—30th.—"Tent of Jonathan," 73, Turnmill-street.

—31st.—"Tent of John the Baptist," 74, Blackman-st, Boro'.

Independent Order of Rechabites.

"Samson Tent," 86, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock.

"British Metropolitan Tent," 157, High-street, Shadwell, Thursday evening, 8 o'clock.

"City of London Tent," 159, Aldersgate-street, Wednesday evening, 8 o'clock.

The Rev. Mr. Adeney, Vice-President of the United Temperance Association, will preach two Sermons, on Sunday, the 19th instant, at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, at morning and evening service.

On the 31st of July will be published, price Elevenpence, Part I. of

THE TEETOTALER.

Five Numbers of this Journal will be published in a neat Wrapper. The PORTRAIT OF THE EDITOR will be given GRATIS with this Monthly Part.

Advertisements for the Wrapper to be sent to the Printer's, 58, Red Cross-street.

Orders will be received by all Booksellers, Stationers, and Newsmen.

W. STRANGE, 21, Paternoster Row.

MR. HENDERSON'S NEW PUBLICATIONS:—

Lately published, in two volumes, post 8vo., price 16s. cloth,

THE MODERN LITERATURE OF

FRANCE. By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

This work contains critical notices upon the following eminent French Authors, with Select Tales from their best productions:

George Sand.	Frederic Soulie.
Victor Hugo.	Eugene Sue.
De Balzac.	Jules Lacroix.
Paul de Kock.	Jules Janin.
Merimee.	Alexandre Dumas.
Nodier.	Michel Masson.
Ricard.	De Jouffroy.
De Lamartine	De Berenger.

II.
This day is published, price 6d.

THE LAST DAY OF A CONDEMNED,

Translated from the French of Victor Hugo,

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, OLD BAILEY.

United Temperance Association.

EXCURSION TO RICHMOND.

The Committee have engaged the well known

Superior Steam Packets

ECLIPSE AND VIVID,

For an Excursion to RICHMOND, on Monday, the 20th of July, 1840. The Members and any Friends wishing to accompany them will meet at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street, at eight o'clock on the above morning, and walk in procession to Queenhithe-pier with the Splendid Banners, Flags and Band, used in the late procession, and embark at nine o'clock precisely. Proceed to Richmond, hold a large Meeting, and dine in the Park, and return to the Delightful New Vauxhall Pleasure Gardens.

Vauxhall Pier, which are engaged for the Evening to Tea, where there will be a Grand Concert D'ETE, by first-rate performers.

PRESIDENT.—JOHN BILTON, ESQ.:
George W. M. Reynolds, Esq., Author of Pickwick Abroad, &c. &c. and Editor of the Teetotaler; and Messrs. Curry, Balfour, Crump, and Gawthrop, the Advocates, will be of the party.

Tickets, Tea included, 3s. 6d. each. The number being limited to 400, early application must be made to secure them.

Tickets may be had of Mr. Weston, Secretary, 12, Basing-lane; of the following Members of the Committee, Messrs. Caudle and Marriott, 3, Paul's-head-court, Fenchurch-street; Mr. Clark, 7, Chews-ride, Little-moorfields; Mr. Higby, 16, New-court, Milton-street; Mr. B. Kirby, 8, Benjamin-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Crump, 1 Red-lion-market, White-cross-street; Mr. Griffiths, 49, Southampton-street, Clerkenwell; Mr. Gawthrop, 39, Fore-street, Cripplegate; Dennis's Union Coffee-house, Jerusalem-passage, Clerkenwell; Thompson's Coffee-house, Golden-lane; Mr. Brown, 4 Curtain-road; Mr. Adkins, Curtain-road; and at Aldersgate-street Chapel, every Wednesday and Saturday Evenings, from 8 to 10, of the Excursion Committee.

The Steamers will call at Hungerford-market, at Westminster-bridge, and Chelsea-pier, for convenience of friends in these vicinities, going and returning.

This day is Published, Two for Three-half-pence,

THE DRUNKARD'S COAT OF ARMS.

Reprinted from "Cleave's Penny Gazette of Variety."

JOHN CLEAVE, Shoe Lane, Fleet Street; and Sold by all Book-sealers in Town and Country.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers. Price 11.
TO THE TRADE.—Back Numbers charged.

London.—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 5.

SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Teetotaler" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by Mr. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside: Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: Mr. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and Mr. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red Cross Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund, will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER VII.

THE DINNER PARTY.

The moment Victor reached his own room, Mr. Tibbatts hastened to communicate to him a piece of news which made his own countenance radiant with joy.

"Only think!" cried Mr. Tibbatts, "one of my literary friends has been with me this morning, since you went out, and has announced his intention of dining with us to-day. He is going to bring two or three such nice fellows with him—all literary birds also; and, what is better than all, he has sent the provisions and liquor himself."

"I would rather not be of the party," said Victor, still thinking of his good resolution, and afraid of temptation,—"I am not in spirits to meet company."

"Nonsense!" cried Mr. Titus Tibbatts; "only come and look at the bottles Frank Fippins has sent us, and you'll soon change your mind. Cleopatra threw pearls into her drink; and I shall drown all cares in mine."

"I do not see that your simile is very happy," observed Melville, as he followed his new friend to the apartment up-stairs, where half-a-dozen bottles, containing spirits, were ranged in a sort of military rank upon the table that served as Mr. Tibbatts' desk. The chest had been removed from the middle of the room; and Mr. Robus had lent a large table for the grand occasion. This table had been duly laid for six people, by Mr. Tibbatts himself, he being assisted in his arduous labours by a char-woman, who attended upon the lodgers at certain periods of the day; and certainly, considering the paucity of the materials, a very decent display of crockery, glass, and cutlery, was made with them upon this occasion. Six knives and six forks were placed on the table in their proper places: four breakfast cups, one tumbler, and one slop-bason were enlisted in the service of the beer; and six chairs, which might have been taken for six different specimens of as many particular shapes and makes, graced the circumference of the table. The cloth was composed of three napkins and a towel; and an immense earthen pan, glazed inside, had been borrowed from Mr. Robus to make punch in after dinner.

"There!" cried Mr. Tibbatts, as he surveyed these preparations with a complacent expression of countenance; "that isn't so bad, is it? If we have neither the luxuries nor comforts of Heliogabulus, we have that which he never had, pampered as he was—and that's a good appetite. Such a prime leg of mutton and potatoes sent to the bake-house—and a magnificent dish of eggs and bacon cooking down at Robus's. But here are the boys!"

As Mr. Tibbatts spoke, four gentlemen rushed into the room, laughing heartily because they had tumbled up stairs, and swearing at the same time because they had been insulted by the little boys who were playing in the court below.

"Well—here you are, all," exclaimed Tibbatts: "let me introduce my friend Mr. Melville to you. Melville, this gentleman is my old friend Fippins; this is Mr. Buggridge—a great poet; this is an ancient ally of mine, and his name's Pluffers; and this is a not less esteemed, though the last-mentioned individual—the learned and well-known Mr. Mullins."

Mr. Frank Fippins was a young gentleman of four or five-and-twenty, with a very red face, light hair, pinkish blue eyes, and large white teeth. He was attired in a complete suit of black, which made the characteristics of his physical exterior the more remarkable by the extraordinary contrast.

Mr. Richard Buggridge was only a couple of years older than Mr. Fippins, and was so remarkably thin that he would have been deemed a formidable rival to the Philadelphian, whose leanness was so excessive that only one person could see him at a time. He had long, lanky black hair, small dark eyes, and a nose so sharp it seemed as if it would have served its proprietor for a razor, had it not been glued to his face. He was dressed in an old brown coat which had either been made for a somewhat fat man, or else when its present owner was at least four stone heavier than at the period when we introduce him to our readers: his breeches were grey, and were so covered with ink, that they resembled Oxford mixture; and the long ends of his black neckerchief dangled over the front of his shirt.

Mr. Timothy Pluffers was a little, stout, fat man, with black kerseymere tights and gaiters, and pocket-holes on the outside of the skirts of his coat, in imitation of the old fashion. He was about six-and-thirty years of age, and had an excellent appetite, as well as a very good opinion of himself.

It only now remains for us to notice Mr. Mullins, who was an old man of sixty, very ignorant, very conceited, and calling himself a literary man, because he had once induced a bookseller to publish an edition of Shakspeare with notes—a speculation which sent the bookseller before the commissioners in Basinghall-street six months afterwards.

"What a jovial party we shall be!" exclaimed Mr. Tibbatts, when the ceremony of introduction was accomplished. "Now then, Mrs. Duncan, go and see after the dinner."

These words were addressed to the char-woman, who had fortified herself against the labour of waiting upon so many people, with about a pint or so of gin: the consequence was that she felt very happy, and very contented, not precisely knowing whether she stood upon her head or her heels. She however bestowed a sweet smile (she was't quite sixty) upon Mr. Tibbatts, and set off to execute the commission with such good will, that, in order to manifest her alacrity in his service, she did not wait to descend the stairs as other people do, but rolled down the first flight with surprising rapidity.

"That woman's drunk, Titus," observed Mr. Pluffers.

"Oh! she never gets into any harm when she's had a little drop too much, poor thing," returned Mr. Tibbatts: "she fell down a well when in that state, about eight years ago, and it produced such an impression upon her that she never can be induced to touch water when she can get gin: it's a sort of hydrophobia with her."

"That's not poetic, my dear Tibbatts," observed Mr. Buggridge, in a calmly remonstrative tone of voice.

"If Shakspeare had introduced such an idea into one of his plays, I would have struck it out in my edition," said Mr. Mullins; "upon my honour, I would; and when I say my honour—"

"Why, then we know what you mean," interrupted Mr. Fippins. "What are you always talking about your honour for? I might as well talk of my estates."

"Do you mean to insinuate that I have no honour, Sir!" demanded the commentator on Shakspeare, turning as pale with rage as the ghost in Hamlet.

"I shall insinuate myself into that mutton," said Mr. Fippins, as Mrs. Duncan rolled into the room, with the dish in her hands; a delicately clean apron, with which she had been dusting the windows in the morning, protecting her fingers from being burnt by their vicinity to the earthenware.

"Now, then, boys, sit down," cried Mr. Tibbatts.

"So we will," said Mr. Mullins; and he swallowed his indignation and a huge mouthful of mutton simultaneously.

"Give some us grace humidum, Mother Duncan," exclaimed Mr. Pluffers, meaning thereby to express the words "heavy wet."

"Ask Mr. Tibbatts for the gravy," returned the char-woman, deeply indignant at being adjured as a mother, although she was old enough to have been a great-grandmother.

"Well, then, beer," said Mr. Pluffers; and Mrs. Duncan slowly proceeded to obey his command.

"Here's the heggs!" ejaculated this lady, just as Mr. Robus made his appearance with a smoking dish, which he set upon the table: "them as is for mutton had better speak."

"Mrs. Duncan," said Mr. Buggridge, with dignity.

"Well?" answered that amiable female, with the bewitching familiarity which is the characteristic of all char-women.

"We can dispense with your hints and advice," said Mr. Buggridge solemnly: "it is not poetical."

"We know not whether Mrs. Duncan fancied that some covert insult was meditated against her reputation or her conduct by this latter observation: it is nevertheless our distressing duty to relate, that she bestowed a most vigorous cuff on the poetical brow of Mr. Buggridge, and commenced a series of abusive epithets, all of which are not recorded in the English dictionary.

"I wasn't awcer that it becomed any gentleman as calls himself a gentleman to insult a poor woman, and she a vidder for the last nineteen year," said Mrs. Duncan; and then the epithets, which did not however hit so hard as the blow, were again levelled at the devoted head of the poet.

It is impossible to say to what an extent hostilities might have been carried, had not Mr. Robus fulfilled the highly disagreeable, and somewhat dangerous, task of turning Mrs. Duncan out of the room, and in process of time, as soon as he had got her down stairs, out of the house. The poor woman's feelings must have been excited to a very extraordinary pitch by the supposed insult; for she proceeded forthwith to the nearest public-house, whence she was removed to her own home in a wheel-barrow about half an hour afterwards.

But let us leave Mrs. Duncan to her fate and the wheel-barrow, and turn once more to the apartment where so many eminent men were assembled. The dinner passed off without any further accident; and, when the cloths and towel (we like to be precise) were removed, Mr. Tibbatts proceeded to make a mighty jorum of rum-punch. As soon as this beverage was concocted, the cups and the glass were filled, and the contents emptied down the throats of those present. Punch is a wonderful weapon to cut asunder the Gordian knot which confines the tongue; and, accordingly, by the time the second glass and cup had been drank, a fit of extreme garrulity simultaneously seized on each of the individuals there assembled, not even excepting our hero, who unfortunately suffered the odour of the punch to predominate over all the good resolutions which he had formed in the morning.

The poet began to hold forth upon the divine art which he professed; the commentator upon Shakspeare quoted passages from his favourite author; the Latinist exercised his powers of translation with wonderful perseverance; and Mr. Fippins chatted with Mr. Tibbatts upon an immense variety of subjects. It may however be observed that the poet mistook the punch for the honey of Parnassus, and drank very deeply of the delusive liquor; that the Shakspearian commentator cited a line from Hamlet and declared that it belonged to Macbeth; that the classical scholar really fancied his own absurdities to be eminently tasteful; and that Mr. Fippins, Melville, and Mr. Tibbatts, each talked of different topics at the same time, and paid not the slightest attention to one another. At length they all grew wearied of this disjointed style of discourse; and then Victor was far more amused than he previously had been.

"What are you doing now, Buggridge?" enquired Mr. Tibbatts, as soon as he had seized the punch once more.

"I am always writing for the—you know what," was the reply.

"Oh! I know," said Mr. Tibbatts, as innocent of any acquaintance with the paper or periodical alluded to, as most likely Mr. Buggridge was himself.

"I say, old fellow," exclaimed Mr. Pluffers, addressing the president; "shan't we blow a cloud?"

"Certainly," answered Tibbatts; "who's got any cigars?"

"I have!" said Mr. Mullins. "A light! a light! my kingdom for a light,—which is not so bad a paraphrase upon the words of Othello in Richard III."

Victor bit his lip; but Mr. Buggridge was preparing to sing; and so he turned his attention towards that gentleman.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Buggridge, "I am about to sing you a song of my own composing. It is my last—hem! and not the worst thing—hem! that ever I wrote. It will appear in the—you know what—next Sunday. You will observe, it is supposed to be sung by a bookseller."

"Is there any chorus?" demanded Mr. Mullins.

"Chorus—no," returned Mr. Buggridge; and, after having cleared his throat once more, he commenced the following effusion:—

THE BOOKSELLER'S LAMENT.

These are terrible times for the bookselling trade—
So hard that there's scarcely a hit to be made;
Though ladies and lords take to writing romance,
Or books of their travels in Spain and in France:—
America's prov'd the most fertile of fields,
And a work to upbraid it a sure profit yields,
Although on my shelves there still linger a few sets
Of Lord Grogblissom's book upon Massachusetts.

It is hard now to make a new novel go down;
(I really don't know what's come over the town.)
A poem would make a sad hole in my purse,
And sacred effusions are sure to fare worse:
A volume of essays would never be read,
Or would make a man sleep and set fire to his bed:
The public are tired of the works of the Germans,
And now-a-days none will waste coin upon sermons.

"Throw physic to the dogs," said Mr. Mullins, "as Dogberry remarked to Verges."

"Is that all?" enquired Mr. Tibbatts, alluding to the song.

"Every word," was the reply vouchsafed by Mr. Buggridge, evidently annoyed that no clapping of hands was heard.

"It ends rather abruptly," remarked Mr. Fippins.

"Well—what do you think I and Pluffers are going to do?" exclaimed Mr. Frank Fippins, to Mr. Tibbatts.

"I really can't say," replied this gentleman.

"Why—going to start a weekly paper, to be sure!" said Mr. Fippins, with the most sublime dignity.

"A weekly paper!" cried Titus.

"A weekly paper!" repeated Mr. Fippins. "We have clubbed together a ten pound note; and on that we shall raise a little fortune."

"Ten pounds to start a paper!" ejaculated Victor, in the most unfeigned astonishment.

"Oh! yes—my dear sir," rejoined Mr. Fippins; "that is plenty, all we want is an office—and for the desks to put into it we are obliged to pay ready money. We have divided the duties pretty fairly between us; you shall hear how. Pluffers finds the printer and writes the heavy articles. I find the stationer and do the light ones. We intend to support the Whigs; and, to place the paper within the reach of every one, shall only make it a penny."

"Penny unstamped, I suppose?" said Mr. Tibbatts.

"Exactly," replied Fippins, caressing his light hair, and glancing around him in a manner that was quite refreshing to those who gazed upon him.

"You will excuse me, gentlemen," observed our hero, who had sate uneasily upon his chair for the last few moments; "but I am really sufficiently dull-witted not to comprehend your scheme. I cannot conceive how you will start a paper upon a ten pound note."

"My dear Mr. Belville," said Fippins—

"Melville," said our hero correctively.

"Melville, I beg your pardon," continued Mr. Fippins, "since I understand from mutual friend Tibbatts that you are one of us—a literary dustman, you know—I do not care if I let you into the secret. The truth is, Pluffers has credit at a printer's; and I at a stationer's: if the thing succeeds on going off, so much the better, every one will be paid; if not, so much the worse; we lose ten pounds, and the printer and stationer lose all."

"But is that exactly honest?" said Melville.

The whole party, Mr. Tibbatts included, cast a most extraordinary glance of mingled contempt and surprise at our hero: the Shakspearian annotator declared that it would be a rum go if people didn't look out for themselves now-a-days; the Latinist recorded his conviction that the young gentleman was a greenhorn; Mr. Fippins slapped our hero on the back and recommended him to carry those principles with him to the grave, and he would soon get on; Mr. Buggridge expressed his opinion, in truly poetic terms, that what Melville said was merely a particular piece of bacon, otherwise, "gammon;" and Victor himself really began to think that he knew nothing of the world, or at least of the literary one.

"Why, you see," said Mr. Fippins, taking upon himself the task of explaining, "these things are all a lottery. But I'll tell you what we are going to do."

"What?" said Victor.

"We intend to give grand woodcuts on the first page," answered Mr. Fippins, "representing the state of the country through a series of caricatures. We have also secured the services of a policeman to answer questions."

"A policeman!" exclaimed Victor: "is he not a novel appendage to the editorial department of a newspaper?"

"Why—rather," answered Mr. Fippins; "but it will secure a sale. The fact is, we shall have a number of correspondents who will write to us to ascertain whether a person guilty of such and such an action would be taken in charge by a policeman; and by giving correct replies, we shall at once acquire a reputation."

"I should think the statute-book would be the most satisfactory reference," observed Victor.

"Oh! not at all," returned Mr. Fippins; "no one knows any thing of English laws from books or acts of parliament, because they all contradict each other. Even the judges themselves don't pretend to be versed in our laws; for, whenever a point is referred to them, they are invariably divided in opinion. This is a blessed country for all that; and thus you see every day that the rich escape from the penalties due to those crimes for which the poor are severely punished."

"I really believe you are right," said our hero, after a moment's consideration. "But have you any other attractive feature in your projected journal?"

"Oh! plenty," was the instantaneous reply. "We intend to give answers to all kinds of correspondents. Besides the policeman, we have enlisted in our service a decayed gentleman—an insolvent prize-fighter—and a bankrupt horse-chaunter."

"And what, my dear Sir," cried Mr.

Buggridge,—"what, in the name of all that's poetic, sublime, and beautiful, are they to do?"

"How very dull you are to-night, old fellow," returned Mr. Fippins. "Why,—points of honour, relative to duels, bets, gambling transactions, and those kind of fashionable amusements, will be referred to the decayed gentleman: the names of the other two sufficiently explain their use and attributes in our establishment."

"And what is the pay allotted to these worthies?" enquired Mr. Tibbatts; "for, I believe, that in London, as in Rome, all things are venal."

"Oh! the wages and privileges are pretty fair," explained Mr. Fippins, running his fingers through his hair: "the policeman will be allowed thirty shillings a week, and will have the right to thrash the office-boy at all hours, because a policeman must bully somebody; the decayed gentleman may give tradesmen and discounters references to the proprietors, and make his bills payable at the office; the prize-fighter will be permitted to give morning lessons in boxing to young noblemen, in an empty room on the first-floor; and the horse-chaunder has stipulated that we shall bail him, as often as he is had up for swindling, before the police-magistrate."

"Nothing could be better arranged, I think," said Mr. Mullins, approvingly. "But is this really all true; or is it a hoax? 'To be, or not to be—that is the question,' as the gravedigger says in the Tempest."

"Of course it's all true," answered Mr. Fippins: "the first number will be out on Saturday week."

Mr. Tibbatts here proposed "the success and prosperity of the new undertaking;" and the toast was drunk with enthusiasm. The earthenware pan was soon emptied, and another jorum of punch was speedily concocted; whereupon Mr. Pluffers, in a most elegant and eloquent speech, proposed to drink the health of the ancients and of ancient classical literature—a suggestion that was immediately acceded to without a dissentient voice. Mr. Buggridge, in an oration interspersed with numerous poetic quotations, next proposed to honour the ancient English bards in a similar manner; and no one objected to this offer; so that, in process of time, the gentlemen at the banquetting-table, by dint of toasting the past, lost all recollection of the present. Victor was soon overtaken by the liquor which he gladly swallowed in order to keep pace with the conviviality of the company; and when he awoke in the morning, he found himself in his own bed, but had not the slightest idea how he got there. He nevertheless remembered in a confused manner, that Mr. Mullins rose to make a speech, and dropped under the table in the middle of it, just as he was asseverating, in an impassioned manner, "that he had stood by Shakspeare all his life, and that he would fall with him;" and our hero had also a faint reminiscence of Mr. Robus having made his appearance, at one particular part of the evening, with his white nightcap upon his head, to implore the party "not to kick up so much noise," as the lodgers could not sleep in peace.

Having thus far collected his scattered ideas, Melville rose with a dreadful head-ache, and more than ever dissatisfied with himself for having been induced to commit another debauch.

(To be continued in our next.)

Mahomet displayed his wisdom by forbidding the use of wines and intoxicating drinks. He knew that his gigantic schemes would be entirely defeated by those who necessarily compromise everything when labouring under the influence of intoxicating drinks.

THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

If it be argued that some dreadful punishment should await the individual who is guilty of enormous crimes, then let the reader judge whether condemnation to the galleys in France be not a hideous punishment; and if the English legislature do not imagine that the sufferings of English convicts at Norfolk Island are severe enough to expiate even the crime of murder, then let them invent those horrors which are now about to be detailed. We select the following passage from "The Last Day of a Condemned,"—a work translated from the French of Victor Hugo:—

Within these last few days I saw a most hideous spectacle.

It was scarcely day-light, and the prison was full of noise and bustle. I heard the din of many gates opening and shutting—of bolts and padlocks grating horribly—of the bundles of jingling keys fastened to the belts of the jailors—of precipitous footsteps, beneath which the very stairs shook and trembled—and of voices which called and answered from one end of the long corridor to another. My neighbours in the adjacent dungeons—those galley-slaves who had been placed in the small cells before described, on account of breach of prison discipline—were more joyous than ever. All Bicêtre echoed with laughter, singing, running, and dancing.

I, who was alone silent in the midst of all that din—alone immovable in that tumult, I—who was astonished and attentive—had naught to do but listen.

A jailor passed up the corridor communicating with my cell.

I ventured to call him and ask him if it were a holiday throughout the prison?

"It is a holiday, if you like," was his answer. "To-day the galley-slaves are chained together, previous to their departure to-morrow for Toulon. Would you like to see the spectacle? It would amuse you."

It was indeed, for a solitary recluse, an instance of good fortune to be enabled to witness such a spectacle, odious though it were. I accordingly accepted the amusement proposed.

The jailor adopted the usual precautions in order to prevent me from escaping, and then conducted me into a little empty dungeon, which was entirely denuded of all kinds of furniture, which possessed a real window, with iron bars to it, and through which I could behold the sky.

"There," said the jailor: "here you can see and hear everything. You will be alone in your box like a king."

He then left the cell: securing after him bolts, bars, and padlocks.

The window looked upon a vast square court-yard, hemmed in on all sides, as by a wall, by a great stone building, six stories in height. Imagination cannot picture to itself anything more degraded, more naked, or more miserable to the eye than that quadrangular facade pierced with a number of windows protected by iron bars, and at all of which, from top to bottom, were crowds of thin and squalid faces, pressed one against another like stones in a wall, and all enclosed as it were in the frame-work of the cross-bars of iron. These were the prisoners who were spectators of a ceremony, at which they would be speedily destined, at a future day, to perform the part of actors. They might have been taken for souls in a state of punishment, gazing from the loop-holes of purgatory upon the domains of hell.

All looked in silence into the court-yard which was as yet empty. They waited in breathless suspense, for the commencement of the drama: and amongst those faded and miserable countenances, there were here and there eyes that seemed as bright and sparkling as red-hot cinders.

The square of buildings which surround the court-yard, is not altogether closed up. One of the four sides of the edifice (that with an eastern aspect) is separated in the middle: and the two portions are only connected together by an iron gate. This iron gate opens upon a second court-yard, much smaller than the former, and also surrounded by high walls and blackened buildings.

There are stone benches fixed round the walls of the larger court; and in the middle there is a curved iron post, upon which a lamp is suspended at night.

Twelve o'clock struck. A wide gate, which was concealed beneath an arch-way, opened abruptly; and a cart, escorted by filthy-looking and disgusting men, who distantly resembled soldiers, as they were dressed in blue uniforms, with red epaulettes and yellow shoulder belts, rolled heavily into the yard with a noise like that of iron bars rattling together. These were the galley-serjeants and the escort.

At the same time, as if that din aroused all the echoes of the prison, the spectators at the windows, who had up to that period maintained a profound silence, burst out into cries of joy, songs, menaces, and imprecations mingled with shouts of laughter that were terrible to hear. It seemed as if they were demons engaged in masquerade. On each countenance there was a hideous grimace—every hand was thrust through the bars—their voices absolutely roared—their eyes flashed fire—and I was horrified at beholding so many sparks appear in that vast cinder.

In the meantime the galley-serjeants, amongst whom it was easy to distinguish a few new ones from Paris, by their clean garments and the disgust that appeared upon their countenances, commenced their labours with the utmost tranquillity. One of them ascended the cart, and threw toward his companions chains, collars for the necks of the convicts, and heaps of pantaloons made of canvas. They then divided their labours; some of them proceeded to stretch out, in one part of the court-yard, long chains which, in their slang, they denominated "strings;" others spread out the pantaloons; and the remainder, who were the most cunning of the whole escort, examined, under the superintendence of their captain (a fat little old man) the iron collars, the strength of which they tested by ringing them upon the pavement. And all this was done amidst the raillery and shouts of the prisoners, whose voices were only drowned by the boisterous mirth of the galley-slaves for whom these preparations were in progress, and who were busily employed in gazing from the windows of the old prison, which looks upon the smaller court.

When these preparations were completed, a man, covered with silver lace, and who filled the post of inspector, gave an order to the director of the prison; and in another moment two or three low doors vomited forth, all at the same instant, and in small portions at a time, crowds of men, whose appearance was revolting and hideous in the extreme.

These were the galley-slaves.

The moment they entered the court-yard, the joy at the windows redoubled. Some amongst them—the great names of the prison—were greeted with acclamations and applauses, which they seemed to receive with a kind of proud modesty. The greater portion of the galley-slaves had a species of hat made with their own hands from the straw of their dungeons, and formed into grotesque shapes, so that in the town through which they passed the hat might draw attention to the head. Those who wore these hats were more applauded than the others. One especially excited enthusiastic transports amongst the spectators: this was a young man of seventeen years of age, and who had the countenance of a young girl. He issued from his cell, where he had been subject to solitary confinement for the previous eight days: with his sraw he had made himself a garment which enveloped him from his neck to his feet; and he entered the court, turning head over heels with the agility of a serpent. He was a buffoon condemned for robbery. Hands were clapped, and cries of joy echoed round, with demoniac violence. The galley-slaves replied in a similar manner; and it was a frightful thing to witness this interchange of gaieties between those who were to depart for the galleys at once, and those whose turn would arrive on the next occasion. The society of the great world, represented by those who were not criminal—the jailors and the visitors,—was there; but how vainly! for crime ridiculed that society to its very face, and converted that horrible punishment into a family holiday.

In proportion as the galley-slaves arrived, they were shoved between two rows of guards into the little yard, where the surgeons were waiting to inspect them. There they all endeavoured to make a last effort to avoid the journey, alleging some excuse connected with their health,—such as bad eyes, lame legs, and mutilated hands. But in almost all cases they were pronounced capable of undergoing the full amount of their sentence; and then each resigned himself with carelessness to his fate, forgetting in a few minutes the affected infirmity of his whole life.

The gate of the smaller court was opened; and one of the guards called the muster-roll of the galley-slaves alphabetically. They then walked out one by one; and each criminal proceeded to take up his position in a corner of the great court, next to some companion whom the initial letter of his name thus rendered his future comrade. Thus every one is reduced to himself—every one wears his own iron next to a stranger—and if by hazard the galley-slave have a friend, the chain separates them. This is the most miserable of all miseries!

When about thirty had thus taken up their places in the rank, the gate was again closed. A galley-serjeant forced them into a correct line with his staff, threw down before each a shirt, a waistcoat, and a pair of canvas pantaloons, and then made a sign to them all to assume the garb thus allotted to them. An unlooked-for incident, as if it had been however arranged to occur at that precise moment, now arrived to change this humiliation into a torture.

Up to that period the weather had been tolerably fine; and although the breeze of October chilled the air, from time to time a crevice was open here and there in the grey clouds of heaven, to enable the rays of the sun to cheer the earth. But scarcely had the galley-slaves laid aside their prison-rags, at the moment when they presented themselves naked and upright to the suspicious inspection of the keepers and to the curious gaze of the visitors who walked round them to examine their shoulders, the heavens became black—a cold shower of autumn suddenly burst forth—and the rain fell in torrents upon the square court, on the bare heads and naked limbs of the galley-slaves, and on their wretched rags which were stretched upon the pavement.

In a moment the yard was vacated by all who were not galley-serjeants or galley-slaves; and the strangers from Paris hastened to seek shelter beneath the arches of the gates.

In the meantime the rain fell in torrents. Nothing was seen in the court-yard save the galley-slaves, naked and streaming with water, on the deluged pavement. A dead silence had succeeded their boisterous bravadoes. They shivered with cold—their teeth chattered—their thin legs and their bony knees knocked together—and it was pitiful to see them cover their bare limbs with those dripping shirts, waistcoats, and trousers. Their nakedness had been better.

One only—an old man—had preserved a portion of his gaiety. He exclaimed, as he wrung out his wet shirt, "This was not in the programme of the entertainments;" and he menaced the skies with his clenched fist, as he laughed aloud.

When they had put on their travelling attire, they were conducted in bands of twenty or thirty to the farther corner of the yard, where the chains, which were stretched along the ground, awaited them. Those chains were very long, and were intersected at every interval of two feet, by shorter chains placed transversely; at each end of these shorter chains was an iron collar, which opened in a particular spot by means of a rivet. These collars were fastened during the whole journey, round the necks of the galley-slaves. When these chains, the long and the short together, were spread out upon the ground, they resembled the backbone of a fish.

The galley-slaves were commanded to sit down in the mud, upon the inundated pavement; the collars were then tried on; and two smiths, belonging to the escort, and provided with portable anvils, rivetted them together while cold by dint of blows with a heavy hammer. That is a terrible moment, in which the most hardy turn pale. Every blow of the hammer, struck hard upon the anvil which is supported upon the back, makes the chin of the sufferer rebound again; and the slightest movement backwards, would cause the smith to dash his brains out as easily as a shell is broken from its nut.

After this operation, the galley-slaves became gloomy. I no longer heard aught save the clashing of the chains, and, at long intervals, a cry, or the sound of the staff of one of the serjeants upon the limbs of the refractory. Some amongst them wept; the old shuddered and bit their lips. I surveyed with terror all those sinister countenances set in their frames of iron.

Thus there were three acts to this drama;—the surgical inspection—the visit of the jailors—and the fastening of the chains.

A ray of the sun re-appeared. One would have thought that it set all those brains on fire. The galley-slaves rose simultaneously, by a convulsive movement. The five chains joined themselves together by the hands, and formed an immense circle about the iron lamp-post. They then danced round it with a rapidity that fatigued my eyes. They sang a song of the galleys—a slang song to an air sometimes plaintive,—at others furious and gay. Piercing cries were heard at intervals, varied by half shrieking shouts of laughter, mingling with the mysterious words of the song; and then savage exclamations, and chains which rattled together, served as a chorus to that wild and brutal chant. If I were anxious to seek for an image for a nocturnal meeting of demons, I should select one neither better nor worse.

A large tub was now conveyed into the court-yard. The galley-serjeants interrupted the dance of the convicts with blows of their sticks, and conducted them to this tub, in which were swimming God knows what filthy herbs, in God knows what smoking and discoloured water. The convicts partook of the soup.

Then, having partaken of that food, they threw upon the pavement all that remained to them of their soup and their brown bread, and began to sing and dance once more. It appears that this license is allowed them upon the day when the fastening of the iron takes place, and on the following night.

I observed that strange spectacle with a curiosity so greedy, so palpitating, and so attentive, that I forgot my own condition. A profound sentiment of pity excited me to my very entrails; and their shouts of laughter made me weep.

Suddenly, in the midst of the profound reverie into which I had fallen, I saw the howling circle of galley-slaves stop and remain silent. Then all eyes were turned towards the window at which I was placed.

"The condemned! the condemned!" they all cried, pointing with their fingers towards me: and the ebullition of their joy redoubled.

I remained petrified.

I know not how they first knew me, or in what manner they came to recognize me then.

"Good day! good night!" they all ejaculated with their horrible sneering tone.

One young man who had been condemned to the galleys for life, and whose countenance wore a heavy expression, like that of lead, glanced towards me with a species of envy, ejaculating, "He is happy! he'll be clipped. Good bye, comrade!"

I cannot say what passed within me at that moment. I was indeed their comrade. The Place de Grève is the sister of the galleys at Toulon. I was even placed in a lower rank than they: they did me honour. I shuddered.

Yes—their comrade! and even then I said to myself, "In a few days I shall perhaps become a spectacle for them."

I remained at the window, motionless, speechless, paralyzed. But when I saw the five ranks of galley-slaves advance, and rush towards me with expressions of cordiality which might suit the denizens of hell,—when I heard the tumultuous din of their chains, their clamours, their foot-steps, at the foot of the wall, it seemed to me that that cloud of demons escalated the miserable cell in which I was; and I gave vent to a dreadful cry, as I precipitated myself against the door with a violence which nearly dashed it open; but there were no means of flight for me! The bolts were drawn without. I dashed myself against it—I screamed for release with frantic rage. It then seemed to me that I heard the terrible voices of the convicts—and that their hideous heads had already reached the level of my window-sill: I uttered a second cry, and fell down insensible upon the cold floor.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. B. B. is thanked for his communication, which shall appear in our next.

A. D. S.'s article upon Consistency shall be inserted in Number VII. of The Teetotaler.

We have received John Jacquet's letter, and are delighted to find that he is so staunch a Teetotaler. We shall not neglect the cause of the coal-whippers.

We intend shortly to give an elaborate review of that admirable work, "Bacchus."

To C. D. We shall be always happy to give the poor man any advice which lies within the compass of our knowledge. You must bring a civil action against the party complained of: by a strange enactment of the English law, the circumstance is not considered a felony.

X. Y. Z. Although we do not profess to possess medical acquirements, we will still answer your question. You state that a long course of intemperate habits has brought on an inflammation of the eyes, of which even Teetotalism has not cured you. Follow this prescription of the celebrated French oculist, CAEON DU VILLARDS, and you will be cured in less than a week:—Procure a pot of Singleton's golden ointment, and take upon the head of a pin as much ointment as is equal in size to the head of the pin itself; apply this to the lower rim of the eyes, where the lashes grow, then close the eyes, and allow the ointment thus to get into the eyes, which will smart a little. Repeat this operation every morning and evening for four or five days; wash the eyes three or four times each day with a decoction of souchong tea; and at the expiration of a week at the outside, you will be cured.

To W. J. B. Harvey, we reply in the affirmative.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Teetotal progress, and the transactions of Teetotal Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We solicit the correspondence of the heads of all Teetotal Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 0d.
Every succeeding line 4d.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JULY 25th, 1840.

We have received several letters from correspondents complaining that the grand argument advanced against Teetotalism by the enemies to this good cause, still remains unanswered in print. We allude to the species of sanction to the use of wine, which is supposed by many to have been given by our Saviour at the marriage at Cana in Galilee. Those advocates of Teetotalism, who have addressed us upon this head, and those enemies to Teetotalism, who imagine that they have raised up an insuperable barrier between us and the completion of our glorious work, will find an article upon the miracle wrought by our Saviour at Cana, in the next number of our journal. We hope that the question, as to the divine sanction, will then be set at rest. We might challenge all the divines of the two Universities to enter into the discussion with us, upon this point: but we do not believe that any minister of the Gospel would have the unblushing effrontery to come forward, and maintain, by implication, that the Saviour of the World would advocate that habit which has destroyed more lives than the sword, and more souls than all the other devices of Satan taken together.

We regret to be compelled to state that the clergy of the English Protestant Church has not followed that grand doctrine of self-denial which is preached by Teetotalism. There are a few glorious exceptions to this rule; but, as a body, the Clergy of the Church of England is opposed to us. What! cannot the members of that body forget the vicious habits which they acquired at those hot-beds of iniquity—the Universities? cannot they cast off that garment of sin which is more fatal to those who wear it, than the robe of Dejanira? and cannot they turn their thoughts aside from the pernicious voluptuousness of this world's pleasures, in order to reform this world's denizens?

DANIEL O'CONNELL AND FATHER MATHEW.

With this day's Number of The Teetotaler is given to all our readers a handsome lithographic drawing, which represents Mr. O'Connell, M. P. receiving the pledge from the hands of the Rev. Theobald Mathew. It must not however be imagined that this happy event has as yet taken place: our picture is prophetic of a grand occurrence which we can safely promise our readers is near at hand. Three weeks ago did Mr. O'Connell assure a crowded audience at Exeter Hall that "the moment Father Mathew should inform him that he might sign the pledge consistently with his own political safety, he should do so;" and the great champion of Irish liberties—the advocate of Irish welfare—the defender of Irish interests, moreover declared "that this announcement would be shortly made to him." We have, therefore, only anticipated by a few weeks, and probably only by a few days, that consummation of all the duties which O'Connell owes to Ireland.

If Ireland were once effectually removed from the trammels of intemperance, she would become a great and a powerful nation. England owes many a hard-earned laurel to Irish courage, and is indebted to the Irish soldier for many a successful fight. To ensure her maritime supremacy did England connect herself with Ireland; and Irish courage has often and often steered the fleets of Britain victoriously over the ocean. Father Mathew is now aiding O'Connell in his great work of regenerating the Irish nation; for the one teaches it to be temperate, and the other to be free. Without the counsels of the former, the boon which the latter hopes to confer upon Ireland, would be but of small avail. Intemperance would conduct the use of liberty to the abuse of that sacred privilege; and thus it is that Ireland must first pass through the purifying hands of Father Mathew, ere it receive from O'Connell the stamp of its freedom. The dross must be extracted from the ore, and then the metal will be adapted to the hands of him who will mould it into a fitting shape.

The eyes of all British subjects are now fixed upon two individuals, whom Providence seems to have sent to decide the destinies of Ireland. O'Connell, as a politician, and Mathew, as a moralist, will raise the Irish nation to an eminence which shall command the attention and the respect of the world. The natural good qualities of the Irish character, when no longer overshadowed by intemperance, will aid in the progress of the glorious work; and O'Connell may then fearlessly demand that repeal, which shall not be refused him on the pretence that the Irish are incapable of self-government.

The prophetic scene, which we this day introduce to the eyes of the readers of The Teetotaler, will doubtless awaken a thousand happy emotions in the bosoms of our Irish friends. Let us take this opportunity of assuring them that their interests are as near and dear to us as those of our own Association; and that the conductors, like the proprietors, of The Teetotaler, are men who feel proud in uniting their interests, in respect to the grand cause of total abstinence, with those of Ireland.

THE DRUNKARD'S DOOM.

A few days ago, the inhabitants of a populous district in Manchester, hearing an unusual noise in the streets, hurried to their doors and witnessed the following singular procession. In front, marched a number of lads with frying-pans, kettles, and various other articles of domestic use, somewhat the worse, it must be confessed, for wear, by means of which they produced a noise, not very musical, but sufficient to attract popular attention. After these strange musicians followed a number of boys who had hoisted aloft, in an old arm chair, the figure of a drunkard, large as life, and clothed in rags. The face (an excellent mask), exhibited the nose and chin of the drunkard, covered with carbuncles. On his back was pinned a large placard on which was printed in conspicuous type, "The Drunkard's Doom." The mob was convulsed with laughter, and the drunkards sneaked off ashamed of the sight as well as struck with the moral.

NOTES PICKWICKIANÆ.

BY THE EDITOR.

No. IV.

Old Weller.—Samivel, wot ought to be done vith a obstinate old feller, as knows wot's good for him, and yet can't muster up pluck enow to foller it?

Sam.—Vy, pitch into him, to be sure: inflict concealment on him, as the gen'leman said, ven he wanted to be gen-teel and didn't choose to say give him a "good hiding."

Old Weller.—Vell, Samivel, arter all there's nothin' like a good hiding. It's the paytent settler as is better than all med-i-cines. Ven you was a small-hinfant, Samivel, if ever you wos rayther ill, I always per-ferred givin' you a small dose o' the birch-rod to all the doctor's pills and potions in the world. I rayther think too, that there 's the reason o' your havin' turned out so vell in life, Sammy.

Sam.—You're a very virtuous old man, you air. But wot did that there observation o' your'n apply to, about the feller as know'd wot is good for him, an' yet won't foller it, which wos precisely wot the old beggin'-letter impostor said, ven they told him to take a little exercise at the tread-mill.

Old Weller.—I'll tell 'ee wot it is, Samivel, I've bin a ruminatin' a good deal about that there pledge-book vich you've signed, an' I raly think it's a good thing. But if I wos for to sign it, wot 'ud become o' that there genivine breed o' English coachmen as now does honor to the country? You would look in wain for those fellers as used to get so precious lussy that they couldn't sit on their boxes! Wot a loss they 'ud be to this very civilized nation!

Sam.—A very great loss, indeed.

Old Weller.—Loss, ah!—to be sure, they is? See wot innovations is already introduced among us. Vere do you see von o' them railroad fellers as can take his sixteen tumblers o' grog on a fifty mile stage, to say nothin' o' ale, bitters, an' purl, vich invariably goes for nothin'? The good old English coachman will soon go out of fashion, wot with railroads and Teetotalers.

Sam.—I hopes he vill.

Old Weller.—Vy, Samivel?

Sam.—Cos he's a uscless old feller, vith his great coat, summer or vinter, and his blue cotton ankercher round his neck. Vy, you coachmen can't go a mile at a time vithout a-stoppin' to drink. But go on—you're in your own element now, as the gen'leman said ven he chucked his vife into the tub o' hot water.

Old Weller.—Vell, if coachmen does go to ruin in this here way, I don't hesitate for to say that the nation itself 'ull soon be done up. England never flourished till she had stage-coaches; and the reason vy the selvidges isn't as civilized as ve is, is cos they hasn't got no coaches. Do you think them canibals 'ud venture to eat up a stage-coachman?

Sam.—Yes, I do.

Old Weller.—Samivel, Samivel, they'd never swaller his top-boots.

Sam.—This is wot I calls wanderin' away from the pint. I knows wot you're a drivin' at, old touch-an-go; an' I knows how all this is to end. So you may just as vell out vith it at once.

Old Weller.—An' blowed if I don't too, Samivel! I'll set the example to all stage-coachmen, an' to them rail-road fellers into the bargain. So let's off to some chapel or another, an' sign that there thing as is called the Teetotal Pledge-Book.

(To be continued in Number VII.)

Oxymel;—Take of clarified honey two pounds, and acetic acid, one pint. Boil down with a gentle fire, in a glass vessel, to a proper thickness. This syrup is now rarely prepared by the apothecary, but is a favourite and useful domestic remedy in colds and slight sore throats.

TEMPERANCE LYRIC.

I love the chrystal fountain,
I love the bright cascade,
That issues from the mountain,
And flows into the glade.
I love the flashing billow
Of dark November's sea,
That forms the sailor's pillow,
And sings his lullaby!

I love the mighty ocean,
I love the gurgling stream:
Each ripple, with its motion,
Reflects a cheering gleam.
The moon shines on the waters;
Those waters that obey
(Diana's loving daughters)
The goddess on her way.

When in the desert lonely
The Arab speeds afar,
He seeks for water only,
Beneath his guiding star.
Avaunt, delusive Bacchus,
In wine-stain'd garments dress'd;
Remorse will ne'er attack us,
If Temperance be our guest.

THE DEMON LOVER.

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

"No, George,—no more! I dare not touch that intoxicating glass, which you so earnestly press upon me, and with such beseeching glances: no, George,—never again," said the beauteous Emily to her admiring lover.

"Dearest Emily!" exclaimed he, "why thus energetic in your refusal? You know this is the anniversary of your birth, and you must join in making the day happy by a little rational conviviality."

"George, you know not the repulsive feeling with which I view that sparkling liquor:—my soul shudders as I gaze on its fascinations."

"But, Emily," said her lover, "this was not the case the other evening, when, with all the playfulness of happy innocence and beauty, you pledged future happiness to our friends in successive glasses; and declared, afterwards, that you never felt a glow of delight equal to that which then exhilarated you."

"Yes!" exclaimed Emily, in a sadder tone, "so I did; but that was not all. After you left me at the garden gate, I felt a sudden reverse of feelings: my head began violently to throb,—a strange nervous feeling ran through me from head to foot,—and, in the greatest alarm, I hastened to my room, hoping to lull to rest my waking fancy; but, horrid shapes seemed fitting round my bed,—and no sooner had my eyes closed in sleep than I began to dream with a violence and velocity never experienced before. Years rushed by only as moments—crowded with objects,—but all very confused and indistinct. I felt myself no longer a free moral agent,—but was hurried along, resistless, through complicated scenes of misery and woe; but,—oh! too horrid to relate;—" and the beautiful girl hid her face in her hands, as if to screen from her mental vision some object too awful for her sight.

"Come, Emily," said her anxious lover, "do not let idle dreams thus haunt your mind: you were indisposed,—and dreams are always influenced by the state of the body. 'The helm of reason lost,' Fancy always steers a wild and wayward course. Unburden your mind, and let us carefully examine your dream, by the light of common sense, and you will soon find 'tis nothing but a thing of 'shreds and patches.'"

"Oh!" replied Emily, "but it casts a strange influence over the soul. But now that I can command my feelings, I will endeavour, as far as possible, to relate the circumstances thus mysteriously placed before me.—You must first remember, that it all appeared as a phantasmagoria—where one picture becomes gradually blended with another,—and, more than that, I appeared to be at one and the same time, the actor and the looker-on. But, as near as I can recollect, my first feelings were pleasurable:—in short, George, I thought I was married; but where, or when I knew not—only that you were by my side; and I felt a degree of confiding happiness I never anticipated,—for friends surrounded me—and the soft tones of their adulations sounded in my ears as music;—indeed, the whole atmosphere seemed melody, in which were sweetly blended all the harsher and more incongruous feelings of human nature.—In a word, I was inexpressibly happy!—But—in a moment—a change came o'er the spirit of my dream, and I thought all had vanished—and I was alone, sitting solitarily, by an open window, gazing upon the moon, as she shone coldly on a darkened landscape.—Yes! and my very heart seemed cold and chilly, as if some grief had frozen its functions. I thought I was then anxiously waiting the return of him I loved above all the world, when—by some strange magic—two scenes were presented to my view at once.—The one was, as I have just described, myself sitting lonely and disconsolate; the other, a festive board, where the object of my affections was unfeelingly sitting, forgetful of his wife, forgetful of his home;—and, more than that, with his arms"—

"Nay, nay, Emily," violently interrupted her lover, "that cannot be;—no, not even in your sleep, did you do me this injustice. But, proceed."

"Well, George, you have suddenly broken the thread of my description; but I will relate the next scene. I thought years had suddenly passed away, and I was disconsolately weeping over a sickly child, that lay upon my knee; and, as I rocked the scarcely conscious infant, I sang a melancholy tune. I suddenly stopped, and—Oh, horror!—the babe was dead. No friend—no loving partner—was there to console. I was alone! And, in a swoon, I thought I lay unconscious till his return. One look, and that sufficed to add to my horror; he was inebriate and unconscious of what had transpired; but, seeing me in tears, he wildly pressed a bottle to my lips, and said, in an unmeaning, senseless tone,—'DRINK, and drown your cares.' In my frenzy, I thought I drank deeply of the fiery, Lethæan draught; and then, to my excited fancy, he seemed to assume a demon's shape, and for ever kept babbling in my ears, 'Drink, drink!' But, oh! that is not all—the worst remains untold. In the next scene, I thought we inhabited a lowly, dirty room, with shelving roof—no article of furniture was there, save two rough seats on which we sat: rash words and vile recriminations passed between us, till—urged on to phrenzy by taunts—he seized me by my hair, and clenched his fingers round my throat—and I felt all the agonies of death!" And here the lovely girl could no longer control her feelings; the remembrance seemed too frightful, and her eyes were suffused with tears.

"My dearest Emily," said her lover, soothingly, "I know you have higher views of my mental strength, than ever to suppose that I should become the creature you have depicted; and, as it is only a wild dream, let it for ever be banished from your remembrance."

"Now, George," said she, exultingly, "I see it all: I now remember perfectly well reading a somewhat similar account in a newspaper. But," said Emily, thoughtfully, "that only proves the possibility of such events occurring again."

"Well, then," replied her devoted admirer, "to prevent any such catastrophe, I will at once take a pledge of total abstinence, and thus for ever prevent the fulfilment of your dream; and prove, at least, that I am NOT THE DEMON LOVER!"

REPORT OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

MEETING AT STRATFORD.

There was a crowded Meeting of the Teetotalers at Stratford on Tuesday evening, July 14th.

Mr. WESTON, the Honorary Secretary and Treasurer to the United Temperance Association, took the Chair. He opened the business of the Evening with a very eloquent speech, in which he congratulated the Teetotalers of Stratford upon their respectability and numbers. He said that he was also pleased to see so many females present. Mr. Weston then expatiated at some length upon the doctrines of Teetotalism, and exposed the unprincipled conduct of those publicans who vended their malt poison at three-pence per pot. Mr. Weston said that the publicans could not obtain their beer from the brewers at a price which would enable them to sell the liquor at so low a rate; and he therefore concluded that it must be terribly adulterated to permit such a reduction. This adulteration is only calculated (said Mr. Weston) to make the poison of malt liquor more virulent.

Mr. CORNISH, a fishmonger, Mr. FORD, a blacksmith, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. MERRITT, then respectively addressed the meeting, each recording his testimony in favour of the doctrine of total abstinence.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS said that this was his first visit to Stratford, and he was glad that he had paid, that visit with the object of promoting the grand cause of Teetotalism. He proceeded to inform the meeting that he had first come forward as the opponent of Teetotalism; and that he was now one of its most enthusiastic supporters. He had not been ashamed to acknowledge himself vanquished by the force of argument, and he had done homage to the great cause by immediately signing the pledge. He now abhorred all intoxicating drinks, and shuddered when he thought of the crimes of which people are frequently guilty, when labouring under their influence. All stimulants of that kind were necessary and unnatural. When the hand of adversity overtook a man, it was useless to fly to the public-house for solace; why did he not have recourse to the blandishments of domestic comfort? Again, wherefore, when good fortune blessed an individual, did he hasten to a public-house to toast that unexpected joy? Why did he not share his felicity at home, with his wife and children? When labouring under a state of intoxication, all is delusion. To use the words of Rasselas, "we listen with credulity to the whisperings of fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope; we expect that age will perform the promises of youth; and that the deficiencies of the day will be supplied by the morrow;" and on the following morning, we wake disgusted with ourselves, oppressed by head-ache, and a prey to such a depression of spirits that we feel compelled to renew the deceitful draught, in order to avoid hastening to the grave of the suicide.

MR. SMITH then spoke at considerable length. Amongst the numerous excellent arguments adduced by him on this occasion, was the following:—If I wound my arm, or otherwise injure myself (said he), the doctor immediately tells me to abstain from all spirituous liquors, wine, and beer, because they will inflame my blood, and dispose the wounded part to inflammation. Now if these liquors will inflame the blood when my arm is cut, they will produce the same effect when it is not cut. In other words, it is here admitted by medical men that strong drinks produce an unnatural excitement in the human frame. If this be the case, how dangerous is it thus to trifle with nature!

It was announced that Mr. Reynolds would repair to Stratford on Tuesday evening, July 21st, to take the Chair, and the meeting then separated.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Meeting at Aldersgate-street Chapel,—on Saturday Evening, July 18th.

MR. GLENNY (of Hackney), was called to the Chair. He said, after some general observations upon Teetotalism, that he had once been afflicted with a dreadful asthma, and had been advised by his medical attendants, to drink gin and water as a remedy. He however embraced the doctrines of Teetotalism, after a series of dreadful asthmatic sufferings, and was soon completely cured. Total abstinence restored him to perfect health; and he has never had any return of his asthma since he lost it through the beneficial effects of temperance.

MR. BAYLIS said that it was impossible to walk through the streets without beholding on one hand the dreadful effects of intemperance, and on the other the beneficial results of Teetotalism. Strong drinks not only give man the head-ache, but also the heart-ache; and he (Mr. Baylis) had seen so much of the good results of total abstinence, and was himself so deeply indebted to the principle, that he determined upon henceforth devoting himself with more enthusiasm than ever to the great cause of Teetotalism.

MR. PARKER, a West Indian, then addressed the meeting, and kept the audience in a roar of laughter for upwards of three quarters of an hour, with his humorous observations. He said that Teetotalism had done much for him, and advised those who had not already signed the pledge to do so.

MR. DONALDSON observed that he who signs the pledge finds himself increasing in his possessions from day to day: for every farthing which he saves from the public-house he has to spare. From his enthusiastic application to the study of the grand principles of Teetotalism, he (Mr. Donaldson) had much to say upon the subject; and yet he was never wearied with expatiating upon that theme. He regretted that Dissenting Ministers did not advocate the cause of Teetotalism more generally. He would relate an anecdote which had lately occurred:—At the anniversary of Cheshunt College, Sir Culling Eardley Smith was in the chair. This gentleman, after dinner, said "he had subscribed to the Teetotal Pledge, which of course was incompatible with the drinking of toasts;" when the Rev. J. Blackburn, (minister of Claremont Chapel, Pentonville) said "he was not a teetotaler,—he was not in bondage,—and on that subject he had very recently been preaching." What could the Rev. Gentleman mean by this, but that he had recently been preaching against Teetotalism? Let the Rev. Gentleman look at drinking customs and their enormous evils, and ask himself if he has done his duty; or whether he expects to be pronounced "a good and faithful servant," if he continues even from the pulpit to encourage the great damning evil of this nation. Mr. Donaldson said that he was happy to add, that one of the most popular ministers of the day, the Rev. J. Sherman, gave Mr. B. a pretty severe and well-merited reply, by saying "His brother Blackburn had said, he (Mr. B.) was not in bondage; he must be allowed to say, that he rejoiced that he (Mr. S.) had been enabled to break through the old and stupid custom of washing down sentiments by draughts of intoxicating liquors. He had thus become a free man." Mr. Donaldson concluded with some very severe animadversions upon the infamous conduct of Mr. Blackburn.

MR. BENSTEAD said that the object of this society was so important that he did not think it was necessary to make any apology for addressing the audience from that platform, although he were but a new disciple in the cause. He would not, however, be deterred by false delicacy, from stating that the effects of Teetotalism upon him, short as had been his experience, were highly beneficial. He had at first trembled lest he should not be enabled to keep the pledge. He had certainly endured physical inconvenience; but that was rapidly decreasing. His spirits were more even than they ever before had been. He had had his share of good-natured ridicule; but he had been enabled to turn the ridicule against those who used it; and this circumstance had reverted to the good of the society. He (Mr. Benstead) would speak for one moment of the object of that society. It was calculated to work an immense change in the world of mind. It would exercise the most extraordinary influence upon the moral and intellectual world,—an influence so great, that as yet no one could venture to guess at its magnitude. The mind is lost in the immensity of the scope possessed by the influence of that society; and none can anticipate the extent to which its beneficent principles might reach. The mind is God's best gift to man, and is dependent upon the human frame for its energies. How dreadful is it then to derange those bodily functions which exercise so considerable a power over the operations of intellect.

MR. FAIRSHAW then addressed the meeting, and stated that he had lately been to Brighton. He gave an account of his trip, so far as it related to the objects of Teetotalism, and concluded with some observations upon the efficacy of its principles.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS expatiated upon the necessity of avoiding temptation of all kinds, and all opportunities which might lead to crime. Many people (he said) when sober, felt confident in their own honesty, and their own powers of self-control in moments of passion; but if they were overcome by the excitement of liquor, they might forget their honesty, or give vent to their evil passions in some serious manner. The only safety is in temperance—or rather total abstinence; because temperance is a measure which no one can precisely define. One man can drink a pint of wine, whereas a glass will overcome another; and thus it is impossible to draw the line of demarcation which shall be supposed to separate temperance from excess. Temperance doctrines had been tried, and had failed; and total abstinence, both from experience and the dictates of reason, was the only purifying system which could be applied to the present vicious state of society. Mr. Reynolds then called upon those drunkards, who by their example sent their sons forth upon those paths which lead to a prison or a workhouse, and their daughters to the public streets or a hospital, to come forward and join the United Temperance Association.

MR. MEN then addressed the meeting in a most eloquent speech, in which he adduced many arguments eminently calculated to serve the good cause of Teetotalism.

EXCURSION TO RICHMOND OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Monday, July 20th.

Many fears were entertained that the weather would turn out unfavourably for an aquatic excursion, as on reference to the celebrated Murphy, a rather inauspicious day was found prognosticated. (By the way, we should advise all excursion committees to consult this oracle, as it may materially affect the sale of tickets, especially with those whose faith is implicitly fixed thereon.) But nevertheless, all fears were dissipated on the arrival on board of so many sun-shiny faces. The ex-military band struck up, (with our laughter-exciting friend at their head), and the vessel was unloosed from her moorings with the happiest crew she ever carried. Music, singing, dancing, &c. &c. enlivened the journey; and on the arrival at Richmond, a procession was formed, which, preceded by the band, with a splendid banner, flags, &c., marched through the town, and, by its extent and respectability, quite astonished the inhabitants. They proceeded to the Park, where they dined, and afterwards held a public meeting, when Mr. Curry and others addressed them. On their way through the town, they waited on our staunch supporter, Mr. Day; and at three o'clock re-embarked for the New Vauxhall Tea Gardens, where, under an ample awning, tea was laid out on a scale of comfort which did credit to the generous proprietor, who not only fulfilled his engagements in every respect with the committee, but surpassed their most sanguine expectations. After tea the gardens were thrown open, and, without any additional expense, the company were regaled with a delightful concert, &c., concluding with a pyrotechnic exhibition. At eleven the company returned to their boats, and thus ended a day pre-eminently remarkable throughout for the most perfect harmony and concord.

We cannot help noticing our much esteemed and ever-to-be-valued president, J. Bilton, Esq., whose countenance beamed with perfect pleasure, and whose affectionate solicitude and urbanity of manner won the hearts of all present. Our worthy secretary, Mr. Weston, was indefatigable in his efforts to promote the general enjoyment. Also our valued friend, Mr. Crump, the registrar of the society, must not be forgotten, nor ever will he be by those present on this occasion.

Messrs. Reynolds, Benstead, Donaldson, &c., joined the party in the evening at the New Vauxhall Tea Gardens.

Mr. Batger, the Secretary of the Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youth's Teetotal Society, and several of the members with their banners, accompanied the party.

MANCHESTER CORRESPONDENCE.

BY R. B. GRINDROD, ESQ., AUTHOR OF "BACCHUS."

The following circumstance took place during the late procession of the Manchester and Salford Temperance Societies. The procession, from some cause or other, was delayed in its progress up Oldham-road. The horse-men at the head of the procession stopped near to a public-house in front of which was a large watering trough well filled with nature's pure element, not uncommonly called in the north, "Adam's ale." The horses, thirsty from the heat of the day, eagerly hurried to the watering-trough, and were indulging in large draughts of the refreshing fluid, when the landlord of the house, with significant tokens of displeasure, rushed to the spot, and by no gentle means deprived the poor animals of their anticipated treat. The Teetotalers who witnessed this spleenish procedure, dryly remarked that to all appearance the publicans were unwilling to permit even the brute creation to remain water-drinkers. The event, as our readers may well suppose, made no trifling impression upon the bye-standers.

Among other events which occurred during the procession of the Manchester and Salford Temperance Societies, was one which excited no little interest and pleasure in those who were in the immediate neighbourhood. The upper windows of a large provision warehouse in Deansgate were open, and in the vacant space on which something like a scaffolding had been erected, were piled large cheeses, loaves of bread, hams, and other necessaries of life, decorated with gay ribbons, and surmounted with an appropriate flag. The Teetotalers hailed the compliment with hearty cheers; no doubt hundreds in the procession had experienced the blessings of temperance in the possession of these good creatures of God since their happy reformation.

The thieves and pickpockets of Manchester, we imagine, will in future be careful in the exercise of their "profession" on the persons of Teetotalers. On the Monday succeeding the late procession, several prisoners were brought before the Magistrates at the Borough Court, having been detected in their guilty practices. According to the Manchester Police Reports, three or four of these "light-fingered" characters were found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment for periods varying from one to three months. During that time they would be subjected to hard labour on the treadmill. The regulation of the prison moreover confines its inmates to water diet. Industry and temperance are useful virtues, and it is to be hoped that the individuals in question will issue from the jail wiser and better men.

Another individual was brought up at the same time for throwing a quantity of beer on some member of the procession, while he passed near to the Collegiate Church. The Magistrates, who were anxious to punish the man with deserved severity, at the request of the Rev. Mr. Hearne, the Catholic Priest, and one of the members of the Executive Committee, suffered him to depart after administering to him a severe reprimand. The man promised to behave better in future, and it appears had committed the outrage at the instigation of the Publicans.

Much good is effected in Manchester by means of open air meetings, in the week; but in particular on the Sabbath, at times which do not interfere with Divine Worship; frequent meetings are held, and in general very large audiences are assembled. On Sunday's the speeches usually are more religious in their character. Thousands, in consequence of these meetings, hear the principles of Temperance advocated, who seldom or perhaps never attend meetings of any description held within doors. Not long ago the writer witnessed in a popular part of Manchester a plan commonly adopted in that town. Two or three dozen zealous Teetotalers were marching in procession, singing appropriate hymns. The crowd increased as they passed along, and in a suitable place some judicious advocates addressed the auditory. The procession then moved on, and from time to time sung hymns in praise of temperance, and advocated the cause to large assemblies. We are convinced that open air meetings, properly conducted, would in general be found to be attended with beneficial effects.

The Temperance Society, under the patronage of the Rev. Mr. Hearne, is effecting much good among the Catholics of Manchester, and in particular among the Irish. The meetings of this society are always crowded, and numbers of signatures are obtained each night. After the procession, a considerable number were added. Mr. Hearne is indefatigable in his labours. Father Mathew is expected shortly to visit Manchester.

The Rechabite annual Conference has just been held. This valuable auxiliary to temperance is effecting a vast amount of good. As a sick society alone it is deserving of great praise; but the influence extends yet further—it proves a bond of union which those alone can appreciate who have enjoyed its advantages. During the last year a very considerable number of new tents have been opened. We wish this society God speed.

(For further correspondence see our last page.)

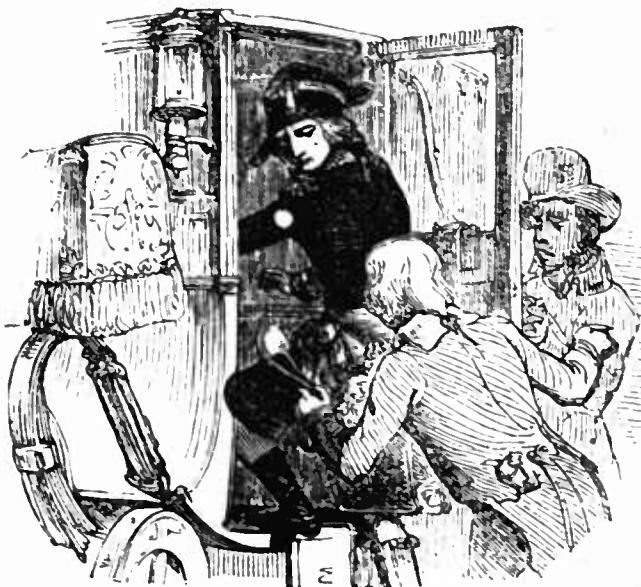

REVIEW.

History of the Emperor Napoleon. Published in Weekly Numbers and Monthly Parts. 8vo. London: W. Strange.

We shall reserve an elaborate notice of this very valuable work, which may be denominated "The People's Edition," until its completion. The history of the greatest man this world ever saw,—whose reputation far outshone that of Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, Timour, or Solymán,—will possess attractions which must ever render it welcome to all classes of readers. In the meantime we shall content ourselves with a few extracts, in order to introduce a few of the very beautiful illustrations which ornament the publication.

Our first extract shall relate the following anecdote:—

"The conferences," adds M. de Las-Cases, "were at first very tedious. M. de Cobenzel, according to the custom of the Austrian cabinet, showed himself very diligent in carrying matters to a great length. The French General, however, resolved to come to the point at once; the conference which he had determined should be the last, was conducted with great vehemence; he demanded a decisive answer to his proposals, and they were rejected. Rising in a passion he energetically exclaimed, 'You wish for war? well then, you shall have it!' and seizing a magnificent porcelain vase, which M. de Cobenzel daily boasted had been given him by the great Catharine, dashed it with all his strength on the floor, shivering it into a thousand pieces. 'Look,' said he, 'such shall be the fate of your Austrian monarchy in less than three months; I promise you.' He immediately hastened from the apartment, leaving M. de Cobenzel petrified; but M. de Gallo, who was much more conciliating, accompanied the French General to his carriage, endeavouring to detain him; "bowing most profoundly," continues the Emperor, "and in so piteous an attitude that, notwithstanding my apparent anger, I could not help laughing heartily to myself."

This mode of negotiating, which seemed to justify what Napoleon had said as to his inaptitude for diplomacy, did not fail, however, to produce the effect he desired.

The ensuing extract relative to the battle of the Nile may not prove uninteresting:—

The fleet arrived on the 1st of July, before Alexandria. Nelson had been there two days before, and, surprised at not meeting the French expedition, imagined it had made for the coast of Syria, in order to disembark at Alexandretta. Bonaparte, informed of his appearance, and foreseeing his speedy return, resolved immediately to effect the landing of his army. Admiral Brueys raised objections to this, and opposed it strongly; but Bonaparte insisted upon it. "Admiral," said he to Brueys, who asked for a delay of twelve hours only, "we have no time to lose; Fortune gives me but three days; if we do not profit by it, we are lost."

The admiral was forced to yield, happily for his fleet; for Nelson, not having found them in the straits where he sought them, delayed not an instant in returning to Alexandria. But it was too late; the promptitude of Bonaparte had saved the French army, the whole of which had been landed. The disembarkation took place at one o'clock in the morning of the 2nd July, at Marabout, three leagues from Alexandria. They marched immediately upon this town, and scaled the ramparts. Kleber, who commanded the attack, was wounded in the head. This conquest was achieved with little effort, and was not followed by any excess; there was neither pillage nor murder in Alexandria.

At the moment of giving battle to Murad Bey at the foot of the Pyramids, Bonaparte, pointing to these ancient and gigantic monuments, exclaimed; "Soldiers, you are about to fight the rulers of Egypt; reflect that from these monuments you are contemplated by forty centuries."

Forty centuries, in fact, did look down on the French from the pyramids. Forty centuries, of which the first had seen the foundation of these immense royal tombs laid by the servile hands of the inferior Egyptians, and of which the last, saw these monuments of ancient servitude conquered by the hands of the free citizens of France. Napoleon's short harangue indicated the great distinction between the founders and the conquerors; the former, tyrants, or slaves, by birth; the latter, all free and on an equality, leaders or soldiers, according to their merits. From the Pharaohs, absolute masters and oppressors of the tribes hereditarily subjected to the most severe labour, and the most abject existence, down to the general, who had just declared to the Egyptians, "That all men were equal before God," and who announced to them the exclusive reign of talents and virtues, there is an uninterrupted chain of slow and painful, wearisome progress, the first link of which is connected with the foundation stone of the pyramids, laid by hereditary misery, and the last with the proclamation of the warrior, who acknowledged the right of wisdom and capacity alone to govern mankind; and who showed himself more jealous and more proud of the preponderance of his reason, than the power of his sword. In telling the soldiers of the Republic that they would be regarded by forty centuries, and then that they were about to face, and give battle to the tribes who still exercised the ancient practice of slavery, Bonaparte powerfully excited the ardour of his troops to preserve and extend the benefits of a civilization, which had cost humanity four thousand years of struggle and sacrifice. These imposing and mysterious witnesses were not appealed to in vain; the French army replied by a complete victory to the eloquent invocation of its general.

We shall now introduce a full-length portrait of the great Desaix, in order to give an idea of the nature of all the pictorial embellishments in this work:—

DESAIX.

In our next number we shall notice the pictorial "Robinson Crusoe," some of the embellishments of which publication we shall introduce into our columns, as on this occasion.

FROM OUR MANCHESTER CORRESPONDENT.

THE cause of Teetotalism is making steady, but rapid, progress in Manchester and Salford. In Whitsun week the procession and annual meetings excited an unparalleled degree of interest and excitement. The procession was by far the largest which had been witnessed in that town. It was from one to two miles in length and lasted from seven to eight hours. In the evening, at Christ Church, Hulme, the annual meeting of the Rechabites took place; the members first partaking of "the cup that cheers but not inebriates." The meeting afterwards was addressed by a number of interesting speakers who occupied its attention until a late hour. On the same evening the anniversary meeting and tea-party of the Salford and Pendleton societies was held in the large hall commonly used for their meetings. R. B. Grindrod, Esq. Surgeon, President of the Manchester and Salford United Association presided on the occasion. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, Mr. Hambleton, late of Ireland, Mr. Holden, from Burnley, Mr. Moffat, from Rochdale, Mr. William Howarth, (alias Slender Billy, so called from his somewhat corpulent figure,) from Preston, Mr. Scott, from Bacup, Mr. Renwick, from Bolton, Messrs. Chadderton's, of Salford, and that veteran in the cause, Mr. Pollard, of Manchester. The speeches delivered on that occasion were extremely interesting, whether as it regards eloquence, value of matter, or the effect produced on a crowded and enthusiastic auditory. The meeting was concluded at a late hour.

The result of these meetings and the procession is not a little encouraging. In the course of the next week from one to two thousand persons signed the pledge. The exact number is not yet ascertained. The readers of the Teetotaler may shortly expect farther particulars. The meetings of the Manchester and Salford Society are in every instance densely crowded, and the success is in proportion to the interest excited. This society now numbers about thirty influential branches; and on a moderate calculation each branch has not less than twenty signatures every week; many of them exceed forty; making thus an average weekly accession of from six to nine hundred members. The time, it is to be hoped, is not far distant when teetotalism will complete its work, in this large and influential town—the annihilation of the drinking system, and the universal diffusion of temperance principles, with the blessings sure to follow, more prosperous trade, improved morals; and what is best of all, the inevitable enlargement of the church of Christ.

WEEKLY LIST OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS,
HELD IN AND NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

Chair taken at 8 o'clock unless otherwise announced.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society holds two large meetings every Wednesday and Saturday, at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, at 8 o'clock, and on Monday at the School Room, Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell.

SUNDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. Service at 11 and half-past 6—
Sunday-School at 2 o'clock.
Temperance Room, Young-st. Kensington. Prayer Meeting at 3.
King-st., Lambeth-walk, at 9
Cumberland Market, 9.
Public Prayer Meeting, Rockingham House, at 3.
New Cut, Lambeth, half-past 4.
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. Preaching—Morning, at 11. Evening half-past six.
Ditto, Enon Chapel, Clare Market, at 11, 3, & half-past 6
Borough Market, at 7 in the morning.
White Stiles, King's Road, Chelsea, 3
Temperance Room, Kent st., Borough. Evening at 6

IN THE OPEN AIR.

Open space, Saffron hill, at 8 o'clock.
Red Lion Market—Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile End Road—Islington Green—Notting Dale—Broadway, Westminster, at 9.
Behind Brunswick Terrace, Well-st., Hackney—Clerkenwell Green—Islington Green—Starch-green, near Shepherd's-bush—Open Space, Cartwright-street, Rosemary-lane—Salisbury-st. Portman Market, 3.
Opposite the Alms Houses, Mile End Road—Stepney Green at 4
Weymouth Terrace, Hackney-Road, at 6
Shepherdess Fields, Islington, United Temperance Association, at 3

MONDAY.

School Room, Aylesbury-st., Clerkenwell, United T. Asso.
East London Temperance Hall, Church-row, Bethnal Green-road, United Temp. Association.
Angel Alley, Bishopsgate. Metro. Roman Catholic Asso.
Robinson's School-room, Whiting-st., Waterloo-road.
The Chapel, Castle-st., Saffron Hill.
School-Room, Orange-st. Chapel, Leicester-square.
School-Room, High-st., Stoke-newington at half-past 7
School-room, Deverell-st., Chapel-yard, Dover-road.
Temperance Hall, Chelsea, New-rd., back of Sloane-st
Temperance-room, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fleet-st. Prayer meet.
William-st., Chapel, Portland-town.

Southwark Academy, Union-st., Borough. Females at 6, Public-meeting at 8.
School-room, Hare-st., Bethnal-green. Youths only
Enon Chapel, New Church-st., Portman Market.
Aldersgate-st. Chapel
Soho Branch, at Orange-st. Chapel School Rooms.
Mariners' Church, Welleclose Square.
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.
Rayner's Temperance Coffee Room, Broadway, Westminster. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8
Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton-street.

TUESDAY.

Aldersgate-street Chapel. Catholic Association.
Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.
School-room, opposite the Workhouse, Bethnal Green
Baptist Chapel, Northampton-st., Somers' Town.
School-room, London-lane, Hackney
Ebenezer-chapel, Old-st. Road.
Mr. Lyons's School Rooms, No. 44, Ratcliffe-highway
Meeting of Members for Roman Catholics only
Temperance-room, back of Kentish Waggoners, Kent-st. Bo.
Catholic Free School, George-st., St. Giles.
Derby-st., School-room, Rosemary-lane
South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catholic Asso.
Temperance Room, Young-st., Kensington.
School-room, York-st., Walworth. For Females only, 6.
Rockingham House, New Kent Road.
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel.
School-room, Grafton-st., Fitzroy Square.
Providence Chapel, Princes-st., Great-garden-st. Whitel.
Temperance-Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.
British School Room, Stratford, half-past 7.
Chelsea Temperance Hall.
Jerusalem Coffee-ho., Jerusalem-pass, Clerkenwell. Youths
School-room, Ship-yard, Wardour-street. Females every, 2d and 4th Tuesday in the month.
School-room, Johnson's-st., Tower-street, Westminster-road. Females at 6. General Meeting at 8.

WEDNESDAY.

Aldersgate st. Chapel, United Temperance Association
School-room, Little Chambers-st. Goodman's Fields.
School-room, Oxford-buildings, Oxford-street.
Haggerstone. Infant School-room, near the Bridge
Chelsea Temperance Hall. Catholic Total Abstinence Soc.
Temperance Hall, Hampstead.
Ivy Lane, Hoxton. Females only at 6. Puh. Meet. 8.
Temperance-rooms, Fleur-de-lis-court, Fetter-lane. Females at 6, Public Meeting at 8.
Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide-sq., Shepperton-st. New North Road, Islington.
Pepperell's Coffee-house, Whitecross st. Females only 7.
Mr. Knight's School-rm., Cambridge-rd. Youths only, 7
Rockingham House, New Kent-road. Youths.
Fisher-st. School Room, Red Lion Square.
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster, 6 to 7, For Females only. Public Meeting at 8.
Eastfield-st, Linchouse Fields. Youths.
Bayham Terrace Chapel, Camden Town.
Wesleyan Chapel, Wandsworth, 7.
Albert Coffee-rm. 1, Crown-court, Crown-st., Finsbury.
Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton-street. For Youths.

THURSDAY.

Chapel, Aldersgate-st.
Union Coffee-house, Golden-lane.
Chapel House Academy, Vauxhall Row.
Wesley Association Chapel, Giffin-street, Deptford
Mr. Lyon's School-rooms, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meet. of the Catholic Association.
Mariners' Church, Welleclose-square
South Lon. Temperance Hall, near the Elephant and Castle.
School-room, 51½, Union-st. Borough. Females only from 6 to 8, for Males from 8 to 10.
School-room, Nelson-st., Windmill-lane, Camberwell, Females only at 6, Public Meeting at 8.
School-room, Manor-road, Parloek-st., Gravesend.
Temperance Rooms, Paradise-st., Rotherhithe.
British School Room, Ship Yard, Wardour-st.
British School, George-st., Regent-st., Lambeth-walk.
Chelsea Temperance Hall.
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel
Rayner's Temp. Coffee-rooms, Broadway, Westminster
Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch.
Albion Coffee-rooms, Pockocks fields, Islington. Youths

FRIDAY.

Harp Alley School Room, Farringdon-st.
Wesleyan Chapel, Webber-st., Blackfrs. Membs. Meet.
Broker-row, Mint, Borough
Subscription School-room, Church-st., Islington.
School-room, Wick-st., Hackney.
Angel-alley, Bishopgate. Females at 6, Public Meet. 8.
Chapel, Upper-Ogle-st., Fitzroy-square.
School Room, London-lane, Hackney. Youths only 7.
Williams's Coffee-house, Staines-road, Hounslow.
South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catho. Asso.
School-room, Charles-st., Dalston.
Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church-st. Shoreditch. Youths only at half-past 7.
Enon Temperance Chapel, St. Clement's-lane, Clare Markt Temperance room, Kent-street, Borough.

SATURDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. United Temperance Association
Lyons's School-room, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Social Meeting of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Asso.
Rockingham House, New Kent Road
Snod's Coffee-house, Ethan-place, Boro'. Social meet.

Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster.
Rayner's Temp. Coff.-rm. Broadway, Watm. Mem.-meet.
Temp. Cof.-rm. 86, Waterloo-rd., Lambeth. Mem. Meet.

RECHABITE MEETINGS.

Southern Counties Brotherhood of Rechabites.
July 27th.—"Tent of the good Samaritan," Temperance Coffee-house, Camden-street, Islington.
— 30th.—"Tent of Jonadab," 73, Turmill-street.
— 31st.—"Tent of John the Baptist," 74, Blackman-st, Boro'.
Aug. 6th.—"Tent of the Star of Temperance," 85, Drury-lane.

Independent Order of Rechabites.

"Samson Tent," 86, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock.
"British Metropolitan Tent," 157, High-street, Shadwell, Thursday evening, 8 o'clock.
"City of London Tent," 159, Aldersgate-street, Wednesday evening, 8 o'clock.

•• The Secretaries of the various Societies are particularly requested to correct the above list.

On the 31st of July will be published, price Elevenpence, Part I. of

THE TEETOTALER

Five Numbers of this Journal will be published in a neat Wrapper. The PORTRAIT OF THE EDITOR, and the beautiful lithographic representation of DANIEL O'CONNELL signing the pledge to FATHER MATHEW, will be given gratis with this Monthly Part.

Advertisements for the Wrapper to be sent to the Printer's 58, Red Cross-street.

Orders will be received by all Booksellers, Stationers, and Newsmen.

W. STRANGE, 21, Paternoster Row.

WORKS BY G. W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.

Mr. TEGG, having purchased the copyrights of the following popular Works, the whole of which are Stereotyped, is enabled to offer them at reduced prices:—

PICKWICK ABROAD,

Or the Tour in France,
With Forty-one Steel Engravings, and Thirty-three beautiful Wood Cuts.

Now Sold at 12s.—Originally published at 21s.

GRACE DARLING,

Or the Heroine of the Fero Islands.
With Twenty Steel Engravings.

Now Sold at 4s.—Originally published at 6s.

Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, CHAPMAN.

This day is published, price 6d.

THE LAST DAY OF A CONDEMNED,

Translated from the French of Victor Hugo;
By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

GEORGE HERDERSON, 2, OLD BAILLY.

Published this day, No. 1, price 2d., neatly printed in 4to, of a weekly Periodical of fun and fancies, with a separate pictorial embellishment, beautifully Lithographed by a first-rate Artist. The work will also appear in Monthly Parts in a neat wrapper.

THE COMIC ALBUM;

London:—W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row;

A. Heywood, Oldham street, Manchester; J. Duncan, High-street, Edinburgh; Smith, Scotland-place, Liverpool; Noble, Market-place, Hull; D. France & Co., Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and all booksellers.

MARSDEN'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL

AND COFFEE HOUSE, 22, OLDHAM STREET, MANCHESTER. This house has been established for the accommodation of Commercial men, Families, and others, visiting Manchester on business or pleasure: it is centrally situated, and is within one minute's walk of the Manchester infirmary. To those who study quietness, comfort, cleanliness, and economy, this Establishment affords superior advantages to that of the tavern or public-house. To those kind friends who have hitherto so liberally supported the above Establishment, the proprietor, Mr. Marsden, returns his most sincere thanks, and hopes by the improvements he has lately made in his premises, combined with strict attention to the comfort of his guests, to merit a continuation of their patronage. To those resident in Manchester this house has many attractions: Teetotalers may meet with kindred spirits; others may find mental recreation, in a long list of Publications and Newspapers.

ROBERT RICHARDS, Manufacturer of SACKS, TARPAULINGS, TILTS, TENTS, FLAGS, BED SACKINGS, and every article in Rope and Twine, at the Lowest Prices for Ready Money. Country orders promptly executed.

Address, Robert Richards, 4, Grey Coat Street, Westminster.

BABINGTON'S ELIXIR OF RHUBARB.

Too much praise cannot be given to the individual who, having an inclination to drunkenness, joins the Temperance Association, but the difficulty is found great, owing to the weakened state of the stomach; but if the justly celebrated medicine "Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken for a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit-drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success on all diseases arising from indigestion; namely, Bilious Headaches, Diarrhoea, Spasm, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. by J. KING, proprietor, 72, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Farringdon-street, and all respectable Chemists.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country. Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers.

To THE TRADE.—Back Numbers changed.

London:—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 6.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"THE TEETOTALER" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TALE.

IN the course of the afternoon our hero wrote a letter to Mademoiselle Dorvilliers, (for she bore the name of her adopted father,) and when he had concluded it, he began seriously to reflect upon the course he was to pursue. To introduce a clown into his drama, and thus endeavour to render it acceptable to the second publisher whom he had consulted, was an idea that was at once discarded from his mind: he accordingly resolved to attempt a tale for the magazine belonging to the bookseller, who had so elaborately initiated him into the existing tastes of the public, and who had favoured him with the flash-song as a specimen.

Pleased with the thought, and already fancying that he saw the tale in print—also extending his ideas so far as to believe that he had actually received the proper remuneration for it—Melville spread his pens, ink, and paper upon the table before him, and commenced his task. Without having any precise notion of the incidents he intended to incorporate in his tale, he nevertheless unhesitatingly began by informing the reader that the night of a certain date was a stormy one—that the rain fell in torrents—that the thunders rolled and the lightnings flashed across the canopy of heaven—that the elements seemed at war with each other—and that the powers above appeared to be in deadly wrath with the denizens of this world. Indeed, according to Victor Melville, there never had been such a storm before. But, somehow or another, all writers, who are novices, commence their first essay in the walk of fiction with a dreadful storm, or else a most placid and delicious calm: none ever attempt the variety of boldly asserting that the weather was neither very fine, nor very bad, but something between the two.

However,—Victor declared that a terrible storm took place; and all this thunder, rain, and lightning were only used to introduce to the reader an individual, who, with a foreboding countenance, eagle eye, lowering brows, curled lips, grinding teeth, clenched fists, and palpitating heart, was pacing his apartment in a condition bordering upon despair. This gentleman (who is the hero of most tales, the plots of which are romantic, but whom Melville fancied to be an entirely original character) spoke darkly of some mysterious deed, and then told himself, in a soliloquy, all the actions of his past life. It is very common to make heroes thus chatter in tales or plays—and it is very kind of the author to do so; as, unless he possessed so much forethought, the reader might possibly remain ignorant of many important facts; but it is at the same time very extraordinary that any gentleman, whether a hero of a book or of real life, should take the trouble to tell himself a quantity of things that he could not possibly fail to remember, and which are not always the most comfortable to a qualmish conscience. Be that as it may—Victor adopted this plan, and through it did he intend to make his reader (when he had one) aware that this individual with the gloomy countenance and the explanatory soliloquy, had poisoned his brother in order to obtain possession of the family estate. Then a ruffian suddenly interrupted this reverie, during which the murderer was recapitulating to himself every particular of the crime; and this ruffian talked in a slang language that Victor hoped would quite delight the fairer portion of his readers. But to make the scene quite suitable to the existing taste, he represented the ruffian to sing a flash song, which the hero very quietly put up with, instead of kicking the musical sinner out of his house.

Melville then proceeded to state how this ruffian had been the accomplice of the hero in the murder, and how he came to torment him for money. The hero throws him a purse of gold, with a tragic air, and the ruffian departs well-pleased with his nocturnal visit. Then comes a tender wife—beautiful as a star—who inquires what is the cause of her husband's melancholy. But the husband declines gratifying her curiosity; and so about two pages of foolscap closely written are devoted to the secret grief and melancholy of the amiable wife.

Years pass away, (so Victor continues his tale,) and the hero and heroine are again introduced to the reader; but this time a beautiful daughter is presented along with them. Then the ruffian comes again, and demands in the most elegant swell-mob language, the hand of the daughter. The father will not consent: a quarrel ensues—words lead to blows—and the ruffian has his brains blown out by a convenient pistol, which is lying already loaded near at hand in the apartment where the dispute takes place. The ladies rush to the room; the hero confesses his guilt, and falls down and dies (although in the possession of the most excellent health) upon the body of the ruffian. The mother and daughter throw themselves into each other's arms; and there ends the tale.

As soon as this task, which occupied nearly the whole day, was accomplished, Victor laid down his pen, and leant back in his chair to refresh himself with a few hopes which he was enabled to enjoy through his conviction that he had just composed one of the most interesting tales in the English language. What pathos in those parts where pathos was required! What a graphic description of the apartment where the last struggle took place, and which was delineated even to the colour of the window-curtains! and what a magnificent scene between the murderer and his accomplice when they first meet! Victor felt persuaded that his tale would be received with pleasure and paid for on the spot: and he already fancied that he saw before him, in elegant type, the words,—"THE FRATRICIDE'S FATE: A Tale. BY VICTOR MELVILLE."

Pleased with these ideas, our hero permitted his fancy to range a little more extensively in the fields of hope; and he speedily saw himself a popular writer—solicited by booksellers to accept engagements—riding in his cab—talked about by the public—quoted in the papers—and sought after by the fashionable. He thought that he was in a little library, with Louise sitting opposite to him reading one of his own volumes, and he engaged in composing a new work. This new work was to crown his glory, to stamp his fortune, to raise him to the pinnacle of fame; and he was already deeply buried in the plot of the romance, when he was awakened from his reverie by a loud knock at his door.

"Come in," cried Victor, the library and the books vanishing from his mind's eye, and the nakedness of his apartment usurping their place.

"It's only I," said Mr. Tibbatts. "What have you been doing all day?"

"Writing one of the most romantic tales I ever invented," was the answer; and Victor half made a motion as if he were inclined to read it to his friend.

"Oh! is that all?" cried Mr. Tibbatts; "a romance, eh? Well, I dare say it is very interesting; but what should you say to a bit of cold mutton and a drop of half-and-half?"

"What! is it dinner-time?" exclaimed Melville, somewhat shocked at the anything but sentimental associations of cold mutton, half-and-half, and romance: "I had no idea it was so late; but I have been so occupied."

"Ah! so have I," said Mr. Tibbatts, shaking his head.

"What—writing?" demanded Victor.

"Oh! no—not to-day," was the reply.

"What then?"

"Why, baiting traps to catch the mice in my cupboard," returned Mr. Tibbatts; "I am swarming with them."

Victor began to suspect that authors were common men after all, and that they were occasionally under the painful and disagreeable necessity of performing many of the every-day occupations which he had hitherto imagined to belong only to the scope of the rest of mankind. His appetite, however, strengthened the suspicion he had just entertained, by making him aware that authors must eat and drink, and that they cannot live upon that pure and wholesome element in which he had been building so many castles; he accordingly agreed to accompany Mr. Tibbatts to this gentleman's dinner-table. He nevertheless first inclosed his tale in a clean envelope, accompanied with a very polite note to request the earliest attention to it, and to say that he should call in a few days for the answer; and then despatched the parcel by the accommodating Mr. Robus to the first publisher whom he had addressed in Paternoster-Row.

Mrs. Duncan, having made every apology for her singular behaviour of the preceding evening, was restored to favour; and the excellent female accordingly waited at the chest, (for the table had been returned to Mr. Robus) as if nothing unpleasant had occurred.

"Anything more this evenin', gen'lmen?" said Mrs. Duncan, when she had cleared away the things.

"Nothing," answered Mr. Tibbatts; "except that you may put the bottle in which a little rum was left from last night upon the table—the chest, I mean, and then make yourself particularly scarce."

This command was obeyed; and as soon as Mr. Tibbatts had mixed for himself a glass of rum and water—an example which Victor was not asked twice to follow—he observed, after a few sips, "Well—it was devilish lucky that Frank Fippins sent these things; for one fact can be easily demonstrated—and that is, I could not have procured them."

"What things?" asked Victor, looking round the room to discover the objects of his companion's remark.

"I mean the dinner and spirits of yesterday, and which have served us again to-day," answered Mr. Tibbatts. "But how shall we dine to-morrow? I am quite aground."

"And my exchequer is very low," said Victor: "I have not so much as a sovereign left; but in a few days, I dare say, I shall be paid for my tale—"

"Your fiddlestick," interrupted Mr. Tibbatts. "However, we can go on pretty comfortably with what you have got for a short time; and then, if nothing turns up, why—I must have recourse to my uncle again,—that's all."

"Ah! it is a fortunate thing to have a relation to fly to in the hour of need," said Victor with a sigh.

Whether horses really do laugh in any peculiar manner, even if they laugh at all—or whether the phrase be only a poetical license, we know not: but very certain it is, that Mr. Tibbatts broke out into that which is usually denominated "a horse-laugh," and a long and sincere one it was too, as our hero made this pathetic observation.

"Why, my dear fellow," said Mr. Titus, when he had partially recovered himself, but with the tears still running down his cheeks, "you really are green! This is a Lombardy uncle to whom I allude—a general relative to the human race, a well-known person who dwells at the sign of the three balls—"

"Oh! I comprehend you," interrupted Victor, now laughing in his turn: "you mean the pawnbroker. But do you really anticipate being shortly reduced to such a dreadful alternative as that of being compelled to pledge your property?" asked our hero anxiously, as soon as he had indulged in a little inclination to mirth at his own expense.

"I only wish I was reduced to the dreadful alternative of having a few more coats and breeches to spout," said Mr. Tibbatts. "But look here."

As he uttered these words, he took a small greasy parcel from his waistcoat pocket, opened it, and displayed to the astonished eyes of our hero about thirty duplicates for articles pledged.

"God bless me!" exclaimed Victor: "are those the pawnbroker's receipts?"

"These are the mortgage-deeds," coolly answered Mr. Tibbatts; "and a very tidy collection there is, I hope. If there were a place in London, as there is in Paris, where they would buy the duplicates, I dare say I should have sold them long ago. See, here is one for a stomach-pump: they only lent nine shillings upon it; that was a burning shame. Here is another for a lady's work-box—twelve shillings: and a third for a kitchen-fender—three and sixpence. Next is a warming-pan—"

"What strange articles for a man, especially a bachelor!" ejaculated our hero.

"Ah! this matter requires explanation," said Mr. Titus Tibbatts, replacing his duplicates in his pocket. "The fact is, that I once got a bill discounted: it was for eighty pounds; and so I took twenty in money, twenty in steel spectacles, ten in pen-knives and paper-cutters, and the remainder in miscellaneous articles of all kinds."

"Upon my word, you astonish me!" cried Melville, really expressing his true sentiments; for every thing he had seen or heard since his arrival in London convinced him that he knew nothing at all of the world.

"Astonish you indeed!" exclaimed his companion: "you will be still more astonished by the time you have been in this city a year. You know not as yet one-half of the shifts to which men, situated as we are, are put sometimes to obtain a meal. There are thousands who leave their beds every morning without knowing where they will sleep at night, or whether they will have a mattress to sleep upon at all; and those same individuals are equally uncertain about their dinners and breakfasts. A man has accomplished half his fight against adversity, when he has got a house over his head and a little furniture about him which he can call his own: he then manages to live on, somehow or another, if he have the least sense about him."

"This must be the case," said Victor, after a moment's pause, during which he reflected upon all that his companion had remarked to him: "but I never thought of these matters before."

"I have seen—and have felt all I tell you," said Tibbatts; "and you will probably have to do the same. I therefore thought it prudent to forewarn you. Would you like to see a little of London life?"

"With pleasure," returned Victor. "I now perceive that it is impossible to get on in this world without experience."

Mr. Tibbatts tossed off his rum and water, threw his hat upon his head, drew on his gloves, and intimated his readiness to act as Victor's guide and chaperon for the evening. Our hero did not hesitate for one moment to accompany his new friend: and they sallied forth together, after having carefully locked the doors of their rooms.

(To be continued in our next.)

Attar of Roses is an aromatic oil obtained from the flowers of the rose, but in such small quantities that half an ounce can hardly be procured from 100 lbs. of the petals. This oil is solid and white at the common temperature of the atmosphere; but, on the application of heat, becomes fluid, and assumes a yellow colour. It is brought in considerable quantities from Turkey, and is sold at more than five pounds per ounce; that from the East Indies, where it is said to be chiefly manufactured, when genuine, has been sold at a much more exorbitant price.

THE MECHANISM OF ART AND NATURE.

WHAT a beautiful instrument is a watch, and how admirably defined are all its combinations. The main-spring consists of a flexible plate of steel, wound round a small axis, which is effected by the key; and its subsequent effort to uncoil itself becomes the maintaining power. The power of the spring is transmitted to the balance by means of several toothed wheels, which multiply the number of revolutions that the chain makes on the fusee, to such a number that though the last or balance-wheel turns nine times and a half every minute, the fusee will at the same time turn so slowly that the chain will not be all drawn off from it in less than twenty-eight or thirty hours, and it makes one turn in about four hours. This assemblage of wheels is called the train of the watch.

The rate of the watch's movement is regulated by two means, either by increasing or diminishing the force of the main-spring, which increases or diminishes the arc that the balance describes; or it may be done by strengthening or weakening the pendulum-spring, which will cause the balance to move quicker or slower.

The beautiful French watches have jewelled pivot-holes for the top and bottom of the verge, to diminish the friction. These jewels are fixed in the bottom part of the pottance and in the top of the cock. Each consists of two pieces, one of which has a cylindrical hole drilled through it to receive the pivot; the other is a flat piece, making the rest or stop which forms the bottom of the hole. Both stones are ground circular on the edge, and are fitted and burnished into a small brass ring, which is fastened into the cock and pottance by two small screws applied to each. The addition of jewels to a watch is a great advantage, as they do not tend to thicken the oil in the manner brass holes do, from the oxidation of the metal.

A circumstance which is essential to the accurate going of a watch, is that it should continue its motion whilst winding up; and this aim is effected by the going-fusee. By a very simple mechanism, the main-spring, while the watch is going, acts on an intermediate short spring, which is called the secondary spring. It is constantly kept bent to a certain tension by the former; for the fusee has no communication with the great wheel except by this spring. When the watch is winding up, and the principal spring, fusee, chain, &c., cease to act, the secondary spring being placed on a ratchet-wheel which is hindered from retrograding by a click, continues the motion of the great wheel without alteration.

Without entering any more minutely into the details of a watch, we may repeat our exclamation—What a beautiful instrument it is, and how admirably defined are all its combinations! If, then, a man were to take one of these beautiful instruments, and day by day apply a drop of water to its perfect mechanism, so that that mechanism should at first become defective through rust, then uncertain in its operations, and at length ruined altogether,—should we not stigmatize that man, who could perform such an action, as something worse than an idiot thus to profane a noble work—thus wilfully to ruin an useful thing—and thus to insult the maker of that wonderful combination? We should: but let us see how this argument can be applied.

Far more extraordinary than the combinations and arrangements of the watch are those of the human frame. The phenomena of life are divided into different classes or functions, and their specific classifications by various commentators have been numerous. One of the principal functions of vivification and secretion is the nutritive circulation, or the course which the blood pursues in the heart and lungs, and in the blood-vessels of the body. This course is justly named a circulation—as the blood is always passing round in the same track, and its motion constantly tends to the point from which it began. The greater circulation is the passage of the blood from the aortic ventricle of the heart, through the arteries, to the extremities of the body, and its return through the veins to the same viscus. The lesser circulation is the transmission of the blood from the pulmonic ventricle to the left side of the heart through the lungs. The uses of the blood in the animal economy are so important that every circumstance relating to its properties, or to the laws of its motion, cannot be too carefully investigated by the anatomist, the physiologist, and the medical practitioner. Blood is a fluid, occupying two sets of vessels, the arteries and veins. Its specific gravity is about 1052. It separates into serum and a fibrinous mass: the former coagulates at a heat of 165° F.; the colour is red, but modified by nitre and gases; it contains globules; the heat varies from 102° to 104° F.; the taste is saline; and the feel is slippery. The heart of an infant, sleeping tranquilly, performs, in the first days of its existence, about 140 pulsations in a minute.

At the end of the first year	124
second year	110
third and following year	96
seventh and following	89
time of puberty	80
At the age of manhood	75
sixtieth year	65

beyond which time the variations are very great.

The mean velocity of the blood in the aorta is calculated at eight inches each pulsation, which gives about fifty feet in a minute. When the circulation ceases before death, it appears to stop in the small vessels, and thus stagnation is propagated towards the heart.

The brain, which is usually considered as the organ of thought, acts a most important part in the animal economy. This organ is of a very delicate texture, and appears, through a microscope, to be formed of an immense number of globules of different sizes. They are said to be eight times less than those of the blood. One extremity of the nerves, which possess the functions of innervation, is confounded with the substance of the brain. The nerves are generally formed of very fine filaments, divided into threads still finer. The physical explanations of sensation consist in applying more or less the law of physics and chemistry to the physical properties presented by that part of the apparatus situated anteriorly to the nerves. Sensations assist, direct, modify, and sometimes mutually injure each other. Smell is made the guide and sentinel of taste. Taste, in its turn, exercises a powerful influence over smell. The sensations are agreeable and disagreeable; the first, particularly when they are vivid, constitute those feelings we denominate pleasure, whilst those of the second cause pain. By pain and pleasure nature makes us to concur in the order that she has established amongst organized beings. The causes modifying the external or internal sensations are numberless; age, sex, temperament, climate, habit, the seasons, and individual disposition, are all so many circumstances which separately would be enough to occasion many modifications in the sensations; and in being united it is reasonable to suppose that the result should be more manifest. The difference of the sensations of individuals is expressed in common language by this phrase, "Every one has his own ways, feelings, or sentiments."

The brain is larger in man than in any other known animal, in proportion to the nerves arising from it: its general weight is from two pounds five ounces and a half to three pounds three ounces and three quarters. The brain of Lord Byron weighed six pounds, and that of Oliver Cromwell nearly as much. The brain of Dr. Gall, the founder of modern phrenology, weighed only two pounds ten ounces seven drams and a half. Baron Cuvier's brain weighed three pounds thirteen ounces and a half.

We might continue this string of observations upon the wonderful construction of the human frame, and its collateral circumstances, until we should weary the patience of our readers. We think we have, however, said enough to warrant the exclamation—Far more extraordinary than the combinations and arrangements of the watch are those of the human frame. The watch is an inanimate thing: the human frame is an animate thing. The one can be replaced by man, if man destroy it; but God alone can replace man, by man destroyed. If then it be wrong to apply a drop of water day by day to the beautiful mechanism of a watch, how much more enormous is the crime of administering to the human frame, that which at first renders its organs defective, then uncertain in their operations, and then ruins them altogether! He, who imbibes poisons which produce these terrible effects, is worse than an idiot thus to profane a noble work—thus wilfully to ruin that which he cannot replace—and thus to insult the Maker of that wonderful combination which we call Man!

Those poisons, which produce such dreadful results—which inflame that blood which we are now described—irritate those nerves which we are now alluded to—destroy those sensations to which we referred—and impair that brain which we designated as the seat of thought,—those poisons, which are more deleterious and more fatal in their consequences to man, than the drops of water are to the watch,—those poisons, in a word, which form the bane of the human race, are the intoxicating drinks that operate as more bitter scourges upon the earth than plague, famine, disease, accident, and war!

TEETOTALISM.

THE time is now come when Teetotalism need neither be ashamed of its numbers or its advocates. When the "Birmingham blacksmith," with his iron eloquence, first advocated the infant, unpopular cause, its best friends did not anticipate the day when the greatest and most polished minds, the most powerful and cultivated talents, and the most eminent literary characters of which our country can boast, should be employed in the advocacy of its blessed principles.

When Teetotal societies were contemptuously spoken of as assemblies of "tinkers and tailors," and it was "vulgar and low" to belong to them, we did not think that ere the Teetotal sun had fairly risen above the horizon, rank and wealth would delight to bask in its cheering and inspiring rays, and pronounce it their highest honour to be associated with Birmingham tinkers, and to join with them in the duty and privilege of giving countenance and support to the once-despised institutions, which have for their object the most needful moral reformation that this country can witness. When Teetotalers were driven from Harpsley,—when its advocates met with nought but jeer and gibe, we little thought how soon, meeting in the great assembly room of our great metropolis, we should hear legislators and senators testifying their unqualified approbation of the cause, and assembled thousands proclaiming by their loud plaudits their admiration of, and love to, the principles which have raised many of them, and are calculated to raise all, from the miserable depths of depravity and vice to a comfortable and honourable position in society;—or, that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would be found ready to bear the reproach of other noble lords by his "willing testimony to the benefits the temperance-pledge had conferred on that country." But the strength of our principle is great: so great, that all opposition falls harmless at its feet;—it has passed through a furnace of prejudice, heated seven times hotter than it was wont,—it has come out uninjured;—it has been tried by a fiery ordeal, the ordeal of public opinion, and it has obtained a verdict in its favour: physicians of all nations have pronounced it "very good," nay, the very best of systems; the noblest minds of every country where Teetotalism has been named, declare in its favour;—it is a heavenly principle, and "if God be for us, who shall be against us?"

I might bid the reader cast his eye over the whole of the human race, and on the brow of every nation would he see more or less, Ruin! ruin! Accursed! accursed! branded by the fiery draught! But look merely at England! the inhabitants of civilised, Christianized England! the land of privileges! the land of Bibles! witness all their evils, all their crimes, all their abominations, all their poverty, all their distress, all their diseases, their deaths, and the souls that are lost! 'Tis an awful picture! What causes their crimes? Consult the annals of crime; ask yonder felons under what influence did they commit them? Ask that miserable wretch who is about to pay his life as a forfeit for some dark deed. What evidence gave that unhappy wretch, whom English Christians, assembled by thousands to see murdered but the other morning, a victim to our blood-thirsty, anti-Christian laws? What causes their poverty? Ask that wretched wife; those ragged, starving children. What aggravates all their diseases? What sends thousands to the grave prematurely? What damns tens and hundreds of thousands of souls yearly? Will not every tongue reply, "Tis drink! the demon drink!"

Then, look at London!—in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, in the third of the Protestant Reformation—favoured London! The eloquent pen of Dr. Harris has well described the state of its inhabitants:—

"What is their state? It is a condensed mass of heathenism, a concentration of depravity, so virulent that it might suffice to inoculate a continent, a world, with vice. What is their state? 12,000 children are always training in crime, graduating in vice, to reinforce and perpetuate the great system of iniquity; 3,000 persons are receivers of stolen property, speculators, and dealers in human depravity; 4,000 are annually committed for criminal offences; 10,000 are addicted to gambling; above 20,000 to beggary; 30,000 are living by theft and fraud; and that this dreadful energy of evil may not flag from exhaustion, it is plied and fed with three millions' worth of spirituous liquors annually!"

Dr. Harris has traced this "system of iniquity" to its right source. Three millions' worth of spirits alone, without the vast consumption of other intoxicating drinks! But he goes on to say:—"Twenty-three thousand persons are annually found helplessly drunk in the streets; above 150,000 persons are habitually gin-drinkers. Such is their ordinary state. Nay, it has grown worse while I have been describing it: for like the magic erections in pandemonium, in addition to the 5,000 temples of drunkenness already existing, other 'fabrics huge rise like an exhalation.'" Yes—from these "temples of drunkenness" springs all this vast amount of guilt.

"But," continues Dr. Harris, "were any one to attempt to portray the abominations of London, where are the colours dark enough, or the imagination keen enough to draw the picture of the guilty reality? There must be seen splendid porticoes, the entrances of which must be inscribed, 'Hells'; and on the breast of those entering must be written in letters of fire, 'Hell.' There must be gorgeous palaces in which death and disease shall appear holding their courts; in which busy hands shall be seen distributing liquid fire to crowds of wan and squalid forms; and each of those palaces must be shown standing in the midst of a gaol, a poorhouse, a lunatic asylum, and a country all crowded and leaning over the mouth of the bottomless pit. And over the whole must be cast a spell—an all-encompassing network of satanic influence, prepared and held down and guarded by satanic agency. And to complete the picture—three hundred thousand Christians passing by—without scarcely lifting a hand to remove it!" Great God! can this be in Christian England! Oh! is not Teetotalism needed? Indeed it is! It is an angel of mercy sent "to proclaim liberty to the captive," the willing captive of the devil, by means of this drunkenness, his best agent,—to proclaim "the opening of the prison to them that are bound" in fetters stronger than iron, the fetters placed on them by the damning thing, and which chains them fast to endless perdition.

But, say you, this is the intemperate, not the temperate, use of these things; it is, but will you cut off the branches of a noxious weed, or pull it up by the roots? The latter; and, so help us God! we will not rest till we have pulled up by the root this cursed practice; we will not stop till our sun has arisen on the whole family of man, and every one of its members has felt the benign influence of its beams.

Will you stand idly by? Will you with apathy and indifference behold hundreds and thousands of your fellow-men enslaved and brought to a state of the most abject misery, suffering in mind and body, and falling into a drunkard's grave—will you see tens of thousands die, who we know "cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven," and never raise a hand for their help? No! yield to our entreaties; as a patriot, wipe off the foul blot from your country's page; as a philanthropist, pity your degraded, deluded fellow-creatures, your brethren; and as a Christian, have an eye to the glory of God, by the saving of souls, and "come over and help us."

Thurlow-place, Hackney-road.

G. B. B.

ARISTOCRATIC OUTRAGES AGAIN.

We extract the following paragraph from the Sunday Times of Sunday last:—

At a late hour on the night of Sunday the town of Hounslow was disturbed by the freaks of a party of gentlemen, who had passed through the town in a splendid "four-in-hand" in the course of the afternoon of the previous day. It appears that, on their return, these persons, who are stated to have been some of the parties implicated in the late desperate outrage on a policeman at Hampton, drew up at the outside of the George Inn, and, whilst their horses were being refreshed, amused themselves by breaking with stones the windows of the neighbouring houses. Not content with that, they then commenced pulling down the poles in front of the barbers' shops, and wrenching the knockers off the doors; that belonged to Mr. Friberg, a baker in the town, they threw with great violence through a window of the house, which had nearly inflicted a severe injury upon Mrs. Friberg, on whose pillow it fell, close to her head. Mr. Friberg called for the police, when the whole party drove off at full gallop towards Town before the police could muster in sufficient numbers to prevent their departure. For the correctness of this statement we are unable to vouch; but from the scandalous impunity with which men of a higher station in society are in this country allowed to commit outrages against persons in the humbler walks of life, it would not at all surprise us if it were true to the letter. A prosecution of a man of fortune for an offence in England, who cares nothing for public opinion, is a mere farce. A very small expenditure of money will enable him, if no serious accident ensue, to prevent conviction; and should the outrage lead to loss of life, from the low amount of bail exacted by magistrates, he can easily escape from justice. It was reported that the policeman referred to in the above account died of the injury he sustained; but we learn, from inquiry, that he is now considered out of danger. But if the poor man had fallen a sacrifice, the bail exacted would have been no obstacle to the escape of his assailants. The amount of bail demanded ought to bear some proportion to the fortune of the parties. And yet we see noblemen charged with an outrage threatening to be followed by loss of life, held to bail in a sum of 100*l*. Some functionary in every neighbourhood, to see that the law is fairly carried into effect against rich and poor, is urgently required in this country. A public prosecutor would feel his honour and professional character concerned in bringing to justice all descriptions of persons. In the mean time, all such means as are compatible with the defective state of the English institutions ought to be resorted to in the case of the authors of the outrages which have diffused such a feeling of insecurity in peaceable neighbourhoods. The policemen ought to be made to feel that no man, whatever his rank or fortune, can injure them in the discharge of their duty with impunity. We trust that these matters will not be hushed up. The public must watch carefully the proceedings. A feeling must not gain ground that any man, or set of men, can set themselves above the law.

We prophesied in our journal of last week that no severe notice will be taken of the conduct of Lord Waldegrave in respect to the policeman at Hampton; and we still declare that we believe our prediction will be fulfilled. It is disgusting to reflect upon the miserable distribution of laws which permit the rich man thus to outrage society with impunity, and which would visit similar misdeeds with terrible vengeance upon the head of the poor man. Is not such a line of conduct on the part of our legislators sufficient to excite the people to rise in a mass against such unjust—such partial—such outrageous institutions? Is the throne of Victoria safe while such injustice is practised beneath her very eyes—within the very suburbs of her capital? Wherefore should there be one law for the poor man, and another for the rich man? Our blood boils with indignation when we reflect upon the manner in which the poor are trampled under foot, and the rich are protected in all their villainies, in a country which is called free!

We received an intimation from a certain quarter, a few days ago, that we had better be careful how we inserted articles written in the style of that one which appeared in our journal of the other week, and which was denominated The Waldegrave Outrage. We shall not comply with the terms of this intimation. We have a duty to perform to that Association whose interests are represented by this journal, and we shall exert ourselves to our utmost to expose all those misdeeds which militate against the glorious principles of Teetotalism. We cry "Shame" upon those aristocratic debauchees—those hereditary legislators—who thus set so vile an example to the lower orders: we are determined to speak out; and if, by one of the infamous laws of this country, we shall be prosecuted for speaking too freely, ten thousand Teetotalers will visit us in the prison to which we might be consigned. We have embarked in a good cause, and we shall not flinch from the just performance of our duties. We shall, in their turns, expose the atrocities committed by a dissipated aristocracy—the licentiousness which characterizes the upper classes of society—and the evil tendency of those laws which protect the rich man, and oppress the poor one. If the boldness and determination, with which we may fulfil these duties, should lead us into trouble, we shall find an adequate reward in the approval of our own conscience, and in the applause of that enlightened body of men who are denominated Teetotalers. Our object is to raise an insuperable embankment against the tide of dissipation and intemperance; and in this object we are resolved not to suffer our ardour to be damped by threats of latent vengeance on the part of those who have already oppressed the masses much—much too long.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. A. L., HOMO, VINDEX, JUNIOR, P. C., F. N. O. (Hackney,) and X. are all sincerely thanked for their communications.

We beg to inform Mr. WILLIAM TITLAV, of Bath, that the United Temperance Association advocates both pledges; its object being the Union of Teetotalers, and the Unity of Teetotalism.

Mr. J. W. WALKER, of Olding, is informed that alcohol does not exist in a natural state, but can only be produced by the process of fermentation. To his opponents, why does he not put this question—"Poisons exist; but is that any reason wherefore you should swallow them?"

If IOTA (Bethnal Green) will forward us a longer article upon the interesting subject he has selected, we shall have great pleasure in inserting it.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Teetotal progress, and the transactions of Teetotal Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We solicit the correspondence of the heads of all Teetotal Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 6d.
Every succeeding line 4d.

ERRATUM.—In number 5, 1st page, third column, and third line from the bottom, for give some us, read give us some.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1840.

THE TRIUMPHS OF TEETOTALISM.

A new weekly paper, entitled The Journal of the British Empire, contains a desperate attack upon the doctrines of Teetotalism. It ridicules the extremes to which Teetotalers carry their innovating reform, and indulges in a laugh at Teetotal processions and galas. We are grieved to find so silly an article in a journal which otherwise appears to possess many substantial claims upon public favour. We shall however take the trouble of answering the main objection adduced by the writer against the principles of Teetotalism.

The writer declares that "Temperance doctrines" would confer a real benefit upon society; but that the extremes preached by Teetotalism are absurd. We are here compelled to repeat the frequently urged and unanswerable argument relative to the use and abuse of intoxicating drinks. The generality of men have not sufficient command over themselves to be contented with a small quantity; and the founders of all new systems legislate for the masses, and not for the few. The exceptions prove the general rule; and if the writer of the article in the Journal of the British Empire be one of those who can abstain from acts of intemperance, and practise the doctrine of self-denial after a partial enjoyment of exciting liquor, he should remember that thousands are not possessed of the same fortitude. It is sufficient for many merely to taste one drop, in order to unhinge months or years of sobriety and abstinence. The doctrine of the moderate use of liquors is feasible in theory; but experience has taught us that its efficacy is not confirmed by practice.

It is therefore certain that the use of intoxicating drink will lead to the abuse; and that it is impossible, either consistently with the dictates of reason or of circumstances, to draw a line of demarcation between temperance and excess. No definite rule could be laid down to mark that distinction, and thus form a principle to be inculcated by a reforming body of philanthropists; because a glass of strong liquor will produce upon one man the same effects which result from a pint drunk by another. Thus as no specific quantity could be defined as the mid-way stage which might be called Temperance,—and as it would be ridiculous for any association of reformers to commence their labours upon a principle so ill-defined as one which admits the propriety of each man partaking of as much liquor as he can imbibe without danger of experiencing inconvenience,—mere Temperance measures are evidently impracticable, and incapable of working out the great moral reformation projected by the Luthers, the Calvins, and the Melancthons of Teetotalism. Total abstinence can alone succeed in accomplishing that great aim, by placing a barrier between men and the object of temptation.

The writer in the Journal of the British Empire ridicules the processions of the Teetotalers. Does this writer comprehend the utility and the object of those processions? Does he know that by a manifestation of numerical strength, the Teetotalers bring in evidence to the eyes of the world a grand argument in favour of the efficacy of their principles? Is he aware that, while those processions pass through the streets, numbers of degraded drunkards—struck by the cleanly and comfortable appearance of the Teetotalers and their families, attracted by the halo of happiness and contentment which surrounds them, and shamed by the example thus afforded them by their fellow-creatures—basten to enlist themselves in the ranks of Teetotalism? Thus it is that the avalanche of the new doctrine pursues its way, gathering up fresh masses as it rolls onwards, collecting strength in its progress, and sweeping away the strong-holds of intemperance in its path from the summit of that cold and cheerless mountain, whence it took its birth, to the peaceful regions of that happy valley where all is felicity, contentment, and joy.

Others of our opponents have directed our attention to the practices and customs of our forefathers, and indignantly demanded of us wherefore we venture to change them. To them we reply that all reforms are adapted to the necessities of the age, and that vicious institutions find no sanction in the fact of their antiquity. Times have strangely changed since—

Inclitus Albertus, doctissimus atque disertus
Quadrivium docuit, et totum scibile scivit.

But the knowledge of these days is the knowledge of things, and not of words,—the slowly ripening fruit of laborious observation—not the easy produce of a dexterous and fantastic logic. Society was for a long while, in its intellectual progress, like a traveller, who, fixing his eye on the point of his departure, keeps steadily in view all its features while he can—reproduces in his imagination such as he can no longer see—and has neither concern nor attention for the objects which surround him, save as by some accidental resemblance they recal the objects he has left. The pure clear landscape of the present, with its broad masses of fertility, its virgin soil, that asked but the slightest tillage, was contemned as an unfruitful waste; while the future seemed but as the prolongation of the desert which the exile must pass in his eternal pilgrimage from home. But the scene has changed,—our long night at the tomb of antiquity is broken, and changed for ever! The spirit song of the past still floats melodiously around us; but our ears are filled with a louder and with a nearer strain—the Pæan of an enfranchised intellect! We look rarely and furtively at the past, for the prejudice of the age is against authority. Our respect is no longer a superstition, but a sentiment;—no longer a subsidy, but "a benevolence." It is a great point gained to be enabled to give up our minds, unfettered and unbiassed, to the investigations of philosophy and science, the interpretation of nature, and the magnificent application of the results of these researches to the increase of the power and the dignity of man. How noble a destiny to be, from the first glimmering of our reason, brought into contact with that active and productive knowledge, which is everywhere scattering its riches over the surface of society—to be no longer immured in a narrow space, splendidly adorned with the remnants of antiquity, but where our voices could awaken no echoes save of the past, and our minds acquire no more than a conjectured knowledge of the present—to receive the revelation, not of other men's minds, but of nature—to possess the key of her oracles—to listen to the wisdom she teaches—and boldly to follow whithersoever she vouchsafes to lead!

Teetotalism is thus intimately connected with the philosophy and wisdom of the present day, because it triumphs over the prejudices of the past, and dares assert an opinion which militates against the usages of antiquity.

THE WINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NOTWITHSTANDING the mighty achievements already wrought by Teetotalism, we cannot but admit that one or two of its first principles are as yet in a crude and undigested state. A true, orthodox, and established code of opinions must be formed; or like a body, whose constituents are divided and opposed, whose foundation is not thoroughly based on commonly-received axioms, it must eventually fall before the subtle and insinuating wiles of sophistry.

A subject so important as the sanction of Scripture is fought for, and ought to be strenuously fought for, by both parties, and the subject should be agitated till for ever set at rest. We wish the Christian public (those especially who oppose our cause) to remember that this subject was involved in mystery and puzzled divines long before Teetotalism was introduced, or at least brought to bear on the community at large.—Commentators, years ago, when discussing those passages that seem to sanction the use of wines, threw out the idea that their nature was materially different from our wines; for they supposed that the ancients, being ignorant of the chemical power of concentrating spirits, were consequently prevented from infusing anything into their liquor to make it stronger than it was from its own fermentation. This proves that it is not Teetotalism alone which is raising any objection to the commonly-received notions on this subject.

• We have been induced, on second thoughts, to enter more fully into the subject than we at first intended. The miracle, wrought by our Saviour, at Cana, will be discussed as soon as we have established our positions.

That our Saviour should have miraculously turned upwards of 100 gallons of water into wine, and that for a small company, puzzled deeply-read and good-minded Christians long since, and led them to doubt the correctness of our translation; and they laid their objections first against the quantity, and, secondly against the quality; at the same time contending they did not invalidate the nature or extent of the miracle. Under the first objection they contended that the word Μετρητας was incorrectly translated "firkins," and that an indefinite quantity was intended. Under the second, they urged the opinion that the word Οινος, wine, was a general term, including in its signification all kinds of wine; and, producing proof that some wines were un-intoxicating, they concluded, that as our Saviour's mission was divinely merciful, they had a right by implication to infer that the wine thus miraculously given was not of an intoxicating nature.

But it is our intention to present to our readers a series of articles on this important subject, wherein we shall collect all that has been or can be said to the purpose; and we solicit our friends to favour us with their ideas as we proceed; and we assure them our columns shall be open to the discussion pro and con.

We shall, in the first place, prepare the way, by laying down, in the simplest form possible, the various Greek words used in the New Testament for the expressions "wine," "old wine," "new wine," "strong drink," and "mixed wine;" appending to each, selections from various parts of the Gospel and Epistles explanatory of their acceptation.

WINE.

Οινος, oinos, (from יין yayin or een), a term for wines of all kinds, whatever might have been their qualities and their ingredients. Examples,—

"John came not drinking wine."—Luke vii. 33.

"Turned the water into wine."—John ii. 3.

"Be not drunk with wine."—Eph. v. 18.

"Take a little wine."—1 Tim. v. 23.

"The wine of wrath."—Rev. xvii. 2.

In all these cases Οινος is used, and it will be evident no particular kind was intended to be specified, but wine of any description; so that there could be no evasion on the one part or deception on the other.

OLD AND NEW WINE.

Luke v. 35. "No man having drunk of old wine straightway desireth new;" the adjectives, Νεος, new, and Παλιος, old, being merely added to the indefinite word Οινος—no particular kind is or can be meant. The expression "new wine" is only used four times in the New Testament—three times by the evangelists when relating the parable above alluded to: Matt. ix. 17, Mark ii. 22, Luke v. 37.

But in Acts ii. 13, "These men are full of new wine," the word Πλεως, full, is used, specifying some particular kind;—for it is rendered in the Latin, dulsis succus, a sweet juice or sirup,* and is supposed to be un-intoxicating; nor does the accusation of drunkenness implied in the words μεμεστωμενοι εστι, "are filled," remove our preconceived notions. For the persons thus accusing the apostles were not Hebrews, but "men out of every nation under heaven," who came there for merchandise; and who, perhaps, judging by the appearance of the poor fishermen of their inability to purchase the costly intoxicating wines, and wishing to bring them to ridicule, exclaimed, "These men are filled with Πλεως!"—that is, we suppose, satirically implying that their brain was so weak that they had actually become intoxicated with that which would not intoxicate a child. For if they had intended to have expressed that which intoxicates, would they have mentioned a liquor, which, at any rate, possessed the least intoxicating power? (See Luke v. 39.) Would they not rather have used some stronger expression, as old wine or strong drink?

STRONG DRINK.

This expression is only used, we believe, once in the New Testament, (Luke i. 15,) "Shall neither drink wine or strong drink," Σικερα (from שכר sicar;) on which word Buxtorf remarks, "It is an inebriating drink which is called Σικερα by the Greeks, and sicera by the Latins. It is distinguished from common wine, Lev. x. 9, Num. vi. 3, and other places. Yet it seems also to include wine in general, as appears from Num. xxviii. 7, where it is used as a libation or drink-offering; to which otherwise the common wines were appropriated. Hence the Chaldee Onkelos, here and elsewhere, renders שכר both old wine and strong drink."

But Kimchi in the same place, says that sicar is more properly a drink made from fruits. Thus also Hieronymus thinks that, in the Hebrew language, every drink that can intoxicate, is called sicar, whether made from fruit or the juice of apples, &c.

FRUIT OF THE VINE.

Γεννημα της αμπελου is used by our Saviour in those ever memorable words, whereby we are commanded to commemorate his death to the end of time. On this point we would offer no remarks whatever which should offend the good taste or religious opinion of any class of individuals, (more especially our coadjutors, the Roman Catholics;) but it is our opinion, (and whilst expressing this idea, we own we are willing to receive correction,) that it is merely a general term, and alludes to the wine most commonly used by his disciples; as, literally, the words do not specify any kind of wines, but merely wines in opposition to "strong drinks."

Lastly,

MIXED WINE.

Ακρατος. We are only aware of one allusion to this in the New Testament; and that in the symbolical language of John in his Revelation. But it cannot for a moment be doubted that the Jews mixed their wines with various ingredients, as is evident by the fact that our Saviour was offered wine or vinegar, mingled with myrrh, or some opiate drug, it is supposed, whereby the dying pangs of malefactors were relieved.

We wish our readers to give the above their most serious consideration; as, in proceeding with the subject, constant reference will be made to the foregoing statements. J. W.

(To be continued.)

THE BANQUET.

WITHOUT being absolutely aware of the fact, many writers both of truth and fiction, place upon record many arguments, which, without the necessity of a very extensive fancy, may be turned as weapons against the evil habits of drinking. What advantages were not taken, in the middle ages, of the intemperate habits of men, to instil a deadly poison into their bodies, through the channel of their cups! There is a scene in a drama of Victor Hugo's which powerfully develops this truth. We shall accordingly extract from Lucrece Borgia the following account of a banquet; merely prefacing the passage by informing our readers that Lucreza Borgia, the Duchess of Ferrara, has been grossly though deservedly insulted by five gentlemen, whom she inveigles to a banquet at the palace of one of her creatures, the Princess Negroni. A youth named Gennaro, is also present, although an uninvited guest at the festivity, in which however he takes but little share. The scene then proceeds thus:—

Maffio. I know not wherefore my blood seems to roll like liquid fire in my veins.

[Donna Lucreza clothed in black, appears suddenly before the guests.]

Donna Lucreza. You are in my house, my lords!

All (except Gennaro). Lucreza Borgia!

Donna Lucreza. It was but a few days ago that you uttered that name in triumph! Now you pronounce it with alarm and horror. O yes!—you may regard me with eyes in which terror is but too visibly depicted. It is well, my lords! I am now come to announce to you—to you five, my lords—that you are poisoned, and that not one of you has another hour to live. Start not—move not! the adjoining chamber is filled with men-at-arms. It is now my turn to speak with the head erect, and to level you with the dust. Jeppo Liveretto, hasten and rejoin your uncle Vitelli, whom I murdered in the dungeons of the Vatican! Ascanio Petrucci, seek your cousin Pandolfo, whom I assassinated to procure his city! Oloferno Vitoloazo, Iago d'Appiani your uncle, whom I poisoned at a feast, awaits you! Maffio Orsini, betake thee to the other world, and there converse of me with thy brother Gravina, whom I ordered to be strangled in his sleep! Apostolo Gazela, I caused your father Francisco to be beheaded, and your cousin Alphonso of Arragon to be put to death, you say: hasten and rejoin them! On my soul, my lords, ye invited me to a ball at Venice: I gave ye a supper at Ferrara. Feast for feast, my lords!

Jeppo. This is an unwelcome interruption to our mirth, Maffio.

Maffio. Let us prepare to stand before our Maker!

Donna Lucreza. Ah! my young friends of the last carnival, ye did not anticipate this! and yet it appears that I know what vengeance is! How silly ye, my lords! does any one of ye know more of vengeance than I? what think ye of this banquet—a banquet offered by a woman? My lords, in the adjacent chamber, there are five priests ready to shrive you; profit by the few moments that remain for you, to save somewhat of your immortal parts. Your souls will be in good keeping. Those holy fathers are the regular confessors of Saint Sextus; and his holiness, the Pope, has allowed them to assist me upon occasions like this. And, oh! if I have taken care for your souls; I have not done the less by your bodies. See! [A curtain at the bottom of the room is drawn aside, and discovers five coffins, each covered with a black velvet pall.] The number is correct: there are five—Ah! young men, ye heap burning ashes on the head of a wretched woman, and ye think that she will not avenge herself! Jeppo, here is your coffin! Maffio, here is yours! Oloferno, Apostolo, Ascanio, here are yours also!

Gennaro (stepping forward). You require a sixth, my lady.

Donna Lucreza. Heavens—Gennaro!

Gennaro. Himself!

Donna Lucreza. Let every one leave this room. We must be alone. Gubetta, whatever may happen—whatever you may hear passing in this chamber—let no one enter!

Gubetta. Your highness's orders shall be obeyed.

[The five friends and the remainder of the guests, make their exit in procession.]

Donna Lucreza. 'Tis he—Gennaro!

[Hymn of the priests heard without.] NISI DOMINUS EDIFICAVERIT DOMUM, IN VANUM LABORANT QUI EDIFICANT EAM.

Donna Lucreza. Once more you, Gennaro? and it is ever upon you that the blows, which I strike, rebound. Heavens, wherefore didst thou join the guests at that banquet?

Gennaro. I suspected every thing.

Donna Lucreza. Once more, you are poisoned. You will die!

Gennaro. I am the arbiter of my own fate: the antidote is in my possession!

Donna Lucreza. True! may God be thanked!

Gennaro. One word—you are expert in these matters. Is there enough elixir in this phial to save those noble lords, whom your priests are about to consign to the tomb?

Donna Lucreza [examining the phial]. There is scarcely enough for you, Gennaro.

Gennaro. You can procure more forthwith!

Donna Lucreza. I gave you all I had.

Gennaro. It is well.

Donna Lucreza. What dost thou? Gennaro? Despatch—and play not with aught so terrible. An antidote is never drunk too soon. Haste—in the name of heaven! I can still favour your egress from the palace by a secret door, known only to me; all may yet be well. To-morrow morning you will be afar from Ferrara. It is now night—horses may speedily be procured. Did not the transactions of this evening strike you with alarm? drink—and depart. You must live—you must save yourself!

Gennaro [seizing a knife]. No, madam—you must die!

Donna Lucreza. What? Speak!

Gennaro. Most treacherously have you poisoned five noble young men—my friends—my best friends; and amongst them, Maffio Orsini, my brother in arms, who saved my life at Vicenza, and against whom all offence and all vengeance are equally felt by me. I repeat—that it is an infamous deed of which you have been guilty, and that I must avenge Maffio and his companions. You must die.

Donna Lucreza. Heaven and earth!

Gennaro. Pray—Oh pray—and let your parting supplication be short. I am poisoned—and have no time to spare.

Donna Lucreza. This cannot be! Oh! no—Gennaro may not—must not be my executioner. It is not possible!

Gennaro. It is possible, madam—and I call God to witness that, were I in your place, I should begin to implore the mercy of heaven in silence, and with clasped hands, and on bended knees.

Donna Lucreza. I tell you it is impossible! Oh! no—not even amongst the most terrible thoughts that harass my imagination—no—that one idea has never yet intruded itself. Ah! you raise the knife! An instant—Gennaro—I have something to reveal.

Gennaro. Haste—Haste!

Donna Lucreza. Throw aside your weapon, unhappy youth: throw it aside, I say! Oh! if you knew—Gennaro, art thou aware of who thou art? Canst thou tell me who I am? thou little thinkest how closely linked together are we! But must I tell thee all? the same blood circulates in our veins, Gennaro! John Borgia, duke of Gandia, was thy father!

Gennaro. And thou art, then, mine aunt?

Donna Lucreza, [aside]. His aunt!

Gennaro. Ah! I am your nephew: and it was my mother, the unfortunate duchess of Gandia, whom all the family of Borgia rendered so unhappy. Madame Lucreza, my mother speaks of you in her letters. You are one of those unnatural relations of whom she makes mention with horror, who slew my father, and who

* The nature and ingredients of the wines of the Hebrews will be entered into more at large in another part of this essay.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

A meeting of the Members and Friends of this Society was held at the Aldersgate-street chapel, on Friday evening, the 17th inst., when in the unavoidable absence of SIR CULLING EARDLY SMITH, the President, the REV. J. H. HINTON, took the Chair, and congratulated the audience that the time had come when Youths were so laudably exerting themselves to stem the torrent of intemperance by the establishment of Youths' Societies for the further prevention of the use of intoxicating drinks.

MR. JOHN HULL, the Vice-President, stated that he felt great pleasure in attending this meeting; he had long been engaged in assisting the progress of the cause of education, but that would be of little avail, unless the principles of this Society also accompanied it.

MR. DONALDSON was gratified at the success which attended this Society; he trusted that all classes would be willing to assist them in their endeavours, for thereby the cause of Christianity would be beneficially promoted, happy homes would be produced, and the rising generation greatly benefited. He had long known the esteemed friend who took the most active part in this Society; he neither received nor wanted pay, but funds were required to enable them to spread their opinions more generally, and he trusted that that night they would receive good encouragement from that meeting.

MASTER SENNINGTON, MR. BRIDLE, MR. BUTEUX, and MASTER PAYNE, then addressed the meeting, each in an eloquent oration on the glorious doctrines and effects of Teetotalism.

MR. R. T. BATGER, the Secretary, stated that assistance had been kindly offered by the REV. C. STOVEL, and the REV. DR. TRACY, and that MR. WALKDEN and the REV. GEORGE EVANS were only prevented attending by other engagements; after which he read an address, stating that since the formation of the Society on the 2nd of January last, they had received the signature of 472 Youths, the majority of whom were believed to be consistent.

MASTER JACQUES, MR. ANDERSON, and MR. CURRIE (of Chelsea), then addressed the meeting; previous to the dispersion of which, twenty-three new members signed the pledge.

We are glad to be informed that the morning following the above meeting, the Secretary was favoured with a communication from Sir Culling Eardly Smith, expressive of his desire to attend a meeting of this Society either on the first or third Monday in August; and we understand they are only waiting to obtain a suitable place previous to the public announcement.

HAGUERSTONE.

The friends of Teetotalism held, as usual, a numerous meeting at the Infant School, on Wednesday evening, July 22nd. Several able speakers addressed the audience. In our next number we shall give a report of the proceedings at the Assembly-room, on Wednesday, July 29th.

CHELSEA.

A numerous meeting of the Teetotalers of Chelsea took place, according to the hebdomadal custom, at the Temperance-hall, Chelsea, on Thursday evening, July 23rd.

MR. BALFOUR, upon being called to take the chair, proceeded to read the pledge, in order to enable those present who might not be Teetotalers, to ascertain the principles that formed the pivot upon which the machinery of the association turned. He then expatiated upon the efficacy of the doctrines of Teetotalism, and energetically called upon those who had not as yet signed the pledge, to come forward and ratify that vow of moral reformation.

MR. GREEN, of Chelmsford, then addressed the meeting. He said that he had once exercised the avocation of a brewer, but that he had abandoned that business from a conviction of its immoral tendency in respect to society.

MR. WESTON, the Honorary Secretary of the United Temperance Association, made one of the most eloquent speeches that ever issued from the lips of this able advocate of the Teetotal cause. He said that he had once been a wine-merchant in an extensive way of business, and that he also had abandoned that avocation in consequence of its tendency to promote the intemperate habits of the people. He expatiated at some length upon the infamous conduct of the publicans in adulterating the liquors which they dispense to their deluded customers, and expounded the principles of that work of adulteration.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, after having advocated at some length the cause of Teetotalism, said he should trouble the meeting with a few observations of an egotistical nature. He had been assailed by many enemies in different directions, since he had signed the Teetotal pledge of the United Temperance Association. He had in a few instances resented the infamous falsehoods that had been circulated concerning him by two or three malicious individuals; and because he did not choose to crouch like a spaniel, he had been again abused. He alluded to certain paragraphs which he had penned in the "Notices to Correspondents" of No. 4, of "The Teetotaler" Journal, and which would not have appeared had not he (Mr. Reynolds) received gross provocation and uncalled-for aggression in the first instance. He did not seek a quarrel with any man; on the contrary, he would exert himself in every way to serve a fellow-creature; but he would not tolerate the attempts of those, who pretended to be Christians and religious men, to injure him. He abominated a religious hypocrite, and should not hesitate to expose him.

MR. CURRIE closed the meeting in a most able speech, in which he narrated the beneficial effects, both moral and domestic, which he had experienced from Teetotalism. He called upon all the Teetotalers to join in one bond of union, and to abstain from intestine dissensions which would only bear out the scriptural proverb, "that a house cannot stand against itself."

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The Aldersgate-street Chapel, on the occasion of the meetings of the members of this Association, is invariably crowded with a most respectable audience. It is really exceedingly interesting to behold the neatness of attire displayed by the wives of the Teetotalers who are present at these assemblies. The most determined opponent to the doctrine of total abstinence, could not view without emotion the numbers of respectable persons—happy families, sober husbands and thrifty wives—that fill the pews of the Aldersgate-street Chapel on Wednesday and Saturday evenings. Such an opponent would feel convinced that there must be something correct in that principle which has turned squalor and poverty into cleanliness and respectability—disease into health—sorrow into joy—and dissipation into rectitude and morality.

On Saturday evening, July 25th,

MR. BROWN was called to the chair. This gentleman made a neat and appropriate speech upon the beneficial effects of that doctrine which would regenerate the degraded portion of the human race.

MR. CRUMP, Registrar to the United Temperance Association, addressed the meeting on the same subject, and explained the satisfactory results of his own experience in the Teetotal cause.

MR. DAVIS said that Teetotalism had worked so complete a reformation in him, that it had transformed him into a moral and upright character (he hoped) from a degraded condition, in which he had been almost lost, mentally and bodily.

MR. JOYCE, a merchant of Addele-street, made a short but appropriate speech upon signing the pledge-book that evening.

MR. MEE addressed the assembly in a most eloquent speech, which elicited unequivocal applause from all present. He entered elaborately into the principles of adulterating liquors by the publicans, and quoted instances of landlords having been fined for such exploits. He drew a striking comparison between the happiness resulting from total abstinence and the miseries produced by intemperance. Whichever way we glance (said Mr. Mee), we see the baneful effects of intoxication. The ruin of Nineveh, of Babylon, of Carthage, of Rome, and of Greece, was brought about by dissipation and unbridled intemperance. There are now seventy thousand prostitutes walking the streets of London—and nearly all were degraded to that unhappy state by the use of strong drink. There are a hundred and sixty-three thousand people who are annually sent to the hospitals—and the primary cause of whose maladies, or the aggravation of them, is intoxicating drink. There is a stream of alcohol rolling through the land, and that stream is thirty feet wide, three feet deep, and a hundred and sixty-eight miles long. It is not therefore prematurely devised by the Teetotalers to propagate those doctrines which will remove so many sources of misery, disease, crime, and ruin.

MR. BENSTEAD pursued the line of argument he had commenced on the previous Saturday, and afforded several striking illustrations of the evil effects of intemperance upon the human frame, and its properties. He showed that intemperance destroys the acuteness of those sensations which are denominated the five senses; and that the use of intoxicating drinks is the most baneful enemy to the reasoning faculties, and to the nerves, which can possibly exist. Sight—hearing—feeling—smelling—and speaking, are all faculties upon the healthy tone of which more or less depends human comfort and felicity. But strong drinks (said Mr. Benstead) undermine all the mental properties of those faculties, and disorder the machinery of the noblest work of the Creator.

MR. ANKINS begged to inform the meeting that a Benefit Society, for Teetotalers, had been established in Bethnal Green, and that he was the founder of it. He had now the pleasure of observing that a similar institution was shortly to be established at Thompson's Coffee-house.

EAST LONDON TEMPERANCE HALL, CHURCH ROW, BETHNAL GREEN.

The Bethnal Green Branch of the United Temperance Association, held its weekly meeting at this place, on Monday evening, July 27th.

MR. THOMSON, who was called to the chair, after explaining the motive of the meeting, proceeded to show the necessity of adopting the principles of Total Abstinence from intoxicating drinks. He spoke in a very plain but forcible manner, and seemed to make a great impression.

plunged the youth of her, that gave me birth, in misery and blood! Oh! I have more than my father to avenge—I have my mother also! you are my aunt—and I am a Borgia! Oh! the idea is maddening—maddening! Listen, Donna Lucreza Borgia, you have lived a long time, and you are so sullied with vice and impurity, that you ought to be almost loathsome to yourself. You are doubtless tired of existence—are you not?—If so, terminate it. In families like our's, where crime, being hereditary, descends from father to son, as well as the ancestral name, it always happens that this fatality is brought to a crisis by a murder, and that generally the murder of a relation—a murder which, as a last act of turpitude, excels all the rest. A gentleman has never been reproached because his genealogical tree bears one sullied branch. Mudarra, the Spaniard, slew his uncle, Rodriguez of Lara, for far less than thou hast done. That Spaniard was praised by all for having killed his uncle: dost thou hear me, aunt? Come, then, enough upon this subject! recommend your soul to God, if you believe in God and the existence of a soul!

Donna Lucreza. Gennaro, have mercy upon yourself! thou art as yet innocent. Commit not this crime!

Gennaro. A crime! Oh! my head wanders—confusion seizes upon my brain. Is it a crime? and if it be a crime—shall I not dare commit it? Ridiculous—I am a Borgia, I am: therefore, on your knees, I say—on your knees, aunt—on your knees—on your knees!

Donna Lucreza. Sayest thou what thou meanest, dear Gennaro? Is it thus that thou repayest my love to thee?

Gennaro. Love?

Donna Lucreza. It is impossible! I must save thee from thyself—I must call for help.

Gennaro. Thou wilt not open this door—thou shalt not make an effort to summon assistance hither! and as for your cries—they are useless. Didst thou not thyself ere now command that none should break in upon our privacy?

Donna Lucreza. Oh! that is cowardly, Gennaro—that is cowardly—to slay a woman—a woman without defence—Oh! you have sentiments more noble than those, in your soul, Gennaro. Listen, and thou shalt kill me afterwards, if thou wilt: I do not cling to life—but my bosom must be discharged of all the agony which now fills it—the amount of its misery is increased by the way in which you treat me now. You are young, child—and youth is always severe. Oh! if I must die, I will not fall by thine hand. It is not possible—I may not meet my death by thy weapon. Thou knowest not thyself how terrible that would be. Besides, Gennaro—my hour is not yet come. It is true, I have been guilty of a thousand crimes—I am very criminal; and it is because I am so great a criminal, that I must have time to recollect myself and repent. Thus must it be, Gennaro!

Gennaro. You are my aunt. What have you done with my mother?

Donna Lucreza. Stay—stay. O God—I cannot tell thee all at once, and were I even to tell thee all, I should but perhaps redouble thy horror and contempt for me. Listen an instant. Oh! how I wish you would receive me penitent at your feet! You will spare my life—will you not? Would you have me take the veil? Shall I shut myself up in a cloister? Were the world to say to you, "That unhappy woman has shaven her head—she sleeps upon ashes—she digs her grave with her own hands—she prays to God night and day, not for herself, but for thee—she who so much requires the mercy of heaven, and you who need it not! All this she does, that wretched woman, in order that one day a single glance of pity from your eye may fall upon her, that one of your tears may heal the wounds of her lacerated heart, and that you may no longer say to her in that voice which is more severe than the last judgment of the Eternal, 'YOU ARE LUCREZA BORGIA!'"—if all this were told to you, Gennaro, shouldst thou have the heart to repulse me? O pardon—pardon—do not kill me, my Gennaro! Let us both live—you to pardon me; I to repent! Have some compassion upon me; for it is of no avail to banish pity from your breast, when a miserable woman is at your feet imploring that pity! Pity—Oh pity—pardon—pardon—pity! Besides, Gennaro—I say it for your sake—the deed would be cowardly in the extreme—a terrible crime—a murder—an assassination! a man to slay a woman—a man who is the stronger! Oh; you cannot—you cannot!

Gennaro. Madam—

Donna Lucreza. Oh! I comprehend you!—you have pardoned me, I read my pardon in your eyes. Oh! now let me weep at your feet.

A voice within. Gennaro!

Gennaro. Who calls?

The voice. My dear brother—Gennaro.

Gennaro. It is Maffio!

The voice. Gennaro—I die! Vengeance on my murderer!

Gennaro, [raising his knife.] I am resolved—I will now hear no more. You understand me, madam—you must die!

Donna Lucreza, [holding the arms of Gennaro.] Pardon—pardon! a word—a word.

Gennaro. Not one!

Donna Lucreza. Pity—and listen to me!

Gennaro. Not a moment.

Donna Lucreza. In the name of God!

Gennaro, [stabbing her.] No—no!

Donna Lucreza. Oh! thou hast killed me! Gennaro—I am thy mother!

MR. GLENNY then addressed the meeting in a very able speech, adducing instances of the ill effects of intoxicating drink as regards the health of working men in general, especially of journeymen bakers.

MR. CRUMP, the Registrar of the United Temperance Association, then addressed the meeting. He painted in a very feeling and forcible manner the evils of drunkenness, in many shapes, with the comforts to be derived from adopting the principles of the Society. He sat down amidst the applause of a very crowded meeting, the members of which seemed to appreciate the truth of the arguments adduced by this staunch and tried friend to the Teetotal cause.

GEORGE APPLEDATE, the Coal Whipper, then made a very forcible appeal to the feelings of working men assembled, upon the necessity of giving up their habit of drinking.

[Having received the following communication from our esteemed President, we hasten to lay it before our readers.]

To G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Esq.

Dear Friend:—I contemplate the goodness of God towards me, and others of my fellow creatures, in purifying our minds and our bodies in so miraculous a manner, by the graces and adornment of Temperance. I feel that we ought to show our thankfulness in every acceptable way in our power: in this I am sure you will concur, and it would rejoice me very much to have a day of public thanksgiving appointed throughout this part of the world, that we may simultaneously praise the Lord for the greatest blessing that we have seen in our day,—a blessing enjoyed by us and offered to all. Blessed be the Name of the Lord, henceforth for ever. Amen.

It would be presumptuous to appoint a distant day, for no man knoweth the day appointed for him to die.

Yours very truly,
JOHN BILTON.

1, King's-Road, Gray's Inn, July 21st, 1840.

TEETOTALISM IN ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

Extract of a letter recently received from a stone-mason, formerly of Chichester.

"The Rev. T. Q. Stow, the Independent minister, lent us his Chapel for our first total abstinence meeting; we had about ninety sat down to tea, and the chapel was well filled when we addressed the meeting. At the close of the proceedings twenty-four signed the pledge. I bless God he enabled me to advocate our noble cause for nearly an hour, fearlessly. It is very hot weather here at this time, but the Teetotalers are better able to stand this hot climate than the tipplers by far. We are about to build a place to meet in, and for a temperance hotel. We have just had eight Teetotalers landed on our shore, two of them are at work for me. I hope the Lord will raise up among us some able and wealthy men, as this meeting has fallen very heavy on me; but, thank God, I have been able to bear it, as I am not at a loss for a few pounds."

REVIEWS.

Bacchus. An Essay on the Nature, Causes, Effects, and Cure, of Intemperance. By RALPH BARNES GRINDROD. Third thousand. 8vo. pp. 535. London: J. Pasco.

(FIRST NOTICE.)

This excellent work was originated by an advertisement put forth by the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, and offering a premium of one hundred guineas to that author who should produce the best essay upon the benefits of Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Drinks. Mr. Grindrod's work was adjudicated as the successful essay, and the approval of public opinion has since appeared to ratify that of private arbitration.

Before we enter into a detailed review of this extraordinary work, we cannot refrain from expressing our surprise at the publication of one of the unsuccessful essays. We allude to Anti-Bacchus, which, although a very clever book, should not have been issued to the world, considering that it was rejected by the adjudicators of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society. A sentiment of delicacy, in respect to the successful candidate—if not of modesty in respect to himself—should have induced the author of Anti-Bacchus to have withheld his work from the public, or at least to have postponed its issue to a distant period. It is evident that Mr. Grindrod has not been fairly treated in this respect: but as we are totally unacquainted with any of the collateral circumstances of the transaction, but argue merely from our own impression, we shall not extend our observations on this head.

The contents of Bacchus are so varied that it will be impossible to do justice to the work in one article in The Teetotaler. We shall accordingly devote our review-columns this week to a notice of the first part, which contains six chapters. These chapters are devoted to disquisitions upon the nature and characteristics of intemperance—the history of intemperance, and its connexion with religion—intemperance, considered in a rational point of view—and the effects of intemperance on the moral and intellectual powers. Mr. Grindrod commences his work with the following observation.

The term INTEMPERANCE, according to its general signification, is indefinite and unsatisfactory. In the present day, however, it is almost exclusively and universally employed in reference to excess in the use of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. Grindrod understands the great difficulty in tracing any definite line between the use and abuse of intoxicating drinks, and adduces some singular facts to illustrate the various opinions held by different writers and societies at different times upon this subject. He then places upon record the incontestable fact "that that part of the community which is in general termed temperate, consumes a larger proportion of inebriating liquor, than those individuals who are usually denominated drunkards." Mr. Grindrod then makes the following striking observations:—

The universal tendency of intoxicating liquors is to debilitate the intellectual and to deprave the moral powers of man. The habitual use of alcohol in any of its varied combinations, strengthens the powers of motives to do wrong, and weakens the power of motives to do right. The nature and tendency of strong drink are such, that mankind in general cannot continue long to indulge in the moderate use of it. From the earliest period of its introduction to the present time, these evidences of its nature and character have been uniform and certain.

It is very certain that the use of intoxicating drink produces an unnatural excitement, of which a species of intellectual delusion is one of the chief characteristics. When labouring under the effects of this delusion, the most upright and honest men may be led to the commission of crimes at the mere names of which they would shudder in their cooler moments. We do not fear contradiction, when we assert our conviction that very few individuals are so naturally depraved as to commit a murder or any other heinous crime, save at those periods when they labour under the unnatural excitement produced by strong drinks. Mr. Grindrod says that Entire nations are known to have existed for ages in a state of comparatively superior health, comfort, and happiness, without the aid of intoxicating liquors. When first offered to the inhabitants of those countries, they have, in general, evinced considerable aversion to their use, and have been reconciled to the practice only by a conformity to the habits and persuasions of those civilized nations who had seduced them into the destructive vice of intoxication. A corresponding illustration of this statement may be found in the fact that young persons, and in particular children, almost universally exhibit signs of repugnance, when first induced to taste of any kind of intoxicating liquor; which indications of disgust are not manifested when they partake of the almost unlimited varieties of nutritious food.

A note appended to this paragraph, and quoted from Mr. Buckingham, informs us that one-fifth of the entire population of the globe are abstainers from all intoxicating liquors—"a number sufficiently large to show that they are not necessary to human existence, health, or enjoyment." The habit of producing excitement by intoxicating drinks, grows on us by degrees, and is not adopted on a sudden as any real means of gratification would be. This fact shows us that nature revolts against such measures, and that nature is only forced to submission by the arbitrary and perverse powers of human volition. Habit possesses the peculiar faculty of rendering disagreeable things welcome to us; "it is however the business of rational beings," says Dr. Garnett, quoted by Mr. Grindrod, "to discriminate carefully between the real wants of nature, and the artificial calls of habit."

We regret to find that so talented and enlightened a man as Mr. Grindrod should have quoted such a piece of rubbish as the following remarks by the Rev. Dr. Hewitt of America:—

The common people of France (says Dr. Hewitt,) are burnt up with wine, and look exactly like the cyder-brandy drinkers of Connecticut and the N. E. drinkers of Massachusetts. If they do not drink to absolute stupefaction or intoxication, it is because sensuality with Frenchmen is a science and a system. They drink to just that point at which their moral sense and judgment are laid asleep, but all their other faculties remain awake. Hence all the horrors of the French Revolution!

The Editor of The Teetotaler can give an unqualified contradiction to the statements made in this paragraph, both from personal observation and from a perfect acquaintance with the French character, in consequence of a long residence in France. The lower orders of the French are particularly sober—especially in the "wine-countries," and as for their being burnt up with the piquette, or small wine which is their beverage, the assertion only shows Dr. Hewitt's ignorance of even the nature of their liquor. The Rev. commentator on the French also manifests his ignorance of French history, when he alludes to the horrors of the revolution. Those horrors were committed by the chiefs individually, under mistaken notions of the necessity of exterminating the old generation, and not by the masses generally. The French, as a nation, are a sober people; and, in Paris, or any of the large cities or towns, it is a rare occurrence to see a French gentleman in a state of intoxication.

The chapter denominated "The History of Intemperance" is a learned narrative of the rise and progress of that dreadful evil, from the times of Noah and Lot up to the present day. The author diverges into the histories of the intemperance of all states and climes, and calls to his aid a mass of valuable authorities. Throughout this portion of his work, Mr. Grindrod has manifested the most patient spirit of investigation, and the most unwearied labour of research.

(To be continued.)

The London Teetotal Magazine. Number for July. London: George Wightman.

This is a very useful publication, and is well compiled. Its contents are varied, and the editor endeavours to render the truths of Teetotalism more apparent through the means of amusing fictions. We extract the following useful recipe:—

EXCELLENT TEMPERANCE BARM.—The following receipt may be relied on, as it has been tried for a period of two years in the potteries with the greatest success, fully answering the purposes required.

Put one ounce of hops into a coarse bag, and boil them in two quarts of water; pare, boil, and mash well one pound of potatoes, and press them through a cullender into the hop water. Place the mixture on a fire until it begins to boil, then empty it into an earthen vessel with a narrow bottom, in which there has been previously mixed half a pound of flour, with a gill of cold water in the form of paste; stir it well while pouring in, and when it is about the warmth of new milk, add one ounce of dry flour, and one pound of teetotal barm, or, if that cannot be had, half a pound of common yeast; let it stand in the vessel, covered up, in a situation where it will keep its temperature.

It will take from four to twenty-four hours to ferment, according to the state of the weather. When it begins to lower in the vessel it is fit for immediate use; and may be preserved, bottled, and corked, for several weeks; and even should it be frozen, it will be no worse after being thawed. If you have no barm with you, make a quart as above directed except in this particular; instead of putting any barm with the dry flour into the mixture, put two or three spoonfuls of sugar with the flour,—bottle it immediately, tie down the cork, set it where it will keep warm, and in twenty-four or thirty hours this will answer to ferment with, instead of the common barm: but it is always better to preserve some of the old for this purpose.

Directions for Use.—Take twelve or fourteen pounds of flour; when you have mixed the salt with it in the kneading vessel, as is usual, make a hole in the middle, and pour in one pound of the yeast. Let the water for kneading be two parts of boiling to one of cold, in winter, and in summer, equal quantities, (soft water;) when the dough is of proper consistence, cover it up, and keep it warm while it rises, which will probably be from five to ten hours. If kneaded at night it will be ready for baking in the morning; but if not then ready, (having been kept too cool,) apply a hot iron plate under the vessel containing the dough, and in a short time it will be fit for baking.

On Stimulants. Extracted from "Life, Health, and Disease," by EDWARD JOHNSON, Surgeon, Second Two Thousand. London: G. F. Cooper.

We strongly recommend this little pamphlet to all our friends and readers. A Teetotaler has by permission made the extract from Mr. Johnson's very valuable work, and we are rejoiced to see, by the announcement on the title-page, that the speculation has answered so well. While novels and romances are selling by hundreds, Teetotal publications are selling by thousands. A work by Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer does not obtain a circulation of more than fifteen hundred copies: and we can assert upon authority the fact that three thousand copies of "Bacchus," by Mr. Grindrod, have already been disposed of. The following curious experiment is worth extracting from the pamphlet On Stimulants :—

Now, if you evaporate a glass of wine on a shallow plate, whatever solid matter it contains will be left dry upon the plate; and this will be found to amount to about as much as may be laid on the extreme point of a penknife blade; and a portion—by no means all, but a portion of this solid matter, I will readily concede, is capable of nourishing the body—a portion which is about equal to one-third of the flour contained in a single grain of wheat.

Pocket Diary. With Life and Annuity Tables of the National Endowment and Assurance Society. Arthur Street, West, London Bridge.

We are induced to notice this little publication, because it affords us an opportunity of recommending our Teetotal friends to lay out the money which they save by their abstinence from intoxicating drinks, in securing a sum to their families at their death. The little work before us, says—

When Life Assurance is as universally understood and practised as it ought to be, he who has not made such a provision, or something equivalent, for the possibility of his death, will, we verily trust, be looked on as a no less detestable monster than he who will not work for his children's bread, and his memory after death will be held in no less contempt.

We concur with these observations, and pronounce Insurance Companies to be prominent amongst the greatest blessings afforded us by civilization. Upon an average, only one family in sixty-two is provided against an event which in the course of nature must happen, and which, happen when it may, must be a serious blow to the survivors. The National Endowment Office is peculiarly suited to the views of poor men, because it allows the premium upon policies to be paid in weekly instalments. We shall quote an example of the efficacy of life insurance :—

EXAMPLE.—A person aged 25 may assure the sum of £100, to be paid to his wife and family at his decease, should that occur within one year, by a Premium of £1; if within seven years, by an Annual Premium of £1. 2s.; or whenever the decease may happen, at an Annual Premium of £2. 0s. 6d.; being, in the latter instance, but little more than 9d. a week; and so in proportion for any other amount. Thus £2000 may be assured for one year, by the payment of £20, or for the whole of life, by the payment of £40. 10s. annually.

WEEKLY LIST OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS HELD IN AND NEAR THE METROPOLIS.

Chair taken at 8 o'clock unless otherwise announced.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society holds two large meetings every Wednesday and Saturday, at the Aldersgate street Chapel, at 8 o'clock; a third on Monday, at the School room, Aylesbury st., Clerkenwell; and a fourth on the same Evening at the East London Temperance Hall, Church row, Bethnalgreen-road.

The Rev. Wm. Curtis, will preach two Sermons at Aldersgate Chapel,—Morning and Evening Service.

SUNDAY.

Aldersgate st. Chapel. Service at 11 and 6½, and Sunday School at 9, and 2½.
Temperance room, Young st. Kensington. Prayer meeting at 3 King st., Lambeth walk, at 9
Cumberland market, 9
Public Prayer-meeting, Rockingham House, at 3
New Cut, Lambeth, half-past 4
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. Preaching—Morning, at 11. Evening, 6½
Ditto, Enon Chapel, Clare-market, at 11, 3, 6½
Borough market, at 7 in the morning
White Stiles, King's road, Chelsea, 3
Temperance Room, Kent st. Borough, Evening at 6
IN THE OPEN AIR.
Open space, Saffron-hill, at 8.—Red-Lion-Market—Opposite the Alma-Houses, Mile-end-road—Broadway, Westminster, at 9—

Behind Brunswick terrace, Well st. Hackney—Clerkenwell grn.—Islington green—Starch green, near Shepherd's bush—Open space, Cartwright st., Rosemary lane,—Salisbury st., Portman market at 3—Stepney green at 4—Weymouth ter. Hackney at 6
Shepherdess-fields, Islington, United Temp. Association, at 3

MONDAY.

School-room, Aylesbury st. Clerkenwell, United Temp. Asso.
Angel Alley, Bishopsgate, Metropolitan Rom. Catholic Association
Robinson's School room, Whiting st., Waterloo road
The Chapel, Castle st., Saffron-hill
School-room, Orange-st-Chapel, Leicester square
School-room, High st., Stoke-newington, at 7½
School-room, Deverell st. Chapel-yard, Dover road
Temperance Hall, Chelsea, New-road, back of Sloane st.
Temperance rm., Fleur-de-lis Court, Fetter lane. Prayer meeting
William street-Chapel, Portland town
Southwark Academy, Union st. Borough. Females at 6, Public meeting at 8
School-room, Hare st., Bethnal green. Youths only
Enon Chapel, New-Church-st., Portman market
Aldersgate-street Chapel
Soho Branch, at Orange-st. Chapel School-rooms
Mariners' Church, Wellclose square
Ebenezer Chapel, Church-lane, Whitechapel
Rayner's Temperance Coffee-room, Broadway, Westminster.
Females at 6, Public meeting at 8
Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton St.

TUESDAY.

Aldersgate-street Chapel. Catholic Association
Harp Alley School-room, Farringdon st.
School-room, opposite the Workhouse, Bethnal green
Baptist Chapel, Northampton st., Somers' Town
School-room, London-lane, Hackney
Ebenezer Chapel, Old street road
Mr. Lyon's School rooms, No. 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meeting of members for Roman Catholics only.
Temperance room, back of Kentish Waggoners, Kent st. Boro'
Catholic Free School, George st., St. Giles
Derby-st., School room, Rosemary-lane
South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catholic Association
Temperance room, Young st., Kensington
School-room, York st., Walworth. For Females only at 6
Rockingham House, New Kent road
Ebenezer Chapel, Church lane, Whitechapel
School room, Grafton st., Fitzroy square
Providence Chapel, Princes st., Great Garden-st., Whitechapel
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster
British School room, Stratford, 7½
Chelsea Temperance Hall
Jerusalem Coffee-house, Jerusalem-passage, Clerkenwell. Youths
School-room, Ship-yard, Wardour st. Females every 2nd and 4th Tuesday in the month School-room, Johnson's street, Tower st., Westminster road.
Females at 6. General meeting at 8

WEDNESDAY.

Aldersgate st. Chapel, United Temperance Association
School-room, Little Chamber's st., Goodman's Field
School-room, Oxford-buildings, Oxford st.
Haggerstone. Infants' School-room, near the Bridge
Chelsea Temperance Hall. Catholic Total-Abstinence Society
Temperance Hall, Hampstead
Ivy lane, Hoxton. Females only at 6. Public meeting at 8
Temperance-rooms, Fleur-de-lis Court, Fetter-lane. Females at 6, Public meeting at 8
Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide square., Shepperton st. New North Road, Islington.
Pepperell's Coffee-house, White-cross-street. Females only at 7
Mr. Knight's School room, Cambridge road. Youths only 7½
Rockingham House New Kent road. Youths
Fisher st. School room, Red Lion square
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster. 6 to 7, For Females only. Public meeting at 8
Eastfield st., Limehouse Fields. Youths
Bayham terrace Chapel, Camden Town
Wesleyan Chapel, Wandsworth, at 7
Albert Coffee room, 1, Crown Court, Crown st., Finsbury
Phoenix Coffee-house, Milton st. Youths

THURSDAY.

Chapel, Aldersgate street
Union Coffee-House, Golden lane
Chapel House Academy, Vauxhall row
Wesley Association Chapel, Giffin st., Deptford
Mr. Lyon's School rooms, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Meeting of the Catholic Association
Mariners' Church, Wellclose Square
South London Temperance Hall, near the Elephant & Castle
School room, 51½, Union st. Borough. Females only from 6 to 8, for Males from 8 to 10
School-room, Nelson st. Windmill lane, Camberwell. Females only at 6, Public Meeting at 8
School-room, Manor road, Parrock st., Gravesend
Temperance-rooms, Paradise st., Rotherhithe
British School-room, Ship yard, Wardour st.
British School. George st., Regent st., Lambeth walk
Chelsea Temperance Hall
Ebenezer Chapel, Church lane, Whitechapel
Rayner's Temperance Coffee-rooms, Broadway, Westminster
Railway Coffee-house, 49, Church st., Shoreditch
Albion Coffee-rooms, Pockock fields, Islington. Youths

FRIDAY.

Harp Alley School-room, Farringdon st.
Wesleyan Chapel, Webster st., Blackfriars. Members meeting
Broker-row, Mint, Borough
Subscription School-room, Church st., Islington
School-room, Wick st., Hackney
Angel Alley, Bishopsgate. Females at 6, Public-meeting at 8
Chapel, Upper Ogle st., Fitzroy square
School-room, London lane, Hackney. Youths only
Williams's Coffee-house, Staines road, Hounslow
South London Temperance Hall. Roman Catholic Association
School-room, Charles st., Dalston
Railway Coffee-house, 49 Church st., Shoreditch. Youths only—7½
Enon Temperance Chapel, St. Clement's lane, Clare Market
Temperance-room, Kent st., Borough

SATURDAY.

Aldersgate-st. Chapel. United Temperance Association
Lyon's School-room, 44, Ratcliffe-highway. Social Meeting of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Association
Rockingham House, New Kent Road
Snead's Coffee-house, Ethan place, Boro'. Social meeting
Temperance Chapel, Broadway, Westminster
Rayner's Tem. Coffee-rm., Broadway, Westminster, mem. meet.
Temp. Coffee room, 86, Waterloo road, Lambeth. Mem. meeting.
Stanbope Coffee house, 73, Turnmill st., Social meeting

The Secretaries of the various Societies are particularly requested to correct the above list.

RECHABITE MEETINGS.

Southern Counties Brotherhood of Rechabites.
Aug. 6th.—Tent of the Star of Temperance, 35, Drury-lane.
—13th.—Tent of Jonadab, 73, Turnmill-street.
—14th.—Tent of John the Baptist, 74, Blackman-st, Boro'.
—17th.—Tent of the good Samaritan, Temperance Coffee-house, Camden-street, Islington.

Independent Order of Rechabites.

"Samson Tent," 86, Waterloo-road, Lambeth, Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock.
"British Metropolitan Tent," 157, High-street, Shadwell, Thursday evening, 8 o'clock.
"City of London Tent," Dennis's Coffee-house Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell, Wednesday Evening, 8 o'clock.

DURHAM PARK, GRAND GALA.

AUGUST 10th, 1839.

The Members and Friends of the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION are respectfully informed, that every arrangement will be made by the Committee to accommodate them with conveyances on the above occasion. Tickets may be had of the Committee at Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday and Saturday evenings.

W. H. WESTON, Secretary.

The Teetotalers of Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Bedfordshire, are respectfully informed that the talented Advocate of the "United Temperance Association," MR. JAMES MEE, will visit the above Counties immediately, and our friends in those parts will do well to avail themselves of his valuable services.

MR. GAWTHORP, the talented Advocate of the United Temperance Association, will be present at the Chapel on Saturday Evening, when he will give an account of his visit to the North, &c.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE MEMBERS are respectfully informed that the next QUARTERLY MEETING OF MEMBERS will be held at ALDERSGATE CHAPEL,

On WEDNESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 5th.

at half-past Seven o'clock,—for Renewal of Cards, and on other SPECIAL BUSINESS.—Members must produce their Cards at the door.

28th July, 1840.

H. W. WESTON, Secretary.

Public Meeting at Nine o'clock.

This day is published, price 6d.

THE LAST DAY OF A CONDEMNED,

Translated from the French of Victor Hugo,

By GEORGE W. M. RYLANDS.

GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, OLD BAILEY.

FATHER MATHEW.

THIS day is published, executed in the very best style of Zincography, from the pen of that celebrated Artist, AUGUSTUS BUTLER, Esq., and printed at the press of C. CHABOT, the most

SPLENDID PICTURESQUE PORTRAIT

OF THE ABOVE CHAMPION OF TEETOTALISM, EVER PRODUCED IN ENGLAND.

The Drawing exhibits FATHER MATHEW encircled in a splendidly executed Wreath, emblematical of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales; to which is appended a beautifully executed Drawing of the Card of Membership of the Teetotalers of our Sister Kingdom, embodying their unique and appropriate Medal, exhibiting at one view a most interesting Picture suitable either for the Parlour, Drawing-room, or humble Domestic of any Teetotaler.

TO BE GIVEN GRATIS.

On the 1st of August, with No. 6, of

THE LONDON TEETOTAL MAGAZINE,

AND LITERARY MISCELLANY.

Price Sixpence.

Early application must be made for this Number, to ensure a supply, as a limited impression only will be taken. With the usual Teetotal and Literary matter, of which there will be 40 closely printed pages, will be given,

A Biography of the Rev. Theobald Mathew.

Teetotalism not sectarian.
The First Speech of Daniel O'Connell, M.P., at the south London Catholic Temperance Society. (By our own Reporter.)

The Speeches at the Great Meeting in Exeter Hall, On Monday the 6th of July, with all the usual Intelligence, Literary, Scientific, and Domestic.

LONDON:—GEORGE WIGHTMAN, 24, Paternoster Row; Sold at the Journal Office, 12, Bulls'-head Court, Newgate street, and by all Booksellers.

CHURCH STREET, HACKNEY. A

SINGLE GENTLEMAN may be accommodated with a BED-ROOM FURNISHED, with or without partial BOARD. Also the FIRST FLOOR TO LET UNFURNISHED. Terms moderate. There are no children; and Omnibuses pass and repass every quarter of an hour. Apply (if by letter, pre-paid) to MR. HURGES, Straw Bonnet Manufacturer, 10, Church Street, Hackney, opposite Morning Lane.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers.

To THE TRADE.—Back Numbers changed.

London:—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 7.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

THIS "TEETOTALER" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Chertside: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 38, Red-Cross-Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER VIII.

LIFE IN LONDON.

It was then about ten o'clock in the evening; and London was all bustle and light. The honest portion of society had desisted from its labours: and the toils of the bad began. The merchant, the clerk, and the tradesman had given up the avocations of the day; and the adventurer, the thief, the prostitute, and the gamester commenced their pursuits with all the ardour that is usually manifested in a good cause. Then the poor houseless wanderer begs the charity of the passenger with more assurance, because the partial darkness of the hour conceals his face, and because the prospect of sleeping in the streets fortifies his courage to do that at which his soul revolts. A strange contrast to that shivering mendicant is the lady of pleasure—clad in gay attire, bedecked with ribands, her cheeks covered with rouge to supply that hue which dissipation has taken away—and arraying her countenance in all the smiles usually worn by happiness and contentment. The lot of the beggar is preferable to that of the fallen girl: the former may be loathed by an uncharitable world; the latter is loathed both by the world and by herself!

Victor was led by his chaperon along Fleet-street and the Strand, to Leicester-square; and

Mr. Tibbatts did not fail to call his companion's attention to everything worthy of the observation of a novice upon London. When they reached Leicester-square, the guide knocked at a door over which a lamp burnt brightly. The summons was immediately answered by a domestic in very shabby livery; and Tibbatts, without making any enquiry, led the way to a room on the first floor, where a scene, to our hero quite new, suddenly broke upon his sight.

In the midst of this room, to the windows of which there were dingy red curtains, was a large oval table, covered with green cloth; and the green cloth itself seemed to be embellished with certain cabalistic lines and divisions, which were evidently of great use to those who were seated or standing round the table. On each side of this table, at the flattened parts of the oval, sat a shabby ill-looking man, both with wooden rakes in their hands, and large green shades over their eyes to protect them from the glare of the lamp which was suspended immediately over the centre of the table. Before one of these persons was a tin box containing money, and which Victor understood to be denominated the "Bank;" and four or five other individuals were engaged in playing at the game called "Hazard." One was a young man, with a very pale countenance, sunken eyes, and hollow cheeks, and who drank gin-and-water as he attempted the chances of the game. Chances! there are no chances at "Hazard;" but there are certainties—and they are all in favour of the "Bank," which in process of time must possess itself of all the capital advanced against it. This young man however played desperately; and each time he lost was signalized by a new draught of spirits-and-water.

The money staked at this gambling-house was only silver; and Mr. Tibbatts informed our hero that it was therefore called a "Silver Hell."

"There are several magnificent establishments of this kind, upon a very grand scale, and where only gold is staked, at the West End," said the chaperon; "but here my shabby coat is not noticed, and it would be there. Besides, it is easier to obtain a lesson from life in these minor dens, than in the larger pandemoniums of infamy. Watch that pale-faced young man!"

Victor glanced again towards the youth whom he had before noticed, and saw that he was now deeply agitated. He plunged his hands desperately into every pocket, and found nothing more to stake. In the course of an hour, as it appeared from an observation which he suffered to fall from his lips, he had lost about ten pounds in stakes of a few shillings each; and then an old man, who was sitting close by one of the croupiers, and who was busily engaged in pricking a card (a method by which he calculated the chances of the game) coolly informed the young gambler that he deserved to lose his money for having played it so recklessly. Impatient of receiving advice on such an occasion, the young man threw the remnants of his gin-and-water into the face of the old one; and in a moment all was riot and confusion. The croupiers called to order, while they kept a fast hold upon the tin box; and Tibbatts, fearing to be compromised in the disturbance, should the police visit the house, desired Victor to follow him away from the den.

"Well—what think you of the first scene in the great drama of London life?" enquired Tibbatts, when he and our hero were once more in the open air.

"I am glad that I have visited that place to-night, because I feel that I can now never become a gambler," was the reply.

"You may depend upon it (if I must hold forth upon morality) that it is better to let the youth who is just embarking in the world, see all that is hideous in the shape of those snares into which he may be likely to fall, and this measure will be a better preventive against delinquency than the opposite system of forbidding him even to gaze upon such scenes:—at least, such are my sentiments," said Mr. Tibbatts, with well affected sincerity.

"I am inclined to agree with you," observed Victor. "But here is a poor fellow apparently in a great state of exhaustion."

As he made this latter remark, our hero pointed to a mendicant who was lying upon the threshold of a door in the Square, and who was sending forth the most piteous moans. The light of the street lamp shone fully upon his countenance; and Victor saw that it was distorted with pain and anguish. He accordingly took a few half-pence from his pocket (poor as he himself was), and presented them to the beggar.

"Thankee' kindly, Sir," said the man, apparently deeply grateful for this assistance. "You have probably saved the lives of nine innocent children this night by your bounty. I dared not go home without taking them bread; and now I have sufficient to make them happy at least for a few hours."

The beggar raised himself up with great difficulty, as he uttered these words, and clung to the railings for support.

"What is the matter with you, my good fellow?" enquired Victor, commiserating the man's condition.

"Misery and want have nearly killed me, Sir," was the answer. "This is the first night I ever came out into the streets to beg; but I could not see my wife and children famishing before my face. I have not tasted food myself, for three days, and shall only eat a mouthful of bread to-night. But, while I eat that mouthful, I shall bless you, Sir."

The tears started to our hero's eyes, and he hurried his companion onward at a rapid rate, his mind deeply affected with the idea that there were hundreds of poor wretches in the same predicament as the beggar whom he had just relieved, in the streets at that moment. Mr. Tibbatts said nothing; but led the way towards the Strand.

At the corner of one of the streets leading from the Strand to the banks of the river, is a well-known pawnbroker's and jeweller's shop. The proprietor of this place is a great discounteer, and does a considerable quantity of business in many ways with the fashionable young men about town.

It was to the shop belonging to this pawn-broker that Mr. Tibbatts conducted our hero; and, when they reached it, the former led the way into the side entrance, which communicates with the row of little boxes, in the door to each of which there is a window.

"Three words were sufficient to denote Cæsar's pursuits," said Mr. Tibbatts; "let the same quantity be enough to instruct you how to act. Use your eyes!"

Victor did as he was bade, and glanced into the half-dozen boxes, one after the other. The first contained a fashionably-dressed individual, with long flowing hair, a slight moustache, and incipient whiskers. He leant against the side of the box with considerable nonchalance, playing with his eye-glass, while one of the shopmen, on the inner side of the counter, was strictly examining a very handsome watch which the young fashionable had tendered to him: indeed, he seemed as happy and comfortable as if he had just received a magnificent present, instead of being compelled to take his watch to the pawnbroker's.

Presently the shopman said something to him, and the young fashionable answered in a voice which was easily overheard by our hero.

"Well, 'pon my word, that's too bad! only eight guineas upon a watch which I paid—or rather am to pay forty-five for! I got it as a part of the value given for a discount—a little vulgar piece of stiff; and the discounteer swore it would pledge for fifteen at least! This is deuced provoking: you must make it ten—I shall take it out again to-morrow!"

The shopman however refused to give any more than the sum he had originally offered, which was eight pounds eight shillings; and the young gentleman calmly consigned the money to his waistcoat pocket. He then sneaked out of the box, and darted down the street towards the Thames, tearing up the duplicate into little pieces as he went along. So much for his intention of redeeming the watch again!

In the second box was a sickly, but interesting-looking girl, belonging to the middling classes. Her eyes were of a soft deep blue, and the elegance of her form was visible even through the large shawl in which it was enveloped. There was a placid melancholy upon her countenance, which immediately rivetted the attention of our hero towards her; and it was with a certain tightening sensation about the heart that he saw her take from beneath her shawl, a shirt—probably her father's shirt, and receive from the shopman four shillings in exchange. She carefully placed the duplicate in her bosom, and then issued from the box with hasty and timid steps, casting down her eyes, and drawing her shawl more closely around her, when she found that two men were standing in the corridor communicating with the boxes.

In the third department allotted to customers, was a gaily-dressed female, whose face was flushed with drinking, and who laughed and joked with the shopman, as she exchanged her gold ear-rings against a pound; then, as she left the box, she uttered some obscene joke for the behoof of our hero and his companion, and walked boldly up into the Strand, as if she were not ashamed of the place from which she had just emanated.

In the fourth box there was a poor old man, bowed down apparently as much by misfortune as by years, and with a deep settled melancholy upon his countenance. He pledged a blanket, and begged so hard for a shilling beyond the amount proffered, that only a pawnbroker's shopman could have refused the demand. But all persons connected with the pawnbroker's business have lost the soft feelings of humanity.

We shall not introduce our readers to the fifth and sixth boxes at this pawnbroker's shop, on the evening when Victor Melville and Mr.

Tibbatts performed their journey of discovery, and (as far as regarded the former) of initiation. We shall follow them away from this dispiriting scene, and pursue their footsteps as far as High-street, St. Giles's, to which quarter Mr. Tibbatts conducted his companion through the most convenient cuts and alleys, not forgetting to take Seven Dials in his way.

Like no other quarter of London is Saint Giles's, at the hour of midnight. In all the streets which lead from the High-street, the doors of the houses are for the most part open; and groupes of women stand at the wooden railings before the dwellings, engaged in a conversation where oaths and curses are far more frequent than flowers of rhetoric. The men sail home from the public-houses in a happy state of independence and elevation, caring not whether they make their way over the bodies of friends or foes, anathematizing the policeman who dreads the denizens of that happy region, and ready to fight all the world, from their deadly enemies, if they have any, down to their own wives. Before the shops close at night, numbers of itinerant vendors of fried fish, meat pies, and oysters, erect little portable shops on the curb-stones of the pavement, and ply their trade with all the importance of licensed victuallers.

But it was now twelve at night, and the shops were closed,—so were the public-houses. The principal objects of attraction in those regions, at that hour, were the groupes of women engaged in conversation, the numbers of men who had been overtaken by liquor (and, by the way, this was a pursuer which they never eluded), the little knot of individuals engaged in witnessing a fight between two drunken coal-heavers on one side, the beggar-woman and her four or five starving children all crowding together on another, the women of the town, and the old libertine sneaking along some obscure alleys as if he were well aware of the impropriety of his conduct. Mr. Tibbatts struck into one of the narrowest, dirtiest, and darkest streets in that neighbourhood,—its precise situation we shall not, for many reasons, point out to the reader;—and, after having examined three or four houses with the utmost attention, he boldly knocked at the door of one of them.

There was an area to this house; and before the front door was opened, a gruff voice challenged the visitors from that abyss.

"Holloa!" said the voice, "who's here?"

"Fly to the fakement,^a old fellow," returned Tibbatts, suddenly changing his tone to that of the most familiar vulgarity. "Hand up the darkey,^b and don't keep me and my pal here in the cold. There's a bob^c in his cly^d which may find its way into your gropus,^e if you're nibsom^f and will make it all right."

"I understand," said the voice; and the area door was then closed very gently. In a few moments a man, with a dark lanthorn in his hand, appeared at the front door, which he opened cautiously. "What's your name?" he demanded of Tibbatts, as soon as he had admitted the two visitors and had shut the door again.

"Mine's Wilkins, and his is Thompson," answered Mr. Tibbatts, pointing to his companion. "He's rather green—not full-fledged yet; but wants to soar. Still he's downey enough not to nose^g it on you or the ben-culls;^h and if he don't mean to go to Tuck-up-fairⁱ himself, he's not likely to send any one there."

The man, who was probably well pleased at receiving so excellent a character of our young hero, honoured him with a gracious

^a "Wide awake."

^b Dark lanthorn

^c Shilling

^d Waistcoat-pocket

^e Pocket

^f Gentlemanly—civil

^g Betray

^h Good-fellows

ⁱ The gallows

smile; and Mr. Tibbatts intimated the necessity of a small reward being tendered to the Cerberus.

"It will cost you a shilling or two now," said this gentleman: "but depend upon it, the lesson will be an useful one."

Victor presented the man with a shilling; and he and Mr. Tibbatts were immediately ushered into a large room, to which they descended by a flight of about half a dozen steps. The door then closed behind them; and Tibbatts, hastily leading the way to two vacant chairs at a long deal table, whispered to his companion not to appear embarrassed or alarmed.

But in sooth there was enough to embarrass and alarm our hero. Instantly burst upon a scene, which, if done justice to by the most graphic pen, would be a room, about seventy feet long, by twenty-five broad, were assembled upwards of forty of the most strange-looking persons Melville had ever beheld. Rags, filth, and ugliness seemed to be their characteristics. Two long tables were laid out for supper,—that is, so far as a greasy cloth and a quantity of knives and forks of all shapes and sizes, can be denominated a preparation. The room itself was lighted by means of a number of tallow candles in tin shades; and as no one took the trouble to snuff them, the tallow streamed to the ground in some instances, and on a gentleman's back in another. But neither the ground nor the back were much injured by this species of anointment, the one being covered with sand, the other with rags. The walls of the apartment had originally been white-washed; but they now manifested the total disregard to all unnecessary expense which was experienced by the proprietor of this house of entertainment.

The inmates of this apartment were immediately taken by our hero for that which they really were,—viz., the beggars from the streets. One had a coat without sleeves, another had sleeves and no coat; here was an individual, one leg of whose trousers was of canvass, and the other of cloth; and there was a fourth, whose garments were so perforated with holes, that it was impossible to decide whether a larger portion of rags or naked flesh met the eye. One had a wooden leg in reality—another a sham one; or rather, they had both wooden legs, but the former required that substitute; and the other did not. One had a black patch over a sound eye; and another left his blind eye naked. In fact, the guests assembled at those two tables, presented to the eyes of our hero the most extraordinarily combined mass of contradictions, deceptions, and misfortunes he had ever gazed upon. And then the hum of all their voices—their oaths—their asseverations—their flash language—and their disputes, added for a few moments, until he gradually became accustomed to the strangeness of the scene, to the embarrassment which he naturally experienced upon suddenly finding himself in such society.

In the course of a quarter of an hour after Victor and his companion had taken their seats, and when the members of the club had ceased to regard them with looks of curiosity, a side-door opened, and two or three waiters, with aprons which seemed to have been usually hung up the chimney when their proprietors did not require their services, hastened into the room, laden with gigantic dishes which they placed upon the table. The sound of the busy voices was then suddenly hushed, and all eyes were turned to scrutinize the luxuries provided for the evening's entertainment. There were joints roasted and boiled—mighty pies—large quantities of vegetables—and a profusion of bread. Vigorous arms soon made deep incisions upon the joints; and hungry jaws speedily committed dire roads upon the dainties thus provided. Numberless pots of porter were then introduced by the same dirty-aproned lacqueys; and the clatter of knives and forks for a time superseded the din of tongues.

In order not to appear singular amongst that strange society, our hero and his companion forced themselves to partake of the viands set before them. Suddenly Melville laid down his knife and fork in the most unfeigned astonishment, and followed with his eyes an individual who had just entered the room, and who, ere he took his seat, cut a saucy fling in the middle of the room, thereby displaying a great elasticity of limb.

"What's the matter with you?" demanded Titus in a whisper. "You must not seem to be astounded at anything here."

"Astounded!" returned Victor, in the same sotto voce: "who could help being astounded, at now seeing a man in full possession of health and strength, when only a short time previously that same individual was apparently all but dying in the streets? Do you not recognize our friend?"

"Ah! I was not mistaken," coolly observed Mr. Tibbatts, as he glanced towards the man, whom his companion had relieved in Leicester-square. "My dear fellow," he added, still whispering, "it is almost useless to felicitate one's self upon having done a charitable deed in London: nearly every beggar whom we meet in the streets is an impostor. Probably this man is unmarried, and has no more children than you or I."

"This is indeed an useful lesson which I have received to-night," remarked Melville. "But see; the impudent fellow has recognized us, and is amusing his companions with the tale."

"Do not appear to notice the circumstance," whispered Tibbatts. "We have no right to intrude ourselves here; and these men, who only tolerate us as long as we behave in a quiet and tranquil manner, would make us remember this evening to the latest hour of our lives, if they suspected that we came to spy their actions with any other motive than one of pure curiosity. They know that gentlemen occasionally come amongst them; and then they affect to take no notice of their presence. I have been here before, and am acquainted with the efficacy of a few flash words uttered to the porter of the establishment."

"That was the secret which obtained us admission," said Victor; but, ere Mr. Tibbatts could make any reply, a plate was handed round by the waiters, and every individual threw nine-pence into it. This was the price of each man's supper: Victor accordingly increased the contributions by eighteen-pence, thereby settling for himself and companion.

When this ceremony was accomplished, the dishes were cleared away, the cloths were removed, and pipes, tobacco, and cheroots were placed upon the tables. The guests then proceeded to order that which each preferred to drink: some chose beer; others spirits; and one or two, who had probably carried on their traffic that day to considerable advantage, indulged in a little hot elder wine. Our hero and his companion immediately followed this example; although no one pressed them to take any refreshment. Not a syllable was addressed to them by a soul; and, when the conversation again became general amongst the beggars, their presence seemed to have been entirely forgotten.

It is almost impossible to rush headlong into scenes of temptation, either through motives of curiosity or to test our powers of self-control, without becoming contaminated. Such was the case with Melville in this instance. He drank glass after glass, and at length entered into familiar conversation with the mendicants around him. He became their intimate friend and their jovial companion in that hour of debauchery; and low as he had already fallen from the effects of drink, he now fell lower still. Like all drunkards, he had increased the quantity of his diurnal potations by degrees; and in the same gradient manner had he each day descended a step more on the ladder which led him from the eminence of his respectability to the depth of his shame. He had committed a debauch in a gin-palace, and he thought that was bad enough for a gentleman; he now committed a debauch amongst beggars; and he made the impostor and the rogue his equals. When he awoke in the morning, he found himself in his own room, in Albion-buildings; and it was with feelings of the most unmitigated disgust that he recalled to mind the particulars of the previous evening's dissipation.

Scarcely had he collected his scattered ideas and convinced himself that he was really that degraded being—an habitual drunkard—when Mr. Robus entered the room, bearing a letter in his hand. The epistle was addressed to Victor Melville: its edges were marked with a broad black border. Hastily snatching it from the hands of his landlord, Melville tore it open; and when his eyes had rapidly scanned its contents, the letter fell from his hands—he threw himself back upon his pillow, and exclaimed in a tone of the deepest grief and perplexity, "Heavens! what can I do? I have not even a friend to assist me with his advice!"

(To be continued in our next.)

INSTINCT AND REASON.

It was a bold attempt in that most quaint and pleasant, yet—most profound of essayists,—Montaigne, to venture to efface the broad line of demarcation which a proud philosophy has so disdainfully traced between the instinct of brutes and the intelligence of man. It was a bold attempt, in such an age as his, to affront that metaphysical superstition, which, severing man from the animal creation of which he is but the head, placed him at an immeasurable distance above it, endowing him with a nature not only superior, but essentially distinct. For the metaphysician, not startled at the idea of supposing a gap in that gradual series of ascents so visible throughout creation, coolly snapped the chain of instinct, and abruptly fixed man at the lower extremity of another chain, to which he assigned the name of Reason. Except the relation of juxtaposition, he would acknowledge none other between them. It seems never to have surprised him that nature, hitherto so regular and progressive, "liberal, but not profuse," superadding with such beautiful frugality one improvement upon another, and effecting vast results by successive and almost inappreciable differences, should at this stage of her operation proceed for the first time per saltum, leaving an immense chasm between the point from which she had departed and that at which she had arrived. He found it more easy to imagine this anomaly than to look upon creation as Montaigne looked upon it, and to say with him, "Il y a quelque difference, il y a des ordres et des degres, mais c'est sous le visage d'une meme nature;" for he could not abide to see in the instincts of the superior brutes too close an approximation to the intellect of man. It was impossible, indeed, to overlook the fact that a type was to be found in them, however imperfect, feeble, and obscure, of the faculties of the human mind; but he contemptuously rejected the only legitimate inference that could be drawn from it. Spurning instinct as a mere product of matter, he assumed a new principle, an immaterial substance as the exclusive source of intellect. Never was there a more gratuitous assumption—never a grosser disregard of that system of relation everywhere so manifest in nature.

Glance as carelessly as we may at the vegetable or animal kingdom, it is impossible not to be struck by that law of progressive improvement, in virtue of which the lowest and most feeble forms of life in each are gradually varied into the highest and most vigorous. If, for instance, we consider the most inartificial form of animal life as exhibited in the homogeneous structure of the zoophyte, with what solemn interest do we perceive it becoming complicated by degrees, diversified into parts, enriched with organs and their appropriate functions, the energy and number of its manifestations correponding with the increasing opulence of its structure, until at last it receives its consummation in the wonderful mechanism of man. But how does our interest soar, when once we are sensible that as the organization loses its primitive simplicity and rudeness, in the same ratio it evolves not only a more profuse and imposing manifestation of the vital principle, but a class of functions, the especial object of which is to determine its relation with other objects. Suppose, for a moment, that we were making acquaintance with animal existence in its ascending series, with what delight should we watch the development of these functions—called instinct in all animals but one,—and with what intense impatience should we press on to contemplate their final and most excellent development in the highest of all animals! How certainly—confiding in our experience that the more perfect the organization, the more perfect the intelligence—how certainly should we expect to find the most exalted illustration of this unerring law in man. And to what a high pitch of expectation should we be wrought, were we previously apprized that the peculiar organ of these functions had received a superb development in him! What magnificent anticipations should we indulge of the variety, and extent, and force of his intelligence! But what would be our astonishment at the very moment of their being realized, when the metaphysician stepping up, solemnly proclaimed that though our anticipations were right in fact, they were wrong in principle; that though the results we admired were those we had foreseen, they were not the results of the law we had observed, but of a new and distinct one now coming suddenly into operation; that what we had hitherto seen was the product of matter; what we now saw was the product of spirit! Should we not, as soon as we could command our gravity, or be assured of his,—should we not insist that the law of relation and continuous improvement progressing in other respects unbroken to the end, there is no more reason to suppose it suspended for one class of phenomena than for the rest?

Consequently, if he maintain that brute intelligence is a material product, he has no pretence for affirming that human intelligence is not; if he can prove the latter to be the product of spirit, he must acknowledge the former, which is cognate with it, to be also its result. Such is the conclusion at which common sense arrives, and which the sublime philosophy of Locke admits.

Nor would there have been any confusion on a matter so plain and obvious, if the dreams of philosophy had not invoked religion to their aid. The pernicious habit of bringing all knowledge to the altar to be gauged and measured by the theological scale, was the eternal resource by which dogmatism, in this as in other things, threw obstacles in the way of rational inquiry. Had this pretended scale of truth been really that one which we believe is graduated by the hand of God, the evil would have been infinitely less; but unhappily its divisions were the arbitrary assumption of human speculation. Whatever, therefore, was adverse to the pretensions of metaphysical philosophy, became adverse to religion; and whenever these pretensions were rudely menaced, she rang her tocsin and proclaimed, trumpet-tongued, that revelation was in danger. The subject we have been considering furnishes an illustration of this. Obeying a passionate desire of man to triumph over that greatest imperfection which is essential to all living matter, its mortality, the metaphysician very early imagined an immaterial substance, which, incorporated with his material structure, would at its dissolution be released, and exist in a separate and immortal state. When revelation, therefore, armed with its divine credentials, announced the resurrection and another world, philosophy gladly received this triumphant proof of its whole theory of an immortal part in man. But as the promise of immortality was made exclusively to the latter, who was by no means anxious to share this magnificent privilege with inferior animals, philosophy willingly flattered his vanity by denying an immortal, and consequently, by the converse of its own reasoning, an immaterial principle to them. Hence, by a misconstruction of revelation, she found herself compelled to consider the whole existence of brutes, with all its manifestations of life and intelligence, as the mere product of matter. This was a first error, which gave rise to a second and graver one.

In process of time there sprang up a class of reasoners, who, after attentively observing the phenomena of matter, pronounced it to be equal to the manifestation of every function which is anywhere connected with it. Of an immaterial substance they saw no trace, and denied all existence. Instinct they found acknowledged as a property of matter: they could not assign a different origin to reason. The metaphysician was therefore in despair and wrath: the thunders of heaven were invoked against the wretch who presumed to question its decrees; the finger of scorn haunted him at every step; he was abhorred and avoided as a leper. One of two things he must choose,—either to abandon his convictions, or to scorn the doctrine that assailed him, as a fable. It is easy to conceive which of them he chose; and thus men were driven into hatred and contempt of religion by this injudicious eagerness to make it the arbiter between contending speculations, with neither of which it was concerned. For what does religion teach? That man is immortal? No—only that he shall become so! That he differs from other matter? No—only that he shall be made to differ! And because philosophers choose to overlook these marked distinctions, they have been compelled to commit an absurdity in their own speculations, and, what is of very different importance, gratuitously to ascribe a contempt of revelation to the speculations of other men. But the time is fast approaching when the pious will overcome the dishonourable suspicion that religion is not in itself a compact of proof,—“that impious diffidence,” as Bacon finely calls it, “which is afraid lest it should discover in nature what would subvert faith.” We shall believe in revelation, yet believe too in whatever has evidence enough to satisfy our reason; and we shall not hesitate to confront the oracles of God with those of Nature, confident that if they do not at present coincide, a deeper investigation will efface their opposition.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

During the seven weeks of the existence of The Teetotaler, we have received such numbers of letters and communications from various correspondents, that we must now solicit the favour of being permitted to answer them all en masse.

In making up our minds thus to dispose of a mass of correspondence, and to answer many letters with one reply, we hope that those who do not receive private rejoinders to their valuable suggestions and hints, will not accuse us of rudeness, but will find for us an apology in the press of business which naturally and necessarily devolves upon us at the outset of this gigantic enterprise. For, although the mere editorship of this journal may seem an easy matter to the superficial beholder, we do not hesitate to inform our readers that it is associated with other duties which render the whole stewardship of the enterprise a laborious and fatiguing one, and an occupation which would try the patience of many, were not that patience supported by the excellence of the cause.

In the first place we have been accused of devoting too much of our space to light matter, and almost altogether losing sight of religious articles. To this accusation we so far plead guilty, that we admit that our chief aim is to inculcate the principles of Teetotalism through the medium of amusing fictions as much as through dry essays or lectures. By this plan we form a new feature in the world of Teetotal Journalism; we supply a desideratum acknowledged by the mere fact of the support which we have experienced; and we present the world with a periodical which will procure access into many coteries, assemblies, and private families, into which a mere report of Teetotal progress and operation would never find its way. We thus interfere but little with the other journals already established; and we have the vanity to suppose that we shall in time create our own class of readers. It is therefore evident that religious disquisition is incompatible with a journal so conducted; and, although we render our articles perfectly moral, and admit none that militate in the least against the pure doctrines of the Christian creed, we do not profess to publish essays whose subjects are entirely of a religious nature. We thus hope that our journal will suit the Catholic as well as the Protestant—the Dissenter as well as the disciple of the Church of England—the votary of one sect as well as the adherent to another.

We have, in the next place, received multifarious epistles upon the long and short pledges; and many have point-blank demanded of us which pledge we advocate. We now answer these queries. We do not enter upon dissertations on the qualities of either pledge, because we advocate both. We do not embarrass ourselves, nor trouble our readers, with the discrepancies of opinions entertained on this head: we are devoted to the grand principles of Teetotalism; and we revere and support all measures which we deem calculated to further the views of its disciples. The United Temperance Association, whose interests we chiefly represent, admits the advocates of both pledges beneath its banners; its aim is union; and its object and its hope is to connect in one vast society—to link together in one grand fraternity—all those who profess the doctrines of Teetotalism. The necessity of union, amongst the Teetotalers of London at least, is every day becoming more apparent, in consequence of the intestine feuds and the petty jealousies which exist amongst the members of rival societies. Those who really wish well to the cause of total abstinence, will seriously reflect upon the necessity of joining the United Temperance Association, which admits the votaries of both pledges, and which offers the grand principle of Union as the guarantee of its strength, its moral excellence, its disinterestedness, and its increasing importance.

Amongst a heap of letters lying upon our writing-table, are several from correspondents in the country, soliciting information relative to the manner in which we expound certain Teetotal doctrines, or the way in which we refute certain arguments used by our opponents. To the often-repeated question, “Whether Temperance measures are not sufficiently effective?” we at once reply, “Read our leading article of last week. You will there find it stated that the use leads to the abuse of intoxicating drinks, and that the cause of temptation should be removed altogether.” We may add that we must extirpate the use of strong drinks, in the same way as a gardener roots up a poisonous weed; he does not content himself with simply cutting off the leaves; he tears it out of the ground altogether. Others of our correspondents inform us that many of their acquaintances and friends would join total abstinence associations, did they not labour under the impression that “alcohol is in nature—that it is one of the good creatures of God—and consequently that it is fitted for our use.” Mr. Grindrod, in his admirable work “Bacchus,” has adduced several excellent arguments to refute this opinion. He has shown that the elements of alcohol are in nature, but not alcohol itself; and he says that, even if alcohol were in nature, that fact would be no justification of its use. We do not use hemlock, nor any other natural poison, as an article of food; God has taught us to discriminate between evil and good; and in the same way has he enabled us to choose between wholesome aliments and poisons. But alcohol can only be produced from the effects of fermentation, and does not exist in nature.

Another of our correspondents writes to us a letter in which he says, “Instinct prompts us to the use of that which gratifies the palate or the senses; but Reason forbids us.” We can show this correspondent, and all those who entertain a similar opinion, that the use of intoxicating drinks will find but a sorry advocate in the idea that instinct and reason point to two different ways; because instinct and reason are not two separate and specific states of knowledge or intellect; they are the gradations of the same faculty under different denominations.

A correspondent at Manchester deprecates the circumstance that we should have been led into any observations of a personal nature. We can only point to a lying and impudent advertisement in the Journal of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, of the week before last, and signed by a man of the name of Jameson, as a specimen of the malignant endeavours of a few base and grovelling wretches to injure us. This Jameson, although pretending to be a Christian, and sometimes appending the word Reverend to his name, has here given the sanction of that name to a statement which he knows to be a direct falsehood. He says that the Editor of this journal “promised to be good;” whereas no such compromise was ever made in the matter alluded to. Even Mr. John Hull himself highly reprobated the officious conduct of this hireling, in thus publicly parading his name in the Journal. Mr. Hull has lately declared that he never intended to insult the Committee of The Teetotaler by his letter declining to become a subscriber thereto, and that he did not consider it a breach of politeness to return the Editor of The Teetotaler’s letter to the writer, with a few words of his own at the back of it. As his ignorance is thus made the ground-work of his apology, we accept that apology, and here may the matter drop.

Several correspondents have written to us to express their approval of the “bold and manly conduct we have adopted in respect to Lord Waldegrave and Captain Duff.” We are pleased to find that our indignation against the aristocratic rioter and his accomplice is shared by so many; and we can assure our correspondents that we shall not fail to watch the proceedings adopted in this matter. We perceive that the “noble” Earl and the “gallant” Captain have been held to a bail of a ridiculous amount by the “worthy” magistrate of Marlborough Street. Why they should have been only bound over for their appearance in a sum which they would doubtless much more readily forfeit than appear on their trial, is a query which only the Solons of the London police courts can answer. A poor man would not have been suffered to put in bail at all; or, if he had been allowed that facility of evading the retribution of justice, the sureties required of him would have been ridiculously disproportionate (in the worst sense of the phrase) with those demanded of Lord Waldegrave and Captain Duff.

To upwards of fifty or sixty correspondents, who suggest “alterations” or “improvements” in the editorial plan of The Teetotaler, we return our sincere thanks for their kind suggestions, all of which are received with deference and considered with care. It will be perceived that a few have been adopted; the majority are rejected for reasons which we cannot now explain.

To those correspondents who have written to inquire whether the history of Victor Melville, in the tale entitled “The Drunkard’s Progress,” be the autobiography of the Editor, we return an unqualified negative, thanking them at the same time for the compliment conveyed by the supposition. There is nothing in common between the fortunes of Victor Melville and George W. M. Reynolds. The latter had not to struggle against difficulties at the commencement of his literary career, because he found at the outset an arena ready opened to him in the editorship of the Monthly Magazine, a situation which he held for upwards of two years. Then his first work, “Pickwick Abroad,” experienced the most unqualified success, its circulation having amounted to many thousands of copies. He was not moreover a drunkard, nor did he enter upon life with all the evils of poverty to surmount. He inherited a large fortune when he came of age five years ago, and lost it by legitimate though unfortunate speculations in Paris. He has, since his return to England, found kind and generous publishers—amongst whom he will mention with gratitude, Mr. Thoms of Warwick Square, Mr. Henderson, No. 2, Old Bailey, and Mr. Tegg, of Cheapside—to support his literary achievements.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We thank Mr. Cocks, of Manchester, for his kind communication, and consider the conduct of the landlord of the public-house alluded to, to have been most scandalous. The publication of the statement is only omitted through press of matter. We shall be glad to hear again from Mr. Cocks.

We sincerely thank our Loughsight Correspondent for his kind communications; and regret that it does not enter into our plan to insert sketches of so purely a local interest. We shall be glad to receive any account of the transactions of his society with which he may think fit to favour us; and we are obliged to him for his support.

“THE DRUNKARD’S WILL” is a clever composition, but rather too severe. E. G. is thanked for his communication. Will he send us an account of the transactions of the Teetotal Society of his town?

A SINCERE FRIEND is thanked for his spirited and manly letter. We regret that his lines upon the Chestnut College affair were forwarded to us so long after the occurrence: they should otherwise have been inserted.

Private answers have been forwarded, as requested, to H. L., X. Y. Z. (Cheriton, Kent), X. Y. Z. (Dover), MARIA, B. C. D., M. N. N., N. L., M. V. C., P., SATIRICUS, HOMO, PROSPER, A. F. and S. S. S.

We regret that we cannot comply with the proposition of ALPHA, relative to the contributions alluded to.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Teetotal progress, and the transactions of Teetotal Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We solicit the correspondence of the heads of all Teetotal Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 6d.
Every succeeding line 4d.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1840.

How lovely is this earth, with its green trees—its waters—and its flowers! When we wander through the verdant groves, where thousands of feathered warblers are pouring forth their untutored harmony—or when skimming the surface of the deep in the noble vessel that triumphs over the tide; how boundless should be our admiration of Nature’s enchanting wonders! The blue and serene sky—the dun clouds of sun-set—the variegated colours of sweet flowers—the blossoms of spring—the fruits of autumn—the golden harvests—the shady bowers of jessamine and clematis—the lofty hill—the peaceful valley, with its happy village—the splendours of great cities—the simplicity of the hamlet—the pomp of armaments—the humble congregation of peasants around the pulpit of their pastor—the hoary-headed patriarch—the lovely shepherdess;—all these, the glories of Nature and of God, are but distant and fitful visions in the mind of the intemperate man!

How distressing is it to know that at the moment when the votaries of Teetotalism are thronging around the platforms of their advocates in the Chapels and Halls consecrated to the genius of Temperance,—how distressing is it to know that at that moment so many myriads of our fellow countrymen are offering up their holocausts at the shrine of Intoxication! Or, again, when the happy and right-minded Teetotalers are passing the evening agreeably together in some gay, but innocent place of resort, the intemperate portion of the community is engaged in those dens of iniquity—the public-houses. The drunkard knows not the joys which are experienced by the Teetotaler. He cannot appreciate that mental placidity—that equanimity of spirits which are the associates of temperance: he is blind to all the charms of Nature, the sweets of domestic comfort, the consolations of a virtuous mind, and the soothing beneficence of religion; he does not walk up the shady grove to enjoy the beauties of Nature, but to reach the tavern which may be in its vicinity; he changes the hours of rest into a period of boisterous mirth; and he pursues the road of dissipation with that recklessness which belongs to the mind that is compelled to bring bravado to the aid of its courage, because the prospects which bound the vista of its existence are the work-house, the lunatic-asylum, the penal colony, or the scaffold!

Can any man in his right senses oppose the doctrines of Teetotalism? Can any one venture to assert that poverty—crime—disease—anarchy—ignorance—and eternal perdition, are preferable to a competency—to virtue—health—peace—education—and salvation in the world to come? And yet the former are the consequences of Intemperance; and the latter are the companions of Total Abstinence. Like the Oromazes and the Ahrimanius of the Persians—like the good and the evil principles taught by the Manichæans—like the Vishnu and Chiven of the Chinese—like the propitious and the inauspicious spirits worshipped by the untaught savage—do Temperance and Intemperance maintain a constant warfare. But, like the old serpent in the "Revelation," the spirit of Intemperance shall be hurled down into the bottomless pit, and Temperance shall be exalted to the seventh heaven of honour and of peace.

It is impossible that a doctrine, which aims at so great a moral reformation as Teetotalism, shall long have to endure the opposition of so many. Truth must triumph over the delusions of falsehood—truth shall conquer all the arguments which are adduced to defend a vicious habit—truth shall hoist a beacon of light upon the rock of salvation—truth shall reduce to silence those who would fain justify their own vices by the pleas of necessity and of the propriety of moderate enjoyment—and truth shall teach the senator as well as the peasant, the monarch as well as the tradesman, the noble as well as the commoner, that social reformation can be alone effected through the uncompromising medium of Teetotalism.

We have been called to account for the levity with which we spoke of the customs of antiquity in our leading article of last week. We do not however hesitate to recapitulate our assertions relative to the folly of attaching any degree of importance to the imagined authority of the habits of our ancestors. The great increase of information on all subjects and in all classes—the many things which in these days it is necessary to know—the many of which one is ashamed to be entirely ignorant—the variety of acquirements essential to a liberal education, all render the task of instruction every day more complicated and difficult. We are no longer at liberty to regard the first years of our childhood as a period of preparatory training, in which we desire to instil habits rather than ideas: on the contrary, intelligence and instruction must appear on the horizon together. Hitherto sixteen of the most precious years of life have been devoted to graceful antiquarian pursuits—to the study of the ancient mind in the beautiful languages which embalm it, but with far greater reference to the language than to the mind. The great art of education was to employ the intellect usefully on what was comparatively useless; and to administer instruction less as a source of ideas than an exercise of faculties. To be a Scholar was fame, and to be imbued, not so much with the spirit of the writings of antiquity, as with a fine subtle sense of the graces of their style,—to be filled with a contemplative admiration of their genius,—to be as nearly as possible an index to the volumes of antiquity, and their echo,—this was to be a Scholar! But those unfading garlands, wreathed from the choicest flowers of the philosophy and poetry of old, which festooned so gracefully around modern intellect, covering its bare places, and shedding their perfume into its deepest chasms, were fetters (and strong ones too), flowery and fragrant though they were. While they seemed, like light and graceful ornaments, to lie in harmless serenity upon its surface, they effectually restrained that natural and unimpeded action essential to the development of its strength. It has required a long effort, and a powerful one, to release it from this brilliant thralldom.

In philosophy as in literature, in science as in art, there was for many an age the same superstitious reverence for the past—the same reverted and adoring glance. But, by degrees, the intellect became agitated with new desires; the present business of mankind became the proper object of their knowledge; the craving of their wants summoned science to its aid; and science, becoming practical, found itself in communication with every man, stimulated every man, and, teaching him that the future would be the scene of his triumph and his power, gradually weaned him in all things from his exclusive veneration for antiquity.

Let not, therefore, the opponents to Teetotalism quote the customs of our ancestors as arguments against us; we shall refute them by adducing the line of conduct pursued, in respect to the past, by the literary, the scientific, and the moral worlds of the present day.

THE WINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

(Continued.)

Secondly.—We intended to have commenced this branch of our essay with lengthy extracts from the works of Columella, Pliny, &c., respecting the nature of the ancient wines, and to have adduced abundant proofs that many of the liquors termed wines were of an unintoxicating nature. But we deem this a work of supererogation after the able and elaborate treatises already written on the subject by our contemporaries. It will be sufficient for our argument merely to state, that the earliest method of manufacturing wine was by squeezing the juice of the grape into a cup; this is evident from the Hebrew root ץץ, yanah, to squeeze, or press; from whence ץץ, yayin, Greek, οινος, wine; so that it will be evident that the unintoxicating or the mere expressed juice of the grape has the most legitimate claim on the word wine. This simple process of manufacture is alluded to in Gen. xl. 11, "Pharaoh's cup was in my hand, and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and I gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand." Nor was it entirely confined to this early age; for long after our Saviour's time do we read, that in the council-chamber of the Goths, each chief was attended by his Gany-mede, or cup-bearer, who, standing by his side, squeezed the juice of the grape into his chalice. Pliny notices the various kinds of wines in his day as amounting to nearly two hundred, and made from about one hundred different fruits and vegetables. There were the aromatic, or spiced, wines, the sweet wines or sirups, the sour wines or vinegars, the drugged wines or opiate draughts, and various others: indeed, every one made and mixed according to his own palate; so that we may take it for granted, that the unintoxicating juice of the grape has in every way, not only from etymological derivation, but by its long-continued acceptance, every claim on the word wine.

Thirdly.—We now proceed to notice the word generally translated "drunken;" and, however strange it may appear, still we are confident, that repletion rather than intoxication is intended. And this will be at once evident to our readers, when we point out its connexion in one or two passages of Scripture. (1.) In 1 Cor. xi. 21, the apostle Paul, reprobating the custom of the early Christians making a feast at the sacrament of the Lord's supper, says, "One is hungry and another is drunken." Now, if inebriation, in its mildest form, had been here intended, would not the severest reproaches have been passed upon them? indeed, would St. Paul have been justified in not at once excommunicating them from the sacred altar?—but with the gentlest reproof, he says, "Shall I praise you in this? I praise you not:" and closes by saying, "If any man hunger, let him eat at home." (2.) Eph. v. 18, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but be ye filled with the Spirit." We unhesitatingly assert, that the whole force and point of this passage is entirely lost by the use of so ultra a word as "drunk." It must be evident to every one, that the apostle never intended to have so associated the two extremes, in one sentence, of the lowest and most degraded state of sin, and the highest state of holiness. We might proceed to notice the expressions, "Be not given to wine," "to much wine," "filled with wine;" but enough has been said to prove, that as we have no word conveying the idea of excess in drinking without intoxication, our translators were driven to the necessity of using so repugnant a term.

Having endeavoured to establish these three positions;—

I. That the word Οινος, "wine," is a general, not a specific, term, implying unintoxicating as well as intoxicating liquors.

II. That the unintoxicating juice of the grape was in general use amongst the Hebrews, at the time of our Saviour, and that it has a legitimate claim to the term "wine."

III. That the word translated, "drunken," implies repletion rather than intoxication;—

We now proceed to apply these positions in the examination of

THE MIRACLE OF OUR SAVIOUR AT CANA.

We have before established the position, that the word "wine" implies no more the nature or quality of the liquor, than the word "medicine" implies any particular drug; consequently it follows, that where an indefinite and comprehensive word is used in connexion with our Saviour, we are justified in supposing that particular thing is intended which would most "manifest forth his glory." Now the established truths of modern physiological and medical research have never been found to contradict the Word of God;—and if the principles on which Teetotalism is founded be correct, namely, "That the use of alcohol is injurious, or, to say the least, needless," then we pledge our lives the word of God will be found to support and advocate the same. And Christians, above all others, ought to prove the principles incorrect, before they look to the Bible for a warrant for their opposition. How strikingly was this manifested in the opposition of the Christian churches to the theories laid down by Galileo,—as to the annual circuit of the world round the sun. Without staying for a moment to examine the truth of his assertion; because it ridiculed their ignorant rendering of the Scriptures, they determined to crush for ever this mighty genius by inquisitorial authority. But how puerile was their attempt! truth prevailed, and they, not the Scriptures, were found in error.

But so far from Teetotalism being in opposition to the will of God or to the Scriptures, we have abundant proofs that total abstinence from all alcoholic liquors has met with the divine approval; as in the cases of Samson, Hannah, Daniel, John the Baptist, the priesthood of the Levites, the Rechabites, and even a pledge of the same, in case of the Nazarites' vow.

We now proceed, without farther comment, to notice how and where this miracle seems to contradict our principles. And the only difficulty has arisen from a supposition that our Bacchanalian orgies had any thing in common with their customs. The remarks of the ruler of the feast have been much misunderstood. "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when they have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now."—From its being the custom of the low pot-house landlords of our day, when men are "well drunk," (in the common acceptation of the word,) to give them liquors of a weaker sort for the purpose of extortion, it has been judged that a similar practice prevailed at private parties amongst the Jews:—so that every fraudulent publican might quote, as a precedent, ancient practice from the Word of God. If it had been the custom of the Jews, when calling a feast amongst their friends, to present their most inebriating wines at the beginning, in order the earlier to produce intoxication, and thus save expense by the introduction of inferior wines, then we unhesitatingly say, that lost as our country is to every sense of shame,—fettered as she is by the trammels of drinking usages,—yet she is comparatively virtuous,—she happily has not yet arrived at so low an ebb, as to practise, in her social circles, any usage so mean or so grovelling.

It is our duty to free, at once, the Jewish nation from so vile an aspersion; and to state that drunkenness was not a national sin,—and that the Jews have always esteemed intoxication as a great, if not the greatest, crime. Their custom was first to offer to their guests their delicious and unintoxicating liquors, (for a love of inebriation was not present with them; then afterwards that which they deemed worse, as least palatable, a small quantity of an alcoholic beverage.

The bride and bridegroom were doubtless poor, and had expended all they could afford on their feast; and as they deeply regretted their lack, perhaps on our Saviour's account, he, seeing their faith elicited in that very circumstance, wrought the miracle,—a most delicious and perhaps fragrant wine was produced. Then the ruler of the feast, when he had tasted the water that was made wine, said, "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine, that is, unintoxicating, and when men are well drunk, (that is, as we before proved, well filled,) then that which is worse, (worse in every sense of the word,—the intoxicating,) but thou hast reserved the good wine, (good in every way, good to the bodies, and good to the spirits,) till now. This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana, of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory." We will not be so presumptuous as to ask, "Is there unrighteousness with God?" but we inquire, If it had been of an intoxicating nature, would it not have induced the parties themselves to mistrust his divinity? And could his glory have been manifested by the creating of that, which, in the smallest quantities, tends, in a certain ratio, to disorganize the nervous system of man?—Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God. J. W.

TEMPERANCE LYRIC.

Genius of good, if still thy wing
O'er Albion's land auspicious soar,
Help to a fallen nation bring,
And raise the drunkard up once more.

The boisterous passions of the soul,
Hate, envy, lust, wrath, and despair,
By Temperance kept beneath controul,
Will ne'er the path of crime prepare.

Genius of good, let Temperance raise
The poor, the humble, and distressed,
To leave the drunkard's evil ways,
And seek the paths of peace and rest.

Cast down the gibbet,—dry the tears
Of those who mourn their fathers' crimes,
So that the deeds of present years
May lead us on to happier times!

NOTES PICKWICKIANÆ.

BY THE EDITOR.
No. V. and last.

Mr. Tupman.—Strong drink is a decided enemy to the charms of the countenance; and without a handsome face, one cannot expect any success amongst the ladies. Since I have left off wine and beer, I have been stared at by all the old women in the workhouse, and all the girls at the charity school. It is however true that I had a peony stuck in my breast—

Mr. Winkle.—Tupman is quite right: intoxicating drinks are certainly prejudicial, especially to the sportsman. I never could kill a bird while I drank; and on the very day that I signed the pledge I caught two in a trap with bird-lime.

Mr. Snodgrass.—Well, that is very singular: but a similar piece of good fortune occurred to me. I never could get any editor to receive my poetry so long as I drank; and since I became a Teetotaler, I have had three effusions accepted. It is true that these three are translated from the Italian; but—

Sam.—Vell, them is testimonies to the system o' vorkin' properly, as the inventor o' the Treadmill said ven the fellers complained that it broke their shins.

Mr. Hook Walker.—It will henceforth be a part of my system to abstain from all intoxicating drinks. Pickwick, my dear fellow, lend me half-a-crown to lay in a stock of ginger-beer.

Mr. Lipman.—I have found Aldgate Pump such an excellent place to draw upon, that I shall in future do no business with any other establishment. What say you, Jopling?

Mr. Jopling.—All I can say is that I shall not only patronize the parish pump at every town I go to, but shall never take my breakfast, lunch, dinner, tea, or supper anywhere else.

Sam.—Wery considerate that is o' you gentlemen; and wery much to your credit is that there forbearance o' yours. Nothin' like a independent spirit, as the pauper said ven he refused to break stones on the road.

Mr. Adolphus Craschem.—Temperance for ever! as my friend the great Cham used to say. I've made up my mind never to borrow money of any one save a Teetotaler in future; and by those means I'll show you how staunch I can be. Snodgrass, just lend me a couple of sovereigns to pay off my tavern score, so that I may avoid temptation in future—will you?

Mr. Pickwick.—We will do anything we can to assist those who will sign the pledge-book and try our principles. I bless the day when I embraced the doctrines of Teetotalism. Those of our friends, who have been rather wild, and who did not hesitate to play me a few tricks during my sojourn in France, will now become steady and sedate. This is a happy day, on which you have met at my house to celebrate the signing of some of you. An excellent supper is provided in the next room—with plenty of ginger-beer, lemonade, and iced water. We will see whether total abstinence will impair our intellects.

Sam.—Hooray! Pickwick and Teetotalism for ever! Here's for the triumphs of principle. I'd rather be the walley o' Pickwick with cold water, than the friend and hale-feller vell-met with that there drunken lord o' Waterford celebrity. Now, then gentlemen—there's the supper; make yourselves at home, as the Hindoos said to the chaps in the Black Hole at Calcutta.

A WORD TO TOTAL ABSTAINERS.

On the Importance of Consistency.

It has ever been matter of reproach by men of the world, against the professors of Christianity, and in too many cases has there been abundant room for the accusation, that, however their lips may declare their attachment to the principles they profess, their daily conduct and conversation do not well accord with such a profession.

The misfortune is, that religion is estimated, more by the fruits its adherents manifest to those around them, than by its own intrinsic merit. And although the good or bad example of religious people can never destroy the authority of divine truth; it is no less certain that religion is honoured or disgraced in the eyes of the world, just in proportion as its professors are consistent or otherwise in the profession they sustain.

There is another class of persons, upon whom consistency of character is equally binding, if they really wish the prosperity of the cause they have embraced: I mean total abstinents from all intoxicating drinks. It is not sufficient, that they can challenge any proof of inconsistency, so far as the mere pledge is concerned. The moral character ought to be above suspicion. Is it not highly inconsistent in the man, who wishes by his example to promote sobriety, to indulge in swearing, and thereby increase profanity? or get into debt without any reasonable prospect of discharging the obligation, and thus be justly liable to the charge of dishonesty? to make promises and engagements, which are never intended to be kept, so as to forfeit his character as a man of his word? It is not a difficult matter to point out other causes of injury to the spread of total abstinence: those mentioned would be sufficient to illustrate our meaning. There are some others of minor importance, which have nevertheless been productive of great mischief. It is quite evident that no consistent total abstainer ought to be seen in or near the beer-shop or public-house; nothing but imperative necessity can justify such a want of caution. We have known some, who, confiding in the strength of their but half-formed resolution, have in an unguarded moment, fallen awfully, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. And when no such mournful result has followed, the example of a total abstainer will be wrested to the injury of such as are always looking out for something to give even the appearance of good to that which conscience, if permitted to perform its office, would condemn in the most unqualified manner. Injury has also been done to the cause, when it is evident that some other motive than the right one has led to the adoption of the total abstinence pledge. If interest, love of human applause, or the force of example merely, has been the actuating principle, the subject of it is not likely to continue firm to his engagement, and would then give occasion of triumph to such as rejoice in the fall of a total abstainer; that being, as they suppose, a palliation of their own less glaring misconduct. It is the right principle of action when total abstinence is embraced and advocated for our own good, and the good of others over whom our example and weight of character would exert an influence. There is no man in existence, whose example has not its share in forming the character of those around him; and it is, therefore, clearly the duty of every man (being a responsible agent) to see to it, that his example is not only, not injurious, but positively beneficial to his fellow men. Ireland has set an example, which all who take the pledge would do well to remember, and imitate. Of the vast multitudes who have bound themselves to the entire disuse of all intoxicating drinks, the instances of apostasy are comparatively rare. I know this is attributed by some persons to a superstitious feeling of sacredness attaching to their engagement; but even if this were the case, it seems but an indifferent commitment to our superior light and knowledge, that this should fail to produce a principle of action equally powerful, with a superstitious one, so called. If reformation of character, an increase of personal and domestic comfort, and the enjoyment of the good opinion of those whose approbation is valuable, be motives of any weight; how cautious should every Teetotaler be; that he do not indiscreetly give occasion of slander. He should prove that his principle is not only negatively, but positively good.

It is hoped that these remarks will not be looked upon as proceeding from a censorious spirit. We are happy to bear our humble testimony to the general good conduct of total abstinents, and are the more anxious that nothing should interfere with the progress of a mighty principle, which we hope is destined to bless and purify our beloved country from its national and degrading vice. A. D. S.

REFLECTIONS IN A HORSE-POND.

TIME, NIGHT.

LET me consider a little where I am! My senses are beginning to clear at present; albeit my body is sticking in the mud, and seems to think of nothing less. This plunge, disagreeable as it is, has been of service to me; we should be thankful for every thing, for they say "every thing is for the best;" and upon this principle, a tumble into a horse-pond may be a good. I shall, however, ascertain this better to-morrow (that is, if I shall ever get out of this mud, of which I am doubtful). In the mean time, I will try way of passing the time, acknowledge my obligation. I am a regenerated creature! Thanks be to heaven, I can see; before my tumble into these revivifying waters, my thoughts were wandering, and my sight was dazzled; now they are fixed, immovably fixed—to this horse-pond; and I only behold one moon instead of two.

I do not exactly know how I came here. I spent last evening with Tom Rattlebrain, Ned Flighty, and Wilk Scamper; we had a famous supper, and resolved to make a night of it. The weather was hot, stormy, and goblinish; it led us to tell ghost stories, which we did, till our marrow froze, and our parched throats cried out like the horse-leech's two daughters, "Give, give." Purely to raise our courage and moisten our palates, we had a couple of bottles additionally. I recollect, that after this, we told some stories partaking more of the flesh than the spirit, and that at two o'clock in the morning, I agreed to ride home on Daylight, hand in hand, like the fire-office insignia, with Scamper, who was mounted on Wildf e. I remember something of trying to force Daylight to cross what I took to be the ferry; I recollect something of our dispute upon this subject, but faintly; I can only guess how the matter ended, by the result; for he is gone, and I am here.

I suppose I must have struggled, flopped, and floundered about a good deal, before I could have been so firmly wedged in the mud, as I am at this moment: the water all around me is up to my chin, and the firm mud beneath me is up to my knees; I have sunk considerably above my calves. I really cut a very ridiculous figure!

The first thing I remember distinctly was seeing my anted cigar, floating, fizzing, and spitting peevishly upon the water. Poor thing! I put out my hand to catch it, but it fizzed angrily, and floated away from me. This "was the unkindest cut of all;" and when I saw its light go out, I felt as if abandoned by all the world.

It just occurs to me that I have another cause of thanksgiving; since one must sometimes fall into a horse-pond, I am grateful that it is an English one. In some countries, now, those demons of the air, the birds of prey, would keep wheeling, whirling, and shrieking above my head, complimenting each other upon the good supper prepared for them, and then coolly peck out my two eyes before my face! This idea is suggested by a somewhat uncomfortable circumstance which, notwithstanding my patience, I cannot but be sensible of. Something—I conjecture either an eel or rat—is gnawing at the boot on my right leg; no other animals venture so deeply into the mud. I wish I could raise my foot.

If it be a rat, he will content himself with the leather, and gnaw away till it be gone—but the eel prefers a bit of meat, and in that case, he is only busying himself to open his "pantry door." Pray heavens it be a rat!

I am a most enduring man. I remember suffering infinite misery a whole season at the house of a particular friend: I was lodged in the best bed-room; and a superb apartment it was. The bed was a magnificent one; but to my cost there was a flea in it—"the last flea of summer." Never shall I forget what I suffered from that single tormentor. I should have known it was only one, from the peculiar pungency of his bite, if the invariable character of the mark had not also been a witness. The room had been for a long period unoccupied, save by this flea, the survivor of all his family and friends, who had died of starvation in the course of the summer. I bore it patiently enough for several nights, thinking that it was a tax to flea-manity that must be paid; but when night after night, week after week, the same torture continued, I began to grow nervous, and irritable. I sought after him diligently in the morning, but never found anything but his trail. Like destiny, he was always to be felt, but never seen. In the night, scarce had I torn the skin off my shoulder, ere I was imperiously called upon to apply the same remedy to my leg. I felt him hop across my hand as I raised it up; and so rapid were his movements, that he seemed to be jumping in every part of my body at once: like the Indian Apollo, he appeared to have the power of multiplying his person, and being in fifty places at the same time; he was a single fiend, whose name was "Legion." I started in anguish, shook my sheets and my shirt, apostrophized the mistress of the house, and mentally sent the house-maid to the hottest place I could think of. It was all to no purpose; he seemed to have some extraordinary power of disgorging his prey, and clearing his stomach, which, like time, was always devouring, never full. So rapidly did his constant meals of breakfast, dinner, and supper tread upon each other's heels that I seemed to live twenty days in one tortured night. I longed to complain to the master of the house; but how tell him there was a flea in his best bed—that bed in which he took such pride, and beheld with so much admiration? At length I met the housemaid on the stairs. She was as ugly as repentance, crabbed as chastity, and old as mother Shipton; nevertheless I addressed her as "my dear little girl," gave her a kiss and a piece of money, and entreated her to kill the fleas in my bed. The next day I met her, and she said, "There are no fleas in your bed, sir." Alas, I knew that; there was but one; and he was a flea of fate beyond her power to destroy. Still the torture went on; still did I lie, night after night, miserable, feverish, sleepless, pinched, torn, and tortured in every part of my burning skin. At length, considering the enormous power possessed by my tormentor, his divisibility, his invisibility, his infallibility, I came at last to the conclusion, that it was no living flea that thus distracted and disturbed me, but the ghost of some starved tenant of former times, who was allowed this recreation to make amends for past sufferings. This idea once established, I knew that I had no hope; I had nothing for it, but to fly; so I descended to my friend, declared to his astonished nent my intention, and when hard pressed for my reason, painfully and reluctantly gave it. "A flea!" shouted he, in a voice between displeasure and mirth, "a flea—and in that bed! then you must have brought it with you." Now was not this too much? I thought my heart would have broken. I, who had endured so much—I, who had suffered torture in silence, for six long weeks, to be accused of having brought it with me! It was beyond human nature to bear. I burst from his presence, packed up my clothes, and though I am a very good-tempered man, have not seen that friend since. I can never forgive his accusation; I can never forget what I suffered! As I call to mind that burning sorrow, I take comfort in the knowledge that I am standing up to my neck in a horse-pond. Thank you, gentle lady moon! I am grateful for any kind of attention, even though it should be of no use to me; but yours is. I wish I was a poet now, I could make something of this scenery. I have read a good deal about "moonlight on the waters," but I never was so near its dancing beams before. The devil take this rat! how he nibbles! My boots are new—a hole in them at least. There's a villainous odour comes over me from some part of this horse-pond, "at which my nose is in great indignation;" it strikes me also, from something uncomfortable in my stomach, that in my plunge, I must have swallowed a good allowance of Mark Antony's liquor. (See Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra: act 1, scene 4.) The hare idea is enough to make me faint; only who would be fool enough to faint in a horse-pond?

I have been several times in my life taken in, besides to-night by these waters.

Thank you again, dear gracious moon! She's very bright just now—there is a large tract of blue in the heavens over which, for at least the next twenty minutes, she may travel without being "capped by a cloud;" so I shall have time to look about me. I am nearly in the centre of the pond; the water is perfectly tranquil, except when it hobs against my chin, disturbed by the movement of my head. Lord help me! Suppose I should die here, as, if nobody comes to my assistance, I certainly shall. On my first ascertaining the character of my position, recollecting that horse-ponds are generally in the neighbourhood of town or farms, I hallooed so lustily, that I found my voice grow husky; so I determined to reserve it for a better occasion—I mean in case any persons should approach—Heaven send them. This would be a comfortless bed to die in.

A huge frog has just discovered me; and he sits among the weeds below the opposite bank, croaking out his speculation as to what I can be; he stares earnestly—so do I—he takes my eye for a challenge—he is a frog of courage however, for he plunges into the water, swims toward me, and plants himself directly opposite to my face. He croaks—I answer very naturally—for the water has qualified my voice. The frog stares again. "The voice is the voice of Esau, but the form is Jacob's." Now he very gravely swims entirely round my head, and then again plants himself in front. I laugh aloud. He backs a little—I open my eyes very wide at him; he returns the compliment—my chin splashes the water about him; he takes flight and disappears. Hark! certainly footsteps in the neighbourhood. Halloo—ough—ah—mercy upon me; my voice is quite gone, and I shall be compelled to live in this horse-pond the remainder of my days. Who will feed me, I wonder; the rat will not be so civil to me, as the ravens were to Elijah; and I have affronted the frog. Ha! the footsteps come nearer—and nearer. 'Tis a man—I see him—a groom—I'll call. Halloo—ouk—era—ak! "Hang your croaking soul," quoth the vagabond; and he flings a huge stone at my head. Despair and distraction! what shall I do? Die! No—that's cowardly—I'll live, bravely—that is, if I can. The fellow is gone, and "I'm all alone." Alone! What do I hear? Voices—yes—they come—most sweet voices. A gentleman and the rascally groom aforesaid. "You have not dragged this pond to-night," says the master. "Indeed, sir, we did, from one end of it to the other," replies the fellow. "see how the weeds are disturbed."—"You lie, you rascal; you did not, or you would have found me there," said I.—"Heighday," said the master, "what have we here?"—"A gentleman in distress"—"I should think so—but how came you in this pond?"—"I'll tell you when I am out."—"Help, all of you fellows," says the gentleman. "Now, sir, hold fast: I was in search of a drunken uncle, who has escaped from his servants; I expected to find him in this horse-pond; and I discover a sober gentleman in his place."

N. B. I did not think it necessary to rectify this latter mistake.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

HAGGERSTONE.

ON Wednesday evening, July 29th, there was a crowded meeting of Teetotalers at the Infant's School-Room, which is the usual place of their weekly assembly. The persons present were of the most respectable appearance, all being particularly neat and well-dressed. The female portion of the audience offered a striking testimony to the good effects of Teetotalism, the principles of which are the most undoubted friends to the beauty of woman.

MR. GREEN, the Editor of the Intelligencer, was called to the Chair, upon the occupation of which he briefly unfolded the business of the meeting, and called upon the Secretary to read the first Annual Report of the Haggerstone Auxiliary branch.

THE SECRETARY proceeded to read the Report, which detailed the great progress made by the Teetotalers of Haggerstone in the good cause, and held out the most flattering hopes for a continuation of the same successful career. The Report was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and was welcomed as an instance not only of the triumphs of Teetotalism, but also as a proof of the activity of the Committee of the Haggerstone Auxiliary.

DR. OXLEY, MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, and several other advocates of the Teetotal cause, then addressed the meeting in support of several Resolutions connected with the welfare and interests of the Society. The school-room was crowded to excess, and ingress to a vast number was absolutely impossible.

GREAT MEETING IN FAVOUR OF THE COAL-WHIPPERS.

ON Friday evening, July 21st, pursuant to public notice, a grand meeting was held at the Aldersgate-street chapel, which was lent for the purpose by the United Temperance Association, to take into consideration the distressing case of the Coal-Whippers of Wapping. Shortly after eight o'clock the Chapel was crowded in every part, numbers being absolutely compelled to obtain seats in the organ-loft. All the avenues between the pews were densely filled; and the most lively interest was taken by a most respectable audience in the business of the evening.

UPON the platform were the following members of the Committee of the United Temperance Association:—Messieurs WESTON, (the Secretary,) GAWTHORP, SIMS, JOHNSON, EALES, and G. W. M. REYNOLDS.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS was called to the Chair: upon taking which, he proceeded to explain the object of the meeting. He said that the case of the Coal-Whippers is a most distressing one, and demands the consideration of all philanthropists. The facts connected with that afflicted body of men are these. They are compelled to apply to the publicans of Wapping for employment: the monopoly of all the labour of unloading colliers being in the hands of those publicans. The result is that the Coal-Whippers can only obtain employment upon condition of dispensing upwards of one-third of their wages with those base and mercenary monopolizers. It was in vain that the Coal-Whippers endeavoured to free themselves from that state of terrible thralldom. The publicans of Wapping (said Mr. Reynolds) are protected and supported by the Coal-proprietors and Ship-owners of the North, who entrusted them with the discretionary privilege of employing the men to unload their vessels that were bound for Wapping. The sail-makers, biscuit-venders, and slop-sellers, are all linked in one grand chain of monopoly and oppression with respect to the Coal-Whippers. Those sail-makers and other tradesmen are for the most part shareholders in colliers, and of course give the working of their ships to those publicans who are patronized by the owners in the North, because those owners in return bestow their custom upon these tradesmen. The publicans take advantage of this power, and compel each Coal-Whipper, for whom they procure employment, to purchase at least nine quarts of beer per diem. This beer is the vilest of all vile compounds, and is charged at an exorbitant price. Then, unless the Coal-Whipper will consent to anticipate his wages every evening, by calling for drink upon the credit of next day's labour, that labour will not be continued to him. The Coal-Whippers are thus compelled to be intemperate; they would gladly emancipate themselves from this frightful condition of being, but they dare not openly break with the publicans. They would cheerfully contribute towards the establishment of an office as a place of call for the labourers and the employers; but the publicans are too powerful to be thus openly opposed. The Common-Council (continued Mr. Reynolds) has been appealed to, and the matter has been referred to the President of the Board of Trade, who has in his turn referred it to the Crown Lawyers, who have most likely forgotten the business altogether. The rich and the potent of the West-end of London know not even by name the nature of the miseries experienced by the denizens of the East-end. He (Mr. Reynolds) implored the meeting to adopt some measures to relieve the unfortunate Coal-Whippers: he said that their cause was the cause of Teetotalism, because the point to be considered was the means of knocking down that barrier which was raised by the publicans of Wapping against the emancipation of the Coal-Whippers from the shackles of intemperance; he added that if the Common Council of London would not aid the Coal-Whippers, then the Government should be appealed to; and if the Government would not grant them redress, then the members of the United Temperance Association would march in procession to Downing street, and demand justice in behalf of those wretched men.

MR. JOHNSON then rose and addressed the meeting. He said that the philanthropist could scarcely believe that such oppression and misery could exist in a civilized country—in England, the land of freedom and of Bibles—in England, which had emancipated the blacks, and which could boast of so many charitable asylums and humane institutions. Those poor degraded beings would be virtuous if they could, but the publicans would not let them. He (Mr. Johnson) could not do otherwise than deeply deprecate the appalling inhumanity of the publicans, much as he disliked the usage of strong personal vituperation at any time. But this is a matter in which men must speak the truth—and speak that truth boldly. Public opinion should be appealed to; and public opinion should be the advocate of the Coal-Whippers against the oppression of the Publicans. The Chairman (said Mr. Johnson) had spoken truly in denominating the cause of the Coal-Whippers the cause of Teetotalism; and he hoped that all the Teetotalers then present would join in rescuing the Coal-Whippers from the galling chains of oppression. He said that Christianity demanded the emancipation of the slaves of Wapping in the same way as it had demanded and achieved the liberation of the slaves of the West Indies. He then proposed that a committee of some of the members of the United Temperance Association be nominated to take into consideration the best means of assisting the unfortunate Coal-Whippers—of agitating in their favour—of advocating their cause—and of taking the necessary steps to hold larger meetings, and make their grievances more extensively known. Mr. Johnson then proposed a Resolution to the effect that Messrs. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, WESTON (the Secretary), CRUMP (the Registrar), POKKELL, SIMS, and WILSON, be nominated members of the Committee proposed, with power to add to their numbers.

CAPTAIN LOWES seconded this resolution, and moved that Mr. Johnson's name be added to the list already proposed. He then made a most able speech, in which he corroborated the foregoing statements relative to the miseries of the Coal-Whippers, and the oppressive conduct of the publicans.

GEORGE APPLGATE and O'BRIEN then consecutively detailed the particulars of their grievances in the most moving and pathetic language. They showed the terrible effects of the evils of intemperance in respect to the Coal-Whippers, and declared that the ruin of hundreds of families at Wapping was annually accomplished through the means of the villainous conduct of the publicans of that district. The daughters of the Coal-Whipper become prostitutes, and the sons of the Coal-Whipper become thieves.

MR. COWELL, a coal-meter, then addressed the meeting in corroboration of the statements made by the foregoing speakers. He (Mr. Cowell) had invariably set his face against the oppressions of the publicans, and his disinterested line of conduct had frequently entailed upon him the insults of those whose monopoly he was helping to destroy.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS then put the resolution, which had been proposed by Mr. Johnson and seconded by Captain Lowes, to the meeting; and it was carried unanimously. A vote of thanks to the chairman was proposed and carried without a single dissentient voice: a most liberal collection was made for the benefit of the Coal-Whippers; and the meeting separated at a quarter before eleven.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The meeting on Saturday evening, August 1st, was most respectably, though not very numerously attended.

MR. WESTON, Secretary and Treasurer to the Association, was called to the chair: after a forcible speech in favour of the great doctrines of Teetotalism, this gentleman proceeded to read a letter from the Rector of Queenhithe, in which the Reverend Minister expressed his advocacy of the grand principle of Total Abstinence, and his determination to forward the interests of the cause to the utmost of his power.

MR. SMEETON was delighted to behold the fathers of families conducting their wives and children to Teetotal meetings. The custom must be productive of the most beneficial results.

MR. WILSON said that he had only been a Teetotaler for nine months, but that he considered that period ample time to test the efficacy of the doctrines of total abstinence. He should imagine that if no other motives would induce men to sign the pledge, selfish ones might at least produce that effect, inasmuch as a great economy was the consequence of total abstinence from those liquors whose price was both health and wealth.

MR. BOWLER, from Kensington, said that he considered Teetotalism to be one of the greatest blessings ever conferred by philanthropy upon society. He then illustrated the good effects of the principles by several interesting and amusing tales.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS delivered a long speech upon the nature, properties, and characteristics of alcohol. He adduced arguments to prove that although the elements of alcohol be in nature, still alcohol is not itself found in a natural state. He described the process of fermentation and the manner of distilling spirits; he demonstrated the fact that beer and wine are more noxious to the human frame than simple spirits diluted with water; and he concluded by refuting the common objection of the opponents of Teetotalism—viz. "that alcohol is a good creature of God, and is therefore adapted to our use."

MR. BENSTEAD, said that the brain is the great laboratory whence all ideas are eliminated. The brain is delicate—tender—and irritable; and the least act of intemperance materially injures it. Where then is the difference between the suicide who with one blow severs the long connecting mind, or life, and the body—and he who effects the same end by more gradual measures? The brain is made perfect by the Deity; but it is easily rendered imperfect, if trifled with. Any change that it experiences through the habits of man, must change its condition for the worse. It is so nicely adapted to the mysterious duties that it has to perform, that no variation, brought about by human interference, can possibly benefit it, save in cases where medical aid is required and properly administered. Mr. Benstead then developed the dreadful effects of intemperance upon the delicate organization of the brain, and proved to demonstration that even a glass of exciting liquor is calculated to produce prejudicial effects.

MR. GAWTHORP (the delegate who has lately been advocating the cause of Teetotalism at Manchester and the other great manufacturing towns) then addressed the meeting, and expatiated upon the increasing importance of the United Temperance Association. He gave a brilliant account of the successful nature of his mission, and took that opportunity of observing that Teetotalers of all classes, of all societies, of all associations, and of all principles, in those districts which he had visited, were glad to hail the appearance of The Teetotaler journal. He felicitated the Association upon possessing the best organ of Teetotal progress that had as yet been issued to the world, and wound up an able speech with several powerful arguments in favour of total abstinence.

MR. GREEN made some very able and talented remarks upon the propriety of remunerating those publicans who would at once abandon their traffic in alcoholic poisons; and upon the impropriety of the clergy of the Church of England not more generally advocating the blessed cause of Total Abstinence.

NOTTING-HILL, BAYSWATER, AND KENSINGTON United Friendly Society of Total Abstinents.

The Committee of this Association assembled at the Temperance Coffee-house, Kensington, on August 3rd, when the following resolutions were proposed by Mr. Mee, seconded by Mr. Bowler, and carried unanimously:—

"That this Association do now unite itself with the United Temperance Association.

"That the first meeting, after the junction, be held on Monday, August 17th, at the Camden chapel, Kensington Gravel Pits, and that Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds be requested to take the chair on that occasion.

"That the second meeting, after the junction, be held on Thursday, the 20th of August, at the same place, and that Mr. Benstead be requested to take the chair on that occasion."

EAST LONDON TEMPERANCE HALL, CHURCH ROW. BETHNAL GREEN.

On Monday evening, August 3rd, the Bethnal Green Branch of the United Temperance Association held their weekly meeting, Mr. Adkins in the chair. The meeting was forcibly addressed by Messrs. Baylis, Marriott, Parker, Gawthorp, and Bastion; when several signatures were obtained.

The members of the Stratford Auxiliary to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society intend to walk in procession to the Forest on Monday the 17th of August. To start from the Sunday School at Bow at 1 o'clock, pass through Stratford and Leyton, and hold a public meeting in the Forest at 5 o'clock, at which the Rev. W. R. Baker is expected to preside.

On Wednesday the 19th instant, at 7 o'clock, the new Temperance Hall at Plaistow, will be opened: on which occasion, Mr. Whittaker and other advocates are expected. Admission, by Tickets, 3d each. On the two following evenings, public meetings will be held, to commence at 7 o'clock. All friends of Temperance are respectfully invited. J. BURTON, Secretary.

The Welch Total Abstinence Society will hold a Meeting at Aldersgate Chapel, on Friday, the 7th of August, when the Father Matthew of Wales, MR. PARRY, will deliver a Lecture to his countrymen in their own language.

We caution our readers from taking any substitute for spirituous liquors: but as a medicine, when the stomach has lost its tone from previous excess, or other causes, we can safely recommend Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb as a valuable and proper remedy for Teetotalers.

We shall in future publish the List of Meetings every month only.

This Day is Published, Price Half a Crown, 5s. 6d., containing as much letter-press as three volumes of the usual novel form.

SISTER ANNE.
A Novel Translated from the French of Ch. Paul de Kock.
By G. W. M. REYNOLDS.
London:—G. HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey.

VAN BUTCHELL ON FISTULA, &c.—Just published, Fourth Edition, in 8vo., cloth boards, price 7s. 6d., enlarged.

FACTS and OBSERVATIONS relative to a successful mode of treating Piles, Fistula, Hemorrhoidal Excrecences, Tumours, and Strictures, without cutting or confinement: illustrated with numerous cases. Being a familiar exposition of the practice of Mr. S. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur.

"This Volume presents to us a number of illustrations of his singular success under circumstances that would have induced despair in any professor of less mastery, or less accustomed to accomplish cures where cures seemed impossible. The statements here made are most convincing, and place beyond doubt the superiority of the treatment to which they refer."—Court Journal.

Published by H. Reuslaw; sold also by the Author, No. 16, Percy-street, Bedford-square.

DIET—"INGLIS'S DIGESTIVE BREAD"

Is extremely easy of digestion, wholesome and nutritious."—Dr. Walker.

"From the excellence of the materials of which it is composed and the healthful stimulus it produces on the intestinal canal, it cannot fail to prove an invaluable article of diet to all classes of persons, especially those engaged in sedentary employment."—Dr. Spilman.

"Ingles, New-street, Covent-garden, makes very good brown bread. It is well for those who live in town, to know where to find it."—See Graham on Diet and Regime.

"Attend to Diet, regulate your stomach, and that will regulate all the rest of the human frame."—Abernethy.

"My family have been in the habit of eating your brown bread for several years past, and I consider it particularly wholesome and nutritious, and superior to any bread of the kind I have as yet partaken of."—George Jewell, M.D.

Upwards of 100 testimonials may be seen at the shop, New-street, Covent-garden.

BABINGTON'S ELIXIR

Too much praise cannot be given to this medicine, having an inclination to drink Association, but the difficulty is... weakened state of the stomach; but of the medicine "Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit-drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success on all diseases arising from Indigestion; namely, Bilious Head-aches, Diarrhoea, Spasms, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., by J. KING, proprietor, 72, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Far-thingdon-street, and all respectable Chemists.

SIGHT RESTORED.

NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED.
Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.

THIS is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the Eyes and Head.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vade Mecum.

Dr. Andrews also recommends its use as a preventive. (See his report when in Sunderland, published in the Times, Cheltenham Journal, and British Traveller, in November, 1831.) He says:—"The herbaceous quality of the snuff had such an effect on the stomach, as well as the nerves of the head, from the tenacious sympathy of the membrane of the nose with the nervous system, that Grimstone's Eye Snuff, when taken frequently, must prevent any contagion entering the System, and recommends its universal adoption." Dated 10th Nov., 1831.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield's, Esq., Letter.

THE ECCENTRIC SNUFF-TAKER.

Should trade be dull and times go rough.

Oh! give me then a pinch of snuff:

Give me my box a pinch to take.

Even when I'm pleased, for pleasure's sake.

When fortune's frowns disturb my mind.

And friends appear to grow unkind:

Relief I seek within my box.

My system is quite orthodox.

When a true friend perchance I meet.

I cheerfully his person greet.

A hearty "How d'ye do?" takes place.

When lo! my snuff-box shows its face.

My pulveriferous box supplies

A recipe for weaker eyes:

That man must be a silly goose

Who thoughtlessly condemns its use.

If my proboscis could but speak.

'Twould often say the dose repeat:

Each grateful sneeze and titillation

Excites a frequent iteration.

Then here's my glass in which I toast.

Success to that which I love most.

Reader, I pray don't think me bluff—

Mark well the hint!—'tis GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

To MR. W. GRIMSTONE, W. H. W. L., Cooper's Arms, Bristol.

Observe this Caution.—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE INVENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.

Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

MR. A. M. INTYRE, aged 63, No. 8, Silver-street, Golden-square, cured of gutta serena and deafness.

H. LISTON, Esq., Marine Library, Ramsgate, Kent, cured of cataract and deafness.

MRS. HACKETT, cured while at Jamaica of gutta serena, 56, Queen-street, London.

MR. P. SAUNDERS, No. 10, Harper-street, Leeds, cured of cataract.

MR. H. PLUCKWELL, Tottenham House, Tottenham, Middlesex, cured of ophthalmia.

MISS S. ENGLEFIELD, Park-street, Windsor, cured of nervous head-ache.

MARCHIONESS DE BRAGLIA SOLARI, 46, Charlotte-street, hearing and sight restored.

DECIANUS BLACKBURN, Esq., Chertsey, Surrey, head-ache, weakness, and dimness of sight cured.

GEORGE SMITH, Esq., 6, York-place, Kentish town, weakness and dimness of sight cured by its use.—(See letter.)

ELIZABETH ROBSON, 19, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, aged 65, cured of Ophthalmia and deafness.

Copy of a letter sent to Mr. Grimstone, Feb. 10th, 1840.

Sir,—Having been afflicted with bad eyes for a long time, a friend who had received benefit from using your Eye Snuff, recommended it to me. I have taken the contents of your 2s. 4d. canister; and am happy to say my sight has improved; the weakness and dimness is removed; and, Sir, it is my wish that you may make this known for the good of the public. Yours,

G. YORK-PLACE, KENTISH TOWN. GEORGE SMITH.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, inventor of Eye Snuff, 19, Broad-street, Bloomsbury, March 2nd, 1840.

Sir,—I have been afflicted for many years with a severe pain in my head, attended with a dimness of sight and certain pains in my eyes, for which I have had the first medical advice; indeed, I have taken large quantities, without receiving any relief; but I am now delighted to say, with truth, that ever since using your valuable Eye Snuff, which I have taken copiously, that is a 2s. 4d. canister weekly, I am quite free from those excruciating pains, and can read the smallest print, a thing I am in the 60th year of my age. This is my third testimony, and shall be most happy to give it to you or to any respectable enquirer at my residence as under. I remain, with gratitude, sir, your obedient humble servant.

E. ROBSON.

19, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, Marylebone.

This odoriferous Herbaceous Compound of Herbs is sold in canisters at 8s., 1s. 3d., 2s. 4d., 4s. 6d., and 15. 6d., by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists, in town and country; by whom dealers may be supplied. It can be obtained in all the principal towns and cities. A liberal allowance to Shippers, owners, captains, and all vendors of Grimstone's Eye Snuff. This celebrated Snuff is shipped to all quarters of the globe, and retains its benign qualities in every climate. All Snuffs and Cigars shipped on the shortest notice.

Proprietors of newspapers and periodicals are particularly requested not to insert any of Mr. Grimstone's advertisements without a written order, as no account, in future, will be paid without his authority for the insertions.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers, Price Ninepence.

To THE TRADE.—Back Numbers changed.

LONDON:—J. WILSON, Printer, 38, Red-Cross Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 8.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"THE TEETOTALER" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association; the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. STRANOE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER IX.

THE STRANGER.—TEMPTATION.

As soon as Mr. Robus had delivered to Melville the letter, which produced so strange an effect upon the young man, he hastened down stairs to pursue his usual avocations. These avocations chiefly consisted in writing out fair copies of his lodgers' bills, and delivering them at the respective doors of those tenants. He however found it a much more easy task to write out than to collect the amounts due to him; and he frequently assured his friend the milk-man, and his flying acquaintance the two-penny postman, "That if it weren't for an occasional drop of half-an-half he didn't know how he ever should get through the fatigues of the day." This was one amongst the numerous delusions that intemperance imposes upon its votaries.

Be it known, then, to all men, by these presents, that Mr. Robus proceeded to his own apartment as soon as he had delivered the letter to Victor Melville. But scarcely had Mr. Robus seated himself at a table, and commenced the addition of the three-pair back's running account (so called because the three-pair back did subsequently run away without paying it,) when a low knock was heard at his door.

"Come in," shouted Mr. Robus: and his invitation was immediately obeyed.

The door opened, and an old man, of about sixty-five years of age, and of venerable appearance, entered the apartment. This individual was bowed down, by the weight of affliction as well as of years; and this much was betrayed by his deeply-thoughtful countenance. There was a certain dread and timidity about the manners of the stranger which only tended to increase the native impudence of Mr. Robus. He was well dressed, and appeared to belong to that class of society which bears the miscellaneous denomination of "gentlemen."

"Sit down, Sir," said Mr. Robus, indicating a chair with his left hand, and helping himself to a draught from a pewter-pot with his right.

"I thank you," answered the stranger, with an accent which immediately proclaimed him to be a foreigner—a fact that delighted the heart of Mr. Robus, who was resolved that, if any business were to be done, due advantage should be taken of the presumed ignorance associated with foreign extraction. "I believe you are in the habit of letting lodgings?" added the stranger.

"Well, that is von o' my numerous habits," answered Mr. Robus; and he might have added that drunkenness was too; but he prudently suppressed that unnecessary particular.

"Have you a lodging to dispose of now?" demanded the stranger; then, without waiting for a reply, and apparently forgetful that he was overheard by a soul, he said in a low and musing tone, "Yes—I will retire from the busy world.—I will fly that phantom which is ever pursuing me,—I will hide my head in this retreat—and there—there—there will I die!" and as he thus gave vent to his excited feelings, he struck his forehead violently with his clenched fist, as if he were in a paroxysm of rage.

"A lodging, is it that you want?" cried Mr. Robus, who did not trouble himself much with the affairs of other people, unless those affairs were more or less connected with his own: "well—I am quite full now, Sir. There was that there lovely room as the Irishman and his family lived in, and was never cleaned out all the time; but that's taken by the cat's-meat man as supplies this very thickly populated neighbourhood. But—if you really wants a room—and as you seems a decent sort o' chap—why—I don't care if I let you have this here."

The stranger was a man of very few words, and he immediately concluded a bargain with Mr. Robus for the apartment in which they were then seated. It was pretty tolerably furnished by Mr. Robus's own moveable materials; and a second bargain was immediately ratified for them. The stranger did not attempt to cheapen the price put upon the furniture by the landlord; and the landlord did not attempt to act over honestly in the transaction. The consequence was that the stranger paid about fifty per cent. above the cost price of the furniture. Mr. Robus was so overjoyed at this unexpected piece of good luck that he proceeded to an adjacent public-house, where he expended in reckless dissipation the greater portion of that which he had acquired by the most deliberate dishonesty.

In the meantime, Mr. Tibbatts sought his friend Victor Melville as usual.

"My dear boy," said Titus, "what means this air of dejection—this mournful countenance? You resemble Cato meditating suicide."

"Alas! nothing but misery pursues me in this world," said Melville, as he pointed towards the letter which he had just received, and which lay open upon his bed.

"What, bad news!" ejaculated Mr. Tibbatts. "Ah! my dear boy, and I have not a single drop of anything to console you."

Victor shuddered at the sense of this observation flashed upon his mind, and he ground his teeth with the ferocity of a maniac.

"If you knew," said he to his companion, "what it is to love—and if you knew what it was to feel assured that the object of that affection is overwhelmed with grief, while you are unable to fly to her relief, to assist her with your advice, to console and comfort her, then would you give way to the force of your affliction. There is a young girl in the vicinity of Paris, at this moment—a young girl of exquisite beauty and great accomplishments—a young girl whose personal and mental endowments would adorn a queen,—a young girl, in a word, who adores me, who would lay down her life to make mine happy, and who is at this instant suffering and wretched. She has just lost the kind guardian of her youth—her more than parent—the man who has acted a father's part to her: he is gone—gone to the cold grave, and left a warm heart behind to mourn his loss."

"Why don't you marry this Phoenix of all perfection?" demanded Mr. Tibbatts, carelessly sitting down upon the edge of the bed, while Victor rose and proceeded to dress himself.

"Marry her!" ejaculated Victor, in a hoarse tone of voice: "marry her!" he repeated, laughing wildly. "What—marry her, without a farthing to provide for us! It is sufficient for me to dream all day and all night of misery for myself; but misery for another—misery for a third—misery for a fourth—misery for numbers—for misery is as prolific as was the box of Pandora—oh! all this is too horrible to think of!"

There was a decanter of water upon the table; Victor took it up and emptied it almost at a draught.

"Water! water!" he exclaimed; "would that I had never drank anything but water;" and then he began to walk up and down his chamber.

Nothing is so bad as to turn about in a narrow space: the wolf turns, the sorceress turns, the eagle turns: to turn about is to encourage the presence of misery; hell is invoked by turning about in that foreboding fashion. The more Victor increased his steps and augmented the number of his circles, the more his head wandered, and his brain became confused. His lips were white, his cheeks were burning; from his mouth emanated a whirlwind of scarcely articulated and unintelligible words; and his whole frame trembled. He forgot that another human being was in the room; he thought only of his companion, misery! And like none other is that companion; having no heart, no soul, no smiles, no tears, no pity,— naught that is proper to human companionship. Any other comrade—aye, even among comrades in a gaol—attaches himself to his comrade, and shares with him the little that he has, even where he has nothing to share. But misery is a wretch who speaks not, sighs not even, gives no answering glance, yet presses on you with a weight like lead. Suddenly Victor opened the window and looked into the court beneath. He appeared irresolute, uncertain how to act, and seemed to calculate the chances of life and death; and then he once more resumed his walk up and down the room. But death was always in his eyes, death was in his gestures, death was in all his thoughts. He hastened once again towards the window—a curse issued from his lips—he leapt upon a chair to reach the sill—he was about to execute his horrible purpose of suicide, when a strong arm pulled him back, and the voice of Tibbatts recalled him to his proper senses.

"That is not the shortest way to marry the girl," said Titus, as he closed the window, and returned to his seat upon the bed. "Cato was a coward—so was Cleopatra: Victor Melville shall not follow their example."

"I am a wretch—unfit to live!" ejaculated our hero in a tone of despair.

"Let us see whether we cannot induce you to honour this world a little longer with your presence. Have you any money?"

"Not a farthing," was the answer. "We expended all my stock last night at the beggars' assembly room."

"Have you anything to eat?"

"Nothing."

"Nor I."

And the two men exchanged such looks with each other as two hungry, poverty-stricken men would exchange in such a case.

"I wish I knew where or how to obtain a few pounds!" ejaculated Victor, as his ideas were once more reflected towards the far-distant orphan whom he loved, and who solicited his advice—because she had no other friend whose counsel she could implore. Oh! he thought of her—of her who was so beautiful and whom he loved. He then called to mind every lineament of her fair face—he remembered that she possessed one of those charming countenances that sometimes emanate from the pencil of Watteau—one of those thousand-and-one feminine animations which belong to him alone, and which he knows so well how to depict upon the canvass—a charming creature, with a complexion of milk and roses—with a delicious though melancholy smile—shining hair, and luxurious contours of form. Yes—Victor thought of his absent mistress, first as a lovely thing which seized upon and captivated his imagination—then as a soft lustre which stole for a moment upon the dark cloud of his ideas, like an angel passing into the hell of his soul,—and then, by dint of thinking upon so much youth, innocence, accomplishments, and beauty, he felt steal into his heart that which he had never felt before—a kind of icy-cold that made his teeth chatter—a kind of remorse that made all the misery of his mind the more appalling!

"You wish you had a few pounds?" said Mr. Tibbatts, slowly, and gazing fixedly upon Victor's countenance.

"I do—I do!" cried the young man. "Oh! to know that she is there—all alone—without protectors—and not to be enabled to fly to her!"

"The case is very urgent, then?" said Tibbatts, eyeing Melville as before.

"Very—very," was the impatient reply.

"Robus has money," said Tibbatts, assuming a careless air.

"But he would not lend it to a stranger—he would not assist me," cried Victor.

"We would not ask him," laconically returned Mr. Tibbatts.

"Then of what use was your observation, that he had money?" demanded Victor.

"You say the case is urgent," replied Tibbatts, pretending to be looking towards the mantel-piece; "you want to get away from here as soon as you can—you will perhaps lose the girl if you don't—so I just thought—"

"Thought what?" interrupted our hero, a partial shudder creeping over him.

"Oh! don't bother me," said Tibbatts. "If you want the money, it can be had—that's all; and if we don't get it, we shall starve—that's all again."

These words were uttered with an affected pettishness that added materially to the mystification in which Victor's mind was enveloped relative to the real meaning of his new friend. A long pause ensued: he did not choose—he knew not wherefore—to ask for any farther explanation; and Tibbatts remained in a half-sulky, half-musing attitude on the bed.

"Well, this won't do," said Tibbatts, after a long silence. "We can't starve—that's very certain."

"I see no other prospect," quietly remarked Victor.

Mr. Tibbatts suddenly rose from his seat, hurried out of the room, and returned at the expiration of about ten minutes with the well-known case-bottle in his hands. How he obtained the liquor Victor did not think of inquiring: he suffered himself to be prevailed upon to partake of the alcoholic poison produced by the tempter; and he suddenly felt curious to know at what end his companion had ere now been aiming. Another glass of brandy was poured out for him and drunk: and he then hazarded a leading question.

"Why, I'll tell you what it is," answered Tibbatts, a demonic smile of satisfaction and triumph playing upon his lips—"the truth is, Robus has got plenty of money—and I know where he keeps it. It is all in a small bag in his portmanteau: the rascal! he's often consigned the produce of my brain to that spot! He sleeps deuced hard—and, as you could replace the money on your return—and as he would never miss it—why—"

"Say no more!" cried Victor: a deadly pallor overspreading his countenance, and his whole frame trembling, as he now comprehended his companion's design.

"Well—just as you like!" said Mr. Tibbatts coolly; and he handed Victor another glass of the burning fluid.

The young man seized it—swallowed it to drown thought—and, as he had as yet eaten nothing that morning, he soon felt the effects of the liquor ascending to his head. He then thought once more of Louise's letter, and settled all his ideas upon a paragraph in which she styled him her only friend and adviser. He knew not what step to pursue: he did not like the idea of writing to her, confessing the denuded state of his resources, and soliciting the means of joining her in Paris; and he felt deeply anxious to proceed without delay to that city. He pictured to himself the inexperienced young girl in the hands of the harpies of the law; and he wrung his hands with agony as he thought of his inability to hasten to her assistance. He again paced the room, and Mr. Tibbatts watched him as the boa-constrictor eyes its victim from the bough of the tree nearer the trunk of which that victim is advancing at every step.

Suddenly Victor stopped short and addressed himself to his companion.

"Do you think Robus might be induced by the prospect of heavy interest to lend me the money?" he said.

"He would as soon give as lend," was the reply.

Victor again paced the room. Presently a clock in an adjacent apartment struck the hour of mid-day.

"Twelve! twelve already," said Melville,—"and nothing done!"

"And nothing will be done at this rate," doggedly observed Tibbatts.

"I must write to her," exclaimed Victor, impatiently.

"And where is the money to pay the postage of the letter?" demanded Tibbatts, who seemed resolved to take advantage of every untoward circumstance to excite the feelings of the unhappy young man.

"You will drive me to desperation—to madness! You are my evil genius—to show me my misery in all its nakedness!" cried Victor, almost foaming at the mouth. "What would you have me do?"

"Nothing is more easy than to make yourself comfortable and happy," was the reply.

"How? Speak—I am nerved to hear you," said Melville, folding his arms across his chest.

"You can make Robus act as your banker," answered Tibbatts, handing him the last glass of spirits out of the bottle.

"Well—it could be replaced, as you say," murmured Victor, after he had imbibed the intoxicating drink which fills the strongest imagination with delusion.

"So it could," added Tibbatts; "and no one ever the wiser."

And then there was a great deal of whispering between the two—and much hesitation and reluctance on the part of Victor—and much persuasion on that of his companion. At length Victor ceased to speak save at long intervals; and Tibbatts continued talking in a low and very earnest tone, while the young hero of this tale sat by him, and listened to all he said with the deepest attention.

At length Victor broke silence once more, after a long—long pause.

"When—when can it be done?" said he, in a low and hoarse tone, and laying one of his feverish hands upon Tibbatts' arm.

"To-night—to-night at twelve," was the reply.

"And then I shall be able to start to-morrow!" murmured Victor, as he endeavoured to steel his soul against the approach of compunction and the warning voice of the good genius that had not as yet entirely deserted him.

To be continued in our next.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES IN AMERICA.

At the first formation of Temperance Societies the total abstinence of spirituous liquor was not contemplated, their occasional use being permitted to their members: their abuse only being strictly forbidden. It was in the United States, in the city of Boston, that, for the first time, a union was entered into, and those who formed it were associated together by the common bond of sobriety; but it was ten years later that, in this same city, many of the most influential inhabitants entered into a determination, which they most strictly adhered to themselves, of avoiding all fermented liquors, and of discountenancing their use in others. In 1828, two years after the enrolment of the names of those who formed a society of this nature, there were no less than 220 similar institutions, comprising nearly 30,000 persons, all animated with one spirit, not that of Bacchus and Mars, two of the most mischievous maniacs that ever made their escape from Babel, but of Temperance and Sobriety. The effect upon the mortality of persons under the age of forty was visible in the following year; and wherever the system has been pursued, a decrease in the number of deaths has rapidly followed. In the year 1834, a central body was formed in Philadelphia, with associations in every town in the United States; from the great body of the people, the determination quickly spread throughout the army and navy. In 1832, 500 vessels quitted the American ports without a supply of spirits on board; and such was the feeling of increased safety to the vessels, that the underwriters lowered their rate of assurance; and that they were borne out in their estimate of diminished danger was fully proved. It has been satisfactorily demonstrated that vessels which were strictly upon the Temperance system, have made more prosperous and more rapid voyages than others. One fact is of the most extraordinary character—that 161 whaling vessels out of 186 employed, took not a drop of spirits on board; and although they had to encounter the cold, the privations, the miseries of a north sea, the crews returned healthier, happier, and more successful, than did those who repudiated the opinions and the customs of this vast and prevailing sect.

AN APPEAL

To the Manufacturers and Venders of Intoxicating Beverages.

(Abridged from the original Tract)

BY THE REV. FRANCIS BEARDSALL.

ALLOW me, under the influence of deep solicitude for your present and eternal welfare, to address you, not in the language of reproach, but of earnest solicitation. Do not, I entreat you, turn away from the appeal of a sincere friend, who deeply sympathizes with you, while he depicts and deprecates the effects of your traffic. Christian philanthropy urges me to the too long neglected duty of attempting the rescue of the perilled maker, vender, and consumer of intoxicating beverages. I would spread the mantle of charity over your motives, and draw the curtain of oblivion over the past, while, with uncompromising fidelity, I endeavour to expose the immorality and awful consequences of your business; and, if needful, in thunder-tone, warn you of your danger and impending ruin. There are those among you who need to be addressed in pointed terms. I address you as my fellow-men, and some of you as my brethren in Christ. I suppose you are aware of the progress of Teetotalism—that you have heard of its triumphs, especially in Ireland and America—that you have heard of the disastrous results in reference to the traffic in intoxicating beverages. I expect it is unnecessary to apprise you of the steady progress of the Temperance reformation in England, by which the fate of the traffic is predicted, and its final overthrow made as certain, as that Divine light and truth will progress, and finally, destroy every abomination, than which, we are assured, there are none more vile than the drinking system. I suppose you know that there are some individuals, and not a few, among whom I have the honour to rank, who are bent upon the extinction of your traffic. Your serious attention is therefore solicited to the following appeal, and to the timely warning hereby given, that you may, without delay, abandon your traffic, and seek by honourable means to obtain the providential blessings of heaven, and, instead of contributing to the immorality, degradation, and final destruction of your fellow-men, you may secure your own, and promote their eternal welfare.

Perhaps you may not be conversant with the following facts, which claim your serious consideration. Intoxicating beverages are not, properly speaking, natural productions, but are obtained only by the decomposition or destruction of the good creatures of a beneficent Providence. They are, properly speaking, poisons, and, as beverages, are by the Divine and universal laws of the human constitution forbidden. (See Drs. Mussey and Grimrod's Prize Essays.) The opinion entertained by some good, but mistaken men, viz.—that the Scriptures sanction the use of intoxicating wine, &c., is incapable of proof; but the contrary is clearly proved. Prov. xx. and xxviii. Chaps. (See our Treatise on Wines.) It should be remembered that the preparation of malt for fermented beverages is a regular system of Sabbath-breaking. Indeed there is not a single view in which the drinking system can be contemplated by the light of Divine truth, without discovering its deformity and diabolical character.

I appeal to you, then, as men. Will you continue to traffic in that which breaks the social bond, and brutalizes your fellow-men? The drinks you make and sell have given a peculiar tenacity to their victims, who, even in the midst of an enlightened British population, have exhibited a brutality worse than is known in savage tribes, or even among the most ferocious beasts of prey; for these fight and destroy one another with more decency than do the men and women who are enraged by your drinks: and will you—I ask again, in the face of the daily scenes of brutality—will you continue in connexion with such a trade? If the traffic must be continued, leave it to demons, but let men abandon and abhor it.

I appeal to you as humane men, and ask if you can consistently continue that system of human slaughter, which is the natural result of your traffic. I do not say you wish thus to slaughter the bodies and souls of your fellow-men. I know you would rather they did not suffer; and you sometimes mourn over "the heaps of slain which cry out for vengeance on you!" but whatever humane feelings you may possess, unless you abandon your traffic, and close your shambles, the work of death will continue. Mere sympathy is not only unavailing, but aggravating. I could take you to scenes of blood, which might make even the callous heart of a Wine and Spirit Merchant cease to beat, and chill the vital fluid in his veins—scenes which are of daily occurrence in connexion with your breweries, distilleries, wine and spirit vaults, public-houses, &c., properly denominated slaughter-houses. See the brutal and murderous frays of (when sober, kind and generous-hearted) Irishmen, infuriated by the drink you sell to them, and for which you take the money which should buy their famished children bread. Visit the scenes of bloodshed and murder—of suicide and accidental deaths, with which our newspapers teem, and which, if the Coroner's Inquests were faithful, would record a verdict against you. Go to the desolations of the once comfortable habitations of your victims: hear the deep sighs and moans of a broken-hearted mother, and the cries of her half-starved children, whose bread your children eat. Thus contemplate the wretchedness entailed by your traffic, and ask yourself, is it humane to promote such scenes of woe? Let the Wine Merchant remove the curtain which covers more private and respectable life, and gaze upon the hidden abominations produced by the vile compound in which he trades. Again regale your senses. Look upon that system of slavery, physical and mental which your traffic produces, more galling than West Indian bondage, and so filthy and abominable as to forbid description. Listen to the ravings and yells of the maniac, and the clanking of the felon's chains. Let the horrid stench from accumulated disease salute your olfactory nerves, and with the hand which took the price of the hunger-bitten children's bread, close the wounds of the bruised drunkard's wife—then raise to your lips that mess of something, and taste the wretched substitute for food; and ask again, Is this the work of humanity? And will you still continue this cruel trade?—it cannot be! Are you not human beings? then be humane, and cease to traffic in intoxicating drinks.

I appeal to you as Patriots. England might be much more worthy of regard, with all her faults, if this foulest blot, your traffic (the bloody hand) were taken from her escutcheon. That man is not a father to his country, who employs the means by which its physical, intellectual, and moral character is injured. He is an unnatural parent, who, instead of sustaining, famishes his children. He who takes and eats or drinks his children's food—who leaves them unprotected, and, after long abuse, murders those who call him by the name of father, is denominated a monster. Such are many drunkards. What then are the drunkard makers? They are not Patriots. Domestic scenes like these are miniature representations of the national character, the result of your traffic, which imposes the most debasing slavery on a people; who, living under drink's "strong delusions," still boast of freedom. And will you yet impose these bonds, and curse your country? Break! break your own, and your country will be free.

I urge you to abandon your traffic, by the appeals which the claims of your victims and their dependants make—by the wide-spread desolations of intoxicating drinks—by the accumulation of human woe, the result of your traffic—by the degradation of your depopulated country, giving its 50,000 drunkards annually to death and hell—by the constant companions of your traffic, poverty, disease, and crime—by the gloom of the felon's cell—by the suspended victim on the gallows—by the banished transport—by the tears and sighs of the drunkard's wife—by the cries of her famished children—by bereaved families—by the ravings of the asylum—by disease in all its aggravated forms—by the blasted hopes in our youth—by the squandered fortunes—by the shattered constitution—by the dying drunkard.

THE PONT NEUF.—A TALE.

[Of all the evil associations of the vice of drinking, gambling is one of the most constant and the most pernicious. To warn our readers against the terrible results of gambling, we have extracted the following episodic tale from "Pickwick Abroad." It is supposed to be narrated to Mr. Pickwick, by a Gendarme of the name of Dumont.]

THE night was dark and stormy—the rain fell in torrents—and as I occasionally looked over the high parapet of the Pont Neuf, or New Bridge, I could catch a glimpse of the rapid waters of the Seine flashing as they passed through the wide arches, even in the midst of gloom and obscurity. Ever and anon the moon made a feeble essay to pierce through the clouds that veiled her; and then the tall towers of Notre Dame were faintly visible, their black and threatening appearance adding fresh gloom to the scene.

I drew my cloak closely around me, and walked at a quick pace up and down the bridge. A murder, under circumstances peculiarly horrible and revolting, had been committed there the night before; and information had been received at the Prefecture, that a gang of desperate characters intended to haunt that quarter, in order to intercept any individuals who might be obliged to traverse the bridge in the dead of night. To prevent the commission of farther atrocities, a Gendarme was ordered to patrol the Pont Neuf and that part of the Island which lies in its immediate vicinity, until some clue should be discovered to track the assassins.

This was in the year 1827; and it was the first time I had been appointed to a dangerous service. I had only been incorporated amongst the body about six weeks—and hitherto my duties had not compromised my safety. Now every thing was to be dreaded at the hands of the midnight murderers whose motions I was appointed to watch; and the utmost circumspection, keenness, and courage were necessary.

The hour of midnight struck at the College of Four Nations; and, as if it had waited for that gloomy hour to commence its rage, the storm, that had been for some time gathering, burst forth with appalling violence. The lightning glared in frequent flashes; and while its vivid rays illuminated the atmosphere, the towers of Notre Dame, the domes of the University, the Sorbonne, the Pantheon, and the Hospital of Invalids, although each so far apart from the others, all distinctly met my view as I cast a hasty glance around.

It was nearly one o'clock, and the storm continued with unabated violence. Being in the month of September, the night was cold, in the extreme; and my thick cloak was but a feeble protection against the intemperance of the weather. During the momentary silence that ensued immediately after a loud clap of thunder, hasty footsteps fell upon my ear, and a momentary struggle—as if it were between two or three men—took place at a little distance. I ran to the spot whence I fancied the noise proceeded—a sudden flash of lightning aided my steps—and at the moment when I laid my hand upon the arm of an individual against whom I ran, the splash of a heavy body falling into the waters below convinced me that a foul deed had been accomplished, and that I had arrived too late.

Without losing my presence of mind for one moment, I detained the person, whom I had secured, in a firm grasp, and called loudly for assistance. The sound of retreating footsteps instantly fell upon my ears, and I knew that one of the accomplices had escaped. Engaged as I was in holding an individual who struggled violently and with a considerable degree of strength, it was impossible to pursue, or even attempt to secure the fugitive.

"Release me!" cried the voice of an evidently young man, in deepest agony—it was the voice of him whom I had arrested—"release me, and ample shall be your reward!"

"Not for worlds—not for all the treasures of France and Navarre!" cried I, having entirely mastered his resistance, and effectually made him my prisoner.

"O think of my disgrace—of my ruin—of the infamy that will accrue to a noble house!" he continued, his voice almost choked with inward emotion.

"Who are you?" said I, as I led him across the bridge towards the Island of the City.

"Oh! if I only thought that the revelation of my name—of my rank—and the certainty of a liberal reward from my poor old father—who, God knows! is ignorant of the vicious courses pursued by his son, his only son—his heir—Oh! I would tell you all!"

"Monsieur," said I in a determined tone of voice, "communicate nothing to me that you would not have repeated to my superiors: for to the guard-house you must go!"

No sooner had I uttered these words, than by a sudden and desperate effort of skill more than of strength, he released himself from my grasp, sprang upon the parapet of the bridge, and was about to join the person whom he had a few minutes before consigned to a watery grave, when I, fortunately for the ends of justice—though unhappily as it regarded himself—caught the skirt of his coat, and again made him my prisoner. In a few moments he was carefully secured in the guard-house on the Quai des Orfèvres.

On the following morning I attended at the office of a Commissary of Police of the arrondissement, and made my deposition. The accused was immediately sent for, and when he was taken into the presence of the magistrate, he was instantly recognised by that gentleman as a Monsieur St. Leon, the only son of a Count of the same name. His father was one of the richest and most respected noblemen in the Faubourg Saint-Germain; but the accused, his son, was one of the most dissipated young men, and one of the most notorious gamblers, in Paris. On being requested to give an account of himself, and explain the extraordinary circumstances that had occurred on the Pont Neuf, as related above, he obstinately denied the fact of a murder having been committed, persisting in declaring that the sound of no splash in the water had met his ears, and that he was as unjustly suspected as he had been shamefully detained.

At this stage of the examination, an individual, whom I recognised to be the concierge or porter of the Morgue, entered the office, and requested to speak to the Commissary of Police. An audience was accordingly granted in a private room; and when the magistrate re-entered the cabinet, his cheek was pale, and his countenance indicated extreme horror. A spectacle so unusual in a public functionary of the police produced an immediate and singular sensation within me. Meantime the Commissary seated himself once more—reflected for some minutes—and then, suddenly turning to the prisoner, said in an impressive tone of voice, "Unhappy young man! I can scarcely believe the tale I have just heard:—and yet, if it be true, you must have mistaken one for another—for another, perhaps, whom you had previously met at the gaming-table, and whose pockets were filled with the produce of an iniquitous passion! It is not for me to judge you, young man—God grant you may be innocent! Suspensions of a serious nature rest against you—a higher tribunal must decide upon their validity. In the meantime, let me tell you that fate—destiny—or, rather, your own vices have probably prepared for you an awful doom—and a terrible tale remains for you to hear!"

St. Leon's knees trembled—his cheek became very pale—his eyes rolled wildly—and his whole frame became suddenly enervated. The Commissary noticed the effect he had produced upon the accused—and, probably satisfied with the result of his exordium, he proceeded as follows:—

"Young man, a deadly deed was committed last night—a mangled corpse lies at the Morgue, exposed to public view at this moment—the features are disfigured, most probably by a concussion against the projecting stones of one of the pillars of the bridge—but a letter in the pockets of the deceased—a letter addressed to him—proves his identity with—listen, young man, and tremble—for that mangled corpse, with those lacerated features—that corpse is all that remains of your father!"

"O horror, horror! a parricide!" cried St. Leon—and he sank senseless on the floor, whence he was raised, and immediately conveyed to the prison of the Conciergerie adjoining the Palace of Justice.

"What o'clock is it now?" enquired St. Leon in an almost inaudible tone of voice.

"Half-past-six," was my reply.

"And they come at seven—do they not?" he added convulsively.

"At seven precisely," I answered.

"Not a minute later—not even one single, paltry minute!" cried he, his tongue barely giving utterance to the words in which he thus expressed his wish to procrastinate the fatal moment as long as possible.

"Not a minute later," said I, unwilling to hold out delusive hopes to the wretched man.

"In another half-hour, then, they will be here!" exclaimed St. Leon, sitting up in his bed, and clasping his hands together, as he spoke. "Oh! in half an hour they will be here—to lead me to—the scaffold!"

"Pray, compose yourself, Monsieur," I began, sensibly affected myself.

"Compose myself! What—when the very knife of the guillotine is trembling over my head—when hell is yawning to receive me—when my murdered father's curses pursue the parricide, his son—oh! how can I compose a mind lashed by the scourges of ten thousand demons? Compose myself!" he continued in a tone where bitter irony and agonized feelings were expressively blended together—"compose myself! And already the instrument of death is erected—the cold steel glitters in the rays of the morning—already thousands have congregated to witness my last moments—and already have the devils begun to stir up unquenchable fires to punish me for my crimes!"

I shuddered as he spoke, but did not venture an observation. I nevertheless inwardly hoped that it would not often come to my turn to keep my vigils by the bed-side of a condemned malefactor during the last night he had to live.

"Is it possible," said he, after a long pause,—"is it possible that vicious propensities can have led me to commit so horrid a crime? Oh! no—it is impossible—thank God, it is a dream!—it is a dream—a fearful dream! Dumont," said he, in a more tranquil tone.

"Yes," was my answer: "what can I do for you?"

"Dumont," he continued, "I have had a most horrid dream! I fancied that I had murdered my own father—my good, my excellent father, with his white locks, and his kind smile, and his mild blue eye that always beamed tenderly on me—that I did not respect those hoary locks—but that I was a parricide! Oh! all this I dreamt, Dumont—and it was a long, a very long dream! And then I fancied I was in the Conciergerie—in a dungeon, and watched by a Gendarme—but it is all a dream—oh! a most horrible dream!—and you are my friend, Dumont, and ~~was~~ a Gendarme! And then I thought that my last hour was come—"

As he spoke the clock struck seven.

"—And that I heard footsteps in the corridor leading to my cell—"

At that very moment the heavy tramp of approaching feet, drawing nearer and nearer to the door, fell upon my ears.

"—Then," continued the unhappy malefactor, "I dreamt that the clanking sounds of heavy keys were heard—"

And the keys clanked in the door as he uttered these words.

"—And, lastly, that the myrmidons of justice came to take me to the guillotine! But thank God, it is all a dream!"

He ceased—the door flew open—and a couple of Gendarmes, with dark-lanterns in their hands, entered the cell. Although it was perfectly light in the open air, within the condemned dungeons all was gloom and obscurity. St. Leon gazed for one moment upon the military forms that stood before him, and then gave one loud, long, piercing shriek, which echoed far around, and which will ring in my ears till the last day of existence. At the same time he exclaimed, "O God! O horror!—it is not then a dream!"

In a state bordering upon the most listless apathy, into which he relapsed almost immediately after this terrible expression of the deep—deep anguish of his mind, he was led to a room below, where he was forced to swallow a cup of coffee. Another malefactor was to be executed with him—he was already there, and was engaged in smoking his pipe with the utmost coolness. In ten minutes the Gendarmes proceeded to shave the hair away from the backs of the criminals' necks—their coat-collars were cut off—and every thing that might impede the fatal blow of the knife was carefully removed.

St. Leon was condemned to suffer the penalty due to the crime of parricide—namely, to walk to the place of execution with a black veil thrown over his person. The preliminaries being thus completed, the solemn procession towards the scaffold began. An hour was required for the cart, in which the prisoners were conveyed, to reach the fatal spot where the guillotine was for in those times executions took place at the châtelet du Trône. Once—and once only—during this fully impressive journey, did St. Leon raise his head—was when he ascended the steps leading up to the platform of the guillotine. He cast one glance upwards—his whole frame trembled convulsively—his cheek became deadly pale—and a half-smothered cry escaped his lips. The other criminal exhibited as much courage as St. Leon did pusillanimity. He was the first to suffer, and he died like a hero, if such hardihood deserve so distinguished an epithet. His crime had also been murder.

St. Leon was then tied to the fatal plank, which was then perpendicular—his head hung almost upon his breast—he seemed unconscious of all that was going on: till when the plank was lowered to a horizontal position, and then his lips faintly breathed these two words—"My father!" I stood near him on the scaffold—I saw the executioner apply his hand to the cord—the knife, already reeking with blood, fell—and the gory head of the parricide rolled into a basket beneath!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MR. WARD'S of Barnsley wish shall be complied with. He shall hear no more of the party alluded to in the columns of this journal.

The Secretary of the Finchley and Haverley United Temperance Society, will see that the crowded state of our Report-columns has excluded his communication. We regret this circumstance, but will in future insert any report with which he may favour us.

A TEETOTALER is thanked for his letter relative to the malsters. The subject shall be attended to.

We regret that press of matter excluded the communication from Chipping Norton. We shall in future be glad to insert any letter from our correspondent there, and are delighted to perceive that a Rehabilitant Text has been opened in that town at Mr. Nicholl's establishment.

We shall always be glad to hear from the Secretary to the Westminster Friendly Temperance Society.

We must request that our correspondents will forward us their reports in as concise a manner as possible, and that they may be upon a separate page of the letter from that which contains any private observations addressed to ourselves.

W. L. S.'s paper is clever, but it will offend.

TO OUR COUNTRY READERS.

We shall be much obliged to those of our Country Readers, who will favour us with accounts of Temperance progress, and the transactions of Temperance Meetings, in the Provincial Towns. We request the correspondents of the Arms of all Temperance Societies, promising to devote ample space in our columns to such intelligence.

SCALE OF ADVERTISEMENTS.

For an Advertisement, not exceeding eight lines . . . 5s. 6d.
Every succeeding line . . . 4s.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1840.

We read in the Morning Herald of August 5th, that out of twenty-two prisoners for trial in the Crown Court, Guildford, at the Summer Assizes, there was only one individual who could read or write. How lamentable is this condition of things; and how anxious should we be to ascertain, in order to remedy, the causes of so deplorable an ignorance. It will doubtless be acknowledged that the effect of education would be the decrease of crime; and that those parents, who have it in their power to educate their children, or that the government which neglects to supply the poor with elementary schools of instruction, are more or less the causes of a considerable portion of the delinquency which fills the gaols with felons, supplies the penal settlements with transports, and from time to time sends forth a victim to the scaffold.

We shall therefore confine our observations to parents and to the government.

The parents, who possess the pecuniary means of educating their children, but who prefer expending their surplus money in the dissipation of public-houses and taverns, are, alas! too numerous. To gratify their own disgusting taste, and pander to their own vicious habits, they neglect their offspring, and prepare the way for all the guilt and misery which may afterwards overtake their uneducated sons and daughters. It is impossible for a child to gather from his father's lips (even should that father be inclined to give it) a sufficiency of instruction and moral information to serve for the guidance of his future life. The child must learn to read those books which contain the only lessons that can ensure his welfare in this life; and if his education be neglected, his morality is neglected.

Now a word to the government. The government encourages the gin-palaces as a means of revenue, and does not provide a sufficient means of popular education. The Chancellor of the Exchequer coolly and deliberately calculates the amounts which certain duties upon ardent spirits, wines, and malt liquors will produce; but he does not reckon the good effects which would result from the increase of national schools. The government encourages the sale of liquors to the utmost of its power, and then hangs those who commit enormous crimes under the influence of the maddening drink. The government, which ought to exert itself to promote the cause of morality, neglects education, and encourages intemperance. The government deprives the people of the means of being enlightened and of being virtuous, and supplies them with a poison, which irritates all their bad feelings, and hurries them on to commit crime. The government affords its protection to the publican, because the publican is the means of increasing its revenues; and neglects the schoolmaster, because the schoolmaster would teach his scholars to avoid the public-house. The government robs the people of the means of education, and puts to death those whose turpitude had its origin in that want of instruction. Thus the government on one side is convicted of dishonesty; and, on the other, it is morally guilty of murder.

But of what nature should be this education, the deficiency of which we so much deplore? Let it consist simply in reading and writing; and when those attainments are once acquired, the mind of the poor man's child will form itself. Eschew all classical instruction: it is much more important to teach the duties of the present day in the good old vernacular English, than the customs of the olden time in a language which is extinct. A few years ago some outward and visible classical knowledge was as indispensable to one who wished to get on in life, as an acquaintance with the four first rules of arithmetic. Men have blown out their brains for a much less persecution than a certain young nobleman suffered for making a false quantity in a quotation. Whoever has read the Iliad, will wonder that he survived it. In those days illustrations from ancient history were gravely uttered and heard: Thucydides, Demosthenes, and Cicero, had a prescriptive right to be heard by proxy in the senate. Trite quotations and profound bows, smart scholarship and elaborate civility, were the learning and breeding of the age; and it would be difficult to decide which would have been most calamitous to a man, an unclassical memory or an inflexible spine.

If the government would only adopt measures to increase the number of primary schools, and diminish the quantity of gin-palaces, the good results of such an arrangement would speedily be made manifest. In proportion as the public-houses decreased, the pawnbrokers' shops, the prisons, the lunatic-asylums, and the workhouses would disappear; and as rapidly as the schools increased, so would the churches. Now, when a church is built in some particular spot, a couple of gin-palaces spring up, almost simultaneously, at the very doors of that temple of worship; and then, when the gin-shops are erected, a necessity is immediately perceived for a prison. The next buildings that are occupied, are the workhouse and the pawnbroker's establishment; and, if a school be erected at all, it is erected last.

This is a distressing condition of morality and of knowledge—or rather of immorality and ignorance. The government is much to blame for the course which it adopts; and to its evil enactments and disastrous policy may be traced all the evils of society. The government is the great promoter of crime, by encouraging intemperance and neglecting education. Of all shops, the public-houses are alone permitted to remain open at certain hours on a Sunday. The publican may dispense his poisons on the Sabbath; but the baker may not sell the poor starving mendicant a loaf of bread! These are glorious ideas of justice and of morality; these are sapient enactments to command our respect and our veneration. Do we not feel the most unmitigated disgust at that government, or at that senate, which legislate in so ridiculous—nay, in so infamous a manner? Do we not see in these enactments, a corroboration of our former assertion "that the government encourages crime?" and shall we not, as philanthropists, and as men whom all powers of perception and understanding have not altogether abandoned, raise our voices and exclaim against these unjust—these disgraceful—these criminal proceedings, on the part of an authority which ought to command our respect and love?

The misdeeds of our legislators and rulers will undermine all the monarchical institutions of the country, far more rapidly and far more effectually than the machinations of republicanism.

ORATORICAL HINTS FOR OUR ADVOCATES.

Oratory is the art of communicating our ideas orally with power and effect. That branch of oratory which is more particularly devoted to the use of the public speaker has always been found to rise with the progress of civilization. In England it stood much higher towards the close of the last century than at any previous or subsequent period.

The invention of oratory as an art has been ascribed to the Egyptians; Aristides calls eloquence the gift of Mercury; and for the same reason the organ of speech was consecrated to him. He was likewise said to be the interpreter or messenger of the gods, as he excelled in eloquence. Hence we read in the sacred writings that when the people of Lystra took Barnabas and Paul for gods in human shape, because of that sudden and surprising cure which was wrought upon the blind man, they called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercury; for this reason, as the inspired writer tells us, "because he was the chief speaker," that is (as the spectators then thought) the interpreter or spokesman of Barnabas.

Oratory consists of four parts; viz., Invention, Disposition, Elocution, and Pronunciation.

Invention in oratory may be considered as the power of discovering such things as are proper to persuade the judgment and influence the understanding; and, in order to attain this end, the orator purposes to himself three things,—to prove or illustrate the subject upon which he treats,—to conciliate the minds of his hearers,—and to engage their passions in his favour. And as these require different kinds of arguments or motives, it is the province of invention to furnish him with those best fitted for the purpose.

As invention supplies the orator with necessary materials, so disposition directs him how to place them in their proper order, and manage the several parts of a discourse in such a manner that they have a just method and dependence upon one another.

Elocution, or style, is the peculiar manner in which a man expresses his ideas: it is a picture of his thoughts as they rise in succession. The word is derived from the Latin stylus, an instrument employed by the Romans in writing. The foundation of a good style is good sense. Cicero recommends all who are candidates for eloquence and desirous of becoming masters of a good style, to write much. This affords them an opportunity to digest their thoughts and weigh their expressions, so as to give every thing its proper force and evidence, while, by reviewing the composition, they may correct its errors or supply its defects.

Different countries have not only a different language, but a peculiarity of style, suited to their temper and genius. The eastern nations for instance have a lofty and majestic mode of speaking. Their words are full and sonorous—their expressions strong and forcible—and their phraseology warmed with the most lively and moving figures. This is very evident from the Jewish writings in the Old Testament, in which we find a most agreeable mixture of simplicity and dignity. On the contrary, the style of the more northern languages generally partakes of the coldness of their climate.

The chief distinction of style arises from the different subjects or matter of discourse. The manner of speaking no more suits all subjects than the same dress would suit all persons and all ranks. The style, therefore, should always be adapted to the subject. Rhetoricians have divided the varieties of style into three classes; viz, the low or plain style,—the middle or temperate,—and the lofty or sublime. The style of an orator comprehends all the characters of low, middle, and sublime, as they are applied by him in the different parts of his address. For the language must be suited to the subject, and the different views of the speaker necessarily occasion a variety in the manner of expression. Now, an orator has three things in view,—to prove what he asserts,—to represent it in an agreeable light,—and to move the passions. Each of these parts of an orator's address requires a different style. The low style is most proper for proof and information; the middle style is best suited for pleasure and entertainment, but the sublime is necessary to influence the passions. As short periods are proper in the low style; so less care is necessary in their turn and cadency. As the middle style is more adapted for pleasure and delight, it admits of all those beauties and ornaments which soothe and entertain the mind. But it is the sublime style which perfects the orator. This requires the most forcible and emphatical words, the boldest metaphors, and strongest figures.

Pronunciation was anciently called action; though, if we attend to the proper signification of these words, the former respects the voice and the latter the gestures and motions of the body. But, if we consider them as synonymous terms, in this large sense pronunciation or action may be said to be a suitable conformity of the voice, and the several motions of the body, in speaking, to the subject matter of the discourse. Quintilian observes that it is not so much what our compositions are, as how they are pronounced, since it is the manner of delivery by which the audience is moved.

The chief qualities of the voice are strength, clearness, fullness, and smoothness; and various defects of the voice may be lessened by care and attention. The voice must suffer if the organs of speech have not their proper tone.

By gesture is meant a suitable conformity of the motions of the countenance, and several parts of the body, in speaking. A cast of the eye is not in some respects less various and expressive than language. Cicero tells us that he often diverted himself by trying this with Roscius the Comedian, who could express a sentence as many ways by his gestures as he himself by words. Pantomimes are carried on wholly by mutes, who perform every part by gestures only, in a way very intelligible as well as entertaining to the spectators.

The head in calm and sedate discourse ought to keep its natural state—an upright posture. It should not however be long without motion: it should always accompany the other actions of the body, and turn on the same side with them; except when aversion to any thing is expressed, which is done by stretching out the right hand, and turning the head to the left, the several muscles of the face bearing their part, and contributing to the proper motion of the whole. In a calm and sedate discourse, all the features retain their natural appearance. In sorrow, the forehead and eyebrows are depressed. But, in joy and cheerfulness, the forehead and eyebrows are expanded, the cheeks contracted, and the corners of the mouth drawn upwards. Anger and resentment contract the forehead, draw the brow together, and thrust out the lips; and terror elevates both the brows and the forehead.

Cicero advises that the greatest care should be taken with the management of the eye; as any sudden change or emotion in the mind is presently followed by an alteration in the look. The natural position of the shoulders is most easy and graceful. A continued motion of the arms any way is to be avoided. Their action should be generally very moderate, and follow that of the hands. The hands should be kept about as high as the breast, and should make nearly a right angle with the arm. They should never be suffered to hang down, unless it be to lean upon a pulpit or a bar.

To speak low at first has the appearance of modesty, and is best for the voice, which, by rising gradually, will with more ease be carried to any pitch that may be afterwards necessary, without straining it. In narration the voice ought to be raised to a higher pitch. Facts should be stated distinctly and accurately, with a proper emphasis laid upon the principal circumstances. In confutation, the arguments of the opposite party should be stated plainly and distinctly, unless they appear unworthy of a serious answer, in which case they may be answered with humour, or exposed.

There is however a natural eloquence which is occasionally found in the rudest and most uncivilized states of society, and which is even more powerful than the most laboured forms of art. The address of an Indian warrior has frequently been found to operate in a most powerful way upon the passions, and to rouse the consciousness of right that had previously lain dormant in the mind of his oppressor. As however we are not all of us gifted with this innate power, we must learn its natural attributes through the medium of artificial rules.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL MEETINGS.

WYCHFORD FOREST.

MR. BENSTEAD, of the United Temperance Association, proceeded, according to invitation, to a meeting of Teetotalers on a beautiful plain in the midst of the vast forest of Wychford. This meeting took place on the 4th of August, and would have been reported in our Journal of last week, had not the account of it reached us at too late an hour. Mr. Benstead in his letter to us, observes, "that the spot chosen for the reunion, is not less celebrated for its grand and romantic forest scenery than for its associations with the sylvan sports and chivalry of former times. The meeting was formed by the Teetotalers of the various towns and villages upon the borders of the forest. The effect produced by the appearance of a great number of elegantly dressed ladies, was peculiarly agreeable and exciting; and when their united voices were raised in the song of Temperance, the impression produced upon the minds of the audience was powerful in the extreme."

Several able advocates addressed the meeting, especially some gentlemen belonging to the Wesleyan Ministry.

EAST LONDON YOUTHS' TEETOTAL ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday evening, August 5th, a meeting of the members of this Society took place at the Mariners' Church, Wellclose-square. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, pursuant to notice, took the chair upon this occasion. The assembly was most respectfully attended; and the appearance of the juvenile members was in every way creditable to the great cause of Teetotalism.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, upon taking the chair, expressed his delight at having been called to preside over that meeting. He was lost in wonder and admiration when he contemplated the effects of Youths' Teetotal institutions upon the generations that were springing up. Society would be radically purged and purified. Its members would not change from dissipated habits to the doctrines of Teetotalism: they would be born—they would commence the work, as it were, as Teetotalers. It was a most delightful spectacle (said Mr. Reynolds) to behold those Youths, many of whom were not above twelve years of age, thus setting themselves in array against the vice of intemperance—thus affording a good example to their fathers and elder brothers—and thus embracing a doctrine which could not fail to continue them in the ways of morality, happiness, health, and peace.

MR. NORRIS, and several of the youthful advocates, then addressed the meeting, which separated at an early hour.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday, August 5th.

Pursuant to notice, a members' quarterly meeting of this Association took place at the Chapel in Aldersgate-street, for the purpose of renewing the cards, &c. The Chapel was crowded to excess; and several of the most able advocates of the Association addressed the meeting. MR. JOHNSON occupied the chair; and upon the platform were observed Messieurs CRUMP, WILSON, WESTON (the Secretary,) GAWTHORP, SIMS, GIMSHAW, EALES, POCKNELL, CAUDLE, &c. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS attended later in the evening.

It is evident that the United Temperance Association is destined within a very few months, to stand at the head of all Teetotal societies in the kingdom. The rapid progress it has made both in the cause of Teetotalism and in public estimation, is the elementary guarantee of this ascendancy; and when we reflect that its object is the "Union of all Teetotal sects and parties in one grand fraternity," we cannot do otherwise than admit that it possesses every claim upon public attention. The numbers of its members are increasing every week at the proportion of seven to four, when compared with the numbers of disciples obtained by the other two great societies. The United Temperance Association possesses the best literary organization—the best places of public-meeting—the most effective committee—and the most persevering advocates; its success is therefore placed beyond all doubt; and hundreds consider it an honour to enrol their names in the books of an Association whose members have never yet been divided by intestine differences, party jealousies, or domestic feuds.

This members' meeting was adjourned until Friday, the 14th of August, on which evening Mr. H. W. WESTON, the Secretary, will read his first Half-yearly Report to the assembly. This Report, contains an account of the rise, progress, and present condition of the Association, and is eminently calculated to cheer the spirits of all staunch Teetotalers.

Saturday, August 8th.

The meeting of the United Temperance Association at Aldersgate-street Chapel, on this occasion, was, as usual, most respectably attended.

Mr. WILSON was called to the chair.

Mr. BOWLER (of the Kensington Auxiliary Branch of the United Temperance Association) made some very striking observations upon the propriety of establishing schools for the children of Teetotalers.

Mr. SMETON said that if the working classes became Teetotalers, fathers of families could afford to educate their children upon the money which they saved from the public-house.

Mr. AUSTIN (of Kensington) gave an account of his conversion to the doctrines of Teetotalism by the celebrated Mr. John Hockings, of Birmingham. He very properly observed, in the course of his narrative, that drunkards did not originally intend to become so; but that the force of habit gradually became stronger and the more invincible.

Mr. HUDSON made a most eloquent speech upon the good effects of Teetotalism. He said that Teetotalers need not be disheartened if they did not succeed in their grand aims all in a moment; they had already done wonders; and every thing must have a beginning. The mighty ships, which triumph over the tides of ocean, could be traced, in respect to their existence, to an acorn; and the golden harvest, that now blessed the labour of the husbandman, had their origin in grain. So was it with Teetotalism; and equally powerful in its effects, and equally prolific in its good fruits, should that great principle eventually prove.

Mr. WADMAN (of Stratford) observed, that it was the first time he had ever addressed an audience at that Chapel; but he did not feel alarmed, because he knew that he was amongst Teetotalers—and Teetotalers were friends. He made a most eloquent and moving speech upon the efficacy of the doctrines.

Mr. JOHNSON (of Stratford) said that he had signed the pledge because he had been a most inveterate drunkard; and the fact of his having so done had been his salvation.

Mr. JOHNSON (the advocate of the United Temperance Association) remarked that he was frequently asked what Teetotalism was; and that his invariable answer was, that it was a Balm of Gilead, which was capable of healing all wounds. He adduced several remarkable illustrations of the evil effects of intemperance, and the beneficial ones of Teetotalism; and concluded a most eloquent speech with a powerful appeal to those who had not as yet signed, to lose no time in embracing principles capable of producing such salutary effects.

Mr. GREEN (of Westminster) addressed himself particularly to the ladies present, and exhorted them to use their utmost influence to reclaim their degraded fellow-country-women from the influence of the demon of intemperance.

Mr. GAWTHORP begged to inform the meeting, that the United Temperance Association had lately taken most important steps in favour of Teetotalism. Not satisfied with having founded the most respectable Journal (The Teetotaler) to advocate the glorious principles, and which Journal already enjoyed the largest circulation of any publication of the kind, in spite of the price which had been placed upon it as a guarantee for its respectability—the Committee of the United Temperance Association had established a Depôt for the publication and sale of Temperance works, periodicals, and tracts, in Aldersgate-street, only a few doors from the Chapel, and which Depôt would be opened on Tuesday, the 11th instant.

Upon the platform were the following gentlemen, who did not however speak on this occasion:—Messieurs BENSTEAD, G. W. M. REYNOLDS, WESTON, (the Secretary), SIMS, CRUMP, EALLES, and CUZNER (of Haddington.)

EAST LONDON TEMPERANCE HALL, CHURCH-ROW, BETHNAL-GREEN.

An excellent meeting of this Auxiliary Branch of the United Temperance Association was held on Monday evening, August 10th, at the Assembly Room, Church-row. Mr. CRUMP (the Registrar) was called to the chair, and made a most eloquent speech. He was followed by Messieurs PARKER, ADKINS, HARRISON, &c. We regret that the length of the account of the Gala at Dyrham Park, precludes the possibility of a more elaborate notice of this meeting this week.

THE GRAND EXCURSION TO CAPTAIN TROTTER'S PARK.

A lovelier morning never dawned upon this hemisphere than that which ushered in the day of the 10th of August. Not a cloud was to be seen upon the face of heaven; a gentle breeze swept over the country; and the wings of that zephyr waxed faint with the perfumes of all the choicest flowers that greeted the season in the numerous gardens around the northern part of the capital. Nature herself had put on her holiday attire; for this was a grand day in the history of those regenerated men who had cast off the rags of their evil habits, and donned the gala-garments of a noble principle.

From an early hour carriages and vans, decked with the banners belonging to the various branches of the great Temperance Societies, were seen passing through every quarter of the metropolis, in the direction of the northern roads; and carts laden with provisions proceeded on the same way. As the vehicles passed along the road towards Dyrham Park, which is situate at a short distance beyond Barnet, the inhabitants of all the houses in their way hastened to catch a glimpse of the gay and cheering scene. The farther the procession drew into the country, the greater seemed the astonishment of the beholders. Mothers held up their prattling infants to obtain a full view of the carriages of the Teetotalers; old men feasted their curiosity with a sight which reminded them that their younger days had unfortunately possessed no chastening means of moral reformation like that the testimony of which was then before them; young girls gazed with astonishment upon the sight, and envied the neatly attired daughters of the disciples of the new doctrine; boys—children of all ages—and people of all ranks, classes, and professions, hurried to their windows, their doors, or their garden-gates, to witness this grand procession.

And surely a more interesting sight never met the view of those myriads of beholders; and the inmates of the vehicles themselves seemed proud of belonging to a cause which produced so extraordinary an excitement wherever its effects were seen.

The ride was a very pleasant one, and took place through a charming part of the country. When about a few miles from the metropolis, on looking back, that vast assemblage of edifices was seen stretching over hill and plain like the Babylon of ancient days, and its thousand towers were gilded with the rays of a joyous sun. Those rays fell brightly upon the dome of Saint Paul's, and made its pinnacle glitter like a distant light-house upon some tall rock. The dark towers of the Abbey of Westminster, which seemed to defy the ravages of time, and despise the centuries that have already passed over their heads, frowned above the myriads of dwellings around them, and raised their summits to heaven like two Goliaths in the midst of a mighty army. For it is in the still hour of the morning, before the wholesome life of cities is fully awake, that London presents her most striking aspect to him who surveys her from a little distance. Then it is that the everlasting cloud is lifted for a moment from her forehead, and the fresh fan of the morning passes through her stifling streets; and amid the yet smokeless air, the eye rests upon pinnacle and spire that steal, one by one, into the unadulterated light of the young day, and mark distances, which, in another hour, will have no representative at that majestic congress. Then London, in her vastness, may be reckoned by her steeples; and the thousand fingers with which she points up into the clear cool morning, are as an index to the mighty volume, whose myriad pages lie closed below!

But at length London was lost in the distance, and—town, village, and hamlet past by—the carriages and vans all united together in one grand and unbroken line of procession up Barnet hill. About two hundred and fifty vans, each carrying twenty-four individuals, and numerous post-chaises, barouches, glass-coaches, and private vehicles, formed this mighty cavalcade. From every one floated the gay banners of the several associations, branches, auxiliaries, and independent orders, of Teetotalers—and the beautiful hues of nature were for a moment eclipsed by the splendid dyes of artificial manufacture. The vehicles were filled with smiling and happy faces; all the inmates of those vehicles were neatly, and many well dressed: the female portion of the community was characterised by extreme cleanliness, and freshness of looks; and the male part wore an appearance of health and comfort, which was more galling to the minds of the publicans and their adherents than even the swelling ranks of the procession.

As the cavalcade, which was upwards of a mile long, passed through Barnet, a place that is studded with public-houses and taverns, the proprietors of those dens of infamy turned out to get up a laugh against the Teetotalers; and, in order to effect this the more readily, they hired a parcel of ragamuffins who willingly sold their services for beer. But the contrast between the ragged and filthy appearance of those beer-drinkers and the healthy and happy air of the Teetotalers, was too striking and rendered too apparent by this contiguity; and the publicans and their tattered adherents slunk back in shame and indignation to their unwholesome dens.

It was about half-past twelve when the procession reached the park, which is a beautiful ground, adorned with a piece of water, and forming a proper approach to the mansion which stands at the summit of the acclivity. Booths were erected by various coffee-house keepers from London and Barnet; and amongst the best of these were the Fitzroy and Thompson's tents. A large booth, which was erected by an individual from Barnet, was provided with most infamous food; and this rubbish was dispensed by filthy waiters, at an infamously dear rate. Thompson's and the Fitzroy booths were well furnished with all kinds of provisions, and possessed the recommendable characteristic of cleanliness.

The Teetotalers soon dispersed themselves all over the park. Some formed little pic-nics, and ate their food upon the grass; others proceeded to the booths; and all enjoyed themselves to their hearts' content. Captain Trotter made his appearance amongst them on horseback, and was enthusiastically greeted. He harangued them in a very eloquent speech, and declared that the chief motive of his having thrown open his park that day was for the purpose of uniting all classes and societies of Teetotalers. Captain Trotter is thus attached to the doctrines taught by the United Temperance Association, and the truths of which he thus strongly recommended to the New British and Foreign and the Suppression societies: may they profit by the hint thus judiciously given, and hasten to join themselves with the United Temperance Association.

In the evening, after the meeting had been addressed by Mr. Roche (the magistrate), Sir Culling Eardley Smith, Bart., and several other gentlemen, various sports and amusements took place upon the green. Several individuals diverted themselves throughout the day by angling in the piece of water; and several fine fish were caught. About six thousand persons succeeded in amusing themselves, without the aid of intoxicating drinks of any kind, and without missing them, or wanting them, or once regretting that they had forsworn the use of them. Surely this fact must speak volumes in favour of Teetotalism, and convince the whole world that the doctrine will stand the test of general application and universal practice.

At about eight o'clock the Teetotalers began to return to their vehicles; and in a short time the whole cavalcade was on the road homewards, every individual highly delighted with the day's entertainment and the kindness of Captain Trotter in throwing open the park for the reception of the Temperance associations.

Had six thousand persons, who were not Teetotalers, proceeded on such an excursion, more than half of them would have returned in a state of intoxication, and quarrelling and disorder would have been the result: on this occasion, with the Teetotalers, not an angry word between any two individuals marred the pleasure of the day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Teetotaler.

MR. EDITOR,—Questions on medico-teetotal subjects are repeatedly put to me, some by letter and otherwise, by our Temperance friends; and were I individually to answer them it would trespass most inconveniently upon my time. It has therefore occurred to me that your inserting them in your Journal would meet the wishes of the querists, and prove not altogether uninteresting to your readers. The questions and answers are the following:—

First Question.—Does the quantity of milk determine the quality? and what other diffusible stimulants can mothers employ in the place of alcoholic drinks?

Answer.—One female may have a superabundant quantity of milk, and so deficient in quality as to compel her otherwise to feed her infant. Another may have comparatively a very small supply of that fluid, yet so rich in nourishing matter as to support "a bouncing child," many months, without any auxiliary.

I am of opinion that the production of milk by the habitual use of any diffusible stimulant is highly reprehensible; and that if the vital powers to secrete milk of requisite properties be deficient, the mother had better relinquish the duty entirely.

Second Question.—Does a Teetotaler, under disease, require the same medical treatment as he would have done under the same kind of complaint, before he abstained?

Answer.—I find a surprising difference as to the quantity of this treatment, but little essential as to quality: but it should be observed, that by abstinence many diseases are avoided, and others give way, the cause being so removed.

Third Question.—Is it desirable to vaccinate the children of Teetotalers with matter taken indiscriminately?

Answer.—Medical men are entitled to great credit for the care with which they select children for the purpose of collecting vaccine lymph; and with all other precautions, I give a decided preference to the offspring of Teetotalers, and more especially to those whose parents are total abstinents of long standing.

I am, Mr. Editor, your's faithfully,
MINGAYE SYDER.

167, Fleet-street.

(We have much pleasure in inserting the following certificate, because it bears testimony against the received notions of a numerous class of individuals:—)

Sir,—I, the undermentioned, having tried fully the total abstinence principle, for the last three years, can bear testimony to the advantages I have received thereby, and my ability to labour more efficiently without the use of any intoxicating liquors.

Signed by me, this 11th day of July, 1840,
ELIZABETH PARSONS, Monthly Nurse.
15, Curtain-road, Shoreditch.

MEANS EMPLOYED FOR PROMOTING THE CAUSE OF TEETOTALISM.

THE public means for promoting this extraordinary cause—Total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, consist chiefly—the press, the delivery of lectures, the preaching of sermons, and the holding public meetings. These means have made a very great impression throughout this empire as well as other parts of the world. It is commonly acknowledged that the press is the most powerful in diffusing information and in disseminating knowledge. We find it a mighty engine in this cause. America has her national organ, The Journal of the American Temperance Union, with a numerous train of auxiliary periodicals, pouring an immense flood of light over many parts of the world. In Great Britain and Ireland we are following up this means as fast as the circumstances of these countries will admit. We have in Scotland another model of light, The Journal of the Scottish Temperance Union, with her train of periodicals also. In England, it is difficult to estimate the value of the leading organs of the temperance press. The first in course is, The Advocate and Journal of the British Association for the promotion of Temperance; second, The Journal of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society; the third, The Temperance Intelligencer, an organ of the British and Foreign Society for the suppression of Intemperance; and lastly, The Teetotaler founded by the London United Temperance Association. These Journals profess to extend their operations on an enlarged scale. In addition to these, there is The London Teetotal Magazine, a number of country periodicals, and three distinct series of monthly publications, in the form of Children's Magazines. In Ireland, The Dublin Weekly Temperance Herald, with a variety of smaller works of a similar description, and in many of the countries abroad, the same means are employed. As a general observer of the motions of the press, there is a small monthly work, The Temperance Examiner, having this motto, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good."—Cambridge Temperance Herald.

THE EFFECTS OF TEETOTALISM.

It is stated that in the year 1835, 4000 distilleries were abandoned in America, and that 8000 persons, who had previously obtained their livelihood by the sale of spirits, were compelled to discontinue their trade. The example of the people of the United States was soon followed by those of other countries; and, to the honour of Ireland, the town of New Ross was the first place in Europe, in which a Temperance Society was established. Since that period, almost every large village in England has founded a similar institution. Tea has in most instances been substituted for fermented or spirituous liquors, and the consequence has been a general improvement in the health and in the morals of a vast number of persons. The tone, the strength, and the vigour of the human body, are increased by it; there is a greater capability of enduring fatigue; the mind is rendered more susceptible of the innocent pleasures of life, and of acquiring information. Whole classes of the community have been rendered sober, careful, and provident. The waste of time that followed upon intemperance, kept individuals poor, who are now thriving in the world, and exhibiting the results of honest industry. Men have become healthier, happier, and better for the exchange they have made. They have given up a debasing habit for an innocent one. Individuals who were outcast, miserable, abandoned, have become independent, and a blessing to society. Their wives and children hail them on their return home from their daily labour with their prayers and fondest affections, instead of shunning their presence, fearful of some barbarity, or some outrage against their better feelings. Cheerfulness and animation follow upon their slumbers, instead of the wretchedness and remorse which the waking drunkard ever experiences.

REVIEWS.

Bacchus. By RALPH BARNES GRINDROD. Third Thousand. 8vo. pp. 535. London: J. Pasco.

(SECOND NOTICE.)

It is with the greatest pleasure that we return to this very talented production. The more we examine its contents, the more are we astonished at the spirit of research which is evidenced by its pages, and the more do we feel ourselves bound to applaud the labours of an individual whose grand aim is the regeneration of society. A man who can write such a book as this, is an ornament to the whole literary world; and the sooner his volume becomes well known beyond the pale of Teetotal literature, the better. Although the exclusive principles of Teetotalism—exclusive in respect to those who have not sought to learn its rites nor embrace its mysteries—be against the extensive popularity of a work written expressly and solely upon the one grand subject, still must this publication, from its very nature, find readers in all spheres, and in all classes. Mr. Grindrod is a classical scholar of no mean importance; he is a chemist of no small attainments; he is a philosopher—a moralist—an essayist—and an ethical legislator. His language is easy and agreeable, and is totally devoid of that stiffness and harshness which are the usual characteristics of scientific works. In fine "Bacchus" will confer upon its author that most durable of all emoluments—a reputation are perennius.

We shall now proceed to that chapter which treats upon the evils of intemperance in a national point of view. Mr. Grindrod says at the outset—

It is to be feared, that, in the present day, vice in all its varied forms has become so familiar to Christian observation, as to be viewed with far too little apprehension and alarm. To this source may be attributed the apathy which is manifested to those lamentable evils which arise from the use of intoxicating liquors. Every man, reflecting on intemperance, must deplore its consequences. The cause or causes, however, by which this humiliating vice is produced and cherished are, unfortunately overlooked, and, in a great degree, encouraged. The custom of drinking is so generally and so intimately interwoven with the social habits of life, that few persons entirely escape from its contaminating influence. All national evils originate in individual practice, and the extension of its influence and example.

These are the reflections of a profoundly-thinking man—of one who has watched the progressive development of the habits of life in all its various phases—of a philosopher, who reasons from the conviction of experience. Farther on, the following remarks relative to Ireland occur:—

In the early part of the eighteenth century, however, through mistaken views of national weal, great encouragement was given to the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits. The consequences of this short-sighted and erroneous policy are manifest at the present time. The habit has become national, and many years may elapse, pregnant with every kind of misery to that unhappy country, before the evil can be effectually eradicated.

We are happy to perceive, by a statement in the papers, the other day, that "the whole of the south of Ireland has been teetotalised" through the means of Father Mathew. With respect to the effects of intemperance upon morals, Mr. Grindrod very properly says that—

An age of intemperance has been invariably characterized by exhibitions of vice, the most disgusting in its nature, and the most fearful in its consequences. . . . The condition of the ancient Greeks, the Romans, and other nations, who were accustomed to indulge in the use of strong drink, exhibits sufficient evidence of this fact. The history of the British nation abounds in similar examples, striking illustrations of which, &c. &c.

These illustrations had been adduced in a previous chapter. With regard to the interesting subject of education, this able writer makes the following observations:—

The progress of education has been powerfully impeded by the use of strong drink. This department of our inquiry may be considered either in regard to its influence on the skill of a community, or the obstacle which it presents to intellectual and literary labours and to scientific discovery.

Mr. Grindrod shows the intimate connexion which exists between the brain and the mind, and proves the importance of the healthy condition of that organ to all the literary, scientific, or mechanical occupations of life.

(To be continued.)

The Monthly Magazine. Edited by John A. Heraud, Esq. Number for August. Sherwood and Co.

This very clever periodical has totally eclipsed the learned and erudite organ of the ultra Conservatives—we mean Frazer's Magazine. Its contents are as varied as they are instructive or amusing. The Editor exercises a delicate taste and keen perception in the way in which he allots the several departments of his work to the profound—the light and attractive—and the purely critical subjects which are comprised within the attributes of the Monthly.

We have not room for quotation this month, and shall therefore content ourselves with observing that the best papers in the current number are "The Manager's," "The Actor's," and "The Poet's Theatre,"—the "Norse Papers,"—and "Locke's Metaphysics illustrated by Owen's Socialism."

The London Magazine, Charivari, &c. Number for August. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

"The Diurnal Revolutions of Davie Diddledoff" are continued this month with humour and spirit. There is however too much detail and elaborated description in the tale to suit its continuous nature. "The Death-Hole of the Daughtens" is well told: we long for the appearance of the next number to peruse the denouement, which it will doubtless contain. The Charivari department contains some good hits. On the whole, this is a good number.

The Monthly Review. Number for August. George Henderson.

This venerable representative of English literature—this long-established periodical, which recalls the days of Byron and his contemporaries, and which reminds us of Southey's best critical essays—contains, as usual, some valuable reviews and notices of all the newest works published either in England or in France. An admirable tale in the Dodecaton, ou le Livre des Douze, manifests the superiority of French works of fiction over the English. "Slavery in America and British India," is a very clever paper.

The People's Letter-Bag, and Penny Post Companion. 12mo. pp. 108. Darton and Clark.

A very useful little publication, containing all the conventional forms of letters current amongst the middling and lower classes. The volume moreover comprises the New Postage Act, and the required forms for the addresses of all letters or petitions.

It will not only be found eminently useful to servants, but also to those humble tradesmen who in early youth did not receive the blessings of education, and who have succeeded in forming for themselves a certain position in the world. Messrs. Darton and Clark invariably issue works of utility and instruction.

CAUTION.

WHEREAS, a person calling himself Levi Harrold Leighs is travelling the country, as an advocate of Temperance, with a general testimonial of character, to which our names are affixed: we hereby withdraw our countenance to the same, and recommend an application to either of us before an acceptance of his advocacy.

MINGAYE SYDER, 167, Fleet-street,
H. W. WESTON, 12, Basing-lane, London.
August 6th, 1840.

TEMPERANCE LYRIC.

The Nile that rolls its waters wide,
And far beyond its native shore,
Flows from a little streamlet's tide
In Abyssinia's mountains hoar.
Farther and farther as it goes,
Its volumes gather bulk and force;
And from the winter's constant snows,
It takes the grandeur of its course.
So o'er the bosom of the land
Teetotal doctrines lately rolled:
Humble the preachers, yet how grand
The aims they ventur'd to unfold!
Let ev'ry tongue exclaim, "Rejoice,
The golden age is now restored!"
Thankful let all exalt the voice
Of praise unto a bounteous Lord!
For He, who sent his Son to die
When mortal crimes had seal'd our woe,
And suffered men to crucify
His offspring on this earth below,—
Redemption he has sent once more
To aid us in a world of sin,
And teach us how, when life is o'er,
A crown of endless joy to win.

ADVERTISEMENTS

This Day is published, Price 2d.
TEMPERANCE LYRICS.
OR HYMNS FOR PUBLIC MEETINGS, FESTIVALS, &c.
for the United Temperance Association.
Published at the Depot of the United Temperance Association, 159, Abchurch-lane, London.
Where all Temperance Publications may be had, wholesale and Retail.

This Day is Published, Price Half-a-Crown, 8vd.
Containing as much letter-press as three volumes of the usual novel form,
SISTER ANNE.
A Novel Translated from the French of Ch. Paul de Kock.
By G. W. M. REYNOLDS.
London:—G. HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey.

DYRHAM PARK
EXTRAORDINARY GRAND TEETOTAL GALA.
A most interesting account of all the amusements of the day, with
A SPLENDID ENGRAVING OF THE PARK AS IT AP-PEARED ON THE OCCASION
together with the Speeches of Captain Trotter, R. Wallden, Esq.,
Sir C. F. Smith, Bart., T. B. Roche, Esq., the Rev. Mr. Whitty,
Mr. Stirling of Leeds, &c., &c., is published this day.
PRICE ONE PENNY.
Published by G. Wightman, 24, Paternoster-row, London: sold at the Journal office of the Society, Bull's-head court, Newgate street; at the Printing office, 10, Craven buildings, Drury-lane, Strand; William Strange, Paternoster-row; and by all booksellers.

VAN BUTCHELL ON FISTULA, &c.—Just published, Fourth
Edition, in 8vo., cloth boards, price 7s. 6d., enlarged.
FACTS AND OBSERVATIONS relative to a successful mode of treating Piles, Fistula, Hemorrhoidal Excesses, Tumours, and Strictures, without cutting or confinement: illustrated with numerous cases. Being a familiar exposition of the practice of Mr. S. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur.

"This Volume presents to us a number of illustrations of his singular success under circumstances that would have induced despair in any professor of less mastery, or less accustomed to accomplish cures where cures seemed impossible. The statements here made are most convincing, and place beyond doubt the superiority of the treatment to which they refer."—Court Journal.
Published by H. Renshaw; sold also by the Author, No. 16,
Percy-street, Bedford-square.

RUSSELL'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.
AND COFFEE ROOMS, BROADWAY, WESTMINSTER.
Will be opened under the immediate sanction of the Committee and patronage of the Members of the West Branch of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, on Wednesday, 19th of August, 1840.

WILLIAM RUSSELL, in soliciting attention to the above establishment, most respectfully informs his Temperance Friends and the public generally, that it will be his constant aim not only to render it subservient to the general interests of the Temperance cause, but conducive in every possible way to the comfort and convenience of all who may favour him with their support.

Its contiguity to the houses of Parliament, Sessions-house and Abbey it is presumed will render it a desirable temporary abode to persons visiting Westminster, for purposes either of recreation or business, and for whose convenience good beds and every necessary accommodation will be afforded.
Refreshments of every sort compatible with true Temperance will be furnished at very moderate charges.

The Reading room will be amply supplied with Temperance literature, periodicals, and newspapers, and form a repository also for the sale of all the societies' publications.

In the Teetotal mechanic, artisan, and labourer this establishment will offer considerable advantages in furnishing suitable refreshments during any part of the day, and in the formation of societies for their mutual benefit and registration of such who may be out of employ.

N. B. Conveyances to every part of the kingdom by railway; and steam-boats within five minutes' walk of the hotel.

ROBERT RICHARDS, Manufacturer of
SACKS, TARPULINS, TILTS, TENTS, FLAGS, BED SACKINGS, and every article in Rope and Twine, at the Lowest Prices for Ready Money. Country orders promptly executed.
Address, Robert Richards, 4, Grey Coat-street, Westminster.

SIGHT RESTORED.
NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED BY THE USE OF GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

Copies of Testimonials given gratis by all Agents.
Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.

This is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the eyes and head. It will prevent diseases of a Scrofulous nature affecting the nerves of the head. In cases of a nervous head-ache it is completely efficacious, and gives a natural sweetness to the breath. It may be taken as frequently as other snuffs, with the most perfect safety and gratification to the consumer. Wash the eyes every morning with warm milk and water, to remove whatever secretion may have been produced during the night.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vade Mecum.

Dr. Andrews also recommends its use as a preventive from contagion.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield, Esq.'s Letter.

Observe this Caution.—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE IN-
VENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.
Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of
GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

Mrs. A. Cole, No. 7, Skinner's Almshouses, aged 69, sight restored and head-ache cured, Jan. 9, 1840.

W. Verlin, Esq., inflammation cured, Youghal, Ireland.

J. J. Protherne, Esq., sight restored and head-ache cured, Waterford.

J. W. Chester, Esq., sight restored, Ballyclough, Glebe, Mal-low.

G. W. M. Reynolds, Esq., excruciating pains in the head and opaque vision cured, Upper Stamford street, London.

J. B. Lachfield, Esq., cured of ophthalmia; Whitehall, and Thatched House Tavern.

Mrs. Guppy, 86, Nelson-square, Blackfriars-road, cured of ophthalmia.

Miss Mary Roades, Market place, Winslow, Bucks, cured of ophthalmia; witnesses to her cure, Mr. John Roades, father, and R. Walker, Esq., a magistrate.

To Mr. GRIMSTONE, 39, Broad street.

Sir,—Having read in several public journals many testimonials the editors of which have thought them worthy their attention, in many instances so much so as to call the invention of which I believe you are the proprietor, and consider it of such vital importance to the preservation of sight, as to recommend its universal use. Now, sir, to my case, during my residence in Jamaica, I suffered much from inflammation in the eyes and head, which brought on a continued nervous headache. I had all the advice that the medical gentlemen of those parts could afford, but all to no purpose. My uncle, Mr. Frederrick Hill, a gentleman well known in those parts, was recommended to send to your agent at Kingstown for some of your Eye Snuff; and I believe he paid to the value of 3s. for every one of the 1s. 3d. canisters; this I know, it was cheap at any price. I was relieved before using the contents of four canisters, and from that time I have ever used it with the most happy result. You may circulate this testimony for the good of others, who may be sceptical as to the real utility of your Eye Snuff.

I am, your's gratefully, M. HILL.

1, Bull's-head court, Great Queen street, Lincoln's Inn.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. Read G. J.
Lachfield's letter.

A FEW EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESS.

From Blackwood's Lady's Magazine, for May, 1838. To Mr.
Grimstone, on his valuable invention of the Eye Snuff, made from Brush Herbs, for the diseased organs of the head and eyes.

Great was the power that did to man impart
Creative genius and inventive art.

The second praise is not less, Grimstone, thine
Wise was thine head and great was thy design!

Our precious sight, from danger now set free,
Wives, widows, fathers, praise a song to thee.

ELIZ. ROBINSON.

12, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, Marylebone.

The above poetic effusion was copied by the editors in the following works, newspapers, &c., in May, and the two succeeding months, of the year, 1838.

To Mr. Grimstone, Penryn-arms hotel, Bangor, May 25, 1838.

Sir,—From the great and signal benefit I have experienced from your invaluable snuff, I conceive I should be doing an act of ingratitude to yourself, as well as injustice to those suffering as I have, if I did not thus openly state for the satisfaction of the public that I have been for a long time past labouring under an almost total deprivation of sight, so great, as, except by the feeble incapacity of knowing a shilling from a guinea. A gentleman who stopped at my house for a short time, pitying my (as I imagined incurable) misfortune, kindly recommended me to try a small quantity of your discovery, which he procured from an agent of yours in Dublin. I felt so much benefited from the contents of a 2s. 4d. canister, that I have sent for two more, which having nearly used, I am now almost completely restored. I have no doubt in the course of another week of being cured. Sir, if you would appoint an agent in this town it would be doing the inhabitants an incalculable benefit. Should you be so disposed, I can with confidence name Mr. Heywood, a most respectable tradesman here, from whom I am convinced you would experience every satisfaction. Pardon this liberty, but as I have myself felt such good effects from using your Eye Snuff, I am doubly anxious our town should be supplied by a local agent. Sir, you are at perfect liberty to publish this testimony of acknowledgment from your grateful and obedient servant.

W. BICKNELL.

To W. Grimstone, Esq., inventor of Eye Snuff, 39, Broad street,
Whitehall, March 8, 1838.

Mr. Grimstone—Sir, I think it but justice that I should offer my acknowledgments to you for the great benefit I have derived from the use of your most exquisite fragrant compound, composed of herbs, called Eye Snuff, its action on the membrane of the nose, causing the lachrymal glands to discharge in a manner truly surprising, and by that means to cleanse the cornea, that my eyes became healthy, strong, and performed their wonted duties in a manner that I have not known the blessing of for six years. The renowned G. J. Guthrie, Esq., recommended me to try your Eye Snuff prior to my undergoing an operation.
Many thanks to him for his suggestion; thanks to your invention, that operation will not be necessary. Sir, you have my permission to make this known in any manner you may think best. I am, sir, your obedient servant, J. R. LACHFIELD.

P. S.—Sir, be pleased to send to the Thatched-house Tavern, St. James's street, a 4s. 4d. and 3s. 4d. canister. You can send the change in the parcel for the enclosed half-sovereign. J. R. L.

This letter is attested to by G. J. Guthrie, Esq., F.R.S.

Sold in canisters at 8d., 1s. 3d., 2s. 4d., 4s. 4d., and 15s. 6d., each, by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists, in town and country. A liberal allowance to shippers, owners, captains, and all vendors of Grimstone's Eye Snuff.
Foreign and British Snuffs and Cigars of the finest quality. All orders made payable in London. Letters must be post paid Manufacture, Bow-lane, London.

N. B.—Grimstone's Eye Snuff will keep in any climate.

UNDER THE ESPECIAL PATRONAGE OF HIS LATE MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY—As the following letter received from Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley, Keeper of the Privy Purse, testifies.

"Sir,—I am honoured with the King's command to express his Majesty's sense of your polite attention in sending the two bottles of Essence of Ginger. His Majesty has been pleased to direct me to forward you ten pounds in payment for it—inclosed you will find that amount—I am, Sir, yours obediently, H. WHEATLEY."

St. James's Palace, June 25th, 1835.

To Mr. Decimus Woodhouse.

WOODHOUSE'S ETHERIAL ESSENCE OF GINGER is particularly recommended to all cold phlegmatic, weak and nervous constitutions; it is certain in affording instant relief in Spasms, Cramps, Flatulence, Languor, Hysterics, Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Sensation of Fullness, Pain and Oppression after Meals; also those Pains of the Stomach and Bowels which arise from Gouty Flatulencies; Digestion however much impaired, is restored to its pristine state, by the use of this Essence for a short time, if taken in Tea, Coffee, Ale, Beer, Porter, Cider, or Wine; it corrects their flatulent tendency; also this Etherial Essence warms and invigorates the whole system, and will be found on experience, a happy substitute for those spiritual cordials, which at the moment they seem to revive, are insidiously undermining the very principles of life and health in short as a domestic remedy, a remedy for the Traveller by sea or land, nothing can be more convenient or efficacious, as a few drops in water, forms a tea of any strength.

The undersigned, and 208 other medical men, have given certificates of their unqualified approbation of the value of the Essence, as also of its superiority over all other similar preparations. Drs. James Johnson, Physician to His Majesty, A. T. Hedrold, S. Ashwell, R. Rowley, A. Middleton,
C. Loudon, D. Davies, Surgeon to their Majesties, J. Pereira,
G. Fisher, F. Salmon, F. Tyrrel, J. H. Curtis, Aurist to his Majesty, C. Millard. In bottles 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and 21s. each.

Also WOODHOUSE'S PATENT CORN PLASTER, for affording instant relief, and eradicating CORNS and BUNIONS without pain or danger. This plaster acts by softening and destroying the Corns or Bunions, and defending the affected parts from the pressure of the shoe. Thus its use is perfectly safe and certain in affording relief in ten minutes, if a cure is not effected: in boxes 1s. 14d., and 2s. 9d. each.

These preparations are prepared only by DECIMUS WOOD-HOUSE, Operative Chemist Extraordinary to his late Majesty at his Laboratory, 13, Little James-street, Bedford-row, of whom it may be had wholesale, and retail of Hooper, 43,
King William-street, London Bridge, T. Butler, 4, Cheap-side,
Sanger, 150, Oxford-street, and of all Medicine Vendors.

N. B. Be sure to ask for Woodhouse's.
CAUTION. To prevent imposition, be sure to see the name of DECIMUS WOODHOUSE, 18, King William-street, London Bridge, is engraved on the Government Stamp, otherwise cannot be Genuine.

DUGALD MURRAY'S WRITING INKS.

The above celebrated Inks, which are made of Black,
Red, Blue, and the Blue that turns Black are rapidly super-seeding most others now in the market. Those persons who may be annoyed by the absence of the requisite qualities in writing Ink, Brilliancy of colour, extreme fluidity and permanence, are requested to make trial of Murray's Writing Inks, when they will find that in them they have been attained in perfection. They may be had at every Stationer's, Booksellers, and News-Vendor's Shop in London, and the Country, and of the sole Proprietor and Manufacturer, Douglas McMillan, 33, Myddleton Street, Clerkenwell, London.

PURE CARBONATE OF SODA, 1d. per oz.

1s. per lb. Tartaric Acid, 2s. 12. 2s. per lb. Tasteless Salts,
1d. per oz. 1s. per lb. N. B.—A tea-spoonful of Tasteless Salts, half a tea-spoonful of the Acid, and the same quantity of Soda put into a tumbler of Water make a Sedilious Draught, an excellent Aperient Medicine, entirely tasteless. Sedilious Powders, 8d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s. 6d. Ginger Beer Powders, 5d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s. Lemonade Powders, 5d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s.
Soda Water Powders, 4d. per doz. 3 doz. 9d. Each dozen makes six Draughts. At 41, Clerkenwell Green.

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH. Messrs

MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which Messrs. M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation; they are fastened without Springs, Wires, or Ligatures, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication.
DECAYED TEETH filled up and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs.
M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Enamel in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Beautified equal to the Finest Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed.
With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery, scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Fins-
bury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore Street.

DR. GARDINER'S WORM MEDICINE, after forty years' unparalleled success, proofs of which may be seen in the vast collection of Worms in the Museum, 71, Long-acre, especially recommends itself to the many thus afflicted, as also parents and guardians, on whom it is an imperative duty to observe those leading symptoms by which worms are generally detected—as irregularity of appetite, itching of the nose and seat, starting in the sleep, grinding of the teeth, dry cough, constant thirst, wasting and general debility, fits, and, if neglected, decline and death.

Prepared (only) and sold by the Doctor's grandson, J. S.
GARDINER, as above; also, by ENWARDS, St. Paul's; SAN-GERS, Oxford-street; BACALAT, Farringdon-street, and most respectable Medicine Vendors, in boxes 2s. 9d., for children 4s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and 21s. The Cordial Tincture to be used with the Pills, in bottles, 1s. 14d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster-
Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.
Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers, Price Ninepence.

London—J. Wilson, Printer, 55, Red-Cross Street.

THE TEE TOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 9.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER X.

THE MIDNIGHT PLOT.

THE old gentleman, who had hired the apartment which Mr. Robus had surrendered to him in the manner related in the preceding chapter, appeared suddenly overcome with delight when he found himself alone in his new lodging. A beam of joy animated his pale and care-worn countenance; and his heart expanded with a strange sentiment of independence of the world, as he gazed around him, and exclaimed, "Heavens be thanked! here at least all my actions will not be overlooked!"

He spoke in a foreign accent; and any one, who had been accustomed to associate with Frenchmen, would have at once perceived that he belonged to the land of our gallant and great neighbours. He was attired in a fashionable manner; a massive gold chain was appended to his neck, and communicated with an elegant Breguet watch in his waistcoat-pocket; a valuable diamond-ring glittered upon one of the fingers of his right-hand; and the purse, from which he had extracted the coin to liquidate the first week's rent to Mr. Robus, was apparently well-filled with gold coin. He had arrived at the gate of the alley in a hackney-coach, and the driver had carried a portmanteau and a writing-desk up to the apartment hired by the stranger. In a word, every thing belonging to, and about, this old gentleman bespoke wealth and importance in the great circle of society.

As soon as the first feeling of satisfaction at finding himself alone had passed away, the stranger placed his writing-desk in a convenient spot upon the table, and sat down to pen a long epistle, during which occupation, he was frequently agitated by inward emotions to such an extent, that he could scarcely hold his pen. He wrote with trembling fingers; and from time to time, he pressed one of his hands to his forehead, as if he were anxious to suppress the very thoughts that crowded in his imagination. The perspiration rolled down his cheeks; and ever and anon he started and half-closed his desk, as a footstep in the passage, or on the staircase without, fell upon his ears.

At length he terminated his letter, which he endeavoured to read through; but in this attempt he totally failed, and the big tears now chased each other from his eyes in rapid succession. He threw himself back in his chair, and sobbed violently; and then, as if reckless whether he were overheard or not, he muttered broken sentences aloud.

"Well—it may not be too late! Oh! no—God forbid that it should be too late to do this act of justice! Poor innocent creature—thus to have been neglected! Wretch—villain that I am! How have the thunders of heaven slept so long? Wherefore have not the lightnings blasted me in my wicked career? But, oh! the wrath of an offended Deity has overtaken me: it has never left me since I did the deed! I have not known a happy hour—a happy minute,—no, not even an instant devoid of care, since that thrice accursed day! Oh! it was vile—it was cowardly—it was despicable thus to have acted! To rob the traveller upon the high-way, who could defend himself, that were a noble deed compared with this! Alas! alas! I have suffered much—I have suffered severely—but I have not suffered enough! No—this state of being is only a foretaste of the horrible torments—tortures—hell—that are reserved for crimes like mine!"

He ceased, for his voice was rendered hoarse by deep emotion, and was then drowned in sobs. The agony endured by that old man—the bitter, bitter anguish of his soul was indeed the consequence of some dread crime—the fruit of a remorse which belonged to turpitude that must have been very terrible!

He rose and walked towards the window. The morning, which had been sunny and beautiful, was succeeded by an afternoon of rain and gloom. The waters poured down in torrents; and for some moments he watched the pyramid of rain as it fell into the court beneath. And the variable climate of this country brought to his mind the beautiful atmosphere of his own native land—of France; and as he read the address of the letter which he had folded and now held in his hand, he sighed deeply. For he knew that the shores of that land were closed against him; and he felt that he should die without beholding its capital—the gay city of Paris, once again. Paris in the year 1824 was that which it is at the present day, the centre of the civilized world, the Babylon of Europe, a furnace of new and powerful intellects, a constant ebullition—a pandemonium of philosophers, of economists, of adventurers, of writers; a gulf in which agitated a band of demolishers of thrones and of altars; a Titan reposing in the mire, weighed down by a mountain of stone, but ready to shake the world with the least of its movements. And it was to this city that the old man could not return; and he felt the interdiction to be one of the most oppressive and intolerable grievances attendant upon the crime which he accused himself of having committed.

And the rain continued to pour in torrents. But still the stranger determined himself to convey his letter to the post-office; for he felt that he should not die happily unless he knew that he had performed that last duty. He accordingly enveloped himself in his cloak, took an umbrella, and, having locked the door of his room, proceeded to the general Post-office. He paid the postage of his letter, which was destined for France, and then retraced his steps through the torrents of rain, to his humble lodging.

In the meantime, Victor Melville had thrown himself upon his bed, and, in a state of the deepest agitation, had begun to reflect upon the course on which he was now entering. Tibbatts had retired for the purpose of procuring something for their dinner,—for breakfast they had had none, unless the deleterious spirits they had drunk might be thus denominated; and our young hero was left to his own meditations.

When a man in Victor's situation has determined upon the commission of a crime, there are but two courses for him to pursue, in order to avoid the temptation,—and those are to throw himself into the river, or to go to bed. These alternatives will be decided according to the temperament of the person interested. At all events, when the first is not adopted, the second is an admirable method to appease the senses and refresh the head. Oh! how sweet—how sweet is it when the heart is full and the pocket is empty, to rush up-stairs to one's bed-room—while the tempest is howling without, to envelope one's self in the bed-clothes—and, then, alone, in the silence of that chamber—alone with all one's infamy—to accuse one's self of cowardice, of villany, of madness—to complain—to anathematize—to beseech—until fatigue and slumber overtake him, and carry him into the delusive regions of another world! But to toss upon one's bed in the broad day-light—while the rains are pouring without, and poverty and hunger prevail within—to stand upon the threshold of a crime which he dares not contemplate, and from which he has not the courage to retire—to know that that crime will alone produce the means of accomplishing some much desired object—and then to calculate the probabilities of failure, and the chances of punishment,—oh! this is passing from one kind of hell to another—this is merely making an exchange of tortures—this is the difference between physical and mental suffering—the hunger of the body, and the thirst of the soul,—this is drinking molten lead after having been burnt with red-hot iron,—and this is experiencing the punishment of Victor Melville!

"This is indeed the progress of a drunkard in the ways of crime!" said Victor, aloud, as he writhed upon the bed in the folds of his own thoughts, as if he were in the embraces of an anaconda; "this is the career of him who yields himself up to the most pernicious of all habits! And yet—how to withstand the temptation! Oh! at this moment there are thousands of individuals in this great capital, who know not the cares of poverty! Why should this difference exist? Why should I be wretched and poor—and another happy and rich? Wherefore should I not seek that equalization which the unjust laws of this country forbid?"

This wretched sophistry was interrupted by a knock at the door of the youth's apartment. He started as if he had already been guilty of the crime he meditated, and already feared the domiciliary visit of the police. A moment's reflection banished the cause of alarm. He hurried to the door, and received a packet from the hands of a young man, who merely said "With my master's compliments, Sir,"—and then turned hastily away. Melville closed the door, seated himself at the table, and with a trembling hand opened the packet. A manuscript fell to the ground,—it was his own tale—the tale he had so confidently sent to the publisher in Paternoster-row. All hopes sank within him. There was a short note in the envelope which contained the manuscript; and that note briefly expressed a regret that the tale was not suited to the pages of the periodical, to the Editor of which it had been addressed.

Evils never come singly: and if anything were wanting to confirm the wavering resolutions of this poor young man, and urge him on to crime, circumstances had of a surety conspired to accomplish this aim. From that instant he no longer hesitated what step to pursue; but awaited the return of Mr. Tibbatts in a sombre mood of obstinacy, dogged resolution, and the recklessness of a despairing man.

Mr. Tibbatts returned, after having prevailed upon a butcher in the neighbourhood to supply him with some meat—a publican to fill his bottle with brandy—and a baker to unburden his generosity to the extent of a quarter loaf. At three o'clock he and Melville sate down to their dinners; and the remainder of the evening was passed in drinking and smoking.

Brandy is at all times calculated to form the finished ruffian, and to inspire the reluctant with that bastard courage which is necessary to the accomplishment of a bad deed; and the fumes of tobacco are well adapted to increase that doggedness of determination and sullen recklessness to which the sinner nerves his mind on the eve of a fresh crime. Alas! all these evil results spring from the vicious combinations of political systems: the government makes bread dear—man wants bread—he cannot purchase it, and he cannot starve,—he must therefore steal it,—and the intoxicating drinks, the sale of which is encouraged by the government, urge him on to accomplish that act of turpitude. The same government, which thus compels him to sin, punishes him for his misdeed with all the severity of impartial and indignant justice! What contradictions are there in all the systems of human invention!

As the evening approached, the rain fell less violently; but the artillery of heaven commenced its dreadful din. The thunders rolled, and the lightnings flashed; and the moments of perfect stillness which succeeded each clap seemed to inspire the minds of the two carousers with awe. But this effect soon passed away; and as, one by one, the lights in the windows of the houses in Albion Buildings were extinguished, they exchanged significant glances with each other,—as much as to say, “The hour approaches!” and then, as if those words had really issued from their lips, they said, “Come, drink,”—another manner of expressing a sentiment understood by both—the sentiment that the time for the trial of their courage was at hand!

The storm howled without—the thunders rolled at less distant intervals,—and from time to time the flashes of vivid lightning called into full and perfect outline all the houses seen from the window of Victor's apartment. It was at the moment when one long and loud clap of thunder had just sunk into the silence of the night, that the clock of Saint Paul's proclaimed the hour.

Melville counted the strokes,—one, two, three,—and so on,—until he had numbered eleven.

“Eleven!” cried Tibbatts; “I did not think it was so late.”

“Eleven!” said Victor; and that hour appeared to be the knell of his happiness for ever—the tocsin of a ruined soul!

“In half an hour we'll go to work,” observed Mr. Tibbatts: “I know that Robus sleeps pretty sound. It was a capital idea of mine. But you don't drink!”

Melville filled his glass with brandy and water, and lighted another cigar with the hope of composing his ideas. But he experienced a mental agitation and a bodily uneasiness—an oppression at the heart, and a weight upon the chest—which rendered that half-hour of suspense absolutely intolerable!

At length Tibbatts tossed off the remainder of his liquor, and rose hastily from his chair.

“Every one is in bed now,” said he, in a low and hoarse voice: “we cannot choose a better moment.”

“You are afraid, Tibbatts,” said Melville, appalled at the change in his companion's tone.

“Afraid!” ejaculated the tempter, affecting a chuckle: “there is not much to be afraid of!”

“Suppose the door should be locked?” observed Melville, trembling violently, and almost hoping that a reply in the affirmative would be given.

“I know all about that,” answered Tibbatts. “The door is sure to be locked; but it lifts off its hinges: and that we must do as gently as possible. I've got a dark lantern in my room, which I shall take with me, so as to throw a momentary glare upon the portmanteau in case I don't put my hand upon it in an instant.”

Mr. Tibbatts procured the lantern from his own apartment; and at the same time he satisfied himself that all the inmates of the extensive lodging-house were quiet. He returned to Melville's room, and then informed him of the mode of procedure to be adopted. Victor was about to decline at once to enter any farther into the scheme of villany; but the thought of Louise—of his unsuccessful tale—of his poverty—and of his denuded pocket, once more armed him with that desperate courage which was necessary for the execution of the project.

It was within half an hour of midnight,—the storm still raged with appalling violence,—and the night was dark as pitch, save at those intervals when the whole metropolis was lighted up with a sudden blaze of fire produced by the flashes of lightning. Tibbatts slowly led the way down the flight of stairs leading to the apartment of Mr. Robus, and Victor followed with noiseless steps. Tibbatts gently tried the door, and, to his joy and astonishment, he found that it was not locked.

“Now then, my boy,” said Tibbatts, in a low whisper to his companion, “we shall soon complete the job.”

As he uttered these words, he cautiously pushed the door open, and Victor mechanically drew nearer towards the threshold. Tibbatts stole into the apartment, and was silently and slowly advancing towards the spot where he knew that the portmanteau of his landlord usually stood, when his foot slipped upon something that seemed greasy and wet. At that instant a flash of lightning of exceeding brightness illuminated the whole room for several seconds, and Tibbatts mechanically cast his eyes towards the floor. He staggered, as a terrible picture rapidly but distinctly met his view and then disappeared.

“Victor—Victor—Melville!” he cried in a faint tone of voice; “in the name of heaven, where are you?”

“Here—here,” was the reply: “is anything the matter?”

Tibbatts immediately opened his dark lantern, so that the light fell upon the floor: Melville drew near the spot; and a ghastly—hideous spectacle met the eyes of those two men who had sought that room for plunder. Beneath the sickly glare of the lantern, was seen the body of a man, lying with his back upon the floor, and his distorted countenance upwards. A hideous gash across the throat, and a razor lying in a pool of blood near him, at once convinced them that some terrible deed had been lately committed there. Again a flash of lightning illumed the chamber; and Victor recoiled, horror-struck, towards the door, for he thought that the lips of the corpse moved, and that its eyes, which were open, rolled in their sockets. But his imagination alone had produced that idea.

“Come—come away,—for heaven's sake let us stay here no longer!” said Melville in an agonizing tone of voice.

At that instant a footstep was heard upon the stairs; and a long and hearty curse at the darkness of the night fell from the lips of the individual who was ascending the steps.

“Here is Robus himself!” ejaculated Melville; and, without knowing what step to take, or what to do, he hurried up-stairs to his own apartment. Influenced by some idea that his own safety was at stake, he seized his hat, and again rushed towards the stairs with the precipitation of an individual escaping from the officers of justice. The form of that bloody corpse haunted him at every step: his brain seemed on fire—and yet a cold perspiration broke out all over his body. As he hurried down the stairs, he heard the voices of Tibbatts and the landlord in loud altercation in the apartment where the body lay; and he perceived that the tones of Mr. Robus were hoarse and thick, as if influenced by drinking.

Without waiting to ascertain the cause of the dispute between Tibbatts and his landlord, and still urged onwards by the idea that his own safety should be alone consulted at that crisis, the young man flew down stairs, hurried out of the front-door, and continued his flight down the court, into the street, as rapidly as his legs would carry him. He was heedless of the rain and of the violence of the storm, for he was pursued by the constant conviction of imminent danger, and haunted by the grim and ghastly features of the corpse of which he had caught so perfect, although so transient, a view in the chamber of a mysterious death.

(To be continued in our next.)

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. 1.

So prominent is the position now occupied by the United States in the social, the political, and the commercial worlds,—so erroneous have been many of the statements propagated relative to those tracts and their inhabitants,—and so necessary is it for the votaries of Teetotalism to become acquainted with that nation whence emanated this new light of moral reformation, that we shall not offer any apology for the insertion of a series of articles, under the above denomination, in the columns of this journal.

Three quarters of a century have not yet elapsed since thirteen western colonies of Great Britain took up arms, and achieved their independence. It was a great work commenced on a great principle, the importance of which none but a highly enlightened people could have conceived. The emancipated colonies, after some years of existence, as separate though confederated states, coalesced into a single nation, which immediately entered upon a most brilliant career. But while all her energies seemed absorbed in raising her commerce to be the second in the world, a process—to Europe an invisible one—was going on within her, which has led to most startling results. A passion for emigration got hold of the eastern states; the Yankee took to the woods, as the apprentice in England takes to the sea; a love of adventure, a capricious industry preferring its own method of toil, the surly self-consequence of being responsible to no one for his pursuits, each of these was sufficient to induce him to shoulder his axe. Off he went, and cleared himself a home in the forest, until the sounds of approaching footsteps sent him deeper into the wilds: thus he proceeded, screaming off the fertility of successive spots, and abandoning them to some new adventurer less intrepid than himself. Like the birds that are said to be constantly skimming the surface of the Bosphorus, and are never known to rest upon it—the French have given them the name of ames damnées—these men are ever on the move; and in this sense at least, if in no other, they may be styled the ames damnées of civilization. But a less restless race is always on their track, ready to profit by their impatient toil. It is this double and simultaneous action, this commercial enterprise without, and this colonizing enterprise within, which furnishes one of the most interesting features of the American career. Already, it is found expedient “to check (we quote from No. LXX. of the North American Review) emigration from the settled to the unsettled parts, and to substitute the cultivation of the arts of social life, its tastes, its manners, and its habits, for those of the roving emigrant, or solitary settler in the wilderness." Already! Now, it was naturally to be expected, that with the "rage for commerce," which Dr. Price, writing to Arthur Lee, in 1787, ascribes to the Americans, that their Atlantic border would soon be fringed with a dense and rapidly increasing population, and that a certain portion of in-lying territory would be cultivated for the supply of the vast produce which their wants and an extensive commerce would require. But that while this result is rapidly accomplishing, this very population, as if already oppressed by the luxuriance of numbers, should send its swarms of emigrants to the forest, not to be the pioneers of a laggard and remote improvement, the nuclei of future and slowly budding settlements, but the artificers of present villages, towns, and cities—the subduers of woods to the uses of societies, organised in their most efficient form—is a consequence that not only astonishes us, but proves that the dullest of all sciences, even that of statistics, is not devoid of its romance. Singular phenomenon of a people beginning its political existence with little more than three millions of inhabitants and 300,000 square miles of occupied territory, and in little more than half a century adding nearly nine millions to its population, and 500,000 square miles to its civil jurisdiction! But these results are too immense to be appreciated as a whole. Go into the forest, you will stumble upon a town in full activity, bee-like and busy—it has 10,000 inhabitants, and is—in its eleventh year! Are you descending the Ohio, you will reach a town of 30,000 inhabitants. "The streets and buildings are handsome," says Hamilton, "and would be considered so in New York or Philadelphia." "It has eighteen churches," writes Stuart, "numerous cotton and woollen factories, steam saw-mills, and machinery, and mechanics of all kinds. It has also an institution for general education, and a military college and a library, and a museum of natural history." It is the largest city of the western states, and "stands on ground which till lately was the extreme limit of civilization." "It is full of pigs, and abominably bad manners," says Mrs. Trollope, for it is Cincinnati we are speaking of as it stood in its thirtieth year! This lively and sarcastic lady has been rather hard upon this young wood nymph,—this forest hoyden; but what a delightful book to those who know how much of it is true, and have not the fear of Europe before their eyes; and what a gem of a book to the future generations of Americans, who will greedily devour its grotesque record of their olden time. Such then is the spontaneous growth of those cities of the woods. Poor Catharine of Russia! How would her spirit marvel could it behold such fairy scenes, this legerdemain, this "hey presto, be gone!" of enterprise which bids the forest fall, and the city rise; she whose passion it was to lay the first stone of towns that were never to boast a second; and to whom the Emperor Joseph so wittily alluded when he wrote from the Crimea, "I have this day been assisting at a great work—laying the first stone of a grand city, and the last." How would the imperial lady envy the happy despot that could indulge such freaks; and how would her wonder grow when she learnt they were not the products of an ukase, but mere sweat-drops from the brow of a young athlete, whose nurse was Freedom, and whose name is Industry. But there are greater marvels than these. It is now almost eighty years—peradventure, venerable reader, your own age may exceed this period by a decade—since a Virginian physician, a man of enterprise and talent, passed the western frontier of his colony for the purpose of exploring. He advanced with a small party to a region to which the Indians had given the fearful name of "the Dark and Bloody ground," and hearing that the Ohio was not far distant, set out in quest of it; but after floundering about for some time in a wrong direction, and undergoing the severest fatigue, he at length abandoned his project and returned. This wild district has now its population of nearly a million; its eighty-three counties with their 1100 schools; and what, we opine, is a greater marvel than all, its one county of Morgan, with its 893 children, and no school at all; its university and colleges, and its library fund of 140,000 dollars a year; it has been a state since 1792, and rejoices in the name of Kentucky. Such is the magic worked by the axe of the Americans; such the continuous progress of the social stream now eddying into large masses, and now voicing in innumerable channels into every corner of this gigantic country. But let us see what has been done on the north, and north-western side of the inaccessible river of the beautiful Ohio, la belle Rivière. Has its gentle wilderness of prairies escaped the rough hug of industry? Let the territories of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, now raised to the dignity of states, reply. Here is the El Dorado of the Union—the paradise of the prairies,—vast islands of verdure, of long rich grass entwined by brilliant and sweet flowers, girded by the forest and indented by it as the ocean by its shores. The second of these states will afford some idea of the natural advantages of this superb region. Covering an extent of 39,000 square miles,—it is the third state in point of territory,—it presents a vast undulating plain of the richest land in the world, not varying in its level above sixty feet, extending from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, and containing within its limits 4000 miles of "boatable" waters, many beautiful lakes, and such perfect natural irrigation, that it is impossible to settle at any point distant from water carriage. In this "terrestrial Paradise," as the French styled it, there was in 1830, a population of 170,000—the amount having trebled in ten years. Here too is a capital with the visionary name of Vandalia, which six years ago, when Stuart saw it, though only nine years old, had not merely houses and men, legislators, lawyers, and physicians, but two learned societies, an historical, and—God save the mark—an antiquarian! Now we should as soon expect to hear of an agricultural society moored in the midst of the heart of the Great Desert. We wonder what this learned body considers a remote antiquity—doubtless the close of the last century? The affair, we suspect, was only got up by way of novelty; for the almanac for 1835 does not notice it; it has therefore died—of old age perhaps!

(To be continued in our next.)

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. I.

MR. WONTNER, the late governor of Newgate, said that ninety-nine out of a hundred prisoners were reduced to their degraded situation by means of drink.

Dr. Cheyne, M.D., has declared that if a man, beginning at the age of twenty, were to take one large glass of spirits regularly every day, he would thereby affect the duration of his life, probably abridging it by at least ten years. Writers upon Toxicology include ardent spirits in the list of poisonous substances.

Two men were one day seen coming out of George-yard, Whitechapel; and, after talking some time together at the corner of the gate-way, one of them pulled off his shirt, went into a pawnbroker's, and pledged it. He then went into a gin-shop with his companion, and they spent the money together. On another occasion, two men were talking in the same neighbourhood; and in this instance, one pulled off his shirt, sold it to his comrade, and then they both went to a gin-shop and spent the proceeds of the garment.

There are in London, 1887 bakers, 1479 butchers, 940 cheese-mongers, 265 fishmongers, 163 poulterers, 218 dairy-men, and 1933 grocers. These make a total of 6890 provision shops; and there are in London 3638 licensed victuallers, exclusive of beer-shops. The bakers, butchers, and fishmongers amount to 3631; and, as there are 3638 licensed victuallers, all of whom sell spirits, there are seven more venders of distilled poisons than of wholesome food.

One great proof of the increase of drunkenness in the last thirty years, will be seen in the great increase of consumption of ardent spirits, the increase of lunacy, of pauperism, and of crime.

Twenty-five millions of money are annually expended by the public, in the British dominions, for distilled spirits alone.

The great and rapid increase in drunkenness has been particularly noticed since the year 1825, when the duty was lowered on distilled spirits.

The mere fact of drunkards becoming reformed and industrious would create an immense demand for provisions and clothing; and this would increase the demand for labour.

Within the last ten years, the premium given for public-houses has most enormously increased. It is now a common practice to give from £2000 to £4000, premium, for the good-will of a house of large business.

A publican one day sent to an operative chemist for certain drugs which were sold by the latter; at the same time the young man, who called from the publican, asked the druggist for an order for some gin. The druggist accordingly gave an order for a gallon, which quantity was forthwith sent to him. The chemist immediately applied a test to it; and the moment he dropped the testing substance into it, the whole quantity of spirit turned white. He sent it back to the publican, with a message expressing his astonishment that he should send him poison.

Gin is frequently marked up 8s. 6d. a gallon at the gin-shops. Now the price-current of gin, whisky, and rum is about 2s. 4d. to 3s. 6d. a gallon. If you add the amount of the duty to these sums, it will be found that the article vendible by the publicans can be little better than poison, or they could not afford to sell it at the price above mentioned.

Vitriol is one article that is commonly made use of for the purpose of adulterating gin.

From observations which have been made relative to those children who attend Sunday-schools, it is ascertained that the children of intemperate parents are invariably squalid, emaciated, and exceedingly debilitated, and this is the general effect produced by the use of ardent spirits both upon parents and children.

The average number of persons taken up by the police out of the streets for intoxication, amounts to about 30,000 per annum in this metropolis.

A considerable portion of the intoxication which exists in London, especially amongst bricklayers and journeymen tailors, may be traced to the fact of their masters or their masters' foremen paying them in public-houses, where those unfortunate persons often wait three or four hours on Saturday evening for their wages. Publicans will frequently advance masters sums of money to make up their arrears of wages, on condition that those wages be paid at the houses of these accommodating landlords.

Gin-shops have increased enormously since the passing of the Beer Bill. There was originally a limit to public-houses; but the number of beer-shops soon became without limit. The publicans were thus compelled to change their system of doing business in order to compete with the beer-shops; and thus all the houses of the former became places where spirits and beer are sold over the counter, either to be taken away or drunk on the spot. The old public-houses, where a man could have his steak dressed, and sit down and take his ale, are extinct: they are all converted into splendid houses where gin is sold at the bar.

In families where the mother takes to drinking, total ruin must ensue. If the father take to drinking, it is more likely to be at night; and that is bad enough; but, when the mother drinks, she drinks in the day, and the children are left to shift for themselves. If the girls be smart and good-looking, they are picked up and become prostitutes, and the young boys are picked up by the thieves, in whose avocation they are speedily instructed.

Drinking is terrible in its remote as in its immediate consequences. All the prostitutes in the lower class are associated with thieves: they have their fancy man, with whom they live, and who is invariably a thief. The great object is to pick up old men, and induce them to drink; and then their companions are generally ready in a corner to assist them.

Bad practices, the assemblage of prostitutes and thieves, low dancing called "hops," and all those things that lead to vice, with the mischief that invariably follows, are always in the inverse ratio of the prosperity of the public. A man, who is prosperous, does not encourage those things; but when sinking, and when he finds himself going, he has only two alternatives,—either to embrace Teetotal doctrines and retrieve himself, or confirm his ruin by plunging into all kinds of dissipation and excess.

(To be continued.)

THE LAST BOTTLE.

From the London Magazine for August.

KARL VON BRUNNEN was a young painter of Vienna, without reputation, though not without talent, who consoled himself at times for the rigour of fortune by frequenting the wein-haus, and the other places of entertainment, which abound in that mirthful city. One day, a knock was heard at his door. With a fluttering heart he opened it, thinking it just possible that some rich connoisseur, suspecting his genius, had come to give him an order for a bildlein (little picture), and haply would cross his palm with the geld beforehand. Alas, it was only his tailor!

Karl owed his schneider a round bill. The schneider was a most obstinate dun. How to put him off, to do him to a turn, not like a capon, but "a chameleous promise-crammed"—this was the question; and its solution, considering the snip's character, would almost require the genius of a Sheridan.

"Ah ha, 'tis you, Herr Muller. My dear Sir, tsartlich willkommen" (a tender welcome)!

"Hein!" said Muller, "this is the tenth time that I've come here, and can't touch a graschen. Very disagreeable! Dreadful loss of time!"

"Oh! you come perhaps to ask me for a little money?"

"Money, Sir? Most undoubtedly I come to ask for my money. What else could I come for?"

"Oh, I only just thought you might have come to take my measure for a coat I'm consumedly in want of—"

"Sorry to hear it, Sir; but shan't put in another stitch for you, until you've paid off the old score!"

"Ausschweifend verschwendung! (extravagant prodigality!)" exclaimed Von Brunnén, pronouncing the uncouth words with a tremendous guttural emphasis, which made them ten times more uncouth: "I shall not need the other coat. The fine season's now arrived; and I shall do admirably well in my shirt-sleeves at home, and my blouse out of doors."

"What, Sir, you do not mean to give me any money this time either? Donner und blitz!" &c., &c.

"Pray come down stairs," said Karl; and they descended to a wein-haus on the first floor of the tenement.

in which he lodged. Karl's good nature and looks had obtained him credit with the Mädchen who stood at the bar.

Karl had not said one word in descending, knowing his man well, and understanding the necessity of mollifying him before proceeding—in the language of our modern young English gentlemen—to "gammon" him.

Upon entering the room, he merely said, "The rum here is delicious, (he perceived the schneider's mouth beginning to water). Do have a glass."

The order was instantaneously given and complied with. Karl took the schneider down with his eye, as the fowler does the little bird. The single glass had melted away all the ice from around Herr Muller's heart.

Karl plied him with a second, and thawed him into perfect bonhomie and benevolence.

Muller, though upon befitting occasions a very inveterate dun, was a true Deutschlander at heart, and drinking and good-fellowship were with him indigenous qualities. He ordered a flasche of wine to be set before them, and as to be a connoisseur in such matters is in all countries accounted gentlemanly, found it villainous:—

"Bah!" he exclaimed, "this is mere vinegar to the wine they sell at a florin the bottle in a wein-haus I know—the Freuden der Tafel (pleasures of the table) in the Ungegend (environs) hard by."

"Why I was just going in that direction," said Karl. "Then come with me so far."

"Recht tsartlich!"

Karl and the schneider set out together. Arrived at the Freuden der Tafel, the tailor ordered a bottle of wine. Its bouquet and flavour were both delicious. Von Brünnen thought it requisite to do as Muller had done at the tavern to which he had first invited him. He called for a second.

"Would you believe it?" said Muller. "I begin to grow hungry."

"Good! let us call for something to eat."

"Not here; though they have christened the house, 'The pleasures of the table,' it's all a villainous imposition. Their wine is good, but their eating is abominable."

"Where shall we insert our forks?"

"Not here; that's certain. Just come up the hill with me a little. We shall obtain a glorious view of the city. I know a sweet spot, and their tafel is perfectly enchanting."

Von Brünnen followed the savant tailor up the hill. Half-way up they stopped at another wein-haus, finding it, as they alleged, quite impossible to climb so steep an ascent, without a fresh bottle on the way. They cast their eyes upon the plain, and each man saw a couple of Viennas!

At length they reached the tailor's favorite dining-house. They had soup and a chasse of Curacao each—charming slices of ham, with sauer kraut, and they drank some wine with considerable relish; cutlets and a salad with plenty of hard eggs, and they drank with increased relish; rosten (broiled bones), a favourite dish of the tailor's, and with marvellous gusto he exclaimed:—

"Trinke! trinke!" (drink—drink!)

The nachtsch (dessert) followed; and pistachio-nuts and olives demanded each a fresh flagon. Karl's little account had no longer the slightest shred of existence in the tailor's wine-warmed imagination:—

"I'm happier," he exclaimed, "than the Papst or the Kaiser" (the Pope or the Emperor), as he ordered the fourth bottle. "Herr Brünnen," he proceeded, hugging the painter to his bosom, "you're a hahn richt männlich (a right manly cock!) Now let's begin the wein-schlacht (wine-combat, a bottle-battle.)"

"Staar! (a cataract) and I will follow thee," was Karl's reply, and he repeated a passage out of a Bürschen melody about:—"True Deutschlanders we, and what care we for the pleck diebsbande" (the vulgar mob—a band of thieves!)

At the fourth bottle, the tailor opened his heart to Karl, and began to recount to him the chagrins which he suffered from his henpecking frau. At the fifth, Karl experienced the necessity of unfolding his own bosom, and spoke to the tailor of the intrigues and cabals, which left him in schmach (disgrace), and prevented him from arriving at the very highest point of professional eminence. Such and such a one, whose names he mentioned, had studied with him under Graf, and had succeeded only because they had toadied Von Paletzen! He seized a piece of chalk, sketched a profile upon the wall, and exclaimed:—"Just look there. Der teufel! There's not one of those fine-dressed sparks, that wouldn't swallow the chalk sooner than draw such a head as that. Blitz, not one! Well; they have all splendid houses, while I am dying in a garret."

The tailor became soft as padding, and said with a maudlin twinkle, a tear trembling in his eye, "If ever I ask you for money, may I be —! Mein Knaven, you'll pay me when you can!"

They left the house together, after having swallowed a tolerable share of brandy—to facilitate digestion—and set out for a short walk before the sonnenuntergang (sun under-go or sunset).

"List! list! list-en!" said the tailor, "a young man like you should be well dressed. Blitz! I'll make you a suit."

"But I can't tell when I shall be able to p-p-pay you." "You shall paint the p-p-portrait of my wife—der teufel! and the p-p-portraits, too, of all my little little ones!"

And the tailor finished by measuring him in the open air, making the small mistake of setting down 62 instead of 26 inches!

Then they were both of opinion that it began to grow excessively hot, returned to the wein-haus, and ordered three bottles of wine. After each man had drunk his bottle, they saw with great grief that they could hold no more! What was to become of the last bottle? They called the tapster, and arranged with him that he should give the bottle to the first thirsty man, without money, he could see; and the two friends descended the hill together by a very circuitous route, and separated.

Upon reaching home, Karl first perceived that he was slightly affected by the liquor which he had imbibed. He was a deuce of a time in finding the lock. At last he got in, and threw himself on his bed; but the chairs seemed to dance around him, and the principal figure in his "grand picture," just commenced, began to play right lustily on the violin. He slept for a moment, and awoke with his throat on fire; and then he thought that there was not a man in all Vienna thirstier than he, or with less money. "The bottle (he argued) which we left at the wein-haus is mine by right." He stumbled down the stairs, and up the hill, claimed the bottle, and found his friend the tailor quietly drinking it in a corner.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Several Communications and letters have been received, and private replies have been returned, as requested, to their writers. Those letters, which are to be answered publicly, will be attended to next week.

Particular attention is requested to an advertisement in this day's journal, relative to a new work to be immediately issued by the DEPT. OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION. (See our Advertising columns.)

The Report of our Cork Correspondent in our next.

A Correspondent from Yarmouth has informed us that it is supposed by some that we are not altogether free from the taint of Socialism. We positively rebut the charge, and inform our readers that nearly all the Shareholders are members of various religious societies.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1840.

THE REGENERATION OF IRELAND.

How great a contrast will exist between the past condition of Ireland and its state so soon as the work of Father Mathew shall be completed. The whole of the south of Ireland is now teetotalized; and the Apostle of Temperance will doubtless produce the same good effects in the north within the lapse of a very short period from the present date.

The past history of Ireland attests the same penury—the same filth—the same idleness—the same improvidence; fits of temporary energy succeeded by long intervals of degrading sloth; a fertile country and a beggared people; acute intellects and insane conduct. Fitted by their capacities for the noblest and the best actions, they have been tied down by the effects of intemperance to the meanest and the worst. Members of a kingdom wherein knowledge is as common and as necessary as the air they breathe, they have hitherto been as unenlightened as the people of those kingdoms from which knowledge is jealously debarred. While the mighty stream of improvement was rounding off the asperities of every other people, its powerful eddies circled without any visible impression around the rugged character of this one. If we looked upon a fair land and a gallant people, we saw nothing but misery, poverty, starvation, and crime. The threshing floor was covered with the heavy grain; the stately ox, like a pampered epicure, was dainty amid the richest herbage of the earth; and yet the peasant struggled with famine, and pined in the midst of plenty on his mean and rugged fare. We saw men with hearts overflowing with sensibility, and warm with generous emotions; and we shuddered as we beheld their lawless acts. We looked upon men with intellects in which imagination is happily blended with acuteness, impatient energy, and a discrimination singularly just; and we were forced to turn away in disgust from their pitiful ignorance and their blind superstition. If we sought for Ireland's spacious towns, her bustling cities, and her crowded quays—for the graceful decorations of social life,—for civilization in all its glitter, its gaiety, its beauty, and its strength,—we did not seek in vain! but beyond those centres of light a cloud hung like an unhealthy mist over her rural population. There were the fat pastures, the tillaged field, and the wide landscape teeming with its blessed fruits; but where were the most precious ornaments of the scene? The neat cottage—the thriving village—the clean and red-checked peasantry—where were they? Where the glorious stir of industry, the ferment of toil, the proud desire of competence, which swell the veins and muscles of a sound society? Alas! where they should have been were only wretched huts, and squalid habits, and wasted forms—recklessness and crime—rags, and misery, and want.

The spell of intemperance was upon the Irish character,—and hence those hideous results. We say not this lightly: we recognize the brilliant qualities of the Irish, and we respect them. It is therefore our fervent hope that the teetotalizing of all Ireland will be the means of its regeneration.

In the natural progress of the Irish, they did not want for civilization; but habits of degraded intemperance destroyed their susceptibility for it. It was not that we found the means of social improvement studiously withheld, but that we found them neutralized by evil customs. When letters dawned upon the intellectual darkness of Europe, Ireland was gilded by their earliest rays; and her latest historian has eagerly thrown her social confusion at this period into shadow, in order to bring out her mental achievements in bold and brilliant relief. To her schools resorted students from all Europe. The personal intercourse of the learned with Ireland became proverbial; and when a scholar was missing from his usual haunts, it was said of him, Amandatus est in Hiberniam. If anything could have laid the solid basis of a rare and excellent civilization, it was such intellectual excitement and commerce as this. But intemperance—encouraged by the government—destroyed all these elements of greatness; and the introduction of ardent spirits ruined those energies which might have erected eternal fabrics of human glory in that fertile land. Hence has arisen the suspicion that there is in the Irish character, as in that of some other nations, a principle of repugnance to social order—an invincible reluctance to exchange the wild self-will of semi-barbarous life for the irksome restraints of society completely organized. The calm and gentle vigour of civilization, which, by slow and successive conquest, has uprooted the barbarism of Europe, and scattered far and wide the seeds of social happiness; which has reclaimed the misdirected energies of some nations, and created a new stimulus in others; has been levelled in vain up to the present period against the disposition of the Irish. Habits of intemperance have successfully driven it from their shore; and the extinction of those habits could alone destroy its only and natural enemy.

Father Mathew shall be the votary of civilization, who will exterminate all opponents to its beneficent course; and the regeneration of Ireland shall be traced to the kindly influence of Teetotalism. The lie shall then be given to the implied assumption in that Query of Bishop Berkely, which asks, Whether the bulk of the Irish natives are not kept from thriving by the cynical content in dirt and beggary which they possess beyond any other people in Christendom? Ireland shall be regenerated, we say; and for this work of social reform she shall be indebted to the clearing of the Angean stables of her intemperance. She shall again assume those characteristics of superior refinement which, ere the introduction of the fatal habit, she derived from her ancient commercial connexion with the Phœnicians, the actual colonization of that extraordinary people amongst them, the influx of strangers during the period of her literary glory, and the well-deserved reputation of her academical establishments.

DESTINY.—A TALE.

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

"The Printer's Devil," he it known, is the soubriquet given to an humble individual employed in nearly all printing establishments for the purpose of dunning authors for copy, &c.: and the alarm and trepidation in which he sometimes throws the Editor, when, on the morning of publication, he laconically exclaims, "Waiting for copy, Sir!" we suppose has obtained for him one of the unenviable titles of his Satanic Majesty. Sir Walter Scott has, in one or two instances, done him the honour of an especial notice in his immortal works. These sketches, from their abrupt fragmentary character, we suppose, must have been unfinished tales purloined from the literary sancta of some of the individuals he occasionally visits.—Ed.]

"Allow me to assure you, Roland Bertram, my affections are already irrevocably engaged," said Lucille, blushing deeply; "and much as I regret being compelled thus boldly to acknowledge the same, yet I cannot, in justice to your feelings, withhold the information; and the more so, as I have hitherto always esteemed you as a gentleman possessing the finest sentiments of honour and delicacy, and one upon whose judgment I can invariably rely. As a proof of the sincerity of this avowal, I will at once disclose the name of the individual that—in short, you are acquainted, I believe, with Charles Crans—"

"Cranstoun!" literally shouted Roland. "O, Lucille, for the love of heaven, retract those words! You know not, I am sure, the specious character you mention. Of all individuals he is the least worthy of your esteem, and the most despicable:—but, excuse me, I rave wildly; the suddenness of the disclosure has deprived me of the calmness I should otherwise possess."

"Really, Mr. Bertram," replied Lucille, "this outrage I could not overlook in any other individual; but believing it is only a momentary passion that thus blinds your better judgment, and induces you to calumniate your friend—"

"Friend! friend!" interrupted Roland; "but I will endeavour to suppress this raging fire in my bosom." And, covering his eyes with his hand, for some moments he remained silent, Lucille viewing him with an anxious look of pity and astonishment. At last he proceeded to speak; and his contracted brow, and vacant gaze, seemed to imply that he had in those few moments prophetically darted through the circumstances of years yet to come.

"Lucille, I am calm: I loved—I love; and never will I resign this tie but to one that is every way worthy of you, and calculated to make you happy. Educated, as we were, together from our infancy, I am well acquainted with your character and the inestimable virtues you possess. Many associations at this moment crowd into my mind: one, above all the rest.—The other evening, in the calm moonlight, struck by the beauty of the starry host, we were unpremeditatedly led to converse respecting the sages of old, who, by the appearance of the planetary system, pretended to be enabled to predict the most important circumstances connected with an individual's future existence;—and we decided then that the whole theory was absurd, and that they only arrived at their conclusions from a close analysis of the component traits of individual character. And then, turning to the oracular answers of Delphos and Ammon, we thought their ambiguous responses were not the momentary effusions of some improvisatrice worked up to a pitch of frenzy, but the results of philosophic minds, deeply investigating the slumbering elements silently at work in nature: in short, as a chemist would prophesy the precise time of explosion of a prepared combustible—or as a mathematician, establishing two positions, arrives at a third—so easily did they prophesy and predict. And we then said, if they were thus enabled to dive into futurity, as it were, how much more necessary is it for us to exert this discriminating faculty, and, seeing the result of our deductions, avoid what fools alone call DESTINY."

"So then, according to your position," satirically observed Lucille, "every woman must be a metaphysician before she presumes to think for herself."

"No, not scientifically so; but only the exertion of the same faculty constantly exercised by every one, and that enables us to calculate any necessary consequences. 'The happiness of life,' says Young, 'depends on our discretion and a prudent choice.'"

"Let me then hear your sapient deductions, and assist my poor head by your pedantic conclusions," said Lucille ironically.

"Then, once for all, I confidently state, regardless of your keen-cutting satire, that as soon might the dove be happily fettered with the hawk, as the noble-minded Lucille with the besotted and selfish Charles Cranstoun. And—hear me—I know his character intimately; and that the specious garb of candour and generosity covers as base and selfish a soul as ever tabernacled in human shape;—a selfish, unsatisfied, inordinate love of wine will drown all scruples of conscience, and, joined to a passionate ungovernable temper, must, as a necessary consequence, lead every one with whom he is connected to misery and woe."

"It is sufficient," said Lucille, rising, with the tears in her eyes; "though I was previously satisfied that the distorted optics of jealousy influenced alike the learned and the illiterate, yet surprised am I to hear the once noble and esteemed Roland Bertram descend to the mean expedient of calumniating a rival. Our acquaintance here closes, Mr. Bertram."

With nervous and agitated step, the unfortunate Lucille left the apartment: and the still more miserable and unhappy Bertram—fixed as a statue—remained absorbed with the rashness of his remarks.

Six months after the above conversation had taken place, a carriage was observed furiously driven down the quiet streets of the University of—. The whole town was in commotion; a report having been circulated, that during the previous night, at a revel held in one of the colleges, a student had been killed. The carriage, followed by a multitude, dashed on at a frightful rate, till it arrived at the college entrance. One word, and the gate flew open. The carriage drove into the quadrangle, and the ponderous doors closed on the too inquisitive audience. Every thing connected with these gloomy abodes is enveloped in mystery; and within their walls the common rights of Englishmen are not acknowledged.

On a bed, in one of the apartments, lay the murdered victim—the younger son of the Duke of—. A secretly empannelled jury were examining the corpse; a broken bottle handed round to the jurymen—and a ghastly incision on the temple of the corpse—showed at once the cause of death. The Dean was very eloquently expatiating to the audience on the necessity of secrecy, and the nature of the unfortunate accident; and a verdict was speedily given which liberated another monster upon society.

But, to return, the carriage contained the lovely Lucille; who, in spite of all the remonstrances of her friends, was determined to unite her fortunes to those of the selfish Charles Cranstoun. In a few years—by gaming, wine, and gay company—he had run through the whole of his patrimony; and, as a dernier resort, church preferment was offered, provided he would enter a university and take orders. Stern necessity drove him to this uncongenial expedient: but even there he chose the most reckless and profligate as his companions; and at one of those bacchanalian orgies, termed "wine parties," constantly perpetrated in our Universities, he had been taxed by one of his victims as a cheating gambler. Exasperated by continued taunts, under the influence of maddening potations, he hurled the bottle at the head of the ill-fated son of the Duke of L—;—and thus terminated the career of one of the most promising students in the University.

It was under these circumstances that the lovely Lucille, urged only by her unbounded affection for her unworthy lover, flew to his relief; but he, instead of requiring her soothing cares, rejected her proffered services, and sought comfort only in the bottle: and even at the time the jury were deciding his fate, he lay in a besotted state of intoxication.

The next day the same carriage was observed standing at the college gate; and, as Lucille was following to the vehicle her disgraced and crest-fallen lover, she stopped, and hesitated;—'twas but an instant,—and then she muttered,—"Tis MY DESTINY, AND I MUST OX." At that moment she felt her hand suddenly seized, and warm tears fell fast upon it.—In a moment it was released; and, she caught one look, as the figure retreated:—'twas Bertram! The warning voice was recalled to her memory; and in that look volumes were conveyed: she wished to stop, but was hurried on,—the carriage door was closed; and, amidst the hisses and groans of an enraged multitude, they proceeded.

The populace thought one individual alone was the inmate of that carriage; for, unseen to them, in one corner, huddled up, lay the neglected

Lucille in an unconscious state of agony—like the fearful lamb caged with the ferocious and blood-thirsty tiger.

Mr. Bertram was an inmate of the same college, had obtained his Doctor's degree, and remained a Fellow of the college, and, of necessity a bachelor, all his life: but, although he was esteemed as a man of vast attainments, yet the Butler would very compassionately insinuate to his fellow-servants, as the Doctor took his melancholy promenade round the quadrangle, that all was not altogether right in "the upper story;" and would adduce, as an instance, that he once heard him say, that "wine—aye, down-right good college wine—had killed more than the sword."

POISONS.

POISON is any substance, which, when taken into the system, proves injurious to, or destructive of, animal life. There are many different kinds of poisons, and they vary much in their modes of operation. The mineral poisons, as arsenic and corrosive mercury, seem to attack the solid parts of the stomach, and to produce death by eroding its substance: the antimonials seem rather to attack the nerves, and to kill by throwing the whole system into convulsions; and in this manner almost all of the vegetable poisons seem to operate. All of these, however, appear to be inferior in strength to the poisons of some of the most deadly of serpents, which operate so suddenly that the animal bitten by them will be dead before another that had swallowed arsenic would be affected.

An ounce of emetic wine, injected into the jugular vein of a large dog, produces no effect for a quarter of an hour. At the expiration of that time, the dog will become sick, have a continual vomiting, and evacuate hard excrements. These operations will appear to relieve him; but he will soon grow uneasy again, move from place to place, and vomit once more. He will then lie down again, and his strength will rapidly decline with vomiting. In one hour and a half, about, he will die in convulsions.

A dram and a half of sal ammoniac dissolved in an ounce and a half of water, and injected into the jugular vein of a dog, will kill him almost instantly with convulsions.

A dram of purified white vitriol, injected into the cranial vein of a dog, will kill him immediately.

Diluted nitric acid, injected into the jugular and cranial veins of a dog, will produce instantaneous death by coagulating the blood.

Oil of tartar, injected into the veins of a dog, will cause the animal to swell and die after experiencing dreadful tortures.

A decoction of two drams of white hellebore, injected into the jugular vein of a dog, will kill him like a stroke of lightning.

An injection of an ounce of rectified spirits of wine, in which a dram of camphor is dissolved, will produce similarly speedy results.

Mercury and oil of olives, if injected into the blood, will prove fatal after a time.

Sulphuric, nitric, muriatic, oxalic, tartaric, acetic, and citric acids, when taken in large quantities, are most deadly poisons. The best species of antidote to these poisons is calcined magnesia. An ounce of this should be mixed with a pint of water, and a glassful taken every two minutes, so as to favour vomiting, and prevent the acid from acting. Should this not be at hand, decoction of linseed, marsh mallows, or any other mucilaginous liquid, may be taken in the meantime; for the success of the treatment depends entirely upon the activity with which aid is given: the delay of a few minutes may determine the fate of the sufferer. Soap, dissolved in water, (half an ounce to a pint,) or chalk and water in any dose, will also be found useful in the absence of magnesia. Glysters, prepared with the same substances, should also be given. Cloths, steeped in decoctions of linseed or mallows, must be subsequently applied to the stomach; and if relief from inflammation be not obtained by this measure, a dozen or fifteen leeches should be applied, and bleeding performed. Wine, which is considered by many medical men as proper to restore action, is in this case a fresh poison, which acts precisely like that the effects of which we have combated.

Arsenic is well known for its poisonous qualities, and it is frequently resorted to by persons desirous of committing suicide. In this case, the patient should take twenty grains of white vitriol, dissolved in a little water, or fifteen grains of blue vitriol. No fluid should be taken until vomiting commences, when large quantities of water, sweetened with sugar, or linseed tea, or thin gruel, should be given to suspend the poison and encourage the vomiting. Should vomiting and purging have arisen spontaneously, they should be assisted by drinking copiously of decoction of mallows, or of any of the above liquids. When the sickness has subsided, a table-spoonful of castor oil should be administered, and repeated at intervals of two or three hours; so as to clear thoroughly the stomach and bowels. The patient should drink frequently a tea-cupful of lime-water, which may be made by placing a piece of unslacked lime, about the size of a walnut, for five minutes, in two quarts of water, and then straining the liquid through a cloth or flannel-bag. Lime unites with the arsenic, and renders it insoluble; should therefore any of the mineral be remaining, it will be rendered less dangerous by being converted into an insoluble arseniate of lime.

The wolf's-bane, or monk's-hood, is much admired for its dark blue flowers; the fox-glove is also cultivated for the sake of its flow'rs, as well as black hellebore; but all these are highly poisonous. Deadly nightshade grows in hedges, and is much admired for its purple flowers, which turn to bunches of light orange-coloured berries. The plant is used in medicine. Small hemlock has frequently been mistaken for parsley, and has produced sad results. Hemlock dropwort is also a poisonous plant. Stramonium, or the thorn apple, acts nearly in the same manner as opium; and strong-scented lettuce is highly somniferous. Persons, who may be poisoned by the extravagant use of this vegetable, must be treated in the same manner as those poisoned by opium.

The symptoms which lead to the suspicion of poisoning by tobacco are severe nausea, vomiting, and other sensations of drunkenness, great sinking of the strength, cold sweats, and convulsions.

The utmost danger often arises from carbonic acid gas being extricated from burning charcoal in close rooms, and from the gas accumulating in cellars and others places which have been long kept closed, and into which individuals imprudently enter immediately after they are opened. No person ought to enter a cellar, pit, well, or other place in which this gas can accumulate, without carrying with him a lighted candle; the going out of which should be the signal for instant retreat.

When prussic acid is taken in a large dose, death almost instantaneously follows; but, when the quantity is more moderate, it produces the same sedative effects as laurel-water.

The class of septic or putrescent poisons comprehends those substances, which, on being taken into the stomach, or introduced by any means into the system, produce general debility, faintings, and a breaking down, or putrescent state of the animal fluids and solids, without much effect on the intellectual faculties. They are almost all of an animal nature, and more especially such as result from the venom of serpents. We may particularly enumerate the viper, the rattle-snake, and the cobra de capello. Animal poisons of this description are innocuous when taken into the stomach, although their action is so powerful, and often fatal, when they are introduced into the habit by a wound or any other method of inoculation. If the lips or the tongue, of a person who sucks a poisoned wound, be chapped, the system is inoculated in the same manner, as if it were inserted by a lancet, or by a bite, under the skin.

In the event of a person being bitten by a mad dog, any person on the spot should immediately tie a ligature above the wound, and apply a wine-glass or a cupping-glass over it, until a surgeon can be procured to cut out the bitten part. As everything depends on the complete extirpation of the part, a good surgeon must afterwards be employed. When the disease appears, if the medical attendant have not previously seen a place of the kind, which may happen to the most skilful practitioner, request him to cup the patient over the course of the spine, and immediately administer prussic acid.

The following cautionary hints should be attended to. They are mainly intended for the use of printers, compositors, plumbers, glaziers, painters, and other artificers. These persons should not only abstain altogether from the use of intoxicating drink, (a recommendation we offer to every one,) but should pay the strictest attention to cleanliness, and never, when it can be avoided, to daub their hands with ink or paint; and never to eat their meals, or go to rest, without washing their hands and faces. They should not eat or drink in the room where they work; and particularly careful should they be in avoiding the exposure of their food to the fumes or dust of oxidated metal. As the clothes of persons in this line (painters especially) are generally observed to be much soiled with the colours they use, it is recommended to them to perform their work in frocks of ticking, which may be frequently washed, and conveniently laid aside when the workmen go to their meals, and again put on when they resume their work. Every business, which can, in these branches, should be performed with gloves; those of woollen or worsted are recommended, as they may be often washed. Caution should be taken in mixing, and even in unpacking, that the fine powders may not be drawn in by the breath. All artificers should avoid touching lead when hot; and this caution is particularly necessary for printers, or compositors, who have often lost the use of their limbs by handling the types, when drying by the fire, after being washed. Glazier's putty should never be moulded by the hand; an iron pestle and mortar should be used.

doubt not that some will do their work. In some towns the landlords did not like the mention of teetotalism, particularly at St. Albans. The landlord at the Pea-hen threatened to duck me in a horse-pond. I, at length, reached my appointed station, where I was very kindly received, and very soon went to rest, thanking God for the blessings of the day, and praying him to forward my efforts for his glory.

Sunday, August 3rd.—I attended the preaching in the morning, and heard a local preacher, who is a thorough teetotaler, but who, in consequence, is held in derision, by most of the Methodist preachers, and has been threatened with suspension, unless he pledges himself not to preach the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. Perhaps this may be accounted for, as the two circuit-stewards, who are local preachers, are both dealers in strong drink; the one, a wine and spirit merchant, and the other a brewer and the proprietor of most of the beer-shops in the town where he resides. They are both wealthy and very high professors. In consequence of my being a teetotaler, there was a very strong prejudice against the services, and the opposition was carried to a very great extent, especially in the adjoining town. Some one had printed with a pencil, the words, "A Total Fool," after my name; and the bill was allowed to hang in the vestry, during the preceding Sunday and all the week: I have the bill in my possession. Notwithstanding all the opposition, the place of worship was filled in the afternoon, and the collection was very good. In the evening, however, such was the greatness of the congregation, (consisting of Churchmen, Baptists, Wesleyans, Independents, Bible Christians, and others,) who had come to hear the teetotaler, that my esteemed coadjutor, the morning preacher, took a very large congregation upon the green before the farm, and preached to them, while I conducted the service in the barn fitted up for the occasion. The collection exceeded that of the former year. On Monday 4th, I gave a physiological lecture in the same barn, which was well attended; a collection was made for the Sabbath-school. The collection on the whole was £8 15s. 0d.

In consequence of having received a challenge from a gentleman belonging to the National Instruction Society at Walthamstow, I was obliged to return to town on Tuesday. However, during my very short stay, I visited several villages, and endeavoured to spread the principles of union; and I found on every place the people desirous to unite in one grand fraternity.

I remain, dear Sir,

Very truly yours,

J. H. DONALDSON.

REVIEWS.

Sister Anne. A Novel, Translated from the French of Ch. Paul de Kock. By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS. 1 Vol. 8vo., pp. 296. London: George Henderson.

Mr. Henderson is one of the most spirited publishers in London. He has just issued the first volume of a series which he intends to embrace, as it is denominated, "An Encyclopedia of Fiction." This first volume contains an entire novel, and is published at the ridiculously cheap cost of Half-a-crown. Nearly three hundred pages, printed in the form of "Nicholas Nickleby," &c., upon excellent paper, and nicely bound in a neat wrapper,—all this for two shillings and sixpence. For the monthly disbursement of that sum, any one may possess himself of an excellent library of fiction, the principal portion of which will consist of works translated from the French by Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds.

The novel now before us is one of the best of that decidedly great and popular writer—Paul de Kock. It is replete with humour and pathos, the combination of which in one long and powerfully-interesting tale, forms a contrast which not a little contributes to the effect of the whole. One of the most humorous characters in the work is an adventurer of the name of Dubourg, who passes himself off as the Baron Potoski, and thus imposes upon an old tutor of the name of Menard. The following account of the visit of Dubourg and Menard to a M. Chambertin will doubtless interest the reader, and afford a favourable idea of the work:—

The days and weeks that succeeded the evening on which the fete was given, glided away in peace and tranquillity, a few friends only dropping in from time to time, to pass the evening with Chambertin and his family, and listen to the tales which it pleased Dubourg to tell them concerning his castles, his estates, his ancestors, and his functions at the court of Poland. M. Menard did not open his mouth very frequently for any other purpose than eating and drinking; occasionally, however, he quoted a few abstruse authors, and then the company, who did not understand a word he uttered, regarded him with respectful silence.

Dubourg played back-gammon every evening: but he had no opportunity of winning much money; for the corpulent Frossard was absent, M. Chambertin did not like gambling, and Dubourg began to fear that he should never double his capital. M. Chambertin's birth-day was however approaching; and on that occasion there was to be another fete, on a more splendid scale than the former one. Some friends were expected from Paris—those friends were very rich—and Dubourg hoped to turn their arrival to a good account. It was Madame Chambertin herself who had written for them to come; the amiable lady did all in her power to retain the Baron, and every day she said to her husband, "You do not fully appreciate the honour which M. de Potoski does you in staying at your house."

"I assure you, on the contrary, my dear," said M. Chambertin, "that I am ravished with the honour, and that I would do anything I could to keep him here for ever."

"You do well to talk thus," returned his wife; "for if he were to leave us, I should be very unhappy. He is not a man with whom we meet every day in our lives; he is a nobleman down to the very tips of his fingers."

Everything was in movement at the house of M. Chambertin. Grand were the preparations for the approaching festival, and the hero of the day was to be the illustrious stranger. M. Chambertin seemed determined to do all he could to honour the Polish nobleman; and he was resolved that the whole department should ring with the news of the magnificent fete.

The great day arrived, and numerous were the guests assembled at the house of M. Chambertin. Several individuals, who were not present on the former occasion, were invited on this; and the repast, which was served up, was magnificent in the extreme. The choicest luxuries of the season were provided by the lady of the feast—the wines were delicious—and Dubourg took upon himself the task of doing the honours of the table. He had only to call his host Monsieur de Chambertin of Allevard, and the ex-wine-merchant's head was immediately elevated to the clouds, where his brain was decidedly influenced by the mists. The Baron whispered from time to time in the ear of Madame Chambertin, "Thrice happy was the day on which I met you!" and the excellent lady replied to the compliment by a smile and a sigh.

At length the dinner was over. Monsieur Chambertin had only one subject of regret—and this was that his intimate and particular friend Durosey, whom he expected from Paris, was not yet arrived. Every time the name of Durosey was pronounced, Dubourg said to himself, "I know some one who bore that name in Paris; but who he was, may the devil take me if I can recollect."

He asked M. Chambertin who this M. Durosey might be, and what profession or trade he carried on at Paris.

"He is a very wealthy merchant," was the answer, "who has retired from business with an income of twenty thousand francs per annum."

"Ah! in that case I do not know him," thought Dubourg within himself: "for I never visited a rich merchant."

The company proceeded to the drawing-room, where a wealthy inhabitant of Allevard proposed a game of carte to Dubourg—an offer that was immediately accepted. Almost at the same moment, Lunel entered the room, and informed his master that M. Durosey was just arrived. M. Chambertin, delighted at these tidings, hastened to meet his friend, whom he shortly introduced to the company assembled. Dubourg turned to look at the new-comer; and to his horror and astonishment discovered in M. Durosey the landlord of the eating-house where he was indebted in the sum of four hundred francs, and whence he had been ejected the night he was first introduced to the reader. Such was the friend whom M. Chambertin so anxiously awaited, and whom, instead of a disburser of beef-steaks, he had represented to be a rich merchant retired from business.

This encounter was exceedingly disagreeable for Dubourg, who did not however lose his presence of mind; and when his friend Chambertin introduced him to Durosey, saying, "This is the Baron Potoski, Palatine of Rava and Sandomir," he bowed and smiled, winked his eyes, and turned his mouth into a thousand shapes, in order to deceive Durosey. But who ever succeeded in imposing thus upon a creditor?

M. Durosey did not immediately recognise Dubourg, who breathed more freely when the retired landlord and wine-merchant hastened to another part of the room together. From time to time, however, he cast an anxious glance round the apartment; and whenever he noticed the eyes of his creditor fixed upon him, he recommenced his grimaces, and gave his neck a certain nervous and convulsive movement, which only attracted the attention of Durosey the more steadily towards him.

Dubourg felt uneasy and embarrassed, and could no longer calculate the chances of his game with calmness and precision. He doubled his stakes, lost, and handed over his gold in large sums to his antagonist. A mist passed before his eyes—his brain was oppressed—and he played with a species of desperation to which he was hitherto a stranger. The individual, who won his treasures, gladly tripled and quadrupled the amount of the

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Teetotaler.

DEAR SIR,—Having been called to preach the Anniversary Sermons at Leegrove, near Dunstable, for the Wesleyan Sunday-school, on Sunday, August 3rd, 1840, I beg to give you an account of my journey and the manner in which I employed my time for the good of our great cause. I took with me some teetotal tracts, which I distributed in the towns and villages in the way, and stakes; and at length the game became so interesting that a portion of the company surrounded the table, on which there were large piles of bank-notes and Louis. To add to the confusion of Dubourg, Mr. Durosey sat himself precisely opposite to him, and every time he raised his eyes, he encountered the eagle-glance of his creditor. In half an hour the entire contents of his purse passed into the pockets of his antagonist; and he rose from the table, declaring that he would hasten to his apartment and fetch more money, as he was determined to have his revenge.

But as he was about to seek his friend Chambertin, from whom he intended to borrow a few thousand francs, in order to retrieve the sum which he had already lost,—for a gambler always hopes to conquer the caprices of fortune, till he finds himself in the work-house,—Mr. Durosey, who never lost sight of his debtor, followed him into the passage, and addressed him in such a way that it was impossible to avoid the interview.

"How is M. Dubourg?" demanded Durosey, with an ironical grin.

"Dubourg! what do you mean by Dubourg?" demanded the Baron Potoski, his lips and nose performing a thousand remarkable grimaces.

"Oh! I am certain that I have the honour to speak to M. Dubourg," returned the creditor, in a loud tone of voice; "but I did not know he was a Polish Baron."

"Silence, my dear Durosey," said Dubourg, alarmed at the man's vehemence, and perceiving that it was impossible to deceive his creditor; "I did not recollect you at first; but now I remember you well. I am delighted to see you."

"And so am I," cried Durosey gruffly. "You seem very much at your ease at present; and as you can afford to lose thousands of francs at carte, I hope you will not refuse to pay me the four hundred—"

"Oh! certainly—with pleasure! This evening, if you choose, my dear Durosey. When I left Paris, I quite forgot the trifle."

"And yet I called and sent about twenty times to your lodgings, Sir," returned Durosey, "when you lived on the fifth floor in the Rue d'Enfer, and again in the Rue de—"

"Silence! speak lower," interrupted Dubourg. "Since that period I inherited my estates—"

"Then you will have no objection if I just mention in confidence to our mutual friend Chambertin, that I was acquainted with you in Paris under the name of Dubourg?" demanded Durosey.

"Impossible! you must not touch upon the subject," cried Dubourg.

"It is my duty to an old friend," said Durosey. "But here is Chambertin; and if you be really a Baron—"

Dubourg saw that all was lost. He had not a son in his pockets, and he had encountered a creditor who seemed determined to expose him. He had nothing to hope from Chambertin but to be kicked into the streets as a rogue and impostor; he therefore resolved to leave the house immediately.

Rushing hastily past Durosey and Chambertin, he flew down stairs, seized his hat, gained the garden, and by the merest accident encountered Menard who was returning to the drawing-room.

"Follow me!" cried Dubourg to the ancient preceptor, who gazed upon him with astonishment. "Follow me, I say, and do not utter a word, or we shall both be cut into a thousand pieces."

This intimation gave speed to the legs of the poor tutor, and he followed Dubourg down the gravel-walk which led to a little door opening into the fields. Dubourg pushed Menard out of the premises belonging to Chambertin, locked the door, threw the key into a ditch, and again took to his heels as fast as he could run. Menard followed him at an equally rapid rate, without precisely understanding the motives of so precipitate a flight, but entertaining vague notions that Chambertin's house must be on fire or beset by banditti.

"Quick, quick, my dear Menard!" ejaculated Dubourg, as they merged into the open country. "We have drunk deeply of the cup of pleasure: we must now be more moderate, or else our health will materially suffer. I am not an advocate for dissipation and excess of enjoyment. We must now say, Non est beatus qui cupida possidet, sed qui negata non cupit."

"Amen!" cried Menard, as he trotted by the side of Dubourg, across the green fields.

The Drunkard's Cloak and Coat of Arms.
Reprinted from "The Penny Gazette of Variety." J. Cleave, Shoe Lane.

This is a very clever design, and calculated to work much good amongst the lower classes. To expose the vice of drunkenness in all its nakedness—to show mankind the real horrors of this vicious habit, both morally and physically, are the objects of this broad sheet, upon which we have both woodcuts and letter-press. The cut, which represents the effect of alcohol upon the liver, is calculated to make thousands of Teetotalers: we cannot therefore too highly recommend this publication. We should moreover observe that it emanates from the shop of an individual who is strong in the advocacy of the Teetotal cause, and whose excellent cheap weekly journal generally contains one or more articles upon the now all-absorbing topic. Every Teetotaler should purchase a number of "The Drunkard's Cloak and Coat of Arms," to hold it up as an argument against the opponents of Teetotal doctrines.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

GLOUCESTER.

MR. JAMES PLEVIN, of Gloucester, has furnished us with the pleasing intelligence that upon the dying embers of a Moderation Society a Teetotal Association has been successfully founded in that city. About nine months ago about a dozen Teetotalers assembled in Mr. JONES's sail-loft (having no other place to meet in,) and formed themselves into the elements of a society. They hired a school-room for weekly meetings, and a numerous audience was soon collected. MR. SAMUEL BOWLY, a member of the Society of Friends, and a staunch Teetotaler, took the matter up with zeal and enthusiasm; and being a man universally beloved and respected, he has become the life of the Society. Donations were received, through his exertions, to the amount of forty pounds, in a few weeks. The Gloucester Teetotal Society has now an excellent assembly-room, and a news-room for members, where all Teetotal publications may be perused. We rejoice in this success of our Gloucester friends—we thank MR. PLEVIN for his very kind and courteous letter—and we shall be at all times happy to record any facts which may tend to demonstrate the progressive good fortunes of the society of which he is a member.

BIRMINGHAM.

MR. ELIJAH GOODHEAD, of Birmingham, has kindly furnished us with an interesting account of the Teetotal meeting held in that town, on the 10th of August, at the Severn-street Lancasterian School-room. The chair was occupied by MR. BARKER, and the meeting was addressed by three or four working men, who spoke plainly to the point, in the home-spun eloquence of the rural mind, and told some very interesting truths. "It is at these weekly meetings," remarks MR. GOODHEAD, "that pithy and sensible appeals are made; and too much praise cannot be attached to those individuals who have moral courage enough to laugh at and despise the puny efforts of drunkards to turn them into ridicule." MR. GOODHEAD's letter is full of sensible observations upon the utility and progress of Teetotalism, and should have been wholly transferred to our pages, had not press of other matter compelled us unwillingly to abridge it. The Teetotalers of Birmingham seem to be staunch supporters of this great and glorious cause which we are advocating.

WALTHAMSTOWE.

An animated discussion took place between MR. J. H. DONALDSON, of the United Temperance Association, and MR. LINTON, at the Mutual Instruction Society, Walthamstowe, on Wednesday, August 12th. This was the second occasion of the discussion, which had commenced on the preceding Wednesday. Both gentlemen adduced a number of arguments in favour of their respective opinions; but truth naturally triumphed over the sophistry adopted to support delusion. A show of hands was demanded, and an immense majority declared in favour of MR. DONALDSON. MR. CLARKE, of Snaresbrook, presided upon the occasion, and received the unanimous thanks of the meeting for his impartial conduct during the debate.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Friday, August 14th.

The adjourned Members' Meeting of the United Temperance Association was held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, pursuant to notice.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS was called to the chair.

MR. H. W. WESTON (the Secretary to the Association) read his First Half-yearly Report of the Rise, Progress, and Condition of the United Temperance Association, which was received with the most enthusiastic applause.

It was moved by MR. SIMS, seconded by MR. CRUMP, and carried unanimously, that the Report be printed and sold at the Depot of the Association, No. 134, Aldersgate-street.

A vote of thanks and confidence was awarded to MR. CRUMP, (the Registrar,) as an acknowledgment of the services this gentleman has rendered the association.

MR. CRUMP returned thanks in a very neat and appropriate speech.

It was moved by MR. DAVIES, seconded by MR. JOHNSON, supported by MR. POKKELL, and carried without a dissentient voice, that a vote of thanks be given to MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, "for the able manner in which he has conducted the Teetotaler journal, and for his zealous and enthusiastic conduct in favour of the doctrine of total abstinence, and the welfare of the United Temperance Association."

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS expressed his thanks for this unexpected honour, and declared his intention of doing all he could to deserve a continuation of the favourable opinion of the members of the Association to which he had the honour to belong.

Several other motions, connected with the interests of the Association, were then proposed, upon which occasions Messieurs WESTON (the Secretary,) SIMS, JOHNSON, WILSON, DONALDSON, and GAWTHORPE addressed the members present. Thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed at about half-past ten o'clock.

Saturday Evening, August 15th.

THE REV. MR. ADENY, Vice-president of the United Temperance Association, took the chair at the Aldersgate-street chapel on this occasion. He said that he entertained an inexplicable and boundless feeling of the importance—an importance which was rapidly increasing—of teetotal associations. He then drew a striking picture of the home of the abstemious man, and contrasted it in vivid colours with that of the drunkard.

MR. BENSTEAD expressed his determination to avoid egotistical digression. He had chosen one subject for his theme, and that subject he should discourse upon until he had considered it in all its bearings. He alluded to the influence of intoxicating drinks upon the mind. He was an advocate of all innocent recreations and relaxations which only tended to fit men for the better performance of the duties of life. The tavern does not, however, lead to an increase of mental power, and cannot, therefore, be included within the meaning of those terms.

MR. BIDDLE then addressed the meeting. He said that it was an imperative duty to stop drunkards in their wretched career, and lead them into the paths of happiness, which are the paths of total abstinence. He then alluded to his parents in most tender terms, and observed that they now frequently saw his name in print as the advocate of the glorious doctrines of Teetotalism.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS said that he frequently received letters from individuals in the country, calling upon him to answer the objections of the opponents to teetotalism. One of those objections was that alcohol was in nature, and was consequently a good creature of God. MR. REYNOLDS showed that alcohol was only the product of fermentation, which is one of the first effects of decay or decomposition in vegetable matter. Alcohol was not eliminated from any healthy and living substance; it was only extracted from something advancing towards a state of putrescence. The elements of alcohol were in nature, but not alcohol itself; and so long as vegetable nature possessed the principle of vitality, that poison could not be obtained.

MR. MEE severely vituperated the conduct of those medical men who recommended exciting drinks to their patients in many cases which he named. He gave a description of a tour which he had just been making, and of the progress of Teetotalism in Bedfordshire and Buckinghamshire. He then directed his observations to the beneficial effects of Teetotalism, and noticed its rapid rise. At first, (said Mr. Mee,) Teetotalism was disgraceful,—then it was disreputable,—then it became tolerable,—next desirable,—afterwards reputable,—at present respectable,—it would soon be fashionable—and lastly, royal.

MR. SCOTT commented upon the arguments and excuses invented by those who were anxious to discover any apology for not relinquishing their evil habits. He said that all such arguments and excuses should be immediately answered, and then made a most eloquent speech upon the good effects of Teetotalism.

BETHNAL-GREEN AND SPITALFIELDS BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ON Monday evening, August 17th, the usual weekly meeting of this branch was held at the Assembly-room, Church-row, Bethnal-green. Mr. Wilson took the chair, and Messrs. Price (the proprietor of the room), Parsons, Rice, Eales, Thompson, and Harrison, successively addressed the meeting.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' SOCIETY.

A numerous meeting of this admirable and truly praise-worthy association took place on Monday evening, August 17th, at the Friends' chapel, Peel's court, St. John's-street, Clerkenwell. The assembly was formed of the youths, and their parents and friends, all attired in the most respectable manner.

SIR CULLING EARDLEY SMITH, Bart., (the President of the association,) upon taking the chair, made a most eloquent speech upon the beneficial tendency of Teetotal doctrines amongst the youth of both sexes.

MR. BIDDLE (of Islington,) and MR. BALFOUR (of Chelsea,) then addressed the meeting in most appropriate terms. Master PAYNE delivered a very neat speech, which did great credit both to him and to the association of which he is a member.

MR. R. P. BAIGER (the secretary,) then read his Report in a most impressive manner. This document was couched in very fluent language, and elicited general applause.

Master JACQUES and Master TOWERS (the treasurer,) next addressed the meeting; and they were followed by Messieurs CRUMP and G. W. M. REYNOLDS (of the United Temperance Association.) Thanks were voted to the chairman, who closed the meeting in a powerful address to the youths assembled, upon the necessity of blending religious studies with the practice of total abstinence.

THE TEE TOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 10.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER XI.

FRESH MISFORTUNES.

THE clock of Saint Paul's struck the hour of midnight, as Melville entered Aldersgate-street from Westmoreland-buildings. The rain had subsided, and a cold wind had sprung up in its place. The din of the loud bell oscillated upon his ears with that foreboding prolongation of sound which is caused by the breeze; and this circumstance recalled all the horrors of his situation to the mind of the unhappy young man. He was houseless—abroad in London, in the middle of the night, without the means of procuring a lodging, and not daring to return to the one which he had just left. It was for some time impossible for him to collect all his ideas into such a focus as to enable him to reflect with precision; but the chilly night air soon cooled his heated brain, and he was enabled, as he walked rapidly along the street, to examine the circumstances which had thus rendered him an outcast from the only place he could call his home.

He knew not how to account for the mysterious events of that evening. A dreadful murder or a determined suicide had been evidently committed in the apartment which was usually inhabited by his landlord; and he knew that the victim was not the landlord himself. He did not feel any apprehension relative to a suspicion of murder being excited against him or his companion in the attempt at robbery; but he dared not return home, because he knew not how to explain his presence in the room where the dreadful deed had been committed.

As he thus pondered upon his position, he walked rapidly on towards Goswell-street, and scarcely noticed which way he was taking, or what was passing around him. The pale, squalid, and nameless forms of vice, which haunt the night of vast cities, were creeping back, one by one, to the darkness of their own abodes; and all those hideous representations of poverty, —those personifications of all the miseries and crimes of the human race, which the hours of dusk spawn forth, were gradually relinquishing the streets which were even too cold for them. And those wretched beings had places which they might designate homes; but Melville had not even a heap of straw on which to rest his head. The silence of the night, which in a few short hours would again be broken by the awakening of thousands of hearts, the lifting up of myriads of voices, and the collision of countless interests, was absolutely appalling to the houseless wanderer. The echo of his own footsteps seemed to remind him that it was not shortly destined to cease at any hospitable door, which would be thrown open to receive him.

He could not conceal from himself the fact that his desperate habits of intemperance had reduced him to the pitch of misery in which he then found himself. Had he not yielded to the force of example and partaken of the deceitful draught tendered him by his companion in crime, he would never have suffered the power of temptation to predominate over the better feelings of his mind; and he deeply regretted that he had not accepted the situation which had been so liberally offered him by the great publisher of Cheapside. His brows contracted as he thought of his degraded condition; and, had not the reminiscence of his Louise been ever in his memory, he would have at once terminated all his sorrows in the blood of suicide.

It would be impossible to say how he contrived to wile away the time till morning. He wandered about the streets, reckless of the direction he pursued, and having no distinct aim in view. He at one time arranged a thousand wild plans of reformation and happiness in his mind; and then they were all suddenly destroyed by the conviction that he was a miserable outcast, a prey to a habit—a vice, which threatened him with bodily and mental destruction. Sometimes he sat down upon the steps of a door, until the gruff voice of a policeman commanded him to "move on," for the enactments of the English government and its myrmidons do not even allow the houseless wanderer to rest himself in the open streets, while the rulers of the land repose on beds of down and silk.

Many miles did the poor young man wander about on that miserable night—a prey to all the conflicting emotions which may be supposed to have haunted his troubled mind. At one moment a prey to delusive hope, the miseries of the streets were all banished from his memory; in the next, he wept bitter—bitter—burning tears of anguish as he saw himself thus destitute of even the means of procuring rest!

At length the morning dawned upon the vast metropolis; and Melville found himself upon the confines of that mighty Babel. There the mind, oppressed by the consciousness that in the myriads of houses of that city a happiness was in existence with which itself was unacquainted, might step aside, and find a breathing-space, even amid the restless action of its own giant heart.

Melville still wandered on, ignorant of what course he was pursuing, and scarcely knowing what plan to adopt. Upon inquiry of a gardener whom he met, and who was on his way to one of the markets of the metropolis, Victor found that he was in Camden-town. A sudden idea flashed across his mind. He remembered the old lady and her daughter, with whom he had travelled in the diligence from Paris; and he determined to avail himself of their pressing invitation which had been given him when he bade them adieu in Gracechurch-street. He did not stay to reflect upon the excuse he was to make for his early intrusion; but no sooner had he ascertained that the clock had struck eight, when he inquired his way to Terrywhist Terrace, and presented himself at the dwelling of the proprietors of that line of buildings.

He gave a loud double knock at the front-door, and awoke the echoes up and down the terrace. In a moment a window was opened on the second floor, and out popped a head with a white cotton-nightcap upon it; and, as soon as the eyes which belonged to that head had ascertained the nature of the visitor, the head popped in again; then a window on the fourth floor was hastily thrown open, and another head, ornamented with curl-papers, was thrust forth; and, meteor-like, that also disappeared in another instant. Then the front-door was thrown wide open, and a dirty girl appeared upon the threshold.

"This is the house of Mr. and Mrs. Terrywhist, I believe!" said Melville, somewhat timidly.

"Yes," replied the girl. "They isn't up yet."

"Oh! in that case, I will wait a little, then," said Melville, making a motion as if he would enter the house.

The girl hastily abandoned the door, rushed up the passage, and called forth the name of Mrs. Jubbins as loudly as she could, at the top of the kitchen-stairs. The female thus adjured shortly made her appearance, and a very singular appearance it was. She was an aged woman of about sixty; and her nose was considerably begrimed with snuff. An old black silk bonnet was very airily perched upon the summit of her head, and her sleeves were tucked up, because this worthy female was engaged in the pleasing and domestic avocation of cleaning the kitchen-grate. To her did Melville explain the circumstance of his acquaintance with Mrs. and Miss Terrywhist, and invented some lame excuse at the moment for his early call.

"You'd better walk in then," said the old woman, eyeing our hero most suspiciously; and when she had conducted him into a little back-parlour, she very prudently removed the silver spoons and forks which were lying upon the table. She then banged the door, and crept up-stairs to announce the arrival of this untimely visitor.

In about a quarter of an hour, a very slow and solemn step was heard descending the stairs, and a little old man, very stout, very consequential, and very sedate, and whose corpulence was enveloped in a Parisian silk dressing-gown, entered the room where Melville was sitting.

"Good morning, Sir," said the little old gentleman. "You are welcome. My wife has communicated to me, in impassioned language, and with a due appreciation of your kindness, the pleasing fact of the attention which she experienced at your hands during her journey from the metropolis of France to the capital of this country."

This harangue was delivered in a slow and solemn tone, which admirably suited the pace at which the old gentleman walked; and due emphasis was laid upon every word. Melville immediately comprehended the failing of Mr. Terrywhist—namely, a desire to be thought a very clever man.

"You will excuse my early visit, Sir," began our hero; "but the truth is—"

"I do not apprehend," interrupted Mr. Terrywhist, with suitable gravity, "that any apology is necessary: indeed, I can safely bring my mind to the satisfactory conclusion, and to the settled opinion, that a morning's walk in the suburbs of this city has procured me the honour of your company. The morning's meal will be shortly served up: your presence at the breakfast table will confer an honour upon me—a favour upon my family—and, I fondly hope, no inconvenience upon yourself."

"Curiosity impelled me to visit the terrace, which, I understood, owed its origin to you, Sir," said Melville; "and therefore I accept your invitation with the greatest pleasure."

"This terrace, Sir," continued Mr. Terrywhist, seating himself with the solemnity of a Pacha, and talking with the gravity of a judge, "was built by the humble individual who now addresses you. Mine, Sir, has been a chequered life—but I am not ashamed of confessing that the trophies of my present fortunes were raised upon the glories of my own abilities."

Mr. Terrywhist paused to see what effect this well-rounded period would produce upon our hero; but as Melville only knocked an obtrusive cat off his knees, Mr. Terrywhist proceeded with additional solemnity.

"Yes—Sir," he said, shaking his head, "mine has indeed been a chequered life! I commenced my career in this world in the honourable, but humble sphere of a tinker; and to the fortunate occurrence of being sent for three months to the county-gaol, I am indebted for my rapid—and, I may say, my astounding success in life."

"Indeed!" ejaculated Melville. "That was a strange beginning, was it not?"

"A deep mystery is attached to that transaction, young man," said Mr. Terrywhist, with awful solemnity of manner, in which he quite outdid Ward as the Ghost in Hamlet. "The particulars of the case are these, as they are now confidentially exposed to you. It was on a delicious evening in May, while the birds were singing in the country, and London was full of life and animation, that I was drinking beer out of a quart-pot in a cellar. A nobleman, one of those wild children of nature, who delight in nocturnal revels—entered the place, soon became engaged in a dispute with an unoffending coal-heaver, and knocked him down with the quart-pot out of which I had been drinking. I was some how implicated in this affair; and the nobleman, myself, and the coal-heaver were all taken up next morning before a magistrate. The nobleman, with that generosity which only the aristocracy of birth can bestow, instantly proposed to me to take the whole blame upon myself, in consideration of a munificent reward. I did so.—I pleaded guilty to the fact of having levelled that respectable coal-heaver with a quart-pot.—I exonerated the nobleman.—I was sent to prison for three months.—I received a noble reward.—and from that day every thing has prospered with me."

Melville was about to make some suitable comment upon this extraordinary tale, which was delivered with all the solemnity of a monarch's speech from the throne, when the old woman, who had now condescendingly laid aside her bonnet, entered the room to say that "the breakfasts were all served up in the front parlour, and that the ladies was a-waitin' for the favour of the gentlemen's company."

"Very well, Mrs. Jubbins," said Mr. Terrywhist; and rising from his chair with all imaginable solemnity, he led the way into the front parlour, where Mrs. and Miss Terrywhist were seated at the breakfast table. A grand interchange of compliments, inquiries, and answers then took place.

"Ah! Mr. Melville, how air you?" cried Mrs. Terrywhist: "I raly thought you'd quite forgot us."

"This is kind of you to find us out," simpered Miss Elizabeth. "I often told ma we should be sure to meet you again."

"How is that nice gentleman which travelled with us?" asked Mrs. Terrywhist; and before Melville had time to reply, she added, "But you ain't looking so well as you was."

"The wind is rather high this morning," answered Victor, looking hastily at his disordered dress; "and I have been taking a very long walk."

"Well, now—do sit down, and make yourself quite at home," said Mrs. Terrywhist, with peculiar emphasis upon the words printed in italics.

"Mr. Melville is as welcome as if he were a prodigal son, returning to partake of the fatted calf," said Mr. Terrywhist, drawing his dressing gown around him, as a prior arrangement to the occupation of cutting a magnificent ham which stood before him.

Scarcely had the little party got settled over their coffee, muffins, &c., and scarcely had Mrs. and Miss Terrywhist discussed each about half a pound of ham and quantities of scandal to boot; when a little pony-chaise drove up to the door.

"Here's Balls come to breakfast, I do declare!" ejaculated Miss Betsy, as soon as she had taken a survey from the parlour-window; and, in the course of a few minutes, Mrs. Jubbins introduced that gentleman into the room.

Mr. Balls was an individual of about thirty, and possessed features which were marked with peculiarly angular characteristics. His nose was quite pointed—his chin was pointed—his lips were thin—and the termination of his forehead at his eye-brows was also marked by a sharp line. He was attired in a suit of somewhat dingy black; but a massive watch-chain with numerous seals, divers gold rings on his fingers, and a large diamond pin in his shirt, showed that he was not so dressed by reason of poverty. It will be recollected that Mr. Balls carried on the extremely lucrative and respectable business of a pawnbroker, and that he had married one of Miss Terrywhist's cousins. In fact, he looked like a pawnbroker; and he took his seat with the familiarity of a family connexion.

"A fine morning, Sir," said he to Melville, as soon as an introduction had taken place between the two gentlemen.

"Rather chilly," observed our hero.

"I suppose you have taken a good walk this morning, Sir?" said Mr. Balls. "Did you come from London?"

Melville answered in the affirmative.

"Oh! then I dare say you have told the ladies all the news," said Mr. Balls. "Ladies like hearing or reading of things of that kind."

"Of what kind?" ejaculated Mrs. Terrywhist: "I'm sure that Mr. Melville hasn't told us no news."

"Farther than his own conversational powers are possessed of originality and novelty," said Mr. Terrywhist, solemnly conveying a piece of ham to his lips while he was speaking. "I know of nothing absolutely new which he has detailed to us."

"Then you haven't heard about that singular business in the city, Sir, I suppose?" said Mr. Balls.

"No," replied Melville. "At all events I am ignorant of the matter to which you may allude;" and, as he spoke, he turned deadly pale, and trembled violently.

"Why, the fact is," resumed Mr. Balls, "that a most dreadful murder was committed—"

"A murder," ejaculated Melville.

"Yes—a dreadful murder, upon the person of an old gentleman—name unknown—in some place leading out of Bartholomew Close."

"Good heavens!" screamed Mrs. Terrywhist: "and so there will be another person hanged, then?"

"Hanged!" involuntarily repeated Melville; and the knife and fork which he held in his hands, fell upon his plate.

"It appears," continued Mr. Balls, not attaching any sinister importance to the emotions displayed by the young man.—"it appears that a man of the name of Robus, was returning home very late last night, and was going up stairs to sleep in a garret of his house, as he had let his own apartment in the morning to a strange gentleman, who, by the way, they say was a Frenchman—"

"A Frenchman!" exclaimed Melville.

"Yes—a Frenchman; and this Frenchman was the victim," continued Mr. Balls. "But, as I was saying, this Robus was going up stairs, when it seems that he found a person in the room which he had let to the Frenchman. He asked this person what he wanted there; and the person said that he had heard a noise—that he had come down stairs from his own room—and that he found the Frenchman murdered. When the police came (for this Robus soon went and spread the alarm) the witness said that he had also seen a young man, who lived in the house, which is a lodging-house, hurrying out of the room where the murder had been committed."

"And that young man was the murderer, then?" said Mrs. Terrywhist.

"Of course he was," answered Mr. Balls. "I have not been able to ascertain any farther particulars; nor do I know the names of any of the parties connected with the transaction. One thing, however, is very certain;—and this is, that the police are after the young fellow, who has absconded."

"The villain!" cried Miss Betsy: "I hope they will take him. Heavens! Mr. Melville—are you ill?"

"No—it is nothing—a sudden headache," cried Victor, impatiently. "These news—the idea of a fellow-creature being murdered—and the long walk that I took—all this—"

"You had better lie down a little," said the old gentleman: "it was wrong to take so long a walk, despite of the charms of the country, without slightly breaking your fast, before you set out."

"Perhaps Mr. Melville," began Mrs. Terrywhist—

At that instant a loud knock again resounded from the front door; and a glance through the blinds into the street convinced Melville that the police had detected his hiding-place. The moment the other inmates of the room caught sight of the uniform of the officers, they all expressed their surprise and astonishment at such a visit being paid to that house; and they were too much occupied with this idea to notice the ashy pallor of Melville's countenance, or the attitude of undisguised alarm which he had assumed.

The knock at the door was soon repeated with considerable impatience; and Balls himself hastened to answer it.

"What do you want here?" he demanded of the officers who crowded round the steps.

"We have traced the supposed murderer of the unfortunate Frenchman to this terrace," was the answer; "and our last informant says that he entered one of the houses. I hope you will not offer any obstruction to the execution of our duty."

"Not in the least," said Balls. "But I can assure you that you are mistaken. There is no one here, but the family of Mr. Terrywhist, and a young friend of his—a Mr. Melville—"

The officers did not allow Mr. Balls time to finish his sentence. They rushed into the house, saw that the parlour-door was open, and crowded into the breakfast parlour, to the utter dismay of Mr. Terrywhist, his wife, and daughter. But who can depict the horror and surprise of those worthy and hospitable individuals, when the officers of justice pounced upon Melville, and when that unfortunate young man fell upon his knees, exclaiming,

"Mercy, mercy! I am innocent—Oh! I am innocent!"

"Come—come along!" ejaculated one of the officers, brutally shaking his prisoner; for the police invariably consider it necessary to anticipate the vengeance of the law, and inflict a little of their own upon any one who falls into their clutches.

"What? Melville a felon—impossible!" exclaimed Mr. Terrywhist, who had not overheard the parley of Mr. Balls with the officers at the front-door.

"It's very possible, though," cried the chief of the officers, who bore the rank of Inspector; "and if he don't take precious good care, he'll have this before he's two months older," added this merciful officer, laying his head upon one shoulder, and diving down a little—a pantomime which was intended to convey the idea of a man hanging.

"Mr. Melville, what does this mean?" demanded Mr. Terrywhist, still confident that the behaviour of the police was the result of a mistake.

"It means, Sir," answered our hero, in a voice almost choked with sobs, "that I am accused of that murder, of which you have now heard some of the particulars! But I am innocent—I take God to witness that I am innocent! A strange combination of circumstances—the villainy of a friend—and other collateral events, have thus tended to throw suspicion upon me. I repeat, I repeat—that I am innocent."

The officers did not allow their prisoner time to say anything more: they speedily attached a pair of manacles to his hands, and dragged him away from the house, while Mr. Terrywhist and his family surveyed this singular and unexpected scene with the utmost astonishment commingled with the deepest grief.

To be continued in our next.

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. 2.

There is on the banks of the Ohio, a dingy-looking place, called Pittsburg. "It is inhabited," says the celebrated Arthur Lee, in his journal without a date, "almost entirely by Scots and Irish, who live in paltry log-houses, and are as dirty as in the north of Ireland, or even Scotland. There is a great deal of small trade carried on: the goods being brought at a vast expense of forty-five shillings per cwt. from Philadelphia to Baltimore. . . . The place, I believe, will soon be very considerable." Such is the prediction, and now for its accomplishment. "Since that time (1793)," says Stuart, "it has become a great manufacturing city, contains 17,000 persons, has its flour mills, cording and spinning mills, iron mills, etc., and manufactories of ironmongery, cutlery and glass; cottons, woollens, pottery, and copper ware." But this is not all: a vessel arrives at Leghorn—the captain exhibits his papers—cleared out from Pittsburg. Pittsburg: there is no such port—they are evidently forged. The tar takes out his map—points out to the officer the gulf of Mexico—then the mouth of the Mississippi: leads him 1000 miles up to the mouth of the Ohio—another 1000 to Pittsburg. "There, sir, is the port from which I cleared out." Thus the log-village, driving "its small trade," importing "its goods at the vast expense of forty-five shillings from Baltimore," is now "a manufacturing city," exporting to Europe its own fabrics in its own built vessels—aye, its own vessels—for in the American Birmingham, "ship-building is carried on; and boat and steam-building pursued on a larger scale than in any other place in the western country."

We have thus endeavoured to give some impression of the internal activity of the Americans, while to the eye of Europe their whole energies seemed absorbed in their great commercial schemes. When we add to this the vast improvements which in the old states have given new wings to industry, the canals like that of Erie, connecting the northern lakes with the Atlantic, and linking in every direction the splendid net-work of the rivers, the railroads annihilating space in a country whose greatest inconvenience was extent, we must be prejudiced indeed if we do not recognise at every step the intelligence and power of a great and gifted people. Hereafter we may notice more minutely some of these great results; at present we only glance at them for the sake of the reflections they suggest.

To what are we to attribute the social progress of the Americans, so far outstripping any ratio of improvement which the world has ever seen? Are we bound to consider them—as with a very pardonable vanity they often style themselves—the most extraordinary people of all time? We answer frankly—No. Great we admit them to be—aye, to any pitch of greatness they may claim: but the least extraordinary of any people we know. Our reasons are these: the present condition of the United States is the solution of a problem; the measures of the capacities of the age placed in circumstances the most highly favourable to their development. Never were men called upon to work out greater consequences than the Americans, and never were men less authors of the causes and principles from which, or the means by which, they are to be educated. In other countries, the actual condition of society is the hard-earned booty which the intelligence of its past and present members has carried off from time; the prize of a long wrestle with ages of barbarism, ages of oppression, of fanaticism, of blood; the amount of health, which difficult precautions, and tedious cures, have rescued from old and still unsubdued disease. Look at England—for England and America can best comprehend each other—from her heptarchy to her conquest: from that to her revolution; from that to the present time. Mark her long and weary efforts to pile up her freedom: how often was it the toil of Sisyphus. Consider the stubborn and closely guarded quarries, from which she was forced to hew out her greatness: trace the course of her social improvements; at first, like a little silver stream in a rocky wilderness; then widening and deepening, always flowing and fretting onwards, but not always seen: now diverted from its way by some rugged obstacle, and now dammed up, until the weight of the waters break down the impediment; thus, sometimes free, and sometimes checked, until its channel becomes broad and deep, and its waters expand into a glorious flood. It is this long agony with toils—it is these stolen marches by night, and this warring by day. It is this self-construction of character and fortune which constitutes an extraordinary people. And can America pretend to it? What has been her career? Like another Minerva, she sprung into existence a perfect goddess; and as the brain of Jove alone could have conceived the first, the greatness of England could only have conceived the second. What did the ground of quarrel with her parent state imply? A sensitive love of liberty, and a practical acquaintance with its elements. But such a knowledge infers a high degree of social and intellectual excellence. So primed and seasoned for self-government, she was fully able to go on her course alone, nor was she at all embarrassed which path to choose. A less enlightened government than that of Britain she could not take; a more enlightened—as far as she was concerned—could only be devised by modifying the fundamental principles of that one, so as to suit the new society to which it was to be applied: all that was to be done, was to discern and discern: the British constitution: and she did it. The great difficulty in England had been to combine the artificial distinctions of society into one great action—to connect them by a common interest. In America, these distinctions did not exist: society there presented a plain uniform surface, without inequalities, without difference of materials—no one point of which required a different kind or weight of superstructure from the rest. The American Republic, therefore, instead of being a bold innovation, was, after all, only a close copy with local amendments. Viewed at a distance through the midst of European prejudices, it seemed a chimera: viewed near at hand, at a distance from those prejudices, it was plainly a necessity. The feudal government, that is, the confederation of the separate republics, was a work of more difficulty and merit; and the men who contributed to its formation would have done honour to any time and country. Up to this point, then, there is confessedly nothing in their career to surprise us. Trained up from their earliest colonizations in the practice and principles of constitutional liberty,—trained, that is, to a jealous regard for their civil rights, and to the possession and pursuit of those high advantages and ends which is the object of those rights to secure—they no sooner resolved to be independent, than they became so; no sooner became so, than with a noble display of easy and dexterous strength, they wielded the sceptre they had seized. It was doubtless the most imposing application of a great principle the world had ever seen: there never certainly was any on which Fortune more kindly smiled. Placed, as it were, in the midst of a political solitude, they had no neighbour to harass or obstruct them; to excite their cupidity, their ambition, or their revenge. Even the feverish excitement that survives a revolution found a natural issue in their commercial activity and skill. Then came the mad wars of Europe, taxing their enterprise to the utmost; goading, compelling them to wealth; and then came—Fulton. The first steam-boat that ascended the Hudson ploughed away centuries of delay to the growing prosperity of the states, and eventually of the world; and if ever a man deserved a monument from his fellow men, it was Fulton. They say he was not an inventor; true, steam-boats had been made, and used, and thrown aside; but so have many other great inventions, until some ardent and sagacious mind has discovered the favourable circumstances under which to try them, and has dared to try them in spite of the world's discouragement and sneers; and this was his praise. The steam-boat was as important in its immediate results to the navigation of America, as the compass in its remote results to the navigation of the world; and then, as if she were to have the benefit of extent without the obstacle of distance, the railroad appears, and separation vanishes. And now we put it to any American, if under this complication of advantages—if with his early infusion of sound political, and social, and moral knowledge—if, with a territory of inexhaustible fertility, and mechanical inventions that enable him to subsidize every part of its vast surface—if, with appeals and encouragement to his industry, such as no nation was ever before in a position to receive—if, with all these things, there be anything in the brilliancy and swiftness of his course to puzzle or confound us. With great means he has done great things. In many and most respects he may challenge our applause; in some he provokes our censure and rebuke; in none our wonder.

We have now but one word to add. The supercilious indifference that would not listen to the story of American greatness, or disposed of it with a sneer, has passed away; a manly and national curiosity has supplied its place. As yet no attempt has been made to tell this story through any periodical channel; this task we mean to attempt;—we shall bring to it honesty and diligence,—what else we as yet know not; but, if only these, we shall be entitled to say to our readers at the conclusion of our labours, be they long or short, Valete et Plaudite.

To be continued in our next.

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. 11.

In order to prevent drinking amongst the lower orders the legislature should alter some of the oppressive laws, (the corn-laws, for instance,) which tend to diminish the comfort of the poorer classes. Drinking is on the increase in the inverse ratio to the comfort enjoyed; and therefore an increase of domestic comfort would diminish the vice of intemperance.

The manner in which the public-houses in London are suffered to increase is disgraceful to the country, and exhibits the cold and calculating feeling of a legislature, which only thinks of increasing the revenues of the government at the certain computation of an increase of poverty and crime. If the government will not suppress public-houses altogether, at all events let an enactment be made to limit the number of them, so as to enable their proprietors to gain a better living and better interest upon their capital, and consequently become more respectable men. If such a case were provided for, there would be nothing but good houses of that description, and there would be no infamous dens of resort for dancing and low prostitutes.

The infamous Beer Act has been the means of increasing intoxication a hundred-fold, and has given encouragement to the vices of the lower orders. It has multiplied the low dens of dissipation, and ruined men who really did endeavour to make a business (which is never a very respectable one) as respectable as it could be.

Young prostitutes, between the ages of twelve and thirteen, are frequently taken up before the magistrates, charged with drunkenness and disorderly conduct. There is no city in Christendom where female degradation commences so early as it does in London; and no other cause can be assigned to this lamentable circumstance, save the dreadful habit of intemperance which rages amongst the poor.

Mr. Broughton, one of the magistrates of Worship-street, has declared that that which tends to demoralize and impoverish the people, must have a great effect upon the poor-rates, a fund that was originally destined for the sustentation of the miserable and wretched. The tendency of gin-drinking is to bring people to misery and wretchedness. In the eastern part of London the greater portion of the misery and wretchedness which exist, is a consequence, arising out of gin-drinking, which also encourages diseases of all descriptions. Mr. Broughton mentioned the following dreadful case as one which had come under his especial notice:—

"A family was lately discovered in a state, which, if it had not been seen, could not have been believed. I think there were four children. There was no other bed than a few old rags in a corner, into which they huddled. All occasions of nature were performed in the room; and it was quite clear that for those purposes neither children nor parents ever went anywhere else. Upon information being given, they were all taken and brought before me. From the nature of the case, I felt a great deal of interest in it, and went very minutely into its history from its origin; and I found that the woman two years before had borne a most respectable character. The man was a mechanic, and could earn two guineas a week. His brother came before me, for I committed both the husband and wife to prison for neglecting their family, adjourned the case for farther hearing, and sent the children to the workhouse;—the brother came before me, I say, with tears in his eyes, and was quite ashamed to appear in the court. He said that his brother had had a little property left him, and might have lived with comfort, the income arising from it being about two hundred pounds per annum. I went farther into the inquiry, by examining the boy, who was a very intelligent one, of ten years of age; and I found that the woman, the man, and baby slept together on one batch of rags, while the children huddled up together in a corner without any rags at all. The father and mother rose the first thing in the morning, and went straight off to the gin-shop—the same gin-shop too. I had the keeper of the gin-shop before me; it was kept by a woman, and she certainly seemed ashamed of it. The biggest boy of all used to get up, after his father and mother had left the room, and go out into the market, where he tried to get a few pence by holding horses, leaving the other children to wander about, picking up cabbage-leaves, and so on, to eat. Those children never were washed, and never went to church;—and all this misery was brought on by drinking! The man shook like an aspen leaf, and the woman was reduced to the greatest state of misery and wretchedness. She had scarcely a rag on: I believe she had not undressed herself for many months. When there was no money, the husband went to work; and as soon as he earned anything, he and his wife drank it out. No part of that money was ever expended upon the education of the children, nor were they ever washed."

A very large portion of the beer-shops and the public-houses are absolutely the property of the distillers and brewers; and their interest is for the public to consume the articles they sell, as much as it is the interest of the omnibus-driver for the public to use his omnibus. One object of the Beer Act was to set down the power of the brewers, whereas it has increased that influence, because the brewers are now the persons who set up the beer-shops. Most of the publicans are put into their houses by the distillers or brewers, who advance them a considerable portion of the capital necessary to enter the premises.

The practice of adulteration of spirits and malt liquors has not only increased, but the extent to which the adulteration itself is now carried has also increased. This fact is proved by the circumstance that the police find a marked difference now, from what there was some years ago, in the length of time required for drunken men to become sober and recover themselves. Where a man, in a certain stage of ebriety, used to recover in two or three hours, he now requires six or seven.

(To be continued.)

THE TWO RIVERS.

It was a favourite custom of the ancients to bestow various characteristics and attributes upon their rivers, which, in many instances, they did not hesitate to represent by the personified images of demi-gods. Amongst the most famous of the rivers thus noted, were the Styx and the Pactolus.

The river Styx was the one on which hovered all the grim and ghastly shadows of those who had departed this life; and who were waiting to be ferried over to the opposite shores—those shores being the boundaries of hell. The only passport to the regions of the opposite bank was to be procured through the medium of bribing Charon, the presiding deity of the ferry, with a small coin, in order to induce him to conduct the phantoms of the dead to the everlasting banks of Pluto's dominions. Although those phantoms, in many instances, knew full well the dread fate that awaited them upon the other shore, yet they could not withstand the species of fascination which urged them on to seek every possible means to court the favour of Charon, and procure admittance to his vessel.

Those hideous phantoms may be well likened to the pale and emaciated forms which flock around the doors of the publican, and which are the remains of the miserable drunkards who, in the living world, may thus be considered as prowling about the confines of hell. And farther—still farther may the simile be worked out, without the aid of a very extensive fancy. The publican is the mercenary Charon, who will not even show the way to perdition, nor conduct his victims on the road to eternal ruin, without first receiving the price of his horrible duty. The drunkard must pay for his drink, before he partakes of it—in the same way as Charon must be pacified with the bribe of a denarius. The drink is the vessel of Charon, which wafts the too willing victim to the realms of irrecoverable perdition. And although the miserable drunkard, like the ghost upon the bank of the Styx, knows full well the fate that is in reserve for him, if he only partake of the deleterious and death-dealing poisons dispensed by the publican, still will he seek all the means with which he is acquainted to procure the money that shall purchase the passport to damnation!

The other river of ancient mythology, to which we alluded, is the Pactolus; and so fruitful were the shores of this mellifluous and peaceful stream, and so crowded with rich harvests were its banks, that the ancients allegorically represented it as flowing in a bed the acclivities of which on either side were covered with sands of gold. This river and its banks may readily be taken as the symbolical abode of the sons of temperance. They drink the pure water which nature has given us for our best uses; and they create for themselves, by their habits of abstemiousness and forbearance, harvests of golden profit. The grim and ghastly forms, which haunt the river Styx, are never seen upon the banks of the Pactolus: for in the latter region, all is health, happiness, and joy. Freedom, that brightest of the heavenly train which formerly descended from the realms of the Deity, under the guidance of fair Religion,—Freedom, who is Virtue's twin-sister, and who was born of purest Love,—Freedom, the parent of mirth, contentment, and innocent pleasure,—Freedom rules the fair domains on the shores of the Pactolus; and the free-agency of her subjects is not shackled by the chains and fetters of degrading customs. Despotism, that sprung from the family of Satan, when the evil angels were cast out of heaven for warring against the noble attributes of their God and ours,—Despotism, whose iron rod eats into the very soul of his subjects, and whose mandates are all based upon the stern doctrine of necessity,—Despotism rules the trembling, the oppressed, and the wretched beings that people the kingdom on the banks of the Styx.

Those, who on earth have experienced the tyranny of despotic monarchs, and who have learned to appreciate the blessings of a mild sovereign's just sway, will comprehend the difference between the rule of the prince of the Styx and the princess of the Pactolus. Is the iron yoke of the autocrat of Russia, with the dread deserts of Siberia in the constant perspective of the view of all his subjects—is the sway of that arbitrary monarch preferable to the mild and merciful dominion of the island-queen, the young sovereign of that land where none is judged until after a trial by his peers? Consider this, O miserable drunkard! and then say, wilt thou not shake off the dominion of the despot, and rank yourself beneath the banners of the upright and impartial monarch? Intemperance is a stern and merciless ruler, demanding heavy interest for the sorry pleasures he doles out, and drawing long bills upon the constitution for a momentary facility of confidence; but, on the other hand, Temperance is kind and just, and requires no illegitimate taxation to support its placid and easy sway.

When the deities of the heathen mythology gave their respective attributes to the Styx and the Pactolus, they thus portioned out the various gem which were to repair to the realms of each. To the Styx were sent madness, apoplexy, gout, vengeance, murder, strife, war, discord, poverty, famine, ignorance, and hate: to the Pactolus were consigned intellect, health, peace, wealth, plenty, knowledge, contentment, forbearance, and love. The cities on the banks of the Styx are formed of miserable and dirty hovels, and the inmates thereof are a prey to pestilence, plague, and every loathsome disease. The cities of the Pactolus are grand and flourishing, rich in architectural beauties, characterized by cleanliness, and filled with happy and contented myriads of beings. A constant winter reigns in the realms washed by the former stream; but perpetual summer gladdens the rich harvest on the shores of the latter.

Is it necessary to appeal to the reasonable and thinking man,—is it necessary to ask our fellow-creatures, to which region they wish to repair? Has habit become so invincible that its shackles cannot be shaken off? or shall the examples of upwards of four millions of the advocates of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks prove that no evil habit is invincible? Drunkard, turn from your evil ways, ere it be too late,—abandon the realms and poisoned waters of the Styx, and repair to the banks of the pure stream of the Pactolus. Cheat Charon of his fare, by removing yourselves from the vicinity of his bank; for, hideous and revolting though he be in person, still the allurements he holds out are as the honey which floats upon the cup of poison. Cheat Charon, I say,—cheat the publican of his fare; and, if you do not seek him to offer him a bribe, he will not pursue you with the freely-tendered gift of his inviting drink. He is selfish, and will not give you, were it to save your life, one drop of that which he declares to be wholesome and good, unless you can purchase that drop with your hard-earned coin. The confines of the river Styx are the realms of eternal perdition, to which the publican, in the guise of Charon, is the guide—the borders of the Pactolus are the regions of Elysium, the paths that lead to which are pointed out by the Genius of Temperance.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received a letter from Mr. JOHN SCOTT, desiring us to contradict our statement of last week, that he is about to visit Lincolnshire as an agent of the United Temperance Association.

Poetry, by W. M. C.—"Life, a Poem."—"The Drunkards' Song."—"Lines on the Gala at Dyrham Park."—"and" Sylvia," are declined with thanks. It will be observed that poetry does not form a feature in the editorial arrangements of this Journal.

A LATE CONVERT may drink ginger-beer with safety. The effervescence, which is produced by the combination of two chemical antitheses, does not correspond with the process of fermentation by which alcohol is produced. Fermentation is the first result of decomposition in vegetable nature. Of course the British wines are interdicted: they all contain alcohol, and are inebriating.

Our esteemed correspondent R. K. of Port Vale, Hertford, is informed that the quantities of alcohol in intoxicating liquors, are detailed by Mr. Grindrod, in his very clever work "Bacchus." R. K. can become a member of the United Temperance Association, by signing the pledge, and applying for a card to the Secretary, H. W. WESTON, Esq., at the Society's Depot, 134, Aldersgate-street.

THE TEETOTAL COURANT (of which, No. VIII. of the New Series is now before us) is an excellent champion in the grand cause. It is a cheap periodical, published at Kirkcaldy, on the third Saturday of every month.

We regret that we cannot insert G. B. B.'s communication. If he will favour us with an article upon another subject, we shall be glad to give it our attention. We shall also be pleased to receive the proposed account of proceedings at Newport-Pagnell.

To G. T. A. We regret that the editorial plan of this journal does not admit articles of the nature of that which bears your initials. We shall be glad to receive other contributions from you.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1840.

We have before shown that the turpitude of systems or of customs is not extenuated by the plea of their antiquity; and if the opponents of Teetotalism cite the deeds of former generations as precedents for the conduct of the present, they at once demonstrate their ignorance of the necessity of progressive amendment, and merit our contumely as well as our reproach. The practice of enslaving the blacks might have been justified in a similar manner; and what should we now think of an individual who boldly came forward as the champion of the slave-trade? And yet the most enthusiastic people in favour of political liberty, in ancient times, were the most severe with their slaves. The Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Romans, and the Carthaginians, maintained that the right of disposing of the destiny, the life and death of their slaves, was a principle of society. It is true that in the Jewish laws we find slavery permitted: it is true that the Israelites were empowered to purchase "their brothers for six years, and strangers for ever." Puffendorf declares that "slavery was established by the free consent of the enslaved and the enslavers, and by a certain contract." Grotius maintains that "an individual, made captive in battle and taken to slavery, has not a right to escape from his masters." But the necessity of digesting the Jewish laws according to the nature of the people to be governed by them, and according to the specific state of civilization in the known world at the time,—the unfounded assertions of Puffendorf, and the false conclusions of Hugo Grotius,—all these prove nothing in favour of the immoral idea of slavery.

If, then, in one important matter connected with the welfare of society, the customs of antiquity have been disregarded, may not the same license be extended to other efforts of social reformation? Those, who advocate Teetotalism, are only continuing, in another sphere, the work of emancipation which has been commenced with the Slaves in the West-Indies. The drunkards are the slaves of far more exacting and despotic task-masters than were the poor negroes; and it is to release these voluntary slaves from a fearful bondage that the disciples of Teetotalism are exerting themselves.

We are determined to pursue unflinchingly the path of moral reformation which we have commenced, in exposing the horrors of intemperance, and in appealing to the sympathies of the philanthropic to assist us in this important undertaking. We trust that our impartiality and honesty are sufficiently known to obtain credit, when we say that our good wishes extend to every charitable enterprise, as our sympathies flow to every branch of the human family. Our regards are not confined to the east, nor to the west,—to the north nor to the south: the tyranny exercised by a vicious habit, and the misery resulting from its indulgence, excite them wherever and whenever such strong causes of affecting appeal to our compassion are known to exist. Our sympathies include the human race; the circle of our tenderness and fraternal or social love is not circumscribed to our own country. If the frightful consequences of intemperance were exposed in all their plenitude and nakedness, they would form a dark antithesis to the glowing statements that have been imposed upon the world by those whose interest or whose wickedness prompted them to advocate the most abominable system that ever darkened the reputation of a civilised country, or stigmatised the integrity of a certain set of men. Let the opponents of Teetotalism pause, before they continue to preach in favour of the distillers and the brewers; and let the legislature amend the infamous system of deriving mighty revenues from the crime, the misery, and the degradation of the poor.

Let us look around us, and examine the pulse of society. To emancipate the human race from the bondage of intemperance, there are now thousands who would, if necessary, walk to martyrdom as gladly as to a bridal feast. It is therefore greatly to be deplored that there are still so many, who, while they acknowledge the existence of the evil, will not adopt the only means of exterminating it. Wherefore should they hesitate to come forward and join the Teetotalers? Why should they remain more or less cold, calculating, and unstable? Is this the result of temperament? Many have motives, which, though weak, are still true to the touch of equity and of goodness, and will answer to its application. Besides these, there are now millions of minor beings whose gregarious motives already lean to the right side of the question. The advocates of Teetotalism must speak boldly, and not dread either the ridicule of the prejudiced, or the fears of a government trembling for its revenues. If vulgar sympathy be too frequently resorted to, its energies will be destroyed. A single combat may be fought even by a coward: but it is the long, arduous, fluctuating campaign that tries and proves the veteran. Petty sympathies are speedily exhausted: they must be sparingly, though, at the same time, strongly and energetically aroused. Their nature is peculiar; they will not bear a repetition even of slight impulses: they must be warmed into momentary ardour, and worked off while they are hot.

THE PRIVATE MAD-HOUSE.

In the individual, who is addicted to intoxicating drinks, would only call to mind the appalling fact that habits of intemperance frequently terminate with madness,—and if he were only acquainted with the horrors of both public and private lunatic asylums,—he would not hesitate for one moment to sign the pledge of total abstinence. With a view to elucidate a portion of the latter mystery, we shall lay before the reader the following extract from a novel entitled "GRACE DARLING."

THE other guests at the supper-table were all individuals, who, as the Doctor had observed, were sane enough to be permitted to take their meals with him; and even to walk about the house and garden alone in the day time; but had each some particular eccentricity or weakness which indicated the nature of his malady. One was a solicitor, who, on account of the failure of a law-suit, had sunk into a state of despondency, which had ultimately verged into insanity; although upon professional matters, and those only, he was as lucid in his arguments and discourse as ever. The second was a politician, who, disgusted with contemplating the misdeeds of the great, and possessing a sensitive mind which could not brook the oppression of unjust laws and partial rulers, had professed and taught republican opinions—a system of conduct that entailed endless persecution upon him, and at length had driven him to a mad-house. The third was a clergyman, who, having refused to read the Thirty-nine Articles, had been dispossessed of his gown and the means of subsistence; and who, having seen a young wife and only child die of want and destitution, had been consigned to a mad-house and supported there by the very prelate who had wronged him; and who feared to suffer the evidence of such despotism and tyranny to exist at large in the world. The fourth had been in a situation of confidence about the person of a late high personage, and had been induced by his master to give false evidence at the memorable trial of that master's injured wife—a circumstance, which pressed so deeply upon the poor fellow's mind, that he was at length consigned to the abode where we now find him: and the fifth was a wealthy slave-owner of Jamaica, who had pursued a long course of the most unprecedented rigour towards his unhappy dependants, and whose mind had been unhinged by the perusal of a work which brought home to his imagination his infamous conduct in all its worst colours.

Such were the individuals with whom Somerville now found himself; and in a very few minutes he perceived that they were all sane upon conversing with each upon a certain point; but that in reference to others they were all prone to utter nothing but absurdities.

"I do not think, Doctor," said the lawyer, addressing himself with the utmost solemnity to Wokensmithers, "that you have any legal right to detain the gentleman whom you have brought to us this evening."

"Don't be absurd," cried the clergyman: "you are perfectly aware that the gentleman is a sensible person, and never can be brought to believe that they, who have not had a chance of knowing our blessed Redeemer, can be condemned to eternal perdition. No one can credit so monstrous a doctrine—repulsive at once to common sense, and derogatory to the wisdom and justice of the Eternal."

"I shall send the case before a special jury," said the lawyer.

"And I before the Ecclesiastical Court," cried the clergyman.

"Is this the liberty of the subject?" exclaimed the politician. "Are we to be bound down to the earth beneath the weight of taxes—to see our wives and little ones in the workhouse—to toil only for the benefit of the great? How is it that in France the bread is less than half the price it is in England? Why is the aristocracy in this country to be pampered and made much of, and the lower orders to be treated like dogs? Why can a rich man break lamps and insult the police with impunity, or be released upon the payment of a paltry fine, whereas the poor man is sent to the treadmill for only half the offence? Does hereditary title confer hereditary wisdom? And who dares call a just assertion of our privileges by the name of treason? All power emanates from the people; and the people have a right to choose their own governors. Our kings are stipendiary magistrates whom we may depose at will."

"Kings! Kings!" cried the perjured witness; "ah! talk not of kings. There is no virtue in a court—no rectitude in a palace. I was sent to Italy to try and discover something wrong in the conduct of my illustrious master's wife: but—no—no—she was as pure and spotless as snow, and he knew it. But I suffered myself to be led away—to be bribed—to be won over to his purposes—and Oh! I perjured myself! Many more did so too—Oh! yes, they all did; for they knew she was as innocent as a lamb! It was a horrible plot—a conspiracy—a scheme to ruin her!"—and having uttered these words in a tone of voice which bespoke the most acute agony, the poor fellow buried his face in his hands and wept bitterly.

"Who cries?" exclaimed the slave-owner. "Is it Corah weeping for Tamango? Ah! I know that the poor youth fell beneath the gory lash! I know that my cruelty killed him! You need not reproach me with it: that deed is deeply imprinted upon my memory. Its trace is there, there—" he cried, striking his head forcibly with his hand; "and the worm of remorse is gnawing me here!"

He placed his hand upon his heart, and groaned bitterly: large tears trickled down his countenance; and his whole frame seemed convulsed by deep emotion. His eyes rolled about fearfully in his head; and Somerville thought within himself, that if that man's crimes had been great in this world, his punishment was already at least commensurate with the extent of his delinquency.

It was evident that no one paid the slightest attention to the discourse of his companions, beyond catching an occasional word which bore immediate reference to his own ideas or to the matters which occupied his attention; and now that each had given vent to his thoughts, they all commenced a series of chattering, which, turning upon five different topics, and consisting entirely of declamation, produced a singular though sorrowful effect, and made Somerville almost shed tears to think that he was actually categorised amongst such beings.

"I never shall forgive myself for that oversight," said the lawyer.

"It was all done by bribery," cried the false witness.

"The bishop was at the bottom of the whole affair," observed the clergyman.

"Great men are invariably despotic and unjust," exclaimed the politician.

"Tamango's blood calls for vengeance!" shouted the slave-owner.

"The day of retribution must come," said the politician.

"Blood for blood—wrong for wrong," ejaculated the false witness.

"It's illegal," observed the lawyer.

And thus did those men utter a thousand disjointed sentences, which frequently seemed to bear reference one with another, and which were nevertheless respectively instigated by feelings and emotions widely discrepant in themselves. Frequently was this conversational jargon carried on to a pitch which would have actually excited the laughter of young Somerville, had he not been too deeply bowed down by grief to indulge in aught approximating hilarity and mirth.

In the middle of this singular conversation, which seemed to make no impression upon the Doctor, who continued to eat his supper with a most excellent appetite, the door was suddenly thrown open, and a figure, half-naked, with long black hair hanging wildly over his shoulders, and his eyes rolling terribly in their sockets, rushed into the room. He was attired in a shirt, which being unbuttoned at the breast, displayed the emaciated form beneath, and a pair of dark trousers reaching just above the hips. His feet were bare and bleeding, as if he had just been running over flint stones; in his right hand he flourished the leg of a cold fowl; and in his left he clenched an enormous piece of bread. His cheeks were thin and hollow; his beard had not been shaven for some days; and his whole appearance was forlorn, dirty, and wretched in the extreme.

"Ah! ha!" he cried, as he escaped into the apartment, and munched his bone and then the bread as he danced about the room: "I have outwitted the old girl at last, eh! This will teach her to starve me again. Does she think I can live upon the moonbeams? no—no!"

And he laughed, and ate, and danced, as if he were the merriest fellow in existence.

"Hey day, what does this mean?" exclaimed the Doctor. "Why, here's this confounded Jem broke loose again. Isaac, call Ben."

But Isaac had scarcely arrived at the door of the room, on his way to execute his master's orders, when Ben and Joe rushed into the apartment, and darted upon the unfortunate maniac with a violence and ferocity which made Somerville's blood curdle in his veins.

"Here you are, are you, you cursed good-for-nothing ragged thief!" cried Ben, dealing the maniac a terrible blow upon his shoulder, which felled the poor wretch to the ground.

"Get up, you scoundrel, get up with you," exclaimed Joe, distributing sundry brutal kicks upon the ribs and back of the madman with brutal violence, and uttering imprecations too disgusting to be here recorded.

"What has he been about, the villain?" demanded the Doctor, who seemed very anxious to join his men in their cowardly attack upon his unfortunate prisoner.

"Why, Sir," answered Ben, "he broke loose just as I and Joe were getting a mouthful o' somethin' to eat; and made his escape into the kitchen, where he helped himself to all he could lay his hands on. Well, we ran after him into the garden; and a terrible race he led us over the gravel walks, and through the bushes. At length he returned again to the house, and here he is; and in order that the Doctor might not mistake where he was, the brutal fellow bestowed another kick with his iron-shod boot on the maniac's ribs."

"They starve me, they starve me—Oh! they starve me!" cried the madman, screaming with agony. "They think I can eat the rats and mice in the horrid place where they put me to sleep; but I cannot catch them."

"Silence, beast!" thundered the Doctor.

"Silence, don't you hear?" cried Joe, as the maniac screamed with the pain of another blow; and when the poor wretch attempted to rise, he was knocked down by the demon who addressed him last.

"The strait-waistcoat," said the Doctor. "And Ben—"

Ben who was about to clothe this victim of cruelty in the strait-waistcoat, relapsed for a moment from his occupation.

"Take him up stairs, Ben," continued the Doctor, glancing towards Somerville, on whose mind he was perhaps unwilling to make too unfavourable an impression the first evening: then in a whisper, he added, "And give him four-and-twenty good cuts with the dog whip. That will teach him to go stealing in my kitchen again, the villain!"

The maniac was raised from the ground by his two brutal keepers, and borne out of the room, still laughing, and gnawing his stolen provisions, in spite of the pain he was enduring from the blows he had received. The five guests at the supper-table looked with the greatest apathy and indifference at all that was passing, with the exception of the slave-owner, who cried bitterly. The scene probably reminded him of the deeds of by-gone days, and the atrocities to which he himself owed his insanity.

Five minutes after the removal of the maniac from the supper-room, shrieks of the most piercing agony echoed through the house; and the voice of the unhappy sufferer, appealing to that God whom he had not forgotten in his mental aberrations, fell in torture-wrung accents upon the distracted ears of Somerville. He was about to fall at the feet of the merciless Waken-smithers, and implore for mercy in behalf of the maniac; but the awkwardness of his own position, and the necessity of maintaining a tranquil and pacific line of conduct in order to work out his plans, compelled him to forego the charitable desire.

THE "FREE-AND-EASY."

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

MANY of our more respectable readers are probably unacquainted with the nature or existence of any association whatever under the above attractive title; but, however ignorant they may be respecting them, they are nevertheless numerous, well-attended, and fruitful causes of crime. They are established for the purpose of increasing the custom of the public-houses in which they are held. Singing forms the chief attraction; and, not unfrequently, a professor of music is engaged to superintend the harmonic department. Bacchanalian and very questionable love songs are principally patronized; and, as these resorts are attended by youth of both sexes, already excited by intoxicating drink, our readers may easily picture the deplorable results.

At one end of the room, on an elevated seat, is the Chairman, who is appointed by the landlord; and on his comic or other powers the success of the whole depends. He proposes toasts—sees that no individual is unsupplied with liquor—quells any sudden disturbance—and enforces order by knocking the table with a small wooden hammer. As on this individual so much devolves, his liquor is supplied to him gratuitously; but no other emolument does he receive. This honour is so eagerly sought for, that many have sacrificed everything to attain it—even health, fortune, and character.

The Chairman is not unfrequently a man of extraordinary comic powers—and who for the love of drink, and drunkards' applause, plays the fool for the amusement of the rest. Many individuals might be quoted, well-known characters—who sought not for any other means of livelihood than thus crawling from one Free-and-easy to another; and have boasted that they could make the fortune of any publican whom they chose exclusively to patronize, by increasing the flock of deluded followers. But although plentifully supplied with drink, food is not so easily obtained;—thus this character is frequently detected the next morning begging his meals by mouthfuls, of the inmates of the tap-room.

Poor infatuated individual—lost to every sense of shame—scouted by the very man whose fortune he is assisting in the formation—disgraced in the eyes of the thinking and more sober part of the community—and a burden even to himself,—yet seated on his elevated chair in the parlour, surrounded by his self-styled friends, who so gay—so lively—so witty—so humorous—and so admired!

We shall relate two anecdotes connected with these "Free-and-easies" which will not fail, we think, to interest our readers.

The first in our memory relates to Richard F—. He certainly was gifted by nature with extraordinary comic powers; nor was he confined by an unretentive memory, as no limit appeared to his recitations, songs, ventriloquism, tales, &c. Minniery, and low wit would succeed them till the guests were tired with laughter. But the greatest ingenuity was exemplified in the way in which he forwarded the landlord's interests, by indirectly forcing people to drink; and, when they were incapacitated, by drinking their shares himself, in order to increase the landlord's receipts. But poor Richard had a family; and often have we seen him, the morning after one of his splendid debuts, begging the half-picked bones of the previous feast for his starving family. Often has he left his ragged children, and comfortless home, with a heavy heart, to attend one of those meetings where all his cares must be forgotten—and hilarity take the place of sadness.

But, after being driven from one resort to another, for the purpose of obtaining the necessities of life, and failing in every thing, he at last became the inmate of a workhouse; and, overwhelmed with remorse, terminated his existence by suicide!

We will relate another tragic affair connected with "Free-and-easies":—A young man, an apprentice, was compelled by his master to be at home by a certain hour of the evening; but the youth, wishing to attend these festive meetings, used to leave his bed-room by the attic window; and, running along the roofs of the houses, descend by the same way, into the apartment which he had just left. This feat was hailed by his companions as a valiant achievement; but, alas! retiring the same way—reeling with intoxication, as he reached the parapet, his foot slipped—he was precipitated to the ground—and his mangled corpse lay at the door of the public-house, which, but a few minutes before, had resounded with his Bacchanalian song.

REVIEWS.

A Medical, Moral, and Christian Dissection of Teetotalism. Ninth Edition. 12mo. pp. 12. Newcastle: Printed for D. France and Co.

Although the writer of this pamphlet has found it necessary to make up for the deficiency of argument which his subject involves, with an unreasonable quantity of low blackguardism and abuse, levelled against the Teetotalers, we shall not reply to him in the same strain. When a man, who undertakes to attack some particular theory or system, uses a mass of insulting epithets and unmannerly adjectives, we know how much importance to attach to the cause which he espouses. No man, who has sound argument on his side, will ever descend to abuse, because it is not necessary; abuse is a weapon called into action as a substitute for fair reasoning, and when all other legitimate weapons fail.

The author felicitates himself upon his brochure having reached to a ninth edition. This is no evidence of right on his side: it only proves that he is well supported by those who have a favourite monopoly to sustain.

We find that the principal argument of this pamphlet is founded upon the fact that air and water are composed of stimulating poison. The separate qualities of the ingredients of air and water would, in their application to the human frame, be fatal; but when compounded together, they are perfectly innocuous. The most wholesome fruits and vegetables contain the elements of poisons, which, if they alone existed in those substances, would prove fatal to man; but, as they are mixed up with other ingredients, which act as correctives, they become nutritious and wholesome. Thus air and water in their present condition, are not poisons. The author of this pamphlet may as well say that sugar is a poison, because a chemical manipulation may change it into oxalic acid.

The author of this brochure proceeds to observe that "walking, riding, or running, so conducive to health, produces it by an increased flow of the pulse, causing an exhilaration of the spirits bordering on moderate excitement: from ale, wine, or distilled spirits." The argument which is here intended to be brought against Teetotalism is easily answered. The Teetotalers strongly recommend all natural means of producing a proper excitement in the human frame, and only discountenance unnatural means. Exercise is the natural means; and strong drinks, which ruin the coats of the stomach and injure the intellectual powers, are the unnatural means. The author of the pamphlet under notice, admits that exercise will produce a healthy excitement, and implies that strong drink are artificial means calculated to produce a similar excitement in the absence of the other (exercise). The Teetotalers recommend the general adoption of the former means, and discountenance the latter; and this objection to the latter means is founded upon the conviction, 1. That the excitement produced by strong drinks is unnatural, because it arises from directly artificial means, and means that involve a habit without which health and intellect continue unimpaired; 2. That if a natural means of producing a necessary degree of excitement exist, we should not have recourse to other means, which, even if they did produce the desired effect in one way, would injure the body in another; 3. That if strong drink be taken as a means of procuring that excitement above alluded to, the use, as proved by an undeniable experience, frequently leads to the abuse, and from the abuse result all kinds of maladies and crimes; and 4. That the experience of four millions of men, and the example of thousands of savages, amongst whom alcoholic drinks have only been lately introduced, prove that man can live without those drinks—that he is better in health and mind, without them—and that they are in no way necessary to existence, but, on the contrary, highly injurious to the physiological and mental economy of organized beings.

With regard to oil of vitriol, laudanum, foxglove, nightshade, hemlock, &c., being poisons which are occasionally useful for medical purposes, this very argument adduced by the author of the pamphlet before us, turns against himself, because Teetotalers allow wine or spirits to be taken medicinally, and the opponent to the Teetotalers does not drink either decoction of hemlock or nightshade habitually.

The author of this pamphlet seems to forget one thing, which is of considerable importance, and which he ought to consider with due attention. This is, that even if alcoholic drinks were healthy and wholesome, the Teetotalers would still preach a crusade against their use, because they intoxicate,—and from intoxication emanate poverty, disease, and crime. Consult the evidence given by police-magistrates before the House of Commons, or read the annals of crime, and you will find that nearly all deeds of turpitude emanate from intoxication. Consult medical men, and they will tell you that nearly all diseases spring from intoxication; and use your own powers of survey and research, and you will see that more than half the poverty and wretchedness of the lower orders may also be traced to intoxication. Thus, even if alcoholic drinks were not calculated to impair the healthy tone of the body or the intellect, sufficient causes are found in social life to recommend a total abstinence from them.

The author of the pamphlet under notice then proceeds to a consideration of the subject in a religious point of view: i. e. in its reference to the Holy Scriptures. The miracle at Cana in Galilee is not quoted by him as an argument in favour of the use of strong drinks. If he have read the very clever papers, which appeared in our journal a few weeks ago, under the denomination of "The wines of the Old Testament," and which emanated from the pen of Mr. John Wilson, he would see enough to convince him that the Scriptures cannot be perverted into a recommendation of an evil habit.

The concluding portion of the pamphlet is occupied with declamatory illustrations of the general tone of argument,—in the following manner, for instance:

Because a fool occasionally drinks himself to death, by a criminal excess in ale, or wine, or spirit, must therefore, all men refuse the beneficial use of them, and drink not at all, however useful, nutritious, or refreshing to nature—not even at the command and after the example of the Saviour!

Let us answer this paragraph, and then take leave of the subject for the present. The habit of intoxication has increased to such a frightful extent, that only total-abstinence measures can correct it. The temptation must be altogether removed: experience, and a knowledge of the frailty of human volition, prove that no such thing as a moderate indulgence can be countenanced with safety. Secondly—intoxicating drinks are neither beneficial, nor nutritious: they are not so refreshing as pure water, and they contain no more nutriment than the solid substance to which they can be reduced. Half of a penny loaf contains more nourishment than a pot of porter; and a glass of wine does not possess more nutritious power than a grain of wheat. Thirdly—it is blasphemous to imagine that the Saviour could countenance a habit, even in its most remote degree, which is the greatest scourge that ever was introduced upon earth. We shall lastly observe, that if Teetotalers be wrong—they still advocate a good cause: we see that we can exist and be more healthy, without strong drinks; and we are therefore right in avoiding those things which might lead to intoxication; intoxication being the gate which conducts its victims to the work-house, the felons' gaol, the hospital, or the lunatic asylum.

The London Teetotal Magazine and Literary Miscellany. Number for August. London: George Wightman.

With this talented champion of the Teetotal cause the reader is presented with a picturesque portrait of Father Mathew, engraved in the first style of the art, and well worth all the money that is required as the price of the Magazine itself. The contents of this number are varied and interesting, and are all original (save, of course, the speeches delivered at public meetings, of which, by the way, there is a very faithful Report.) The "Biographical sketch of Father Mathew" is the best that has yet appeared in print. It appears that this eminent apostle of Temperance is now in his fiftieth year, having been born on the 10th of October, 1790.

The Pastor's Pledge of Total Abstinence. By THE REV. WILLIAM ROAF, Saint Paul's Chapel, Wigan. Fifth Thousand. 12mo. pp. 47. London. 12, Bull's Head Court.

This work, which is dedicated to the churches of Christ, of the Congregational Order, assembling in the Independent chapel, Ellesmere, and in Saint Paul's Chapel, Wigan, is a very clever little production, and reflects great credit upon its reverend author. It is a powerful advocate of the great cause of Teetotalism, and must be hailed as one of the most conclusive essays that have been printed upon the subject. We shall make an elaborate extract in another department of our paper at a future period.

The Temperance Messenger, and Tract Magazine. Numbers 7 and 8. New Series. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

A very excellent little publication—very cheap—neatly got up—and admirably calculated to further the cause of Teetotalism.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

WALES.

A letter from Mr. E. G. SALISBURY informs us that the influence of Teetotalism is producing grand effects in this principality. "The prevailing opinion now is," says the letter, "that we have upwards of two hundred and fifty thousand members in North and South Wales. Of these five thousand at least may be considered reformed drunkards. There are also seven hundred ministers and local preachers of all denominations, in the first mentioned number. Mr. ROBERT PARRY has done more in Wales to spread the cause of Teetotalism than any other six public advocates taken together. With half-a-dozen such staunch apostles of Temperance, we should effectually suppress every tavern, gin-shop, and ale-house in the principality ere ten years have expired. We wish The Teetotaler journal every success in this part of the world."

NEWPORT-PAGNELL AND WOLVERTON.

A letter from Newport-Pagnell informs us that the cause of Teetotalism is progressing well in that town, and at Wolverton, an important station on the London and Birmingham Railway. "Much good," says our correspondent, "is done amongst those who are concerned with the Railway, and who make some very eloquent speeches at times upon the beneficial effects of Teetotalism."

NAUTICAL TEETOTAL MEETING.

On the evening of Thursday, the 18th instant, the passengers in the steam-vessel from Hull to Leith held a meeting on board.

Mr. WILLIAM PATON (from London) took the Chair, and the audience stood round him. An interesting discussion upon the comparative merits of moderation and total abstinence took place. The argument terminated in favour of the disciples of total abstinence.

PRINCES-STREET TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY, CORK.

The monthly meeting of this Society was held as usual in the school-room of the Presbyterian Meeting-house.

Mr. R. DOWDEN was called to the chair, Mr. MACINTOSH acted as Secretary.

Mr. HYDE addressed the meeting on the necessity of consistency amongst the members of Teetotal Societies.

Mr. GEORGE BRADY spoke of the hardships to which Teetotalers were exposed by being paid their wages in public-houses. Mr. Brady referred to the case of the London Coal-Whippers, as reported in The Teetotaler journal; and the Secretary read the leading article in Number 2. of that paper, which relates particularly to this subject.

Mr. ROGER OLDEN then addressed the meeting and said that he had witnessed many a scene arising from intemperance, which it would be distressing to relate. He made a pathetic appeal to those present to sign the pledge.

Mr. WILLIAM MARTIN spoke of the comparatively tranquil state of the streets of Cork since the propagation of Teetotal doctrines.

THE CHAIRMAN acquainted the meeting with the fact of Judge Crampton having received the pledge at the hands of the Rev. Mr. Mathew, who presented the judicial functionary with a silver medal as a token of the importance attached to this accession to the ranks of Teetotalism. The Chairman then made a very eloquent speech upon the general effects of the new doctrine, especially in its relation to Ireland.

FINSBURY AND HOXTON YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

This Society is progressing very favourably, thanks to the exertions of its Committee and Secretary. A meeting was held at the Ship Coffee-house, on Tuesday the 18th instant; upon which occasion Mr. PHILLIPS, the Honorary Secretary, took the Chair. Messieurs E. H. Williams (late Registrar,) Parrett, Parks, and F. Dyer addressed the Meeting, each with considerable effect. A vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. E. H. Williams for his exertions during the period he acted as Registrar to that Society.

KENSINGTON AND RAYSWATER BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of this Branch took place at the Camden Chapel, Kensington, on Monday evening, the 17th inst., on which occasion Mr. BENSTEAD, of the parent society, took the chair. The assembly was addressed by Messieurs Stallwood (the Secretary,) Tanner, Mee, Reid, Reeves, Betts, Cox, and Bowler. Mr. Benstead filled the duties of Chairman in a most able manner, and proved himself on this, as on other occasions, to be a great acquisition to the United Temperance Association.

A second meeting was held on Friday, the 21st inst. Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, according to public announcement, took the chair. This gentleman expatiated at some length upon Teetotalism, both in respect to its present and ulterior results, and prophesied that it was destined to achieve the total moral reformation of the country.

Mr. BOWLER then addressed the meeting, and related a dreadful tale of an accident which had occurred to a bricklayer, who fell from a scaffold when in a state of intoxication.

Mr. H. W. WESTON, (Secretary to the United Temperance Association,) made a most eloquent speech upon all the important branches of Teetotalism, in respect to its moral, political, and religious application. He said that he had seen people killed in public-houses, in frays and quarrels; and he then explained the system of adulteration practised by the publicans.

Mr. REED said he had entered upon a new existence since he had signed the Teetotal pledge. His home was now happy, whereas it had before been wretched and cheerless.

Mr. MEE analyzed half a pint of beer, and showed the quantity of alcohol contained in it. He then addressed the meeting upon the beneficial effects of Teetotalism in respect to the working classes, and gave notice that on Thursday evening, the 27th instant, he should give a lecture at that place, explanatory of the nature and properties of alcohol.

A third meeting of the members of this Branch was held at the Camden Chapel, Kensington, on Monday evening, the 24th instant. Mr. H. W. WESTON in the Chair. The audience was addressed by this gentleman, and Messieurs BAYLIS, JOHNSON, M'CURRIE (of Chelsea,) and G. W. M. REYNOLDS.

BIRMINGHAM.

A weekly meeting of the Birmingham Teetotal Society was held on Monday, the 17th of August, in the Severn-street School-room; and the honest, straightforward, and manly statements of the various speakers were received with rapturous applause. Nothing is better calculated to awaken the attention of the persons who usually attend such meetings, than well attested facts as to the effects of drunkenness on the moral and social condition of man; accordingly, in the course of the remarks made by Mr. ELIJAH GOODHEAD, on that occasion, he quoted from No. VIII. of The Teetotaler, the latter part of the Rev. Francis Beardsall's "Appeal." He was pleased to see that the crowded assembly listened with marked attention, and received his observations with cheers. It is encouraging to the friends of the great and good cause of Teetotalism to behold the self-denying devotion of the working men, amidst the scoffs and jeers of not a few boisterous tipplers, who ever and anon essay to prevent a hearing.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, August 19th.

The Aldersgate-street Chapel has seldom seen a more crowded meeting than on this occasion. We have before alluded to the very respectable appearance of the persons who frequent the two hebdomadal meetings of this Association at the Aldersgate street Chapel, and the assembly in question fully bore out the truth of that remark. Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair on this occasion; and several able advocates addressed the meeting. The crowded state of our columns compels us to omit the report of the proceedings this week; but we shall in future give the preference, so far as the publication of the heads of the various speeches is concerned, to the Wednesday evening instead of the Saturday evening meeting.

Saturday Evening, August 22nd.

The meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel was somewhat thinly attended, probably in consequence of the beauty of the weather.

Mr. WILLIAMS, upon taking the Chair, made some very proper observations upon the rapid progress of Teetotalism throughout the British dominions.

Mr. CRUMP (the Registrar) said that it was ridiculous for so many people to be crying out against the dearth of provisions when they could afford to spend so much money in the public-houses, where they never attempted to drive a bargain with the landlord, as they do with the butcher or grocer.

Mr. BENSTEAD argued upon the necessity of the mens sana in corpore sano, and illustrated his favourite theme of the necessity of Teetotalism in respect to the intellect, in a forcible manner.

Mr. BOWLER said that he had several labourers under him, and that they were already thinking of taking a small farm amongst them, upon the money saved from the public-houses.

Mr. REED introduced himself to the meeting as a happy specimen of the good effects of Teetotalism.

Mr. DONALDSON related a story of an individual, who after having long been a dreadful drunkard, was at length induced to sign the pledge of total abstinence. This circumstance empowered him to redeem his pledges at the pawnbroker's; and he was shortly after enabled to pledge his troth to a lady whom he selected as his future companion in life. This lady presented him with some pledges of their mutual affection; and he (Mr. Donaldson) would pledge himself to support the assertion that there was not a happier man now living than this reclaimed drunkard. Mr. Donaldson then dissected the doctrines lately propagated against Teetotalism by Messieurs Rowbotham and Perry, two anti-teetotal lecturers; and cut them up hip and thigh.

Mr. PRICE and Mr. BLACKMORE then each addressed the meeting, which separated at about half-past ten o'clock.

BETHNAL-GREEN AND SPITALFIELDS BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The usual Meeting of the Members of this Branch, took place at the Assembly-rooms, Church-row, Bethnal-green road, on Monday, the 24th instant. This place of Meeting promises to become an important stronghold for the disciples of Teetotalism.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' SOCIETY.

This praise-worthy association holds a weekly meeting, every Thursday evening, at Dennis's Coffee-house, Jerusalem-passage, Clerkenwell; and a youth is always in attendance at the chapel at Aldersgate-street, every Wednesday and Saturday evening, to receive the signatures of those youths who may wish to affix their hand to the pledge. The cause is progressing most favourably amongst the youths, many of whom are good orators. Too much praise cannot be attached to Mr. R. P. BATOER, the Secretary, for the excellent manner in which he conducts the business of this Society.

HAMMERSMITH AND STARCH-GREEN BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A number of gentlemen, residing at Hammersmith and Starch-Green, assembled on Monday evening, August 24th, at the house of Mr. William Cranston, 17, South-street, Hammersmith; and having taken into consideration the fact that numbers of individuals had already signed a pledge book in those neighbourhoods, came to the resolution of forming a total abstinence society under the auspices of the United Temperance Association. It was further resolved that three great meetings should be held at Mr. W. Cranston's house; namely, the first on Thursday, the 27th of August, Mr. H. W. WESTON, Secretary to the United Temperance Association, in the chair; the second on Tuesday, September 1st, Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS in the chair; and the third, on Saturday, the fifth of September, Mr. BENSTEAD in the chair.

NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

On the 19th instant the Superintendent of the Depot of the United Temperance Association forwarded an advertisement of a new work on "Teetotalism" to the office of the Journal of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, in Bull's Head Court. The price of the advertisement was received, and the paragraph sent to the printer of the Journal, in Mark Lane, in order that it might be in time for insertion. An hour or two afterwards much surprise was excited by the Superintendent having his money returned, and being informed, that the Committee of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society had come to a resolution to refuse all advertisements of whatever character from the United Temperance Association: consequently the advertisement was not inserted in their Journal of last week.

We believe that for an enlightened public, it is necessary to make no comment on the above.

ADVERTISEMENT.

With the Magazine, on the 31st instant, will be published, price Eleven Pence, stitched in a neat wrapper, and containing Numbers 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10.

PART II. of

THE TEETOTALER.

Persons, who live in isolated or retired spots, will find the mode of publication in Monthly Parts a very great convenience, as many bookellers can procure these parts with their periodical parcels, when their convenience might not permit them to supply the weekly numbers.

All Bookellers, News-vendors, and Stationers in the United Kingdom will receive orders for the Monthly Parts of THE TEETOTALER. The English on the continent can transmit their orders through the following Bookellers—Paris, Galignani, Brussels, A. H. Wahlen and Co.; Berlin, Asher, 18, Esplanade. Subscribers in America can address their orders to Messieurs Bagster and Marshall, Chestnut-street, Philadelphia.

W. STRANGE, PATERNOSTER-ROW.

17, Aldersgate-street.

THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE DEPT. OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION begs to give notice that a new and perfectly original work upon Teetotalism and the Anatomy of Intemperance, will be shortly issued to the public in a popular and cheap form.

The work will be published in weekly numbers at 3d. each, and monthly parts at 1s. The monthly parts will be stitched in a neat wrapper.

Each weekly number will consist of one sheet, demy 8vo., and consequently each monthly part of sixty-four pages. The whole will be complete in about ten sheets, and thus for Half a Crown each purchaser will possess a complete manual of Teetotalism to bind up in one neat volume.

With this Number of "THE TEETOTALER" Journal is given GRATIS the first HALF-SHEET of this new work, as a SPECIMEN. Those who intend to purchase the future numbers or parts, are therefore requested to give immediate orders to all their local Bookellers, Stationers, or News-vendors, to supply the work.

The Work will be disseminated

THE ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE.

OR A KEY TO TEETOTALISM.

BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

It is presented, without remuneration, by this gentleman to the Association, and all its profits will be devoted to the furtherance of the cause of Teetotalism.

A considerable discount will be allowed to parties purchasing this work for gratuitous distribution. Number 1 will be ready on the 31st of August, with the Magazine.

DEPT. OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

17, Aldersgate-street.

W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row, Dublin. S. MACKEN & Co.

DEPT. OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Just published, Price 2d., in a neat Wrapper.

TEMPERANCE LYRICS.

Original Hymns written expressly for the United Temperance Association.

II.

In a few days, in 8vo., Price 3d.

THE FIRST HALF-YEARLY REPORT

Of the United Temperance Association.

III.

All Temperance and Temperance Publications, Periodicals, Pictures, Lectures, and Tracts, may be obtained wholesale and retail at this establishment. Orders from the Country punctually executed. 17, Aldersgate-street, London.

THE CHEAPEST and MOST ELEGANT BOOKS

Ever printed are the

STANDARD ILLUSTRATED WORKS.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON

300 Engravings.

ROBINSON CRUSOE

400 Engravings.

GIL BLAS

300 Engravings.

ASMODEUS

The Devil on Two Sticks, 200 Engravings.

The Paris editions of several standard works have suggested the idea of publishing a series of works in a similar style of elegance. But our continental neighbours, in their unwearied endeavours to produce these gems of literature in a style that proudly challenges comparison with the best efforts of the typographic art, have evaded alone to make them with the reach of a limited and wealthy class of readers. It is reserved for British enterprise and ingenuity to render a series of works, of comparative beauty, accessible by readers of every rank. To effect this no expense or exertion has been spared in the Production of the Illustrated Standard Edition, and the very great success and popularity which has hitherto attended their Publication is the best criterion of their interest and varied merits. When completed the united series of Napoleon, Robinson Crusoe, Gil Blas, and Asmodeus, the Devil on Two Sticks, will contain no less than 1,000 Illustrations, unequalled for beauty of design, artistic skill, and exquisite finish, by the most expensive books hitherto published.

These unparalleled works are issued in Penny Numbers Weekly, and Monthly in parts price Sixpence each, a list of which are constantly on sale, and may be obtained of every Book-seller in the United Kingdom.

Parts now ready

NAPOLEON, I. to XIV. GIL BLAS, I. to VIII.
ROBINSON CRUSOE, I. to XIV. ASMODEUS, I. to V.
London, W. STRANGE, 21 Paternoster Row. H. Hetherington, Strand; Cleave, Berger, Patten, & Co., and Sold by all Book-sellers in town and Country.

Just Published, price 4s. per 100.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

An Address to Members of the Church of England. By the Rev. JOSEPH FRANCIS WITTE, Minister of St. John's Chapel, London Road, Southwark.

Published at the Office of the Church of England Temperance Society, 2 Exeter Hall, Strand, where Subscriptions and Donations on behalf of the Society will be thankfully received.

VAN BUTCHELL ON FISTULA, &c.—Just published, Fourth Edition, in 8vo., cloth boards, price 7s. 6d., enlarged.

FACTS and OBSERVATIONS relative to a successful mode of treating Piles, Fistula, Haemorrhoidal Excrescences, Tumours, and Strictures, without cutting or confinement; illustrated with numerous cases. Being a familiar exposition of the practice of Mr. S. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon-Accoucheur.

This Volume presents to us a number of illustrations of his singular success under circumstances that would have induced despair in any professor of less mastery, or less accustomed to accomplish cures where cures seemed impossible. The statements here made are most convincing, and place beyond doubt the superiority of the treatment to which they refer.—Court Journal.

Published by H. Kesshaw; sold also by the Author, No. 16, Percy-street, Bedford-square.

REGISTRY FOR SOBER SERVANTS.

17, ALDERSGATE-STREET.

Ladies and Gentlemen are respectfully informed that they may hear of Servants of all classes, who are Total Abstemious from Intoxicating Drinks, on application at the above Office, where Servants of all classes may also hear of Situations.

BRADFORD'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.

No. 16, Head of Elvet Bridge, DURHAM.

William Bradford begs most respectfully to inform his friends of Temperance generally, visiting the City that they will find comfortable accommodation at the above Hotel, and on reasonable Terms.

Well-stored Beds and good Stabling.
An ORDINARY every Saturday at 11 o'clock.

UPWARDS OF 40 YEARS ESTABLISHED.

NO. 4, BLOOMSBURY-SQUARE.

Holborn side

OBSERVE—PARLOR WINDOWS—NO SHOP FRONT.

IRISH SHIRTING CLOTH, made without any admixture from pure Flax.—Sold in any quantity. Whole pieces at the Factor's prices, cheaper than any other house, being manufactured from the best material. The purchase money will be returned should any fault appear.

IRISH, ENGLISH, SCOTCH, AND RUSSIA SHEETING of all widths and prices; Household and Table Linen, Welsh and Saxony Flannels. Families furnishing will find it much to their interest to apply to this establishment.

Bank of Ireland Notes taken in payment, or discounted. Country and Town orders punctually attended to by JOHN DONOVAN.—No. 4, BLOOMSBURY-SQ.

N. B. No connection with any other house.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY.

54, CANNON-STREET, Near Wallbrook.

BLACK TEA
The very best Black Tea imported, full-flavored strong rich Pekoe kind 3/6

Black Leaf very Rough Congou, highly recommended 3/0
Strong Black Leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee houses 4/6

GREEN TEA
The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder, a strong rich full-flavored tea, the very best imported 6/0

Fine Hyson country kind, equal to any that can be bought 2/0
Young Hyson strong & recommended 2/0

Best Plantation Coffee 2/0
Fine Mocha Coffee 2/0
Finest Java Coffee 2/0

Best Spanish Chocolate

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT

AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY

DIRECTORS.

Thomas Bax, Bathurst Wythe
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Pountney Lane
Jas. Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell, St. Peter's New Bridge Street
Henry Sturt, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Chancery Lane
T. G. Dutton, Gracechurch Street
Robert Jeffry, Gracechurch Street
Joseph Sturt, Junr, Southwark
Henry Tuckett, South Street

A Pocket Diary for 1840, with Life and A Family Tables, &c. may be had on application at the office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced some few years ago by the Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

London, Strand, West London Bridge, A. A. FRY, Secretary.

ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100

To the Assured, in attaining the Age of 60, 65, 70, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age Next Birth Day.	30	35	40	45
15	2 5 2	2 4 2	1 15 2	1 12 2
16	2 10 4	2 4 4	1 14 2	1 11 2
17	2 15 8	2 5 2	2 0 2	1 10 2
18	2 19 8	2 6 2	2 0 2	1 9 2
19	2 15 8	2 7 2	2 0 2	1 8 2
20	2 15 8	2 10 0	2 4 6	2 0 0
21	3 1 2	2 12 0	2 5 2	2 1 0
22	3 5 2	2 16 2	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 2	2 16 0	2 8 2	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 2	2 10 2	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 2	2 12 4	2 5 0
26	3 13 2	3 5 2	2 16 4	2 6 0
27	3 17 2	3 6 2	2 15 0	2 7 0
28	4 3 2	3 8 4	2 15 2	2 8 0
29	4 8 2	3 12 0	3 0 2	3 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 2	3 2 2	3 11 0
31	4 18 2	3 18 0	3 2 2	3 12 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 2	3 7 0	3 13 0
33	5 10 0	4 6 0	3 10 0	3 17 0
34	5 15 2	4 11 0	3 15 0	3 19 0
35	6 0 2	4 15 6	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 1 0	4 0 2	3 5 0
37	—	5 7 2	4 6 2	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1 0	4 13 2	3 12 0
40	—	6 9 2	4 18 4	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 2	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 2	4 4 0
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 0
45	—	—	6 11 2	4 10 0

SIGHT RESTORED.

NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED.

Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.

THIS is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the Eyes and Head.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vade Mecum.

Dr. Andrews also recommends its use as a preventive. (See his report when in Sunderland, published in the Times, Cheshire Free Journal, and British Traveller, in November, 1831.) He says—"The herbaceous quality of the snuff had such an effect on the stomach, as well as the nerves of the head, from the tenacious sympathy of the membrane of the nose with the nervous system, that Grimstone's Eye Snuff, when taken frequently, must prevent any contagion entering the System, and recommends its universal adoption." Dated 10th Nov., 1831.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield's, Esq., Letter.

THE ECCENTRIC SNUFF-TAKER.

Should trade be dull and times go rough,

Oh! give me then a pinch of snuff.

Give me my box a pinch to take,

Then when I'm pleased, for pleasure's sake.

When fortune's frowns disturb my mind,

And friends appear to grow unkind;

Relief I seek within my box,

My system is quite orthodox.

When a true friend perchance I meet,

I cheerfully his person greet.

A hearty "How d'ye do!" takes place,

When to my snuff-box shows its face.

My multifarious box supplies

A receipt for weaker eyes.

That man must be a silly goose

Who thoughtlessly condemns its use.

If my proboscis could but speak,

'Twould often say the dose repeat.

Each grateful sneeze and titillation

Excites a frequent iteration.

Then here's my glass in which I toast.

Success to that which I love most.

Reader, I pray don't think me vain—

Mark well the hint—'TIS GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, W. H. E. Cooper's Arms, Bristol.

39, Broad-street, Bloomsbury.

Observe this Caution.—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE IN

VENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.

Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of

GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

Mr. A. M. Laffrey, aged 63, No. 5, Silver-street, Golden-square, cured of gutta serena and deafness.

H. Liston, Esq., Marine Library, Ramsgate, Kent, cure of cataract and deafness.

Mrs. Hackitt, cured while at Jamaica of gutta serena, 46 Queen-street, London.

Mr. P. Sanderson, No. 10, Harper-street, Leeds, cured of cataract.

Mr. H. Pluckwell, Tottenham House, Tottenham, Middlesex, cured of ophthalmia.

Miss S. Englefield, Park-street, Windsor, cured of nervous headache.

Marchioness de Broglie Solari, 46, Charlotte-street, hearing and sight restored.

Thomas Blackburn, Far Chesham Surrey, headache, weakness, and dimness of sight cured.

George Smith, Esq., 6, York-place, Kentish town, weakness and dimness of sight cured by its use.—See letter.

Elizabeth Robins, 12, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, aged 65, cured of ophthalmia and deafness.

Cover of a letter sent to Mr. Grimstone, Feb. 10th, 1840.

Sir—Having been afflicted with bad eyes for a long time, a friend who had received benefit from your Eye Snuff, recommended it to me. I have taken the contents of your 1s. 6d. container, and am happy to say my sight has improved, the weakness and dimness is removed, and Sir, it is my wish that you may make this known for the good of the public. Yours,

A York-place, Kentish Town. GEORGE SMITH.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Inventor of Eye Snuff, 39, Broad-street, Bloomsbury, March 1st, 1840.

Sir—I have been afflicted for many years with a severe pain in my head, attended with a dimness of sight and starting spasms in my eyes, for which I have had the best medical advice. Indeed, I have taken large quantities, without receiving any relief, but I am now able to give you with truth that ever since using your valuable Eye Snuff, which I have taken constantly, that is a 2s. 6d. container weekly, I am quite free from these extraordinary pains, and can read the smallest print, although I am in the 60th year of my age. This is my true testimony, and shall be most happy to give it to you or to a respectable enquirer at my residence as under. I remain, with gratitude, Sir, your obedient humble servant,

12, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, Marylebone. E. FOSCO.

This odoriferous Herbaceous Compound of Herbs is sold in containers at 2s. 6d., 1s. 6d., 4s. 6d., 8s., and 15s. 6d., by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists in town and country, by whom Dealers may be supplied. It can be obtained in all the principal towns and cities. A Agent also goes to Shippers, Owners, Contractors, and all vessels of Grimstone's Eye Snuff. This compound Snuff is of great use to all quarters of the globe, and retains its fragrance in every climate. A Snuff and Cigar shipper on the shortest notice.

Proponents of new snappers and pencils are particularly recommended to insert any of Mr. Grimstone's advertisements in their papers, as they will be repaid without any other consideration.

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH. Messrs.

R. MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL

TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty

and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer

to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which

Messrs. M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation; they are fastened without Syringes, Wires, or Ligatures, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication.

DECAYED TEETH, filled up, and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs.

M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Enamel in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Resurfaced Equal to the Finest

Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed.

With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery,

scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Fins-

bury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore-Street.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of the Printer.

Published for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster

Row; and Sold by all Book-sellers in Town and Country.

Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers, Price Ninepence.

London.—J. WILSON, Printer, 35, Red-Cross-Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 11.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"THE TEETOTALER" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association: the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND; or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of TEETOTALISM, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore now made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are solicited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by MR. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer to the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside: MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road: MR. SKRANGER, Publisher, Paternoster-Row: and MR. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

Amount of Subscriptions already received £12. 1s. 6d.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER XII.

NEWGATE.

THE wanderer, amid all the crowded and stirring scenes of this Great Babylon of the West, will find few presenting more gloomy effects to the outward eye, and the moralist none offering more varied or affecting objects to the eye of the spirit, than the prison of Newgate. The death-bed hath known no anguish, and the church-yard witnessed no sorrow, like the anguish and the sorrow that have wandered within those walls. Many a light heart hath passed by the door in the days of innocence, and subsequently been dragged thither as an unwelcome visitor, over the rough places of this world. There hath been quickened in many a breast, the undying worm; and there hath arisen in many an one the ineffable star. Hope hath laid down her treasure, and fear his burden on the threshold of that place; and beneath those lofty roofs have met all the secrets and mingled all the emotions of the human soul!

There is another point of view in which the yards and cells of Newgate are scenes of most mournful interest. Like the church-yard, they are places of separation—their moral atmosphere is heavy with farewells. How many a fond tie has been for ever broken in Newgate: how many bosoms have there throbbed against each other for the last time! How many hands have there exchanged the lingering press which seems afraid to sever, for fear the pulse should cease to beat! How many souls, keenly tried by the rigour of acute misery, have intercommunicated for the last time on the threshold of one of those dungeon-doors, and set forth on those opposite roads, one of which leads through the low, dark, and ominous portal to the scaffold. The golden bowl of Hope has been for ever broken within the walls of Newgate, and the silver chords of affection loosened in its cells: but no monument remains of all the mournful scenes which that prison hath witnessed, save those only which memory hath erected in the lonely hearts that were widowed or orphaned there,—and which love has too often since inscribed with the name and characters of THE DEAD!

It was to Newgate that Victor Melville was conducted, after having been subjected to a long examination before a police-magistrate. The heart of the young man was nearly broken: for the very individual who had led him into crime—the very person who had tempted him with the proposal to relieve his embarrassments by robbery—the very wretch who had primed him with the flames of hell which the ingenuity of man has modified into alcoholic drink,—that very man had appeared in evidence against him! With the cool and calm indifference of innocence, had Mr. Tibbatts stepped forward as the witness against his friend—his young, his inexperienced victim: with all the fluency of truth had he told so plausible a tale to the magistrate, that Melville's guilt was deemed but too evident; and with the most perfect callousness, had this miscreant put upon record that testimony which could not do otherwise than materially accelerate, if not altogether seal, the dreadful fate of the hero of this tale. For how many crimes has Intemperance to answer! Appeal to the widow—the orphan—and the childless,—ask the diseased, the poor, and the criminal,—address yourself to all the loathed inmates of prisons, of mad-cells, of hospitals, and lazar-houses, ask them all, who made them what they are! and one appalling, agonizing, terrific combination of unearthly voices will proclaim the accursed name of Intemperance! Mr. Tibbatts was therefore only one of the agents through whose means this same degraded and degrading vice was indirectly acting.

The reader can easily conceive the nature of the evidence given against Melville upon the occasion of the examination before the police-magistrate: and so conclusive was that evidence considered, that this functionary did not hesitate to commit the prisoner for trial at the approaching assizes. Melville had not offered a word of explanation: in the first place, because the prostration of his mind beneath this accumulated weight of misfortune was such, that all his energies seemed paralyzed, and the powers of utterance were suspended; and in the second place, because he could only escape from the imputation of one horrible crime by confessing to another, and death would have been preferable to the longest existence of dishonour.

Oh! instead of being born in the upper sphere of existence, had this young man only entered upon life in a humble capacity, he might have become a good and useful member of the great human family! Had he been a mountaineer in the wilds of Switzerland, or a mariner beneath the authority of some stern captain, all this misery might have been saved him! In either case he would not have forgotten, as he long had done, the duties of religion; for the religion of the mountaineer and the mariner is impressed by the power of the spectacle which they have ever before their eyes, the eternal dangers which surround them, and the great voices by which Nature speaks on the sea and on the mountain. We, the dwellers in cities, are reached by nothing great: the voice of the world drowns that of God; and, when we would renew our souls in the spirit of poetry, we must seek it amid the waves, those hills of the ocean,—or on the hills, those waves of the earth! There, if we have been born ever so little poetical or religious, (and to be the one is often to be the other,) we feel a chord thrill within our hearts, and a voice singing in our souls; and we know that that chord and that voice were never wanting, but only asleep; that it was the world which weighed on and deadened them; and that the wings of poetry and religion, like those of the eagles, have need of solitude and immensity for their play. Then do we understand the resignation of the mountaineer and the mariner, while the one wanders over his glaciers, and the other over his ocean. The space in which they travel is too mighty for the loss of the beloved one to be felt, in all its intensity, therein:—it is not till he enters his cabin or his hut, that the mourner sees that a mother is wanting, by its fire, between him and his child,—or a child at the table, between him and his wife. Then it is that his eyes, which had been raised in resignation, so long as he could look upon the heaven to which the soul is gone, droop tearfully towards that earth by which the body is for ever swallowed up!

THE BEGGARS' NIGHT-HOUSE, ST. GILES'S.
To illustrate Chap. VIII. No. 7.

So thought Melville when he was left to himself in the dreary cell to which he was conducted in Newgate. In Newgate! Yes—he was in Newgate; and he soon set himself busily to work to anticipate all the horrors of the career which seemed to lay before him. He thought that he should probably leave that prison only twice again. The first time would be to proceed to the solemn tribunal, where he—innocent and guiltless of the dread crime imputed to him—would be condemned by human short-sightedness to a terrible death—death upon the public scaffold. He thought that, while men without would be pursuing their daily avocations as if all were proceeding pleasantly and smoothly with this world's denizens—as if there were not a single soul in existence, which was then tormented with all the agonizing anguish of the damned—as if no call upon tender sympathy at such an hour demanded one look to be averted from the sordid interests of life, towards a suffering fellow-creature,—he thought that at the moment when music would be playing here, people laughing there, and the rulers of the land walking abroad in all the self-complacency of pomp and power,—he thought that while some fond couple was being joined in the bonds of eternal love, or while some father was hailing the birth of his first-born,—while, in a word, millions and millions were supremely happy, and joyous, and gay,—he thought that a sentence of death would be pronounced some morning, while all this was taking place, upon himself. And such a death,—the death of strangulation—the death of apoplexy—the death of a gush of the blood to the brain, the tenderest part of the human body—a death which would almost force the eyes from their sockets—a death which would leave him dangling in the air, while he could not even gratify the natural impulse of holding up his hands to save himself, because those hands would be bound together before, and a cord would connect his arms behind him,—O heavens! such a death as this—for a human being, gifted with the acutest feelings, to die! Death by strangulation,—hanging,—falling by one's own weight,—and then that gush of blood, through millions of bursting veins and arteries, to the head,—oh! the idea was horrible—horrible—most horrible! It made the poor youth pass his hands to his brow, as if to drive that maddening thought from his heated—his burning imagination!

Yes,—the first time that he anticipated to leave his cell, would be, he thought, to hear that dreadful sentence pronounced; and the second time—No—no—he could not suffer his imagination to complete the thought,—he would not entertain so atrocious an idea,—he could not permit himself to believe that the sentiment was true! But, alas—the dread reality must be contemplated—he must look the grim spectre in the face:—even if he shut his eyes, that dreadful goblin was there, before him, substantial and palpable, and circling around his narrow cell.—Oh! there was the horrible thought—a thought that would not abandon him,—the thought, the conviction which he entertained that his second departure from that place would be to pass through a small yard to a cell called the press-room, where his chains would be knocked off, and while a priest was calling upon him to prepare for death,—and that from the press-room he would have to walk slowly and solemnly (a mourner at his own funeral!) through three or four narrow and gloomy passages, every echo of which seemed the warning voice of some one who had traversed those corridors before, and upon the same mission,—and that he would pass through the kitchen, where people would be preparing the food of those who were to die for that day, and for many, many days,—and that all this while the minister of the gospel would be reading the service for the dead, and the bell of Saint Sepulchre's (ominous name!) would be ringing a funeral knell, and that tens of thousands of human beings would be assembled in the street to behold a human being die,—and that he would see the grim paraphernalia of death erected, dark and lowering as the sky might be, at the door which so many pass day after day, and hour by hour, with light hearts! Could he extend the picture, and anticipate all the horrors of the dreaded death—and the chances of eternity! Misfortune and crime had fallen upon that young man, first as a languor which seized upon the soul—then like a malady which drives that soul to insanity,—and lastly they resembled an agony which consumed the heart. He could not even find solace in the remembrance of his love for Louise, because he felt that he was unworthy of so pure a passion as that entertained for him by the amiable girl! Alas, is love then a flame so subtle that at the first violation of its purity, it abandons us and returns to the heavens whence it originally descended? Is not love a religion?—and does it not possess the sweetest consolations? Has it neither revelations, nor laws, nor prophets? Has it not progressed in the heart of man simultaneously with science and with liberty? Is it always placed beneath the sway of a blind destiny, without our being able to discover in ourselves a power of borrowing purity from its own immaculate source? Or must it eternally succumb, devoured by the flames which it has excited: and shall we always transform into a poison, through the means of our own unworthiness, that balm which was the purest and the most divine that has been bestowed upon us in this world?

Melville dared not write to Louise,—what could he tell her? and yet he trembled to remain silent, and conceal from her the real truth of his desperate—his terrible position! Day after day passed—a week rolled away,—and he still lingered in a prostrate condition of the most utter helplessness. He ate his meals mechanically, when they were brought to him; he walked in the yard mechanically, when he was told that he might avail himself of the hours of recreation; and he retired to his couch mechanically when the appointed time arrived. His couch! a miserable thin mattress, stretched upon a narrow wooden frame-work, with one rug to cover him! And then his meals,—a few ounces of meat, with two or three potatoes for his dinner, scarcely enough to satisfy a child, and not more than sufficient to tantalize in a cruel manner the appetite of a healthy and vigorous man. Oh! human nature has reached the extreme of refinement in torturing the victims of a diseased state of society—of savage and brutal laws!

And, during that week, which passed away as if every moment were borne upon wings of lead instead of feathers, one constant idea alone haunted the mind of Melville. If he lay down and buried his face in his bed-clothes, he still saw that idea: if he walked about, the idea followed him; if he stood with his back against a wall, the idea got before him:—and that idea was that he would be doomed to die! When he awoke in the morning of each day of that week, he said to himself, "Oh! what a hideous dream! Thank God, it is but a dream!" and then that momentary impulse passed away—and there stood death in all its dread reality once more!

Oh! if the drunkard only knew what misery dwelt in the mind of this young man, and how deeply he craved, even then, one drop of those fatal liquids which had brought so much anguish upon him,—if the drunkard could but have read the innermost workings of that youth's soul, he would not hesitate for one moment to abjure the terrible habit for ever! He would fly to the only goal of safety—a total abstinence from the baneful cause of such certain and unavoidable ruin!

At length life became a burthen to the young man; and he made up his mind to rid himself of so much misery, and to annihilate the chances of an ignominious end by immediate dissolution. He would not permit himself to think of his Louise,—the remembrance of her charms and her virtues was maddening to him. He gradually accustomed himself to think of suicide more and more calmly; and at length he methodically reflected upon the means of executing his design. Those means were not wanting. There was an old nail in the wall of the court in which he was permitted to walk; and this he secured about his person. Rejoiced at his success at thus discovering the means of destruction so near at hand, he hastened to sharpen the point on the floor of his cell. It was about mid-day, at the expiration of the first week of his incarceration, as he thus employed himself; and, as soon as he had worked the nail into a point, he closed the door of his cell, and prepared to execute his dreadful determination.

He seated himself upon his bed, took off his coat—turned up the shirt-sleeve of his left arm—and then calmly and tranquilly considered the veins, in search of the most suitable one to perforate with the nail. Oh! it was with a horrible—an unnatural coldness of eye and of soul that he thus entered upon the dread work of suicide. That young man, in the bloom of youth, seated upon his miserable couch, and contemplating death face to face, was a frightful proof of the methodical calmness with which the suicide can arm himself, in that which he deems the last hour of a self-curtailed existence!

He selected the vein which he intended to pierce, and he was about to apply the nail to the soft flesh, when precipitate steps in the corridor communicating with his cell, alarmed him. The steps stopped at the door of his dungeon—there was a momentary hesitation—then the door was pulled hastily open, and a female rushed into that dread abode. In a moment Melville was clasped in the arms of that affectionate girl from whom he had only a few moments previously deemed himself about to separate for ever!

"Louise! Louise!" exclaimed the young man, now suddenly recalled to new life: "what angel has sent you hither?"

"Oh! my dearest—dearest Victor!" ejaculated the young maiden, a ray of joy and animation lighting up her countenance: "it was reserved to me—to your own dear Louise—to save you from this horrible place!"

"Alas! no human power can save me, Louise," said the poor youth solemnly.

"Yes—I can save you—and I will!" exclaimed Louise: "I have the proof of your innocence in my possession—a proof which none can controvert!"

As she uttered these words, Mademoiselle Dorvalliers hastily drew a letter from her bosom, and presented it to her lover. Melville tore it open, and greedily perused its contents, his joy and his surprise augmenting with every line. When he had read the whole, he raised his eyes to heaven to express his thanks to his God, and then once more caught the young and lovely messenger of joyous news to his arms.

Oh! let him despise who will, the heart of woman: it is the purest of that clay which was fashioned by the hand of the Deity. Nothing is more sublime than to see the nature of angels ministering, on bended knees, to human power—to see woman converting all her sufferings into a source of happiness—and taking to herself alone the bitter cup which is presented to man! Poor woman! let him, who will, despise your noble heart: if there be a paradise, your place shall be far more joyous than ours: and, if there be a justice in another world, it shall be more indulgent for your frailties than for our backslidings!

(To be continued in our next.)

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. 3.

It was at the opening of the sixteenth century that Ponce de Leon, the old governor of Porto Rico, sailed for the American continent. He was in quest of a land said to contain a marvellous fountain, which by a process mere simple and agreeable than the kettle of Medea, and as infallible as the most renowned of our Kalydons, could chase the riuances of age, wash out the stains of the grand climacteric, and range the cheek of seventy with the delicate bloom of seventeen. The enterprising ancient, hardly in his pursuit of youth, reached a coast to which, either from the pleasing aspect of the country, or the day on which he landed,* he gave the name of Florida. But after bathing in every stream he could find, he returned to Porto Rico without a wrinkle or ache the less, and with considerable doubts of the truth of the story that had enticed him away. He little foresaw—and small space would it have given him if he had—that the tale, however false in a material sense, would one day receive a moral interpretation, which would be accepted as indisputably true: and that millions would believe that this land does really contain a principle of regeneration, in virtue of which the decrepit institutions, customs, maxims, morals, and habits of Europe lose, as soon as they are transported to it, their senility and rust, and from which alone they can hope to recover the freshness and elasticity of youth. There is not a part of the union in which the countries of the old world are not considered as verging to decay: and when an American speaks of them, his language insensibly falls into the strain of an epitaph. All that is vast and valuable in the social and intellectual system of Europe, would, he thinks, soon moulder away, and disappear, if there were no new world to quicken it with a new existence, and give it renovated vigour for a long career: nor is there any thing offensive in this pretension. It has, like many truths and mere errors, that most respectable of all vouchers, the sanction of the past. To say nothing of the migrations of civilization from east to west, what is ancient history but the record of the rise and fall, the infancy, the maturity, and the decay of states—a vast obituary, registering the demise of nations, as well as of systems, and of generations of men! What, in the fate of extinguished states, strikes us more forcibly than the very fact of their extinction? That they should have been what they were is not more surprising than that they should be what they are. It would seem as if in nations, as in individuals, their mortality was a necessary consequence of their existence. When the American, therefore, supposes the past order of things will be the future, and that he sees in the old countries of Europe the gradual operation of that law of extinction which he has observed in the old countries of the world, he is simply yielding to the impressions which history gives. If he errs, it is from overlooking certain elements in the actual constitution of society, which give fixity and permanence to old societies, as they contribute mainly to the rapid progress of such as are new elements, to which we shall have occasion hereafter to advert.

If a more obvious reason were not at hand, we should suspect it was a nervous apprehension of this dreary law that induces the Americans to post date their birth: if we did not know that it proceeds from the vanity of appearing very young, we should suppose it was from a desire to postpone to the greatest possible distance the period of their growing old. Whenever they give you the picture of their country, you will almost invariably find that they choose the commencement of the revolution for its back ground, excluding entirely the long period which stretches back to the beginning of the seventeenth century, and forms the real perspective of their history. Their colonial existence they regard merely as a period of gestation—a fetal state interesting only as the first stage of their physical development; an indifference which is complained of by an American writer, who is surprised that a "book like Mr. Graham's History of the United States till the British Revolution in 1688" should have been published three years, and its merits still remain to be understood in America." Assuredly it is in that long period of their subordination to England, that we must seek for the germs of their national character: it is by consulting their original composition—by detecting the modification of local influences on their intellectual and moral endowments, constantly reinforced and elevated by the increasing civilization of Europe—by analyzing their political and social condition as a colony—that we can arrive at any sound conclusions respecting the causes of their progress and successes as a nation. It is to this attempt we shall in the first place address ourselves.

The cosmetic visit of the good old governor of Porto Rico, though without personal advantage to himself, was so far useful to his country as it enabled her to set up a claim to this portion of the continent for herself, on the ground that Cabot had not advanced so far to the south. But it had no other immediate consequences. It was from another quarter, by no means celebrated for colonial enterprise, and from a cause which was the most fertile source of American civilization, that the first intention of permanent settlement proceeded. A party of French Huguenots, was sent out in 1632, by Coligni, to find a sanctuary in the western forests, far from the brutal persecutions they were exposed to in their native land. They landed at the mouth of a river which afterwards received the name of Albemarle; took possession of the country in the name of Charles the Ninth: and in honour of their sovereign called it Carolina. But in that age, the watchful and envious eye of bigotry or avarice was ever prying about for victims: nor did the little Lorde of pilgrims, nestling in their far asylum, and occupying an almost invisible speck in the vast wilderness around them, long escape its vigilance. An expedition was fitted out from Spain with orders to exterminate them. These orders were cruelly obeyed: but one individual of the Huguenots escaped: the rest perished by the sword, or subsequently in cold blood upon the scaffold, to which was affixed the respectful intimation that they were executed, not as subjects of France, but as followers of Luther. But they were not unavenged; for though, as has been well observed, the projectors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew would willingly admit a distinction so essentially to their taste, the indignation of a private individual, a gallant French nobleman of the name of De Gorgues, was raised to such a pitch, that he sailed for Carolina, overpowered the Spaniards who had taken possession of the settlement, slew some and hanged the rest, with a counter-placard, stating that "they were executed, not as Spaniards, but as murderers and robbers." Thus ended the first attempt at colonization, which we have the rather dwell upon, as in strict connexion with the subject, it affords a curious illustration of the vicissitude to which opinions and systems are exposed; since the very region, on which catholic bigotry had thus early set up its shambles, was destined to furnish an asylum to men of that haughty faith, flying from the oppressive triumph of the very doctrines that had been so cruelly punished by the gibbet and the sword. Nor is the history of these colonies deficient in other, and even disgraceful contrasts, of the same sort.

(To be continued in our next.)

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. III.

THE increase of the vice of intoxication amongst the working classes, has been brought about by the Beer Bill. A workman, when he comes home from work, in passing through the village where there was formerly only one public-house, has now to run the gauntlet through three or four beer-shops, in each of which are fellow-labourers carousing, who urge him to stay and drink with them. Unless he be a staunch Teetotaler, he cannot resist these temptations, which, in fact, have considerable effect. Similar observations apply to the number of gin-shops in town.

The government is in duty bound to adopt some measure to aid the exertions of Teetotalism. A considerable increase in the amount of license duty would diminish the number of the gin-shops; and an increase of the duty on spirits and wine would be a generally corrective measure in respect to the readiness with which intoxicating drinks would be procured.

A good education has a tendency to produce frugal habits. It has been noticed in parishes that the pauper children, to whom a good education is given, get into employment, and rarely become burthensome as adults: whereas those pauper children, to whom a bad education or no education has been given, are continually burthensome, and become drunkards, prostitutes, or thieves.

Abstinence is easier than moderation.

Strong drinks act first on the stomach, then on the nervous system: they bring on diseased action; disorganization of the brain is the consequence; and all the dreadful results of insanity follow.

The publicans are cold-blooded and slow murderers. They mix such dreadfully deleterious drugs with their liquors, that the stoutest constitution eventually sinks beneath the use of them. The Coal-Whippers, in their evidence given to the Committee of the House of Commons, in 1834, distinctly declared that there was one publican in Wapping who had for a long time literally poisoned forty men every year.

Lieutenant Arnold, R.N., opened an office some years ago for the regulation of the employment of the Coal-Whippers. He called upon a ship-owner, who possessed twenty vessels, and solicited him to allow the labourers for the unloading of those ships to be supplied from the office, instead of by the publicans. But, this ship-owner unhesitatingly refused, because he gained a hundred pounds per annum in factoring the ships of certain publicans.

The same Lieutenant Arnold just alluded to, after having been a drunkard for thirty years, became a Teetotaler; and, from experience, declared that sailors require no intoxicating liquor.

A Turkish porter in Constantinople will, upon an average, carry ten hundred weight. All the Turkish porters are nothing but water-drinkers.

In Manchester so small a quantity of gin as one half penny worth is supplied by the publicans. When it is considered that every factory child in Manchester, over and above the amount of his regular wages, has two pence for itself, and that this two-pence remains to be expended by the child in any way it thinks proper, it is manifest that the temptation of having a half penny worth of gin, with the other temptations in its train, will inevitably lead to bad results.

A midwifery case occurred some time ago, in which the application of instruments was necessary: and the practitioner, from the state of intoxication in which he was at the time, applied them so injudiciously and rashly, that he left the poor patient during the rest of her life in a most miserable and hopeless condition.

Many valuable lives have been sacrificed to the drunken habits of medical attendants, who, instead of treating inflammatory attacks and other severe maladies with promptness and decision, encouraged the patient to use ardent spirits as the best remedy which could be applied, for the base purpose of attaining their share of the beverage.

Doctor Robert Gray Dodd, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1834, said that he was acquainted with several clergymen who were filling menial offices in consequence of the ruin entailed upon them by their intemperate habits. He also knew some who had been expelled from their churches, and who were then living in disgrace with their relations or others, on whom they depend.

It is slow murder to give to infants, as soothing potions, gin-toddy, cordials, and other stimulants. Some parents practise the hateful habit of giving their children, even in health, small portions of these stimulant beverages. This conduct leads to glandular diseases, especially in the bowels, and causes great weakness and emaciation.

Amongst the most terrible of the effects of intemperance are destruction of health; disease in every shape and form; premature decrepitude in the old; stunted growth and general debility and decay in the young; loss of life by paroxysms, apoplexies, drownings, burnings, and accidents of various kinds; delirium tremens, &c. of the most awful afflictions of humanity; paralysis, madness, and violent death; destruction of mental capacity and vigour, and extinction of aptitude for learning, as well as of disposition for practising any useful art or industrious occupation; irritation of all the worst passions of the heart,—hatred, anger, and revenge; with a brutalization of disposition that breaks asunder and destroys the most endearing bonds of nature and society. Ardent spirits and malt liquors fill the gaols and prisons, the hulks and convict ships; and the same causes entail upon the nation the sacrifice of a larger portion of blood and treasure than the most destructive wars can occasion.

* The Sunday before Easter, called in Spain Pascua de Flores.

Ardent spirits may be justly denominated poison. They are ranked by writers on medical jurisprudence amongst the narcotic-acid poisons: their deleterious action depends very much on the constitution of the patient, and the amount taken. Even moderate quantities produce dreadful, and frequently fatal effects in the end, by giving rise to other disease and creating a susceptibility to maladies of all kinds.

(To be continued.)

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R. Frost, our Waterford Correspondent, and D. C. L. are sincerely thanked for their kind communications. We should insert the "DIALOGUE BETWEEN A TEETOTALER AND A DRUNKARD" with great pleasure, but it does not correspond with the nature of the papers usually published in THE TEETOTALER. We shall however be glad to hear from our correspondent again.

MR. MINGAY SYDNEY'S TWO letters in our next.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5th, 1840.

WHEN the idea of propelling a balloon through the air, by means of gas, and the design of moving a ship over the water, against wind and tide, by the power of steam, were first made known, each was vested with its adequate share of ridicule. Many people, who have a great objection to all novelties which do not originate with themselves, refused their adherence to these magnificent agencies, and sought to impede, by means of sarcasm and gibe, the action of those mighty wings which, in their power and invisibility, resemble those of the wind. But already are there symptoms that these opponents are growing tired of their fruitless opposition; and, after all that we have lately seen, we do not consider it impossible that science may yet create a rival to the steam ship in the more picturesque person of the Balloon. Never, in a poet's vision, did Iris glide down the slant pathway of the rain-bow with more grace,—never did the wings of the celestial messenger flash in the sun-light with a richer beauty, as he went and came betwixt heaven and earth, in the dreams of the ancient Greek seer, than are displayed to the eye of the gazer from below, in the lines and motion of those silken palaces which carry the children of earth towards the region of the stars—which bear the bold adventurer through the hiding-places of the storm, and give him far glimpses of those blue distant fields of air, which are the shores of heaven, and within whose vast and peaceful solitudes the tempest cannot come.

The invention of steam, and its application to the ships of the sea and the carriages of the land, have annihilated distance. Fire is the secret soul with which man has succeeded in animating and infusing the ponderous frames that link together the corners of the world—the spirit that impels him along the pathways of the opposing tides, that whirls him along the roads he has raised to a proper level on arch and embankment, or that bears him, through the depths of the sky, over the cities and towns of the world!

Yes—all this has science achieved; and the achievement has been wrought out in spite of the ridicule and evil prophecy of unbelievers. The actions of the scientific world may often afford a parallel to the procedure of the moral one; and in the daring and improbable pursuits entered upon by the denizens of the former, may be seen a species of allegorical prototype of some great feat to be successfully performed by the votaries of the latter. The application of steam to the uses of the scientific world was at first deemed a problem and laughed at; and yet all that was promised in respect to it has been fulfilled—and much more. A few years ago the propounders of the doctrine of total abstinence also met with their share of disbelief, sarcasm, gibe, and jeer; and yet all that the first patrons of Teetotalism originally designed, is being rapidly accomplished. Who shall dare assert, then, that the energies of the moral world are more finite than those of the scientific?—or who shall venture to proclaim the impossibility of working out those grand designs which this new class of moral reformers is so enthusiastically preaching?

If you wish to receive ocular evidence of the fulfilment of all the wonders promised by the scientific world, go to our quays or to our sea-ports, and there you will behold the great floating habitations which are moved by steam. Or go to our rail-roads—those vast viaducts which man has built through hill and over valley for miles and miles, and on which the same power of steam impels locomotive vehicles so rapidly that one large town seems to be only a suburb of another, it is reached so soon! Or peruse the work of Mr. Monk Mason, in which this gentleman gives an account of his aerial voyage from London to Weilburg; you will be astonished as you dwell upon those wonderfully picturesque descriptions of the few earthly effects which he was enabled to note, through the darkness, by its artificial illuminations; and you will feel fearfully excited as you read of those voyagers clearing their uncertain and mysterious way, in their frail and pendant boat, through the invisible expanse of an impalpable ocean! Go and see or read all this—of steam-boats, of rail-roads, and of balloons,—and then believe in the achievements of the scientific world.

Well—you satisfy yourself on that head, and now, then, you may turn to the moral world, and there also you shall see proofs of that which we may advance, and of that which we can do. You will see the platforms of Teetotalism crowded by men who, to hundreds and thousands of an attentive audience, are unfolding the results of their own experience. Those men are for the most part the reclaimed drunkards, whom Teetotalism has saved from ruin and degradation,—those men are the living monuments of the efficacy of this doctrine, the successful application of which, a few years ago, was treated as an impossibility and as a chimera. If you require farther proof of the practical truth of this new doctrine, go to the homes of the Teetotalers, and you will find smiling faces, well-garnished tables, and cleanly children: then turn aside to the public streets, and you will find the gin-palaces less crowded—oh! far less crowded, than they lately were. And probably, if you will take the trouble to walk through a few of the streets, you will see some of those gorgeous gin-palaces shut up;—and if you ask the state of the revenue from some political economist, you will find that Teetotalism has diminished it to the tune of some millions per annum:—and if you visit the churches, you will find them better attended; and the clergyman will assure you that Teetotalism has filled those pews:—and the butcher and the baker can testify to the increase of the demand for wholesome provisions:—and the police-magistrate will inform you that the number of cases of intoxication which come within his cognizance, daily diminishes:—and landlords will tell you that they prefer Teetotal tenants, because they do not have to call twice for their rent:—and the tax-gatherers, those everlasting visitors, can safely declare that their calls are made less frequently upon Teetotalers than on those who still frequent the public-houses:—and the circulation of this and other journals embarked in the same cause, can bear evidence to the fact that there are thousands of Teetotal readers.

We could adduce numberless other proofs of the efficacy of the Teetotal doctrines in their application to society: but we shall content ourselves with naming only one,—and that is as conclusive as the existence of steam-packets, rail-roads, and balloons in evidence of the perfection of science: in a word, it will suffice to say, that, at this moment, at a moderate computation, there are five millions of practical Teetotalers in the United Kingdom!

PUBLIC HOUSE "BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES," &c.

BY "THE PRINTER'S DEVIL."

OUR remarks of last week relative to "Free-and-Easies" met with an awful corroboration, on the very day our publication was issued to the public. A young man, named Stewart, after leaving one of these very questionable institutions, had, without any other inducement than a morbid disappointment at not having the means of indulging farther his vicious predilections, committed suicide by throwing himself from one of the bridges into the Thames. We quote part of the evidence adduced at the inquest, from the Times of last Saturday:—

"A friend of the deceased said, he left him at half-past one o'clock on Wednesday morning, at the corner of York-square and Munster-street, in company with two females and a young man named Jordan. He had passed the evening at a FREE-EXPRESS at the White Horse, Cumberland Market, and during the evening had sung three songs of a joyous tendency. Joseph Stewart, the father of the deceased, said he had often reproved his son for stopping out late at nights. He was low-spirited latterly, because he wished to carry himself higher than his means would afford. No one, in his opinion, threw deceased into the water; he must have done so himself, though he never threatened anything of the sort."

We now take up our pen to expose some of the more specious practices of these dens of iniquity. And we would first advise any of our readers who are happily ignorant of the intricate mazes of the subject, of the fact that the utmost ingenuity is exemplified by the interested publican in cloaking the real character of the meetings held at his instigation: for fain would he induce us to suppose that the tavern or alehouse was the fount from whence all those philanthropic streams emanate which so fruitfully irrigate our land. Consequently, we hear him eloquently descending upon the asylums, schools, &c., erected by the Licensed Victuallers, the various Benevolent Societies and Clubs, patronized and carried on by them: the number of Coal Clubs, and Raffles, got up for the relief of destitute characters; and the many subscriptions started by them for the support of unfortunate individuals. To those parties who are deceived by the plausibility of these things, or whose charity is so lax, that they would not refuse to patronize any institutions which effected some good, although a greater amount of evil were the concomitant, we seriously submit the following observations.

A close investigation of the necessary character of the retailers of intoxicating drinks has made us conversant with the fact, which we fearlessly lay before our readers,—that an individual who is constantly compelled to witness those most degrading and humiliating exposures of the frailty of human nature, consequent on drunkenness,—and who is habitually in the habit of encouraging and turning to his own account the indulgence of the most depraved desires of his fellow-creatures, loses all that respect and esteem for humanity in general, which is absolutely necessary for the proper constitution of society: pity for the drunkard's fallen estate dies away into a hardened misanthropic feeling, and the true spirit of philanthropy at last expires: for, if these individuals had but one spark of that pure flame, would they not at once relinquish a traffic which compels them to steel their hearts against all the finer feelings of humanity, and to fill their coffers with "the price of blood?"

Longinus has a sentiment to this effect, that no man, whose occupation is low or grovelling, can ever attain to the sublime, either of discourse or action. And when we look at the daily conduct of the publican—the constant exhibitions of depravity they are almost forced to witness with an approving smile; the low-bred, disgusting, and obscene language that they—their wives, their children, and their servants—are compelled to hear, and which they have not moral courage enough to reprove;—we unhesitatingly assert, that, under the combined influence of these things, they can never attain the finer spirit of philanthropy.

We now proceed to show the reason why they thus pretend to philanthropic feelings: and, at the same time, will investigate the nature of those benevolent societies. The landlord of a public-house is generally patronized by three kinds of customers: the high, the middling, and lower classes. These he endeavours to keep as distinct as possible, in order that there may be no offending of dignity, or clashing of opinions. And, the more effectually to accomplish this object, different apartments are assigned to each. We shall first enumerate these different classes and their peculiarities, as some of our readers may fortunately be unacquainted with the internal machinery of public-houses.

Class I. Retired tradesmen, or the more opulent inhabitants, parish dignitaries, or officials. To these is assigned the use of a little private parlour, which, being nicely furnished with carpets, chairs, &c., is remarkably snug. On these individuals the landlady herself generally waits; and for them a convenient back door, up some adjacent lane, is usually provided.

Class II. Small tradesmen, clerks, and the more respectable, well-dressed citizens. The public parlour is open to this class. Here the landlord waits in propria persona: each one is hailed the more or less familiarly according to the extent of his custom and influence: indeed, familiarity is the test by which they judge of the bonhomie of the landlord and his guests: and practical jokes are generally carried beyond all bounds of decency and order.

Class III. Mechanics and labourers of all grades. These the tap-room welcomes; and there some rough waiter, remarkable for his pugilistic prowess, generally attends, and supplies their potations of gin, beer, &c.

Now each of these classes, but more especially Classes I. and II., are occasionally troubled by certain twitches of an inward tormentor, respecting the moral rectitude of their conduct, in thus flying to a public-house for that which they at any rate could equally as well obtain at home: and the tormentor at the same time insinuates, that it is only the love of company—and that of the worst description—that thus entices them from their own firesides. The publican, being aware of this fact, and knowing that the voice of slander can be stopped, and the conscience healed, by applying the "flatteringunction" of benevolent aims to questionable conduct,—proposes that they should, at the same time they are gratifying their own depraved desires, serve another and a nobler purpose—that of benefitting their fellow-creatures: the one forming a set-off as it were to the other. Thus, mark! an individual of Class I. is requested to become president, and another of the same class is to be secretary, Mr. Landlord being treasurer. A committee is then selected from Class II., and the public are invited to a meeting, to be held at Mr. Publican's house: when, after about a score of rules are proposed, a dozen drinking fines established, they close with a few songs: and, forthwith, their charity ends, by a few poor individuals waiting upon the landlord the next day, where, over the same counter on which the money was spent for pauperising liquors, it is returned by way of charity!

And Class III., hearing occasionally some hard-to-be-digested truths from their wives and children, require also some of this all-healing unction. Consequently rallies, and institutions of a similar description, are established for them exclusively. But here again, as in the other case, the publican is the individual most benefited: for, in return for his unwonted liberality and kindness, a certain portion of the money thus charitably raised, is expended in drink for his peculiar benefit.

Thus we think that it must appear evident, that these institutions cannot possibly possess, from their very nature, the proper elements of philanthropy upon which all benevolent institutions must necessarily be founded.

In conclusion, we are forcibly reminded of a certain anecdote, illustrating our previous statement. A company of players, in a country town, stated on their bills, that the profits of that night's performance would be devoted to the relief of the poor. Their charitable intentions being appreciated by the inhabitants, an overflowing house was obtained. At the conclusion of the entertainment, one of the players addressed the audience as follows:—"Ladies and Gentlemen,—I assure you that the receipts of this night shall be devoted to the object named in our bill. After making considerable inquiries, we find ourselves to be verily the most pauperised and distressed individuals in the town, consequently the whole receipts are ours; and for your charity we return you our sincere thanks."

THE ATROCITIES OF PUBLICANS.

Samuel Scrivener, of the King's-Head Public House, in Great Mitchell-street, St. Luke's, was convicted of adulterating his beer with green vitriol, (otherwise copper,) with sugar, salt, and water. He was also complained of for having in his possession a quantity of colouring matter for the same purpose. When the beer was tested, it turned quite green. Sir John Mortlock declared that this was a most infamous case, and fined the unprincipled landlord in the penalty of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS.

George Kidman, of the Dyers'-Arms, Long-alley; Norton-Folgate, was charged with shamefully adulterating his beer. The defendant acknowledged that he had put with a butt of beer lbs. of sugar, and from 11 to 12 gallons of water. He was fined FIFTY POUNDS.

Thomas Pressland, of the Two-Chairmen, Wardour-street, Soho, was convicted of having adulterated his beer, by putting 2lbs. of sugar and six gallons of water into a puncheon of beer. He was fined FIFTY POUNDS.

Mr. Johnson, of the White-Hart, Theobald's-row, was convicted of having in his stock ten gallons of British Brandy 23 per cent. under proof.

Mr. Bennett, of the White-Lion, Leather-lane, was prosecuted by the Board of Excise for shamefully adulterating his beer, and having in his possession colouring matter, which is used as a substitute for malt and hops.

It is our intention to record all cases of conviction of landlords for adulteration or other infamous proceedings in those vile dens which prove the ruin of so many thousands of our unhappy fellow-countrymen. These publicans, who put poisons into their liquors (and all publicans have recourse to the same atrocious system of adulteration,) are not one step removed from common murderers who suffer at the Old Bailey. Burke, Hare, Williams, and others, assassinated their victims with one blow; but such miscreants as Scrivener, Kidman, Pressland, Johnson, and Bennett, cause the death of thousands by an insidious, slow, but certain poison. We cannot do otherwise than here quote a passage from Deanevan's "Domestic Economy," page 201, which will doubtless open the eyes of many deluded victims to the infamous practices adopted by the publicans:—"It is absolutely trifling to contemplate the list of poisons and drugs with which malt liquors are universally doctored. Opium, henbane, coquina indica, and Polemonium roseum, (which is said to produce a quick and raving intoxication,) supply the place of a cabinet; aloes, cassia, gentian, sweet-scented flag, wormwood, horehound, and bitter oranges, fulfil the duties of bitters; liquorice, treacle, and mucilage of flax seeds stand for attenuated malt sugar. Capsicum, ginger, and cinnamon, or rather cassia-buds, afford to the exhausted drink the pungency of carbonic acid. Burnt flour, sugar, or treacle, communicate a peculiar taste which porter-drinkers generally fancy. Preparations of fish, with oil of vitriol, procure transparency." It will be recollected that the brewers elaborately adulterate the beer before it proceeds to the house of the publican: and that, when it is placed in the publicans' cellars, it undergoes a second and more complete edition of doctoring still. The heating of beer is a mixture of alum and copper, ground to a powder and used to produce a fine froth which is so pleasing to customers. To increase the intoxicating qualities of the beer, tobacco juice and ura rumina are also employed; and to these is superadded extract of poppies. The object of the unprincipled publican is to make two hurts of beer into three, and thus one third of all the beer that is drunk, consists of deleterious drugs and deadly poisons. We shall be obliged to any correspondents who will forward us authenticated statements of convictions for adulteration, specifying the names of the landlords and the public-houses, the locality, the nature of the offence, and the penalty.—[E.]

THE EIGHTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR;

NOW PUBLISHED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

As if the dangers and disasters, which I had encountered in my former voyages, had not sufficiently initiated me into the changes and vicissitudes of this life, I soon became restless after my return to Bagdad at the expiration of my seventh voyage, and determined once more to tempt the dangers of the ocean. I accordingly purchased a vessel, freighted it with the richest commodities of Irak Arabi, and embarked at Basora. I entrusted the command to a captain who was recommended to me by the chief cadi of Basora, who was an old friend of mine: and at the commencement of the voyage fortune seemed to smile upon all my undertakings. We touched at several ports in the Persian Gulf, and either disposed of our merchandise or exchanged it to considerable advantage.

After having been about sixty days at sea, I was one evening sitting upon the deck, drinking of a cooling liquid which we had procured at the last port we had touched at, when I saw that the captain and two or three of the men were engaged in earnest conversation together at a little distance from me. This circumstance would not have troubled me, had I not observed that they frequently glanced towards the place where I was sitting as they discoursed among themselves. Presently the captain came up to me, and said, "Signor Sindbad, it will be useless for you to resist us. I and my men are determined to possess this ship; and we will kill you without mercy if you attempt to oppose our designs." "Alas! signor captain," said I, "you see that I am but one man against so many of you; all I ask of you is to spare my life." The captain then beckoned his men towards him, and ordered them to bind me, which they did. We were at that moment in sight of land, and the pilot declared that it was an island which was supposed to be inhabited only by genii and evil spirits. I trembled exceedingly when I heard this, and even shed tears; but the captain did not heed my grief. On the contrary, he ordered the pilot to steer the vessel as near the land as possible; and when it was about seven or eight yards off from an immense rock, full of fissures and dark caves, he commanded his men to thrust me into the sea. The merciless wretches obeyed their chief, and I was thrown overboard. The ship then put about and was soon out of sight. As for myself, I was carried upon the crest of a mighty billow into the midst of one of the caves of the hideous mountain which formed the coast of the island.

I was stunned by the violence with which I was thrown into the cave; but when I came to myself I found that the force of the waves had broken the cords with which my hands and feet had been bound. I got up, and saw that the water was now much below the level of the cave. I was therefore relieved of any apprehension of being again swept away by the tide. As soon as I had convinced myself of this fact, I lifted up my eyes to heaven, and said, "Almighty Creator of all things, I thank you for this deliverance from the monsters of the ocean." As I was thus praying, I turned my eyes towards the innermost end of the cave, and saw a faint light. Taking this for some guiding beacon sent by heaven, I rose up, and proceeded towards the light, which was caused by an inlet from the cave upon the island. Feeling hungry, I determined upon venturing out of the cave, and accordingly hastened through the passage which formed the inlet. I soon found myself on an island which seemed to be very fertile. On all sides were the most luxuriant vines, covered with delicious grapes, which were the largest I had ever seen. These vines stood in the midst of corn-fields, the grain of which was neatly four feet high. Fruits of all kinds hung upon the boughs of the trees, which formed inviting shades; and all around were seen those luxurious productions of nature. But that which chiefly astonished me, was to observe that there were no flowers on this fertile island, nothing but fruits and grain. I walked on, and, being athirst, plucked some of the grapes and ate them. At that moment a strange voice sounded in my ears and made me tremble. "Who art thou," it said, "who thus eats raw fruits? From what country do you come, that you do not know the laws and regulations of this kingdom?" I turned round and saw a venerable old man, with a long flowing beard, sitting beneath a tree. Two young girls of exquisite beauty and who did not wear veils, were seated one on each side of him; and on a table before him stood flagons and drinking cups. "Venerable old man," said I, "I am a stranger whom a parcel of pirates have thrown ashore on your island, and I am quite ignorant of your laws and customs." "In that case, I shall pardon you," said the old man, "for I am the king of this island." I immediately prostrated myself at the feet of the prince; but he told me to rise, and bade the two ladies do their duty. They each rose, and one poured forth a cup of wine from the silver flagon near her; and the other handed it to me to drink. I tossed off the wine without stopping, and felt it working like boiling oil through my veins. The king asked me to sit down beside him, and I then observed him the more attentively.

He was a man, who was really not more than forty years of age, although he seemed fourscore. His hair was quite white, as was his beard: his eyes were deprived of all lustre, and a deep black circle was traced around them. His lips were remarkably red and fresh; but his hand shook whenever he conveyed his cup to his mouth. When he rose up to walk, his limbs tottered as if he were an old man of ninety. The young ladies who were with him, partook of the wine from time to time, and indulged in a great deal of laughter and light talk, which I considered to be very unbecoming. Their cheeks were very much flushed, and their eyes evidently shone with a lustre that was not natural, and that would not survive very long.

As soon as I had told the king all my history, at which he was mightily pleased, he addressed me as follows: "Sindbad, the pilot of your ship told you very wrong when he said that this island was inhabited by genii and evil spirits. This island is a great and powerful kingdom, and I am its sovereign. It is possible that you have never heard of king Alcohol, because I and my subjects pass our time in pleasure and ease. We know of no other delight than drinking the delicious juices of the fruits which our country produces, and we have no other occupation than the making of our wine." "Potent prince," said I, falling at the king's feet, "I am delighted to find that I have not been cast amidst the enemies of the human race." "Sindbad," answered the king. "It is very lucky that none of my subjects saw you eat the grapes off the tree, or they would have assuredly put you to death. We are so deeply attached to our vines, that I have been compelled to issue an edict which condemns to death all those who devour our grapes in their natural state."

When the king had done speaking, he rose, and clapped his hands together. In a moment the vast grove of fruit-trees and of vines was peopled with soldiers. Warriors sprung from every shade—from every nook—from every recess. The vines appeared to change into swords—the tall trees into spears—the large fruits into helmets—and the thick foliage into banners. In a moment the king was surrounded by his guards: a hundred slaves brought forward a golden throne, studded with diamonds and rubies; and in a few minutes the silent and deserted grove was converted into a crowded court.

The Grand Vizier now came forward and made his report. The king then disposed of several cases of common police nature; and the hundred slaves spread tables for the banquet. The most delicious wines were served up; I had the honour of sitting at the king's right-hand; and he compelled me to drink. Every one present partook so plentifully of the wine, that when a courier rushed lastly into the midst of the crowded grove, no one save myself noticed his anxious countenance, or the disturbed state of his dress. At length general attention was directed towards this courier, who exclaimed in a loud tone, addressing himself to the king, "Rise, O mighty prince, and haste to put yourself at the head of your armies; for your enemy, King Abstinence, is advancing towards your capital city with a mighty army." At this news King Alcohol was vastly troubled; but he nevertheless set off immediately for his capital, which was close at hand, and ordered me to follow him. I found the city to be the most luxurious I had ever seen. There was a vineyard to every house, and all the inhabitants were sitting drinking in the shade. It was only necessary to gaze for one moment around, to see the dreadful effects of that system of dissipation. Murder was committed openly in the public streets; the females were insulted by the men; and even the king himself was not allowed to proceed onwards in peace.

When the king arrived at his palace, he sent to summon his three great generals to his presence; but the first was labouring under the effects of wine at home; the second had been killed in a brawl only a short time before; and the third declared that he would not leave his cups for all the kings of the island.

King Alcohol was accordingly obliged to place himself at the head of the few troops he could muster, and march forth to meet King Abstinence. I determined to follow the fortunes of a prince who had received me so generously, and accompanied him to the war. A dreadful battle was fought in the suburbs of King Alcohol's capital, in which this monarch was completely defeated. His troops, though far more numerous than those of King Abstinence, could not withstand the superior discipline and physical strength of their opponents, and fled in all directions. I was taken prisoner, together with King Alcohol; and we were both conducted into the presence of our victor. I could not help admiring the physical development of King Abstinence. He was in reality sixty years of age, and he did not seem more than thirty. His eyes were bright and benignant; his hair was jetty black—and his frame possessed all the vigour which belongs to youth. "King," said he, when Alcohol was brought into his presence, "what should you have done, had you taken me prisoner?" "I hanged you to the highest tree," answered Alcohol, doggedly. "Then I pardon you," said King Abstinence; and, having made him promise to pay tribute, he sent him back to his capital. As for me, he took me away with him into his own kingdom, which was quite different from that I had just quitted, inasmuch as it was filled with the most useful vegetables and delicious fowls; but totally devoid of the luxuriant vine. When I questioned King Abstinence as to the cause of this phenomenon, he informed me that his kingdom was once as prolific of the vine as that of his neighbour. "And what has caused the disappearance of that generous production of nature?" said I.

"I will tell you," answered the monarch. "My people were so much addicted to wine, that I first issued an edict prohibiting, under the penalty of death, the use of the grape otherwise than in its natural state. But my orders were being perpetually transgressed, and I was at length constrained to exterminate the cause of temptation altogether."

I could not help admiring the striking contrast between the two kingdoms I had visited in so extraordinary a manner. That of King Alcohol was inhabited by people who gave themselves up to feasting and debauchery; while the inhabitants of the realms of King Abstinence were temperate and frugal. Commerce was unknown in the dominions of the former; commerce formed the source of immense wealth in the provinces of the latter. Crime was constantly at work in the first; virtue prevailed in the second. I stayed altogether about a year in the dominions of King Abstinence, and witnessed the downfall of the throne of King Alcohol. The former monarch, dreading the effects of the vicious habits of his neighbours upon his own subjects, sent a few troops into the realms of his enemy, and completely conquered the kingdom. He exterminated the vine from this sub-duel country, and ordered the golden harvests to be cultivated in their stead. As soon as I had remained to witness some of the improvements thus accomplished by King Abstinence, I implored him to let me return to my native land. He took advantage of this request to send a messenger to the Commander of the Faithful, and in a few weeks I once more landed at Balsora, whence I repaired to Bagdad.

OBSERVATIONS ON SIGNING THE PLEDGE.

There is a feeling which indisposes many to enrol themselves as members of Teetotal Associations, because they are required to sign a declaration or pledge. From all that I have observed I can regard this hesitation in no other light than as the result of a too delicate sensibility, which they can neither well define nor offer any solid reason for. Some seem to consider the pledge to be a vow. It is not so. The declaration is merely an expression of present determination, and by an avowal of existing conviction, the public testimony of him who signs, against the evil. As it is a voluntary act, the pledge that is enrolled to-day can be withdrawn to-morrow, and as there is no other implied claim farther than consistency of conduct, who is a member of the Association, this obligation is no longer heavier than it is chosen to be considered so. Again, if we imagine that they as effectively sever the cause by acting on the principle, without giving the pledge, this is a delusion; for such a line of conduct wants some of the essential requisites which constitute the strength of the cause. It requires the public testimony, which forms one of the chief weapons of crusade against the evil. It costs the example of much of that influence which the simple fact of enrolment as a member would give to it. It deprives the Association of the advantages of that union and combination which are found to give strength and success to every cause; for it is a long-established maxim that "union is strength." There are others who consider the fact of signing the pledge to be an impeachment of their principles, by inferring that they cannot keep themselves sober without such an obligation. It implies no such insinuation against those who profess their principles; and the fact that we select the co-operation of temperate men, repels such an insinuation. Many persons possess no such firmness of principle as to steady their minds against the insidious arguments of this deceitful enemy, intoxicating drink. And in the absence of such firmness, is it not well to anchor the mind by obligation, to prevent the waves of temptation from sporting with it? Still, and driving it to the quick sands of destruction. Very few, it is believed, when they would not know of others, and it is in the simple fact that they are members of a constituted body, that the pledge is of safety to us. The pledge furnishes a solid basis, by which they can resist every seduction from the enemy; and it fixes their resolution, and settles in their minds a conviction that they have bound themselves to the practice, and thus it terminates all those hesitations and desires, which would betray them to evil. There is a power in there is a claim, a long member, and these forms the purity of defence to many who possess no higher principles to protect them. J. P.

FUNERAL OF A MEMBER OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Sunday last, the funeral of Mr. John Thompson, a teetotaler, was held. Many of the members of the Association, and of the Tailors' Total Abstinence Society, of which the remains of their departed brother to his last resting-place in the City Burial Burying Ground, Gower Lane.

The funeral procession of about five hundred members, walking two abreast, left West-street, Southfield, and proceeded through Little Britain, Aldersgate-street, Goswell-street, White-street, carrying six of the Society's sick Union Jacks, writhed with grief and the members wearing their medals. We were glad to see numbers of our Roman Catholic brethren join in with us on this occasion; the utmost order and solemnity prevailed, and the crowds of temperate and intemperate who looked on the sad, slow march, must have been impressed with proper feelings as to the effects of our society.

A collection of 55s. was made for the poor widow, who has three children, and is daily expecting her reconciliation; the expenses of the funeral were defrayed by the Tailors' Total Abstinence Society.

A sermon will be preached on the death of the above individual on Sunday next, in the evening, at Aldersgate-street chapel, by the Rev. Mr. COZNER.

REVIEWS.

Bacchus. By RALPH BARNES GRINDROD. Third Thousand. 8vo. pp. 535. London: J. Pasco.

(THIRD NOTICE.)

The chapters upon the moral and physical causes of intemperance exhibit a vast power of research, and provide us with a rich store of information. The great effect produced by this admirable work, is the nudity in which the hideous vice of intemperance is displayed to the imagination. Mr. Grindrod is a Spartan who disgusts his children with the great evil by showing them the extent of its influence upon the inebriate Helots. He writes with a fearless pen; and the boldness with which he sets about his task, is one of the chief recommendations of his book. He does not dread the frowns of a society which he would gladly wean from a vicious habit;—he does not feel intimidated at the sarcasms which are levelled against all the advocates of this just principle, by those who, like the enervated Byzantine emperors in their wars against the powerful Ottomans, would fain cling to the empty shadow of their enjoyments till the very last.

In the chapter on the nature and combination of alcohol, we shall borrow a few paragraphs. It is impossible to do justice to such a work as this in even a dozen critical notices; but we shall nevertheless do all in our power to recommend Bacchus to the perusal of all our readers. Take a few specimens, for instance, of the value of this work:—

The value of the loss of solid matter sustained by the process of malting and brewing is thus estimated:—
100 pounds of good barley taken in its ordinary state of moisture	100 lbs.
1. Loss of matter by the process of malting, &c. 8 per cent.	8
2. Loss sustained by the process of brewing	67
Total loss of nutritious soluble matter on both processes	75 per cent.

The analysis of wines has of late years occupied considerable attention. The following, according to Professor Brande, is the average of spirit contained in some of our most popular vinous, spirituous, and malt compounds:—

Port Wine contains	Alcohol	Proof Spirit
28 per cent.	46 per cent.
Madeira	22 do.	44 do.
Sherry	19 do.	38 do.
Claret	11 do.	22 do.
Champagne	11 do.	22 do.
Cider	7 do.	14 do.
Apple	6 do.	12 do.
Porter	4 do.	8 do.
Small Beer	1 do.	2 do.
Brandy	53.50 do.
Rum	55.08 do.
Gin	51.60 do.
Scotch Whisky	54.52 do.
Irish Whisky	53.90 do.

Mr. Grindrod then observes:—

From these calculations it appears that the proportion of proof spirit in wine averages from one-fourth to one-fifth of the whole; and in other spirits, and in other malt compounds, is rather less than one-seventh, and porter about one-eighth. More than half the quantity of distilled liquors consists of alcohol in its pure state.

The following extract will doubtless prove interesting and instructive:—

By many it has been supposed that alcohol does not exist ready formed in fermented liquors; but that it is generated by the heat used in the process of distillation. The contrary, however, of this view, is manifested from several considerations, and by none more than by the following decisive experiment made by Mr. Brande, and subsequently confirmed by other distinguished philosophers. Add to wine a solution of the subacetate of lead, and the coloring and extractive matter will be precipitated. The further addition of a small portion of dry subacetate of potassa, separates the alcohol from the fluid which floats on the surface, and will ignite on coming in contact with a lighted taper. By this means we decisively determine, that distillation separates merely the alcohol which has been previously evolved by the process of fermentation; its constituent parts being thereby extracted, in their elementary forms, from the saccharine juices of the grain or fruit, and condensed under a new, a potent, and a deleterious form.

For the present we must again take leave of this admirable volume; promising our readers, however, to recur to it, as to a standard authority, in the course of a fortnight or three weeks.

(To be continued.)

A Popular Treatise on the Stomach. By DR. S. PERRENGTON, M. D. P. With Wood Engravings. Second Edition of Ten Thousand. 12mo. pp. 28. London: C. and L. Layton.

The learned author of this little, but very clever work, begins by noticing the class of animals which the philosophers of old could not distinguish from plants. He instances the sponge, which grows perpetually fixed to a rock like a vegetable. It may be cut, or torn, or burned, without showing any sign of feeling. "Can such a thing be called an animal?" asks the author of this work. "Most certainly. Why? Because it has a stomach." In fact, the possession of a stomach is the point which all modern philosophers have argued upon as the characteristic of the animal creation. But it appears that the very lowest class of animals are mere animated stomachs, digestion being the only faculty of their existence, they having neither sense, nor pulse, nor motion. The little pores with which the surface of the sponge is covered, are so many little mouths that constantly imbibe the fluid and the animalcules with which it is so profusely impregnated. The Polyple is another animalcule consisting of very little else than stomach.

The details of the first chapter show us that digestion is essentially performed by two processes; viz. circular action, and chemical or vital action. It is scarcely necessary to inform the advocates of Total Abstinence that the smallest quantity of intoxicating liquor greatly impairs these powers. The effect of strong drink is to absorb these fluids which are alone capable of dissolving the food.

The little work before us is a very useful and well-written treatise upon the stomach. It displays the causes and proper treatment of indigestion, and the peculiar varieties of the malady. The illustrative wood-cuts are of great utility to the pamphlet, and are well executed. On the whole, we strongly recommend this little treatise to our readers. Its price is only sixpence, and it contains much valuable information.

The Mariners' Church Temperance Soldiers' and Sailors' Magazine, Number for August, London: B. Steill.

This very cheap periodical, its price is sixpence; and it contains forty closely printed pages, is as staunch a champion in favour of Teetotalism as those to whom it addresses itself, are firm and well-tried. There is a great variety of matter in this number; and the strictures upon the heartless conduct of Queen Victoria in listening from the sick-bed of her dying aunt, the Princess Augusta, to the Opera, are very just. A person in human life would be hoisted for such behaviour; but a queen can of course "do no wrong." We earnestly recommend this very excellent publication to our readers, and take this opportunity of passing our verdict of decided approval upon it.

REPORT OF THE TOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

STRAITFORD.

On Monday, 17th August, 1840, the members of the Stratford Auxiliary to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, according to announcement, walked in procession to the Forest. They started from Bow, attended by their banners and a band of music, and proceeded through Stratford, West-Ham, and Leyton to the Forest. On their return to the British School at Stratford, upwards of one hundred persons partook of tea together. The public meeting in the evening was crowded to excess, and fifty signatures to the pledge were received.

On Wednesday evening, the 19th instant, the new Temperance Hall, at Plaistow, was opened. The meeting was commenced by singing and prayer. The Rev. W. R. BAKER presided. This gentleman, in the name of the Committee of the Stratford Auxiliary, presented to Mr. SAMUEL CAYTON, of Plaistow, a handsome silver medal bearing a suitable inscription, in token of their grateful sense of his zealous and efficient services since he became a member of the Committee, and particularly his great and successful exertions in procuring subscriptions towards the erection of the building in which they were then assembled. The Rev. W. TEMPLE, Independent minister, of Plaistow, then signed the pledge; and on the next evening his example was followed by his wife and his three eldest children. On Thursday evening the Rev. W. Temple presided, and the crowded assembly was addressed by Mr. GREIG, (Secretary to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society,) in a most energetic and impressive manner. A third meeting was held in the same place on Friday evening, at which Mr. LUDON presided. The Stratford Meetings will be regularly held at the British School, every Tuesday, and at the Temperance Hall, Plaistow, every Thursday, at 7 o'clock.

WESTMINSTER BRANCH OF THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Pursuant to notice, a grand meeting was held at the York Theatre on Wednesday evening, 19th of August, after a numerous and respectable Tea-Meeting at Russell's Temperance Hotel, Broadway.

Mr. WALKDEN having been delayed a few minutes, the chair was occupied during his absence by Mr. JOHN HULL; but just after this gentleman had made a few general observations, Mr. Walkden arrived and was most enthusiastically cheered on taking the chair.

Mr. FILLAKER, who was first called upon to speak, stated in the course of his remarks that he trusted that with regard to moral feeling, the principles of Total Abstinence would increase the morality of the land and spread happiness on all hands.

Mr. WALKER said that he had never felt greater pleasure than he did whilst addressing that audience;—the throwing open such a place for their reception was a matter of delight, and though some said they were doing nothing, he felt convinced they were reaping abundant success in their grand aim—the annihilation of strong drink from the land.

Mr. URMERT (Agent) made some observations on the deleterious influence of strong drink on different classes of society.

Mr. DONALDSON (of the United Temperance Association) expressed his unabated attachment to the cause; adding that what had been done gave a zest to the present movements of Teetotalism, and was an earnest of what it should accomplish.

Mr. G. GREIG (the travelling Secretary to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society) next addressed the meeting. He particularly alluded to the petty and vexatious persecutions to which Teetotalers were sometimes exposed, and said the foulest epithets were heaped on men who dared to raise their voices against the evils of intemperance, and whose operations tended to prevent its future ravages. His heart was warm in the cause, and he could not but express his feelings in language equally as warm.

Mr. BRATT then came forward, and moved that the meeting be adjourned until the 2nd of September.

Too much praise cannot be accorded to the Committee of this Auxiliary, nor to Mr. LESTERBROOK, the Secretary, for the excellence of the general arrangement of the meeting.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, August 26th.

The usual weekly meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, was crowded to excess.

Mr. H. W. WESTON was called to the chair; and informed the meeting that Father Mathew had added another million to the long list of Teetotalers in Ireland within the previous three months. Mr. Weston also observed that Mr. Amor, a wine-merchant in Regent-street, had lately declared in a public police office, that his trade had diminished twenty-five per cent in consequence of the agitation of Teetotalism.

Mr. CHAMP, the Registrar, made a most effectual speech upon the dreadful consequences of intemperance, and explained the effects of alcohol when injected into the veins of animals.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS called the attention of the audience to the crowded state of the prisons, the lunatic-asylums, the workhouses, the hospitals, and the hulks, and declared that the miseries of the victims therein retained or confined were brought about by intemperance. He then related a most remarkable case of spontaneous combustion, which had occurred at Paris about five years ago, and the truth of which, with all the particulars, he had ascertained from the Commissary of Police, and the surgeons who drew up the procès-verbal.

Mr. THOMSON said that he did not advise Teetotalers to abstain from the public-houses. He went to them—but it was for the purpose of making converts to the cause.

Mr. HART addressed the meeting at considerable length upon the nature and effects of the taxation, in its application to the necessities of life and to the use of intoxicating drinks. He detailed the annual amount of the revenues which the government so infamously and disgracefully derives from the encouragement it affords to habits of intemperance; and said that, if it derived great revenues from crime on the one hand, it was put to an immense expense to pay for the means of punishing, adjudicating, and suppressing of vice, on the other.

Mr. GAWTHORP spoke of the loss of time attendant upon habits of intemperance, and energetically called upon all present, who had not signed the pledge, to make haste and ratify that bond of their salvation.

Mr. SMITH concluded the business of the evening in a very neat speech upon the good effects of the system of total abstinence.

Friday, August 28th.

A meeting of the Advocates Committee of the United Temperance Association, took place at Dennis's Coffee-house, Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell. The Advocates sat down to an excellent tea; after which the business of the evening commenced. Mr. BENSTEAD was called to the chair; and all the necessary plans were laid down and adopted for the supply of the various branches and auxiliaries of the United Temperance Association with a sufficient number of Advocates on all occasions of public meetings. Societies requiring the assistance of well-known Advocates, can obtain the same by application to the Secretary of the Advocates' Committee, (Mr. Gawthorp,) at the Depot of the United Temperance Association, 131 Aldersgate-street.

Saturday Evening, August 29th.

The Saturday Evening Meeting took place as usual at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street.

Mr. BENSTEAD had scarcely occupied the chair when a gentleman stepped forward and professed his desire to discuss the merits of Teetotalism. Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, said that he should be most happy to accept the challenge, if the party giving it were respectable and a fit disputant; and the gentleman in question specified his determination of fixing, on Wednesday next, an evening for the debate.

The meeting was addressed by Messieurs Benstead, Mee, Crump (the Registrar,) G. W. M. Reynolds, Green (of Westminster,) and Donaldson.

BETHNAL-GREEN AND SPITALFIELDS BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This excellent branch of the most thriving metropolitan society in existence, held its usual weekly meeting at the Temperance Hall, Church-Road, Bethnal-Green, on Monday evening, August 31st. The Hall was densely crowded.

KENSINGTON AND BAYSWATER BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This branch does honour to the parent society by the enthusiastic endeavours of its Secretary Mr. STALLWOOD, and its principal supporters, Messieurs MEL, BOWLER, &c., to obtain converts. Its cause is progressing well, and the meetings at Camden Chapel, every Monday evening, are well attended.

METROPOLITAN ROMAN CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

This admirable Society, under the auspices of Mr. JOHN GILES, its Secretary, progresses admirably. It holds a grand meeting every Tuesday evening, at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street. Several of the most talented Advocates of the various Associations are always present on those occasions.

WESTMINSTER.

On Monday Evening the 17th inst. the Committee of the Westminster Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Society for the suppression of Intemperance were highly gratified in being able to throw open their New Temperance Hall, for the admission of the Public free of expense.

SOUTHWARK TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

A grand meeting of this independent Society of total abstinents was held on Monday evening, the 31st of August, in the Southwark Academy, Union-street. Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS in the chair, supported by Mr. H. W. WESTON, Secretary to the United Temperance Association. The room was densely crowded with a most respectable audience, which was addressed by a number of most powerful Advocates, with very great effect.

Monday, August 17th, a Meeting was held at Mr. Granger's Coffee House, No. 10, Pearl Crescent, Baginbidge Wells Road, Mr. F. K. in the chair, when Messrs. Baylis, Frave, Yerlet, and Anderson addressed the meeting, and ten signatures were obtained.

LEICESTER.

We feel the greatest delight in acknowledging the receipt of the very kind letter sent us by Mr. SAMUEL BOLD, Secretary to the Total-abstinence Association, at Leicester. This gentleman speaks of the very timely visit of Mr. HUDSON, one of the travelling advocates of the United Temperance Association, to Leicester. This gentleman held two out-door meetings on Sunday, August 23rd, which produced a good effect. On Monday, 24th instant, he delivered a lecture in the Town-hall. Mr. HUDSON, in company with some Teetotal friends, first addressed an immense concourse of persons assembled at the Midland Railway; and this gave publicity to the lecture in the evening, which was numerously and respectfully attended. Mr. HUDSON addressed the meeting for upwards of two hours, in a very animated, humorous, and powerfully convincing manner. He was listened to with great attention, occasionally receiving bursts of applause. A very good impression was made in favour of Teetotalism, and at the close of the meeting several signed the pledge. September 9th will be the Fourth Anniversary of the Leicester Total-abstinence Association, on which occasion the members hope to be favoured with the assistance of the Rev. Mr. Burns, of London.

ADVERTISEMENT.

This Day is Published, containing Sixteen closely printed pages, Price 3d., Number I. of

THE ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE,

OR A KEY TO TEETOTALISM.

BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.

Author of "Pickwick Abroad," "Modern Literature of France," "Alfred de Rosain," "Grace Darling," &c.

This work will be continued in weekly numbers at 3d. and monthly parts (stitched in a beautiful wrapper) at 1s. each until its completion in ten sheets. It is presented by its Author to the United Temperance Association, and all its proceeds will be devoted to the furtherance of the cause of Temperance.

HEADS OF THE CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I. Introductory Observations upon Teetotalism.
CHAPTER II. The Effects of Intemperance.
CHAPTER III. Grand National Effects of Intemperance.
CHAPTER IV. Influence of the laws upon Intemperance.
CHAPTER V. Spontaneous Combustion.
CHAPTER VI. The arguments of the Opponents to Teetotalism with the refutation.

CHAPTER VII. Sketches of the lives of celebrated murderers, highwaymen, &c. whose ignominious ends upon the scaffold have been brought about by Intemperance.

CHAPTER VIII. Wine Merchants, Distillers, Vintners, and Publicans.

CHAPTER IX. A Prophetic View of the probable effects of Teetotalism upon the social, moral, and political condition of nations.—The Monarchy of the Working Classes.

CHAPTER X. Optimism, and the doctrines of Liberty and Necessity, in their application to Teetotalism.

CHAPTER XI. Sketch of a Code of Laws and a system of Government adapted to a community from which Intemperance has been banished.

CHAPTER XII. Adults' and Youths' Teetotal Associations.

CHAPTER XIII. Present condition of Teetotalism.

APPENDICES, NOTES, TABLES.

PUBLISHED AT THE DEPOT OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, 134, Aldersgate Street, London.

And Sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row. Dublin: S. MACHAN & Co. And all Booksellers, News-vendors and Stationers in Town and Country.

DEPOT OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Just published, Price 2d., in a neat Wrapper.

TEMPERANCE LYRICS;

Or original Hymns written expressly for the United Temperance Association.

In a few days, in 8vo., Price 2d.

THE FIRST HALF-YEARLY REPORT

Of the United Temperance Association.

All Temperance and Teetotal Publications, Periodicals, Pictures, Lectures, and Tracts, may be obtained, wholesale and retail, at this establishment. Orders from the Country punctually executed. 134, Aldersgate-street, London.

"A Daniel Come to Judgment;" a reply to Leitch Ritchie's "A Word with Father Mathew." "The Newspapers and Teetotalism."

THE LONDON TEE-TOTAL MAGAZINE for SEPTEMBER, now Publishing, price Sixpence, contains: "A Daniel Come to Judgment"—The Press and Teetotalism, by Matthew P. Haynes—Consistency Triumphant, by a Lady, a member of the Sunderland Temperance Association—A Servant's Confession—Drinking Customs in Debtors' Prisons—An Amusing and Interesting Account of the Grand Teetotal Gala, held in Dyham Park, on the 10th of August, considerably enlarged, with an Engraving of the Park as it appeared on the occasion—and other Literary and Miscellaneous Information.

Sold at the Journal Office, Bull's Head Court, Newgate-street; J. Pascoe, 12, Paternoster Row; and by all Booksellers. Of whom may also be had, in 8 closely printed pages, An Account of the GRAND TEETOTAL GALA, held in Dyham Park with an Engraving. PRICE ONE PENNY.

TEMPERANCE AND INTEMPERANCE.

This Day is published, price 1s. each, or 2s. each coloured.

SIX PLATES exhibiting the PROGRESS and RUINOUS EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE, contrasted with the PLEASURES AND HAPPY CONSEQUENCES OF TEMPERANCE. These Prints are happily conceived, and vividly portray the fatal results of Intemperance, while the happier state of the Temperate Man furnishes a powerful and effective moral.

The set of Six Plates, may be had, 5s. 6d. plain, 10s. 6d. coloured.

London—Dean and Munday, Threadneedle-street; and J. Pascoe, 12, Paternoster-Row.

A New Weekly Publication for Teetotalers!

This Day is Published, Price ONE PENNY, No. I. of

THE COOK;

OR, THE LADIES' KITCHEN DIRECTORY.

EDITED BY A LADY

With Illustrations on WOOD and STEEL.

London: Published by J. FELLOWES, 36, Tottenham Court Road, and may be had of all Booksellers and Vendors of this Publication.

VAN BUTCHELL ON FISTULA, &c.—Just published, Fourth Edition, in 8vo., cloth boards, price 7s. 6d., enlarged.

FACTS AND OBSERVATIONS relative to a successful mode of treating Piles, Fistula, Hæmorrhoidal Excesses, Tumours, and Strictures, without cutting or confinement; illustrated with numerous cases. Being a familiar exposition of the practice of Mr. S. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur.

"This Volume presents to us a number of illustrations of his singular success under circumstances that would have induced despair in any professor of less mastery, or less accustomed to accomplish cures where cures seemed impossible. The statements here made are most convincing, and place beyond doubt the superiority of the treatment to which they refer."—Court Journal.

Published by H. Renshaw; sold also by the Author, No. 16, Percy-street, Bedford square.

DUGALD MURRAY'S WRITING INKS—

The above celebrated Inks, which are made of Black, Red, Blue, and the Blue that turns Black are rapidly superseding most others now in the market. Those persons who may be annoyed by the absence of the requisite qualities in writing Ink, Brilliance of colour, extreme fluidity and permanence, are requested to make trial of Murray's Writing Inks, when they will find that in them they have been attained in perfection. They may be had at every Stationer's, Bookseller's, and News-Vendor's Shop in London, and the Country, and of the sole Proprietor and Manufacturer, Douglas McMillan, 33, Myddleton Street, Clerkenwell, London.

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS.

Thomas Baz, Bishopgate Without
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Pountney Lane
Job Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell Spicer, New Bridge Street
Henry Sterry, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Cheapside
T. G. Darton, Gracechurch Street
Russell Jeffry, Gracechurch Street
Joseph Sterry, Jun., Southwark
Henry Tuckett, South Street

A Pocket Diary for 1840, with Life and Annuity Tables, &c., may be had on application at the office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced, some few years ago, by this Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

Arthur Street, West London Bridge. A. A. FRY, Actuary.

ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100
To the Assured, on attaining the Age of 50, 55, 60, 65, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age next Birth Day.	50	55	60	65
15	2 8 9	2 2 9	1 18 9	1 13 0
16	2 10 9	2 4 6	1 19 9	1 16 0
17	2 12 8	2 6 3	2 0 9	1 17 0
18	2 14 8	2 7 9	2 2 0	1 18 0
19	2 16 8	2 9 3	2 3 3	1 19 0
20	2 18 9	2 11 0	2 4 6	2 0 0
21	3 1 9	2 12 9	2 5 6	2 1 0
22	3 3 9	2 14 6	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 3	2 16 6	2 8 6	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 9	2 10 3	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 0	2 12 4	2 5 0
26	3 15 9	3 3 9	2 14 0	2 6 0
27	3 19 7	3 6 3	2 16 0	2 7 0
28	4 3 9	3 8 9	2 18 2	2 8 6
29	4 8 3	3 12 0	3 0 3	2 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 3	3 2 9	2 11 6
31	4 18 3	3 18 9	3 5 2	2 13 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 6	3 7 9	2 15 0
33	5 10 9	4 6 6	3 10 6	2 17 0
34	5 18 3	4 11 0	3 13 9	2 19 0
35	6 6 3	4 15 6	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 1 0	4 0 9	3 3 6
37	—	5 7 3	4 4 3	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1 6	4 13 9	3 12 0
40	—	6 9 9	4 18 9	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 9	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 3	4 4 0
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 0
45	—	—	6 11 9	4 10 6

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH. Messrs.

MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which Messrs. M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation; they are fastened under Springs, Wires, or Ligatures, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication. DECAYED TEETH filled up and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs. M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Enamel in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Beautified Equal to the Finest Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed. With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery, scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Finsbury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore-Street.

RUSSELL'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.

AND COFFEE ROOMS, BROADWAY, WESTMINSTER. Was opened under the immediate sanction of the Committee and patronage of the Members of the West Branch of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, on Wednesday, 19th of August, 1840.

WILLIAM RUSSELL, in soliciting attention to the above establishment, most respectfully informs his Temperance Friends and the public generally, that it will be his constant aim not only to render it subservient to the general interests of the Temperance cause, but conducive in every possible way to the comfort and convenience of all who may favour him with their support.

Its contiguity to the houses of Parliament, Sessions-house and Abbey is presumed will render it a desirable temporary abode to persons visiting Westminster, for purposes either of recreation or business, and for whose convenience good beds and every necessary accommodation will be afforded.

Refreshments of every sort compatible with true Temperance will be furnished at very moderate charges.

The Reading room will be amply supplied with Temperance literature, periodicals, and newspapers, and form a repository also for the sale of all the societies' publications.

N. R. Conveyances to every part of the kingdom by railway; and steam-boats within five minutes' walk of the hotel.

DR. GARDINER'S WORM MEDICINE, after forty years' unparalleled success, proofs of which may be seen in the vast collection of Worms in the Museum, 71, Long-acre, especially recommends itself to the many thus afflicted, as also parents and guardians, on whom it is an imperative duty to observe those leading symptoms by which worms are generally detected—as irregularity of appetite, itching of the nose and seat, starting in the sleep, grinding of the teeth, dry cough, constant thirst, wasting and general debility, fits, and, if neglected, decline and death.

Prepared (only) and sold by the Doctor's grandson, J. S. GARDINER, as above; also, by EDWARDS, St. Paul's; SANGER, Oxford-street; BARCLAY, Farringdon-street, and most respectable Medicine Vendors, in boxes 2s. 9d. (for children) 4s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and 21s. The Cordial Tincture to be used with the Pills, in bottles, 1s. 1d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

PURE CARBONATE OF SODA, 1d. per oz, 1s. per lb. Tartaric Acid, 2d. oz. 2s. per lb. Tasteless Salts, 1d. per oz. 1s. per lb. N.B.—A tea-spoonful of Tasteless Salts, half a tea-spoonful of the Acid, and the same quantity of Soda put into a tumbler of Water make a Seidlitz Draught, an excellent Aperient Medicine, entirely tasteless. Seidlitz Powders, 8d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s. 6d. Ginger Beer Powders, 5d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s. Lemonade Powders, 5d. per doz. 3 doz. 1s. Soda Water Powders, 4d. per doz. 3 doz. 9d. Each dozen makes six Draughts. At 41, Clerkenwell Green.

REGISTRY FOR SOBER SERVANTS, AND MECHANICS. 134 ALDERSGATE-STREET

Ladies and Gentlemen are respectfully informed that they may hear of Servants of all Classes, who are Total Abstemious from Intoxicating Drinks, on application at the above Office; where Servants of all classes may also hear of Situations.

ROBERT RICHARDS, Manufacturer of SACKS, TARPULINS, TILTS, TENTS, FLAGS, BED SACKINGS, and every article in Rope and Twine, at the Lowest Prices for Ready Money. Country orders promptly executed.

Address, Robert Richards, 4, Grey Coat-street, Westminster.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY.
94, CANNON-STREET, Near Walbrook.

BLACK TEA.	s. d.
The very best Black Tea imported, full-flavoured strong rich Pekoe kind	5 3
Black Leaf wavy Rough Congou, highly recommended	5 0
Strong black leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee-houses	4 8
GREEN TEA.
The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder a strong rich full-flavoured tea, the very best imported	6 6
Fine Hyson cowslip kind equal to any that can be bought	6 0
Young Hyson strongly recommended	6 0
Best Plantation Coffee	2 0
Fine Mocha Coffee	2 4
Finest flaked Cocoa	0 10
Best Spanish Chocolate	1 0

UNDER THE ESPECIAL PATRONAGE OF HIS LATE MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY—

As the following letter received from Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley, Keeper of the Privy Purse, testifies.

"Sir,—I am honoured with the King's command to express his Majesty's sense of your polite attention in sending the two bottles of Essence of Ginger. His Majesty has been pleased to direct me to forward you ten pounds in payment for it—inclosed you will find that amount—I am, Sir, yours obediently, H. WHEATLEY."

St. James's Palace, June 25th, 1835.

To Mr. Decimus Woodhouse.

WOODHOUSE'S ETHEREAL ESSENCE OF GINGER is particularly recommended to all cold phlegmatic, weak and nervous constitutions; it is certain in affording instant relief in Spasms, Cramps, Flatulence, Langour, Hysterics, Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Sensation of Fulness, Pain and Oppression after Meals; also those Pains of the Stomach and Bowels which arise from Gouty Flatulencies; Digestion however much impaired, is restored to its pristine state, by the use of this Essence for a short time, if taken in Tea, Coffee, &c., &c.; it corrects their flatulent tendency; also, this Ethereal Essence warms and invigorates the whole system, and will be found on experience, a happy substitute for those spiritual cordials, which at the moment they seem to revive, are insidiously undermining the very principles of life and health; in short as a domestic remedy, a remedy for the Traveller by sea or land, nothing can be more convenient or efficacious, as a few drops in water, forms a tea of any strength.

The undersigned, and 208 other medical men, have given certificates of their unqualified approbation of the value of the Essence, as also of its superiority over all other similar preparations. Drs. James Johnson, Physician to His Majesty, A. T. Holroyd, S. Ashwell, R. Rowley, A. Middleton, C. Loudon, D. Davies, Surgeon to Her Majesty, J. Pereira, G. Pilcher, F. Salmon, E. Tyrrel, J. H. Curtis, Aurist to His Majesty, C. Millard. In bottles 2s. 6d.; 4s. 6d.; 10s. 6d. and 21s. each.

Also WOODHOUSE'S PATENT CORN PLASTER, for affording instant relief, and eradicating CORNS and BUNIONS without pain or danger. This plaster acts by softening and destroying the Corns or Bunions, and defending the affected parts from the pressure of the shoe. Thus its use is perfectly safe and certain in affording relief in ten minutes, if a cure is not effected: in boxes 1s. 1d., and 2s. 9d. each.

These preparations are prepared only by DECIMUS WOODHOUSE, Operative Chemist Extraordinary to his late Majesty at his Laboratory, 13, Little James-street, Bedford-row, of whom it may be had wholesale, also retail of Hooper, 43, King William-street, London Bridge, T. Butler, 4, Cheapside, Sanger, 150, Oxford-street, and of all Medicine Vendors.

N.B. Be sure to ask for Woodhouse's.

CAUTION. To prevent imposition, be sure to see the name of DECIMUS WOODHOUSE, 18, King William-street London Bridge, is engraved on the Government Stamp, otherwise cannot be Genuine.

DIET—"INGLIS'S DIGESTIVE BREAD"

is extremely easy of digestion, wholesome and nutritious."—Dr. Walker.

"From the excellence of the materials of which it is composed and the healthful stimulus it produces on the intestinal canal, it cannot fail to prove an invaluable article of diet to all classes of persons, especially those engaged in sedentary employment."—Dr. Spilman.

"Ingles, New-street, Covent-garden, makes very good brown bread. It is well for those who live in town, to know where to find it."—See Graham on Diet and Regime.

"Attend to Diet, regulate your stomach, and that will regulate all the rest of the human frame."—Abernethy.

"My family have been in the habit of eating your brown bread for several years past, and I consider it particularly wholesome and nutritious, and superior to any bread of the kind I have as yet partaken of."—George Jewell, M.D.

Upwards of 100 testimonials may be seen at the shop, New-street, Covent-garden.

BABINGTON'S ELIXIR OF RHUBARB.

Too much praise cannot be given to the individual who, having an inclination to drunkenness, joins the Temperance Association, but the difficulty is found great, owing to the weakened state of the stomach; but if the justly celebrated medicine "Babington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken for a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit-drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success on all diseases arising from Indigestion; namely, Bilious Headaches, Diarrhoea, Spasms, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. by J. Kroe, proprietor, 72, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Farringdon street, and all respectable Chemists.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid to the care of the Printer.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country. Monthly Parts stitched in Wrappers, Price Ninepence.

London—J. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross Street.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I., No. 12.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DINNER PARTY.
To illustrate Chapter VII. (No. 5.)

TIBBATS AND MELVILLE DISCOVERING THE DEAD BODY.
To illustrate Chapter X. (No. 9.)

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

CHAPTER XIII.

VICTOR AND LOUISE.

Who can explain the full extent of the rapture experienced by the lovers at this meeting? The place and the occasion were for some time forgotten; and their thoughts and their language dwelt only upon the conviction that they were once more restored to each other.

Melville clasped the beautiful girl in his arms, and gazed upon her heavenly countenance with the most unfeigned delight. Her voice, in its language of love, was so soft and intoxicating that the tones of the young lover also imbibed somewhat of that impassioned and dulcet accent. When she breathed those delicious words, "I love thee still," it almost seemed that she raised around her a marvellous echo: everything about her was agitated by her love; the air vibrated with the sweet avowal; and then she spoke of her fond hope of recovering that tranquillity of mind which she had lately lost, and of passing the remainder of her days in joyousness and peace.

Then, as if she had said too much, she bashfully bent her eyes towards the earth—she wiped away her tears—and concealed her countenance with her hands. Then she suddenly raised her eyes upwards—those eyes that were drowned in a sorrowful reflection! Her mouth, which was half open in consequence of a rapidly flowing respiration, revealed teeth as white as the pearls of the East; and then she turned upon her lover that look which had ere now been lost in the space above; and when she saw that she was admired by him, she concealed that look beneath her long lashes. But before she thus concealed that look, she darted upon the youth whom she so tenderly loved one of those lightning glances which the eyes of the purest passion can shoot forth, and which burn to such an extent that they compel him on whom such a glance falls, to apply his hand to his heart as if a red-hot iron had penetrated into it. Oh! when the most chaste and innocent of women love with fervour, and love with all the impassioned warmth of their young and virgin hearts, and when circumstances have divested their interview with the object of their affection of all the chilling restrictions of ceremony, as in the case of Victor and Louise,—oh! then, in that hour of mingling hearts and unity of feelings, the young maiden casts upon her lover that fascinating look with which hell or heaven has endowed her—that look which seizes upon and retains him as it were in strong chains—that look which penetrates to the heart and seems to pierce the vitals—a look which even makes the young lover tremble and be afraid, which imparts to him a sensation as if he were about to become mad, and which almost compels him to fall at the feet of the fascinating girl and implore her pardon for loving her so sincerely and so well!

There is one period of our lives—a period that forms a delicious episode in the existence of all—which makes a heaven of earth, and which recompenses us for a world of prior and posterior misery,—and that period is the one in which we experience the blessings of a pure and holy passion. Melville cast his eyes upon the lovely girl that had now fallen upon her knees before him, while her long and luxuriant tresses fell in rich clusters over her white shoulders: he was trembling and humiliated as he remembered her spotless innocence and his own unworthiness; and he could scarcely induce himself to believe that such an assemblage of charms could be in aught associated with the evil career of his own destinies. But that beautiful girl, who seemed so far separated from him, by reason of his vices, that nothing in the world could ever lessen the distance,—that beautiful girl was there—there, at his feet! Long did Victor contemplate Louise! He was afraid to speak to her;—for the first time he felt that his hand was too rude to extend to a female so delicately beautiful;—for the first time he would have wished to soften that voice which spoke so boldly;—he was afraid of wounding her, in touching or consoling her; and when, at length made aware by the motionless attitude of Louise, and by the silence which reigned throughout the cell, that the affectionate girl was awaiting a promise which should confirm all her hopes of happiness, he exercised a violent effort over himself, in order to articulate these few words,—“Oh! Louise, henceforth, indeed—indeed I will be worthy of you!”

“Then am I now rewarded for all the anxiety I have undergone on your account and on mine own,” answered Louise. “Oh! often and often has that rose-leaf, which I received from your hands in the little summer-house at Auteuil been my only consolation. And then, when the spirit of my more than father took wing, had it not been for this emblem of your affection, Victor, I know not how I should have supported such a weight of sorrow.”

“And often and often—even in the midst of my dissipation,” murmured Victor, “have I thought of the rose-leaf which had been pressed to your lips, and which I have religiously preserved. But, tell me, my Louise—tell me that you still love me, and we shall yet be happy."

"Love you, Victor!" ejaculated the amiable girl: "oh! you know not how agonized were my feelings when I read the account of the suspicion that had been raised against you, in the French journals; and I hastened, ill and miserable as I was, to the office of one of those journals in Paris, to ascertain if the account had not been incorrectly translated from the London papers. But the arrival of that letter—and the fact of your having lodged in the same house where the dread deed took place, convinced me that the tale was indeed too true, and that the suspicion of your guilt was naturally excited by the singularity of the circumstances. I therefore determined to hasten to your assistance without delay, and prove the innocence of him I love!"

Not for worlds would Melville have confessed to one so pure and innocent, that the real motive which had taken him, on the fatal night, to the room where the dreadful deed had been committed, was a criminal one, and that he was bent upon a guilty errand when he became involved in the circumstances which had almost proved his ruin. He was compelled to have recourse to a falsehood; and he explained the fact of his being present in the room of death, by stating that a strange noise in that part of the house had attracted him thither.

It was with a sentiment of mingled pride and joy, that Melville sent for the solicitor, whom he had already engaged to conduct his case, and showed him the letter which had been placed in his hands by Mademoiselle Dorvalliers: and as the curiosity of the reader is doubtless excited with respect to this epistle, we shall now proceed to lay it before him:—

"To Mademoiselle Louise Dorvalliers:

"In the sincere hope, most injured girl, that this letter will reach you and remedy, although so late, the great evil which I have done to you, do I hasten to make all the reparation that lies in my power. I have injured—deeply injured you: I have played the part of a heartless villain: but I hope that you will pardon me, for my sufferings have been great indeed. I have not experienced one hour of perfect peace since the fatal day on which I accomplished the diabolic thought that was suggested to my mind by the great temptation placed in my way. I was a gambler; and one evening my losses were so severe that ruin and disaster stared me in the face. I had not the moral courage to triumph over the evil promptings of Satan: I remembered the gold which was entrusted to my care for you; and I determined to appropriate it to my own use. Your kind guardian has doubtless told you the sad tale: I fled with all your fortune—the fortune which had been entrusted to me,—and I left you portionless!"

"Eleven years have now elapsed since that fatal day—eleven years of misery and woe—eleven years of remorse and horror. Often, often have I been about to write to you—to restore your fortune—to confess all my infamy—and to demand your pardon. But shame and fear have always prevented me; and these feelings have triumphed over my good resolution until this moment. I can now support the load of my infamy no longer,—I can bear up against the tide of compunction no more,—I feel that I am going mad—that remorse has robbed me of my intellects,—and I must hasten to do an act of justice ere it be too late. My mind is made up to leave this world of woe,—my misery shall terminate in the blood of a suicide, sooner than be closed amidst the ravings of a maniac!"

"I have sought a humble and obscure abode in which to execute my purpose; and if I make up my mind to live a day or two more or less, my resolution will eventually lead me to the same end. The precise moment only is not as yet settled. Perhaps by the time you receive this I shall be no more. There are instants in which my mind is seized with such an access of raging delirium—the association of a dread remorse—that in one of those whirlwinds of passion my fatal purpose will be doubtless accomplished.

"I make you a full though a tardy reparation; and you will be happier in my death than you have been in my life-time. I enclose you the necessary documents to receive all the fortune of which I robbed you, at the hands of my agents in Paris, to whom I have transferred the whole amount, with compound interest up to the present moment. I have also made a will in your favour, leaving to you the residue of my property. That testamentary document will be found in my desk after my decease. In the same envelope with it is a formal disposal of the order upon the Bank of France which transferred the amount of your fortune to my care: that order is signed by your own father; and consequently the secret of your birth, in respect to him, will be thereby revealed. Your mother was a lady of rank, whose name I never knew. The history of this parent, then, will most probably remain a secret to you for ever.

"And now, Louise—pardon me:—pardon the wretch who has so deeply wronged you,—pardon him in consequence of this ample though tardy reparation; and breathe a prayer for the welfare of his soul—for a prayer from your lips must avail on high—when you hear of the self-destruction of

"JEAN MEZERAY."

The solicitor was overjoyed when he perused this letter, which contained so certain an evidence of Victor's innocence. The statement contained in the document relative to the intention of the unfortunate Mezeray to end his days by suicide, was also borne out by the nature of the wound, the position of the body, and the manner in which the razor had fallen from the hand of the self-murderer. These circumstances, without the letter, would have however been overruled by the idea that Victor had purposely made arrangements suitable to those appearances; but the solicitor now declared that the epistle from Mezeray to Mademoiselle Dorvalliers would prove conclusive. The only draw-back to the happiness of the young couple was that Melville would have to remain in prison to await his approaching trial; but it immediately occurred to him that Louise would experience a welcome reception at the house of Mrs. Terrywhist, now that his innocence was certain to be made manifest. He was not disappointed: that kind-hearted lady received the unprotected young girl with the utmost cordiality; and the solicitor hastened to take the necessary steps to procure the papers from the desk of the deceased Notary, which would put Louise in possession of the property left by that gentleman and also reveal the secret of her birth. She had ascertained, previous to her departure from Paris, that her fortune, which, through the exertions of the deceased Notary, had been more than doubled, and which now exceeded a million of francs,* had really been transferred to a highly-respectable banking establishment in the French metropolis; and thus no pecuniary embarrassments seemed to menace the future happiness of the lovers.

Louise, accompanied by Mrs. Terrywhist, paid frequent visits to Melville in the gloomy prison where he still remained; and as the young man frequently alluded to the dissipation in which he had indulged during his residence in London, he reiterated his often repeated promise to Louise to abstain for ever from the fatal habit of intemperance. Alas! temporary misfortunes frequently extort from frail humanity a vow of perfect reformation: but time in many cases demonstrates the falsity of all earthly resolutions!

Time passed away, and at length Victor was placed upon his trial. Ignominious as was the ordeal through which he had to pass, he knew that he should prove his innocence of the crime of murder; and this conviction strengthened him to submit to the degradation of a public trial. The result was in accordance with his own sanguine hopes; he was honourably acquitted; and, as the real motive for which he had proceeded to the apartment where the suicide took place, did not transpire, the judge assured him that he left that court without the slightest imputation against his character.

At the door of the tribunal from which he had just been released, he encountered Mr. Tibbatts, who came forward to congratulate him upon his escape. Victor surveyed him with the most unmitigated disgust, and repulsed with scorn the proffered hand of him whom he considered to be the cause of all his late misfortunes. Tibbatts gnashed his teeth with rage, and turned away, muttering threats of the most deadly vengeance. But Melville heard them not: for his Louise and her kind friends were waiting in a carriage hard by, to bear him far away from the dread vicinity of the gaol.

What now appeared to stand as an obstacle in the way of the happiness of Victor and Louise? The young maiden was wealthy beyond all her previous hopes and expectations,—and her lover was restored to her. On his part, he flattered himself that he was entirely weaned from a habit which had menaced him with the most certain ruin; and he resolved to take advantage of the opportunities now afforded him by fortune, to carve out for himself a grand career in the world of literature. Everything, therefore, seemed smiling in the presence of Melville and Louise; and the cares of the past were all forgotten in the real joys of the present.

Louise continued to reside with the family of Mr. Terrywhist; and Melville anxiously awaited the expiration of the year's mourning which this amiable girl had imposed upon herself for the loss of her kind guardian. But in the meantime a grand and important revelation was made to the young lady and her lover. The solicitor, who had been assiduously occupied in the investigation and arrangement of the affairs of Mademoiselle Dorvalliers, procured the documents, which related to her, from the desk of the late Monsieur Mezeray. As that gentleman had seemed to promise in his letter to Louise, he had left her the heiress to a considerable private fortune of his own—a fortune which he had amassed by the prudent usage of her own money, with which he had eloped from Paris. But the other document, to which allusion had been made in the last letter of the suicide, was of the greatest importance. It revealed the cause of all the mystery which had been observed in respect to the early days of Louise,—the liberal income that had been allowed Captain Dorvalliers for her maintenance,—the reason wherefore a handsome fortune was portioned to her just after the fatal battle of Waterloo,—and the secrecy which had been observed up to that period relative to the young foundling. The whole family of Mr. Terrywhist was assembled around the table, when the solicitor displayed this document to the astonished eyes of Louise and her lover; for that document, which was explanatory of an order previously given upon the Bank of France, bore the signature of the greatest man that ever shed the lustre of intellect and capacity upon this world: close by that signature there was a large seal,—and on the seal was an imperial crown!

* Forty thousand pounds.

"Napoleon Bonaparte was your father, Louise," said Victor in a voice almost choked by the ineffable emotions caused by this strange discovery: "Oh! how proud should I be to possess the affections of the daughter of that mighty hero!"

Louise turned aside, and shed many—many tears: but those tears fell rather for the memory of an unknown mother, than as a tribute of filial love to that of an imperial sire!

Months passed away: Victor, who had taken a house in the neighbourhood of Terry-whist Terrace, passed nearly all his time with Louise; and during the year which intervened between his accusation of the crime of murder and his union with Mademoiselle Dorvalliers, he never once demonstrated any symptoms of the return of the vicious propensity of intemperance. He accordingly felicitated himself upon having entirely abrogated that ruinous predilection; and Louise soon ceased to remember that he had ever been its victim. But let not the mariner who has escaped shipwreck upon a coil of rocks, imagine that all the dangers of the ocean are passed: the perils of a lee-shore or of an adjacent quicksand may probably prove more fatal than the point of destruction which the buoyant bark has just eluded.

The year of Louise's mourning expired; and the day of the bridal dawned. We shall not however dwell upon this happy period in the lives of our hero and heroine: suffice it to say that their union was blessed by the minister of heaven; that many friends attended at the solemn ceremony; that they removed to a dwelling at the West End of London, where their fortune and the loveliness of Louise soon suppressed the whispers of scandal in respect to the misfortunes of Victor, and where every luxury and enjoyment which wealth could purchase awaited them:—and here let us pause for the present ere we pursue the narrative of the DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

END OF THE FIRST PERIOD.

Chapter I. of the "Second Period" will be commenced in our next.

THE NEWSPAPERS AND TEETOTALISM.

BY MATTHEW P. HAYNES.

Adapted from the Teetotal Magazine for September.

In the consideration of great movements, men are too prone to form an opinion of their progress and merit by the details given, or by the course pursued by the newspaper press. The rule is a fallacious one. The press seldom rushes in medias res, and if its impulses to conduct are carefully and justly anatomized, it will be found rather to follow public opinion than to lead it. The influence of the press, as affecting any particular cause, is the child rather than the parent of the public feeling towards it.

At present, the English press does not speak the sentiments nor mirror forth the convictions of millions respecting the total abstinence cause. In fact, those who are engaged in that great moral reformation, have hitherto had but little support from the journalists. By many of them, and those the most influential, the strongest opposition has been offered: some have pursued a kind of neutral course—they have briefly recorded the proceedings of the teetotalers, but have refrained from advocating their principles; and a few, variis modis in gurgite vasto, have assisted the cause by their advocacy and their example.

Months passed away before the "best possible instructors" even noticed the existence of teetotalism. It was not until numerous societies had been formed throughout the length and breadth of the land, that the editors found themselves compelled to break their mysterious silence.

This tardiness to embrace a new subject is one of the characteristics of the press of England, and it is, at the same time, a reproach to it. Need we adduce instances of the reluctance to which we allude? We have only to refer to the history of every great public question: there is scarcely one, whether political or scientific, which did not at first experience from the press indifference, if not opposition. There is scarcely any great invention which now administers to our commercial greatness, or contributes to our comfort, that the press has not ridiculed, and affected to despise. Not many years ago, the inventions of WATT, in relation to the steam-engine, were sneered at. The engines upon NEWCOMEN'S construction were written up, and persevering efforts were made to write WATT down. Who that looks upon the Thames and sees the fleets of steam craft plying, would believe, if it were not placed beyond the possibility of a doubt, that one of the most scientific men in the empire, and over whose moral character a heavy cloud has recently, unhappily, been spread: who would believe that this Rev. Doctor, whose connexions with the press are widely ramified—who would believe that he for a long time devoted his ability to proving that steam-vessels were unsafe, and that it would be perfect insanity to venture upon the water in a boat propelled by steam! Not long ago, MR. WINNER narrowly escaped being made the subject of an inquest de lunatico, for proposing to light London with gas! When he lectured upon the subject at the Lyceum theatre, he was considered, by the newspapers, somewhat in the same light as Captain ACHERLEY of the present day, with his mystic "dial of Ahaa." Again, when the great discovery of JENNER was first promulgated, it was met with derision and scorn. The newspaper Solons actually declaimed against the cruelty, the folly, and the sin of adding another disease to those with which mankind were already afflicted. In their wisdom they considered vaccination as a species of morbid transmigration of an afflicting principle from cows to human beings, which could not fail to injure the latter, and which must be highly offensive to Almighty God, whose laws it was calculated to contravene. These instances of the fallibility and of the shortsightedness, if not of the folly of Editors, might be multiplied to fill a volume: but enough has been said to show, that the great unknown "W.K."-gotists of the newspaper press, have not an indisputable claim to be considered right in all that they advance concerning any new movement which is made in society, or any new principle which may be propounded in science.

The English are, what the Irish call, "an easy going people." They like novelty, but they are not gluttons at it. We do not adopt novelties merely because they are so—we "try before we buy;" and every day's observation shows, that there are always fools enough to try experiments upon novelties, which wiser men can quietly watch. To the credit of the character of the English people, scarcely ever is a novelty adopted and retained in use, unless it is beneficial and useful. Englishmen are particularly adverse to any inroad upon their old habits. The custom of English society, and even the tendency of English education, is to impress an Englishman with the idea that drinking is one of his chief social duties. Foreigners say we can do nothing without eating. They are right; and we all know what bouts of drinking follow. The opening of a bridge, or the closing of a grave—the erection of a jail, or the consecration of a church—the marriage of a queen, or the trial of a criminal—in fact, every public duty and every private obligation, is considered to be imperfectly discharged, unless an extensive dinner is devoured—and it is absolutely necessary that the wine-merchant or the tavern-keeper should share the patronage shed upon the cook. These eating and drinking habits have caused immense sums of money to be embarked in the wine and spirit, the ale and porter trade. The "licensed victuallers," as a body, yield not in wealth to scarcely any other class of traders. They are well organized—they get money easily, and they spend it freely—they uphold some valuable charities, and they take care to tell the world of it—whilst not a word is said by them as to the social ruin, the individual woe, and the social calamities which the articles in which they deal occasion.—That ruin, that woe, and those calamities, are the origin of those charities of which they so ostentatiously boast.

We have now chiefly to notice that immense wealth is embarked in the publicans' trade. Look at the brewers and distillers—count the men and horses they employ: they have travellers to buy corn: clerks to keep the books: clerks to collect the accounts: agents to take houses and to sell them: they have brewers, smiths, engineers, coopers, wheelwrights, porters, draymen, and gangs of excisemen and permit writers, who in a great degree owe their employment to them. The property in the breweries, vast as it is, is held in shares, by many individuals. There are many more brewers than is generally imagined: no adequate idea is entertained of the number of those, and many of them are termed "pious," and "religious" people, who live upon annuities and profits drawn from some or other of the great fountains of liquid death. The consequence of the brewing and distilling trade, in all its branches, from the malt-kiln to the pewter quartern, having thus insinuated itself into the monetary construction of our complicated commercial relations—is, that a great opposition will naturally be raised to any project which tends to limit or affect that trade. This opposition is the more formidable and determined, because it is purely selfish. The brewers and distillers can flourish only on the prosperity of the tavern and the gin-shop: these can gain prosperity only on the drinking habits of the people,—and hence, as a matter of course, of business and of personal advantage they are the opponents of teetotalism.

We have briefly adverted to the drinking habits of Englishmen, and to the force of those habits. We may add that our national songs have been written to stimulate them. To the force of these habits the power of wealth has been superadded. Avarice and appetite are thus both leagued together against teetotalism: and it is unfortunately the case, that too many of the newspapers pander to the popular prejudices, because it procures them readers; and to wealth, because it provides them with purchasers and patrons.

Nor is this all. In many cases the practices of the conductors of the press are in direct opposition to the theory of total abstinence. We make no invidious allegations: and we are well aware that though in its generalization the remark is just, there are still some exceptions. However, taking editors as a body, and coupling with them the reporters, they are a class who render most liberal suit and service to the "jolly god." Their temptations are certainly great; wit and genius, a similarity of pursuit, late hours and much labour, all combine to render them readily susceptible of the charms of wine, and prompt them, in the state of constant excitement to which their profession exposes them, to attempt to drown in the bowl whatever of care or pain may oppress them.

To a portion of the press, political considerations suggest an opposition, if not to teetotalism, at least to teetotalers, and particularly in Ireland. Long and severely has that country suffered from political vicissitudes: they have made her bleed at every pore,—they have left her exhausted by the road-side—and now that the handmaid of sobriety is binding up her wounds, let not party feeling interrupt the work of compassion.

There are great excuses, though not sufficient ones, for the newspaper-press, for the manner in which it owes to influence, feeling, and wealth. In the first place, fashion is every thing. Secondly, newspapers are merely matters of commercial speculation; and the editors consider it their duty to serve their employers in the best way they can. There scarcely ever was a newspaper conducted solely with a view to principle. The sum of money required for the establishment of a newspaper is very great. Twenty or thirty thousand pounds have been spent upon ably conducted papers, which have, notwithstanding, failed. But when a newspaper is firmly established, the income derived from it is considerable. It is, however, a property held by an insecure tenure. It depends upon the public support; that support is gained with difficulty, and is easily lost. Hence,—the newspapers,—upon the very principle of self-preservation, are reluctant to engage in the advocacy of any great new movement against which the prejudices of the country, the habits of the people, or the interests of a numerous and wealthy class are arrayed.

These reflections will probably afford some clue to the better understanding of the course which the newspaper press has adopted as regards the teetotal cause. The reader will probably now see the force of the remark, that "the press will follow public opinion rather than lead it." It opposes what is opposed generally. When the public hesitate, the press seldom takes upon itself to decide: it changes as the public change; made to be popular, because popularity is that upon which it lives. A teetotal people will find among them a teetotal press,—and the fact that the English newspaper press which was so long silent upon teetotalism, now occupies itself so largely with the subject—is the most conclusive proof of the importance which the cause is daily attaching to itself.

We may intimate that we shall, in future papers, present our readers with some curious details as to the newspaper press. The Era and the Britannia will merit special notice. The former of these has recently changed its editor. The gentleman originally entrusted with its management, was Mr. LEITCH RITCHIE, a pretty romancer, and an amiable albumist. He soon found himself quite out of his place, when through Lord Brougham's interest with MEXX AND CO., he found himself in the unpoetical position of recommending gin and defending XXX. His attempts thereat were mere "half-and-half," and the editorship passed into other hands. Of this, more anon.

Determined again to try his hand, Mr. RITCHIE has made his re-appearance as an antiteetotal writer, in a paper called the COURT JOURNAL.—He is certainly better calculated to adorn the boudoir, than to amuse a tap-room; but he is so determined to write prettily, that he cares not to write truly. His language is not free from profanity, and, as it will hereafter be our province to prove, his pretensions to philosophy are only thin disguises thrown over ignorance; whilst his precipitate and self-sufficient conclusions are as baseless as the ill crutched positions from which he affects to draw them, are insecure.

In the meantime, violent in its opposition, or negligent of its duties as the press may be, as regards teetotalism, there is no ground for despair. Upheld by a higher power than any human hand,—supported by stronger claims than those with which any eloquence can invest it—teetotalism is making a glorious and triumphant progress.—London is now lighted with gas in spite of the invectives of the newspapers against poor Mr. WINNER. JENNER'S great discovery is not now regarded as an additional disease, but is going forth saving and to save; its progress, its adoption, its protective influence, and its ascendancy, are each a convincing proof of the infallibility of the press; and as that press could not stay the career of vaccination, neither can it stem the tide of total abstinence, which, with the blessing of God, and the aid of good men, will, ere long, shed its blessings over every land, destroying the influence of vice: establishing, securing, and hallowing the ascendancy of virtue and happiness.

* The Irish newspaper press is not now under consideration.

[It is with the greatest pleasure that we hail the enlistment of Mr. HAYNES amongst the writers in favour of Teetotalism.—Ed. Teetotaler.]

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BIBO will see, by a reference to the former numbers of this journal, that poetry does not form a favourite feature in its columns. Will he favour us with his name in private?

The foregoing observation applies to the "DANKARD REFORMED," signed SARAH.

To H. F. The advocates of any pledge, whether long or short, English or American, can join the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION so long as the pledge signed involve the principle of "total abstinence."

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS, No. IV. will appear next week; and the articles, under this denomination, will be in future continued every fortnight.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12th, 1840.

Much has been said, particularly by our able advocate, MR. BENSTEAD, at the Chapel in Aldersgate-street, upon the influence of intoxicating liquors on the brain, and, consequently, upon the intellect. Several letters from the opponents of Teetotalism have urged that, even admitting the deleterious effects of strong drinks upon the brain—a consequence they do not attempt to deny, it yet remains for us to prove that the brain is the seat of the intellect; and, until we demonstrate this proposition, they object to our right of asserting that the effects of intemperance are experienced by the intellect. We will therefore examine this question with clearness and impartiality.

If all ideas were innate, we might then have some difficulty in fixing upon a certain determined part of the human frame as the seat of the intellect. Descartes said that the seat of life was the pineal gland; and many philosophers, both ancient and modern, have not hesitated to assert their conviction that the stomach was the locality of the mind, in consequence of the strange sensations experienced in that region, when we are agitated by suspense, hope, or fear, or any acute passion. But we can prove to demonstration that the brain is the seat of the intellect; and, in order to do this, we must commence by convincing the reader that all our ideas are not innate, but that many of them enter by the senses.

The instinct between the sexes is certainly an innate idea; and the affection of mothers for their children is also an innate idea. It is true that instances may be given of mothers destroying their illegitimate children; but that does not convict them of the want of affection: it only proves that the sense of shame has in them been paramount, or that the dread of poverty has for a moment mastered their better feelings. The affection of fathers for their children is not innate; because, whereas mothers entertain an affection for their children as soon as they are born, fathers do not experience the same feeling till the children have been born some time, and frequently not at all—as in the case of illegitimate children. Again, natural modesty is an innate idea. The desire of happiness is not an innate idea; because, as happiness is something desirable, it is the same as to say, the desire of something desirable is innate—which is absurd. The approbation of virtue is by some reckoned innate; but virtue is something approvable; it is therefore the same as to say, the approbation of something approvable is innate—which is absurd.

Hence it is fully proven that all ideas are not innate. How, then, are those ideas, which are not innate, acquired? By sensation or reflection. Sensation is the notice the mind takes of impressions made upon our senses by outward objects; and reflection is the notice the mind takes of its own operations. The most obstinate disputant will admit this definition relative to reflection: he may however wish us to advance proof of our assertion that ideas are acquired by sensation. We shall proceed to satisfy the sceptic on this head.

A man, who was born blind, can have no idea of colours. A man, who was born deaf, can have no idea of sounds. A man, who never had the use of his olfactory nerves, can have no idea of the odour of a rose. These ideas enter respectively, by the sensations of seeing, hearing, and smelling. And now we will prove that these ideas are the result of sensation, and of nothing else.

If we go near a fire, we experience heat. But heat does not really exist in the fire. All that exists in the fire is a body of sharp-pointed particles which gush out from the bars of the grate; and this, striking upon the flesh, produces a sensation which we call heat. But the sensation we feel, and the cause of the sensation, are two widely different things. If a person, who has his eyes blinded, has a red hot coal put in one hand, and lunar caustic in the other, he will experience a sensation of heat in both hands, and will not be able to say which is the lunar caustic, or which is the coal. Now the lunar caustic is a cold powder; and thus the person has no more reason to say that the coal is hot than that the lunar caustic is hot, since the caustic burns as well as the coal. All the reason he can give for saying the coal is hot, is, because it burns him. And again,—the fire, which at one distance produces in us the sensation of warmth, at a nearer approach produces a sensation of pain. There is no more reason for saying the heat is in the fire, because it produces in us that sensation, than to say the pain is in the fire, because it produces in us that sensation.

There is no sound in a bell. All that is in the bell is a vibrating motion, which, when propagated to the air, strikes the drum of our ears, and produces a sensation which we call sound. A feather rubbed over the flesh, produces a tickling; and yet no one pretends to say that the tickling is in the feather; but it might as well be said that the tickling exists in the feather, as that sound exists in the bell.

Manna, when applied to the tongue, produces a sensation which we call sweetness; and for that reason we say that the manna is sweet. But the sweetness is not in the manna: all that is in the manna is such a texture of inward parts so suited, as, when applied to the tongue, to cause a sensation which we call sweetness. The same manna, when it gets into the stomach, causes a sickness; and yet no one pretends to say that the sickness is in the manna, or that the manna is sick. There is no more reason for saying that sweetness is in the manna, than there is for saying that sickness is in the manna. A penknife in cutting produces a smart; yet no one pretends to say that the smart is in the penknife. Yet we may with just as much reason say that the smart exists in the penknife as that sweetness exists in the manna.

If we hold a rose to our nose, it produces a sensation which we call smell. But the smell does not exist in the rose: all that exists in the rose is some particles of effluvia so suited to the inside of our nostrils as to cause the sensation which we call smell. There is no more reason for saying that smell exists in the rose than there is for saying, that smart exists in a knife, or tickling in a feather.

If we look at a carpet, it produces upon us a sensation which we call colour. But all that exists in the carpet is such a texture of parts so suited, as, when placed before our eyes, to produce the sensation of so many different colours. If the light be kept from it, without at all altering the substance of the carpet, the colours will no more be seen. Thence it is plain that the colours are caused by the rays of light coming on the carpet, and from thence rebounding back to our eyes, so as to cause the sensation of so many different colours. For there is no more reason for saying that colour exists in the carpet, than there is for saying that smart and tickling exist in the knife and feather, because they produce in us those sensations.

Hence we conclude that heat, sound, taste, smell, and colour, &c. do not exist in the objects, but are only the sensations produced from them; and that what exists in the objects—namely, what is the cause of this sensation, is quite different from the sensation itself. Hence it is evident that our ideas of heat, sound, taste, smell, and colour, are received by our sensations, and that without those sensations we should not have those ideas. Consequently those ideas are not innate.

Some ideas are acquired by sensation and reflection united: such as beauty, grandeur, sublimity, symmetry, harmony, proportion, &c. The idea of the beauty of a fine view cannot be acquired by sensation alone; because, if it could, the horse we ride on would have as good an idea of it as we ourselves, he being as quick-sighted as we—which is absurd. Neither can it be acquired by reflection alone; because, if it could, a blind man would have as good an idea of it as one that can see—which is absurd. Sensation however precedes reflection; because the mind could have nothing to reflect upon, till sensation had thrown in a stock of materials.

It is now proven that many ideas enter the mind by the sensations: let us now show how the brain is the great laboratory where they are received, and, in certain cases, completed by reflection. All the five senses (the organs of those sensations) may be very properly considered as different modifications of feeling. Thus, seeing any object is only feeling the image of it struck upon the retina of the eyes by the particles of light. Taste is feeling anything with the tip of the tongue. Smell is feeling the small particles of the effluvia of anything with the inside of the nose. Hearing is feeling the air striking the sound upon the drum of the ear. Feeling explains itself: where there is no feeling there is no life. Thus all the five senses are modifications of feeling. What is it in the body that has the property of feeling? The nerves, is the answer. Now all the nerves terminate in the brain; consequently the ideas, which enter by sensations, through the medium of the nerves, are conveyed to the brain. And from all this it results, that the brain is the seat of the intellect, because if it be the recipient place for those ideas which are not innate, it is also the residence of those which are innate.

The opponents to this system of reasoning would still have one question to ask us: and of that we shall dispose in a few words. "If," will they say, "the ideas enter by the sensations, and through the medium of the nerves, and if they proceed to the extremity of those nerves, how do you know that they do not fly to the extremity in the feet as well as the extremity in the brain?" The reply is easy. If we cut off a man's leg, he does not thereby lose one of his ideas; and he still has a sensation as if he had toes at the end of the stump. That sensation is produced by the circumstance that the remainder of the nerves, which terminate in the brain, still hold the power of sensation in that brain.

It is therefore evident that the brain is the seat of the mind; and, so far as the innate ideas are concerned, this argument corroborates the systems of Gall and Spurzheim. It is very easy to show how the influence of intoxicating drinks operates upon the intellect, by reminding our readers of the known power they exercise over the nervous system. Madness is nothing more than a dreadfully deranged state of the nervous system; and the principle of madness can more frequently be discovered in habits of intemperance than in aught beside. The same system of reasoning accounts for the destructive influence possessed by intoxicating drinks upon the faculties of the five senses.

THE INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

As the habit of intemperance frequently conducts its victim to this tribunal, we shall offer no apology for the publication of the following epitomized extract from "Pickwick Abroad:"—

THE construction of the Court House, Portugal-street, is in humble imitation of the Courts in Westminster-hall. Instead of passing through red curtains to obtain admittance, you enter by a green baize covered door, studded with brass nails, which do not, however, always keep the aforesaid green-baize attached to the aforesaid door. In the little lobby outside this means of egress and ingress, you will encounter two or three seedy-looking gentlemen, whose dress and address are neither interesting nor uncommon. They are generally employed in transferring a few dirty papers to each other, with that ambiguity which is deemed an essential quality in all diplomatic writings, acts of parliament, and law proceedings.

Having passed into the court, you find your hat suddenly crushed between two or three individuals, whose own hats had most likely undergone that process some time before they arrived there; and you immediately find it prudent to apply your hand to your watch-chain, if you have one. Your olfactory nerves are simultaneously assailed with a sickly, fetid smell of perspiration emanating from unwashed skins; and if you push a little farther into the Court, you arrive at a partition with a low door, which is kept by a man in rusty black, very much resembling a pew-opener in a Methodist chapel. Once established in this spot, you lean your elbows upon the little door or partition, and proceed to take a more particular survey of the locality and its inmates.

At the farther end is a stage, on which are placed the four desks behind which as many commissioners sometimes sit; although on general occasions there is but one present. In the middle is a pew, or box, divided into two rows, and embellished by the barristers. In the corner next to where you are posted, of the front row, sits (when he does not stand to examine a witness or address the court) the formidable Mr. Roughrow, whom we strongly recommend all insolvents to retain, if they do not wish to be something more than perplexed, should he be against them. But advice is the only commodity the world refuses to receive, although it may be had gratis, with an allowance to those who take a quantity.

Next to Mr. Roughrow is Mr. Butler, the most talented counsel practising at that court, and one who is certain to get an insolvent out of a scrape, and an opposing creditor into one, if those very desirable ends happen to be within the compass of possibility. Beside and behind Mr. Butler are seated two or three other members of the independent bar—their privileges usually consisting in a total freedom from the weight of any business at all.

Between the stage on which the commissioners are seated and the pew containing the barristers as aforesaid, is a low, large, dirty table, round which are placed some twelve or fourteen attorneys or law-agents, looking much more insolvent than any of their clients. Many of them seem to lack that useful and very generally estimated commodity—a shirt (if we must tell the naked truth); and a few appear to be so much attached to the only one they possess, that they are exceedingly loth to part with it, even after it has been turned twice since the middle of the previous month. The independence of the bar is like a ghost—a thing much talked of, but never seen: the independence of the lawyers at the Insolvents' court is, however, far from problematical; inasmuch as some of the fraternity carry it to such an extent as occasionally to make their appearance at the low table in a pleasing and highly interesting state of intoxication.

At the extremity of the court, facing the one which is embellished by the luminous presence of the commissioners, is the receptacle for the audience, which principally consists of decrepit old men, leaning their hands and chins upon cane walking-sticks, and watching the proceedings with a most critical eye. On the left hand side of the barristers' seat, the reporters of the newspapers occupy a small box in the immediate neighbourhood of the pulpit into which the opposing creditors hoist themselves, when they proceed thither for the purpose of punishing some silly young man whom their own pressing invitations to obtain goods upon credit have ruined. Immediately opposite to this pulpit, on the other side of the court, is the box into which the insolvents ascend to be bullied by their creditors; and connected with that "bad eminence" is the pew allotted to petitioners who await their hearing or their sentence.

Such was the state of matters in the Court House in Portugal-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, on the morning when Mr. Adolphus Craschem, alias Mr. William Sugden (by which latter name we shall henceforth distinguish him) accompanied Mr. William Wibsey, the tipstaff, from the Royal Repose, or, in vulgar parlance, King's Bench Prison, to the aforesaid court.

On Mr. Sugden's arrival at the court, the examination of Lord Thomas Swales was just concluded. His lordship had just been proved by an opposing creditor to be the most unmitigated swindler on the face of the earth: but the learned commissioner Buckphiz prudently and kindly took his lordship's patent of nobility into consideration, and instead of remanding him for three years, as he would any poor devil without a title, ordered him to be discharged forthwith. His lordship, who looked any thing but like an insolvent, being dressed in the extreme of fashion, scarcely condescended to thank the commissioner for this Daniel-like decision, but withdrew to the tavern opposite to drink gin-and-water and smoke cigars with the tipstaff who had charge of him, the sporting friends who waited for him, and the attorney who had seen him through the Court.

Another Insolvent was then summoned into the box; and as the memory of this individual was exceedingly treacherous relative to certain goods for the disposal of which he could not exactly account, a long and tedious examination ensued; and after a species of bull-baiting which lasted about two hours, nothing having been elicited, Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz tried an experiment with a view of refreshing the Insolvent's memory, and remanded him for the space of eighteen months from the day in which he filed his petition. The discomfited Insolvent received his sentence with a singularly wry face; and having resumed his seat in the pew allotted to his fraternity, he took from his blue cotton handkerchief a little luncheon of cold veal and bread which he had brought with him; and that, with the addition of some salt extracted from his waistcoat pocket, seemed to console him for his disappointment. On the following morning the nobleman's case was only slightly alluded to in the public papers; whereas the examination of the unfortunate devil who was thus remanded, was set forth in all the glaring colours and in all the embellishments usually adopted in such reports. It is scarcely necessary to observe that the case of Lord Swales was ten thousand times blacker than that of this poor man; but the former was the son of a peer; and the latter was a broken-down linen-draper.

It is highly amusing and edifying at the same time, to observe the species of sensation which takes place in the court when an Insolvent descends from the box in which he had so conspicuously figured. The commissioner looks up to see if the windows in the lantern on the roof be sufficiently open to ventilate the room: the old clerk beneath him tumbles about a parcel of papers which bear no reference in the slightest degree to any thing with which he has to do at the moment: the other clerk in the brown coat and brass buttons, and with sandy hair, next to him, looks very mysteriously over his papers; Messieurs Butler and Roughrow converse in whispers; the barrister in spectacles behind them reads the Times with more desperate attention than before, because, as he has not got a brief, he must be doing something; the reporters mend their pens; some of the attorneys proceed to the gin-shop opposite, to refresh themselves with a small drop of strong waters, their stomachs having been long estranged to weaker liquids; a mother, seated amongst the spectators, ventures to give suck to her child, who now screams with temporary impunity: the man at the little desk underneath the Insolvent's examination-box administers certain small incitements to perjury, vulgarly called oaths, relative to the correctness of schedules, to those petitioners who may have been heard; and, in fact, the interval is one of general excitement and bustle.

We will, however, eschew farther description for the present, and pursue the thread of our narrative with the same ease which we exemplified in leaving it.

The petitions of Lord Swales and the linen-draper having been disposed of, the clerk summoned

"WILLIAM SUGDEN," at the top of a most discordant voice; and when the personage thus adjured jumped lightly into the box, his presence was greeted on the part of the audience with that sort of compassionate attention which is bestowed upon gentlemen in the press yard while their fetters are being knocked off. But Mr. Sugden leant over the box with great ease and independence of manner, and tried to stare Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz out of countenance; but finding that to be as ineffectual as endeavouring to do the same to a brass warning-pan, he looked very bashful and modest to please the court, and then took a pinch of snuff to please himself.

It appeared that two creditors had entered opposition against Mr. William Sugden: and at the announcement, which was made by the clerk of the court, the Insolvent politely requested to be informed by his creditors "if they didn't wish they might get it?" A loud laugh on the part of the spectators, and in which all the barristers and attorneys cordially joined, welcomed this sprightly sally on the part of Mr. Sugden: but Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz threatened to dismiss the petition if the insolvent repeated his pleasantries; whereupon Messieurs Butler and Roughrow, who had been retained by the attorney of Mr. William Sugden, desired that gentleman to take care and not commit himself.

The names of the opposing creditors were now called; and Mr. Anthony Stickemin, tailor, and Mr. Michael Nagsflesh, horse-dealer, answered to the summons.

A few preliminary questions having been put to the insolvent by the learned Commissioner, and having been as duly replied to by Mr. Sugden, Mr. Anthony Stickemin was requested to ascend the witness-box, an invitation with which he complied with an alacrity and promptitude as remarkable as they were meritorious. Mr. Stickemin had retained no Counsel: he opposed in person, and entered with an air of determination and valour upon the business which had brought him thither.

It seems that this was the second time that Mr. Stickemin was Mr. Sugden's creditor. Mr. Sugden had been imprisoned in France, and the claim of Mr. Stickemin, who was one of the detaining creditors on that occasion, was liquidated by Mr. Sugden, sen. as the reader will remember. Three months before the period of which we are now writing (that is, of the transactions in the Insolvents' Court) Mr. Sugden made his appearance in England and at Mr. Stickemin's shop; and the consequence of the visit was that a quantity of clothes were duly ordered, and forwarded to Mr. Sugden's lodging in Maddox Street, Mr. Stickemin fancying that as his debtor's father had already paid his son's bill once, the same result might attend a renewal of credit in that quarter.

"You may put any question you please to the Insolvent," said Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, who had been making copious notes of a new-projected bill for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt in the book in which it was usually supposed that he wrote the leading features of the cases before him.

"Were there not six pairs of buckskin hunting breeches among the things I sent to your lodgings?" demanded Mr. Anthony Stickemin of Mr. William Sugden.

"I shouldn't be surprised if there were," answered the last-named gentleman with his characteristic off-hand manner.

"And did you not pawn them at Mr. Clegg's in Prince's Street?" continued the tailor.

"You've hit the right nail on the head again, old fellow," replied the Insolvent. "It's the proper saw you've got by the ear, as my friend the Great Cham of Tartary used to say."

Here Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz again interfered to remind Mr. Sugden that he must give direct answers to the questions of his opposing creditor; whereupon Mr. Sugden refreshed himself with another pinch of snuff, nodded familiarly at the Commissioner, muttering something which sounded very much like the words "I twig," and then assumed an attitude of the most profound attention.

"Did you not tell me," continued Mr. Anthony Stickemin, "in order to obtain fresh credit with me, that your father had come down with the stumpy, as you called it?"

"Certainly," answered Mr. Sugden.

"And did you not say you were going to stand for some borough in Hampshire, as you had sufficient influence in that part of the country to turn an election, whereas you hadn't even the power to turn a shilling?"

Here Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, who never permitted an insolvent to utter any thing in the shape of a joke, facetiously observed "that he Mr. Sugden had got into the wrong box at last;" whereat there was a general laugh, which of course was not interrupted by the Commissioner. Mr. Sugden himself indulged in a cachinnation so loud and long that he quite won the heart of the Commissioner, who from that moment determined to discharge him, however dark might be the features of the case.

But Mr. Stickemin had not laughed; so, when order was once more restored, Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz desired him in a very savage voice to "make haste with his opposition, and not waste the precious time of the Court, or he should know the reason why."

"But, Sir—" began the discomfited tailor.

"Don't address yourself to me; address yourself to the Insolvent, Sir," cried Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz.

Messieurs Butler and Roughrow smiled at each other, and then smiled at the Insolvent, to intimate that "all was right." Mr. Sugden pointed towards the opposing creditor, and playfully jerked his left thumb over his left shoulder, which in symbolic language meant that "Mr. Stickemin was done for, and that his opposition was no go."

"The leathern breeches I traced out," continued Mr. Stickemin, considerably crest-fallen; "but what became of the two black surtout coats—the red waistcoat with gold buttons—the cut-away green riding-coat—the black breeches—and the other articles you swindled me out of?"

Mr. Sugden very quietly intimated that the goods alluded to were in the custody of a relative, from whom, with his usual prudence and foresight, he had taken certain small receipts which he had placed in the hands of the provisional assignee of the Insolvent's Court.

Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz did not appear exactly to understand this explanation; so Mr. Roughrow undertook to enlighten him.

"My client means, in plain language, Sir, that he has pawned the clothes, and that the receipts are the duplicates," said Mr. Roughrow.

"Ah, ha! I see," said Mr. Buckphiz. "I believe that a pawnbroker is not unfrequently denominated one's uncle!"

Mr. Butler intimated that the learned Commissioner was right; and when another little laugh had been very successfully got up and accomplished, Mr. Stickemin was asked if he had any more questions to put to the Insolvent. As he replied in the negative, Mr. Butler rose with the determination of making his gown serve as a cloak for brow-beating the witness, who but for that protection might have been as insolent as he chose to the barrister.

"You are a tailor in Regent Street, I believe?" said Mr. Butler, addressing himself to the miserable creditor.

"That is my trade, Sir," was the quiet reply.

"Oh! that's your craft, is it?" resumed Mr. Butler, with a glance towards the Commissioner, who smiled—not at the joke, nor the sarcasm conveyed by it—but because he had at that moment penned a clause in the new Bill for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt, inasmuch as was heretofore which rendered the Insolvent's Court more necessary and permanent than ever, and consequently ensured a continuance in office to himself and his brother Commissioners.

Mr. Stickemin again admitted that he was a tailor.

"And I believe that you were the creditor who arrested the Insolvent?" continued the learned Counsel.

"I was, Sir," answered the creditor; because I knew that he meant to cheat me."

"And how did you find that out?" demanded Mr. Butler.

"Because when I called at his house for my little bill, he was always denied to me," was the reply.

"Might he not have been really out or engaged?"

"Oh! I know that on several occasions he was at home, when I called," persisted Mr. Stickemin.

"And, pray, Sir, how do you know that he was at home on those occasions?" asked the Counsel.

"Because, Sir," rejoined Mr. Stickemin, "I heard him sing out to his servant, 'There's that infernal scoundrel of a tailor, Ben, go and tell him I'm not at home.'"

"You see, Sir, the private opinion which the Insolvent entertained of his creditor's moral character," observed Mr. Butler, with a look of the most profound erudition, to the Commissioner.

The Commissioner glanced towards the witness, and shook his head mysteriously—a movement which plainly intimated that he, Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, knew, of his own private knowledge, that Mr. Stickemin was the most consummate scoundrel and desperate villain under the canopy of heaven.

Mr. Butler suffered all this to make its due impression in favour of the Insolvent, and then again addressed himself to the opposing creditor.

"Now, Mr. Stickemin," said the learned Counsel, "will you have the kindness to inform us how you became aware that the Insolvent had pledged the—leather breeches, I think?"

"Yes, Sir—buckskin breeches," observed Mr. Stickemin.

"Oh! buckskin breeches, eh?" said Mr. Butler.

"Well—Sir—about these buckskin breeches, then,"—and the excellent lawyer laid prodigious emphasis upon those which are generally supposed to be unmentionables.

"I'll tell you how it was, Sir," answered Mr. Stickemin. "One Sunday morning, as I was going to Saint James' Church, I overtook Mr. Clegg, the great pawnbroker of Princes Street, who was walking the same way, quite promiscuously, along with Mrs. Clegg, Miss Jemima, and little Orlando in his new suit, for he'd only been breeched the day before. So I passed the compliment of the morning to Clegg and his family, and we walked on together, as we happen to sit generally in the same place. But I looked at my friend Clegg with an uncommon sharp eye, for I saw that he'd got on a brand-new pair of buckskin breeches; and on closer inspection I instantly recognised my own peculiar make and cut. Just at that moment we arrived at the church door, and so I couldn't say anything then. But when the parson was approaching the sermon, I put my head down in the pew and asked Mr. Clegg how he'd come by them breeches. 'Why,' said he in a whisper, 'I'll tell you how it is. I'm going to take the sacrament,' says he, 'and so I thought I'd make myself uncommon smart, and do the thing a little genteel. Now, between ourselves, I never wear any clothes of my own—I have none, in fact. I never patronise a tailor; but I always appear well dressed, and no man has such a variety of attire. One day I wear a blue coat and brown trousers; another, a shooting-jacket and gaiters; and another, an entire suit of black.'—'Well,' said I, 'that's true, but how the devil do you manage it?'—'Why,' said he, 'I'll tell you how it is. I always wear the clothes of my customers—the pledged articles, you know. For instance, this coat belongs to the clerk of a great publisher not a hundred miles off—this waistcoat was pawned a few days ago by the servant of a nobleman in the King's Bench, who always patronises me—these boots were sent home by Macdonald to a young spark living in the Albany, and were pledged on the following morning—and of these breeches I've got six pairs. I shall give 'em all a turn before I've done.'—'Oh! oh! and that hat,' whispered I, to avoid exciting any suspicion on his part as to my real motives of questioning him.—'That hat,' said he, speaking quickly, because the sermon was just over, 'up to this time has been pawned regularly every Monday morning, and redeemed every Saturday night, for the last six months. It belongs to a member of the swell-mob, who preaches at the Obelisk in St. George's Fields every Sunday, and his confederates help themselves to the watches and handkerchiefs of the congregation he gets round him. He went yesterday afternoon to the treadmill for six weeks; but when he comes out again, he'll redeem his hat as usual, and begin preaching away more fiercely than ever. In the mean time I wear it for him.'—This was the way, Sir, in which I discovered that Mr. Sugden had pawned the buckskin breeches."

"And more shame for ye, Mr. What-d'ye-call-it!" vociferated a loud voice from the corner of the Court near the green-baize door. "That's the way you Snips of the Vest Land entraps youngsters, is it, Mr. Thingumbob?"

"Silence!" exclaimed a hanger-on of the Court.

Mr. William Sugden strongly suspected that it was his excellent father's voice which had caused the interruption; but as the learned Commissioner Buckphiz was entirely wrapt up in the draught of the bill before alluded to, no further notice was taken of the circumstance.

"You may stand down, Sir," said Mr. Butler to the opposing creditor, after he had put a few more questions tending to elicit facts in favour of the Insolvent; to the effect that Mr. Stickemin's bill was very exorbitant, that he had pressed his goods upon his debtor, that he never expected to be paid by more than one customer out of ten, that he who paid amply remunerated him for the loss of all the rest, and that he himself became a bankrupt regularly every three years, in order to have an excuse for arresting his customers and getting in his accounts, through the medium of assignees who were generally intimate friends of his own. Mr. Butler appeared to be perfectly satisfied with this acknowledgment on the part of the opposing creditor; and when Mr. Stickemin had descended from the box, Mr. Butler sat down, and Mr. Michael Nagstflesh was summoned to the place just vacated by the discomfited tailor.

The second witness having been duly sworn, and the Commissioner having taken a good long stare at him, the examination of Mr. William Sugden was renewed.

"Did you not obtain a horse from me under the name of Adolphus Craschem, son of General Craschem, of Craschem Park?" inquired Mr. Nagstflesh.

"Yes—and it was paid for by my father," answered the Insolvent in a tone of the most noble contempt.

"I know that," said Mr. Nagstflesh. "I merely want to show that you entered yourself for the sweepstakes under a false name."

"When I renewed credit with you a few weeks ago," observed Mr. Sugden, "you knew that my name was not Craschem; but you gave me any thing I wanted on trust, as you said at the time 'that the old fogey would pay for it all again.'"

"I didn't use any such language," exclaimed Mr. Nagstflesh. "A greater falsehood was never uttered under the roof of the House of Commons."

"Proceed with your questions, Sir," said the learned Commissioner very savagely, "and don't banly words with the Insolvent, or—"

And Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz shook his pen with a sublime air of mysterious portent, at the opposing creditor—a movement that excited the admiration of Messieurs Butler and Roughrow to an extraordinary degree.

"Did you not tell me that you were the intimate friend of Twankay Fum, the Great Cham of Tartary?" demanded Mr. Michael Nagstflesh of the Insolvent; "and did you not also inform me that his Majesty, the Cham Twankay, had commissioned you to purchase a hundred horses for him in this country; and ship them on board a junk which you expected every day to arrive in the Pool?"

"There's some truth in that," said Mr. Sugden, "I scorn to tell a lie."

"Well, its about time to entertain that notion," cried Mr. Nagstflesh. "But wasn't I fool enough to believe all you told me?"

Mr. Sugden did not for one moment attempt to dispute his creditor's right to this highly distinguishing and self-imposed title.

I repeat," said Mr. Nagstflesh with emphasis, "wasn't I fool enough to believe you?"

Mr. Sugden again intimated that he was.

"And didn't you get me to go, for the first time in my life, to Margate with you by the steam-boat?" continued the horse-dealer; and didn't you very confidently point out a queer-looking, red-bottomed, foreign-kind of vessel lying at anchor at the mouth of the Thames? and, after all, wasn't it nothing else but the Nore-light?"

"Well, Sir, and what of that?" enquired Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, who began to feel the cravings of a good appetite, and recollected that he had ordered luncheon to be ready at half-past two o'clock.

"What of that, Sir?" exclaimed Mr. Michael Nagstflesh. "why, Sir, he swore that it was his junk come to fetch the horses for his friend the Great Cham."

An agreeable tittering, varied by one or two right-down horse-laughes, welcomed this avowal; and when it had subsided, Mr. Nagstflesh proceeded.

"Insolvent," continued he, "didn't you also ask me to dine with you? and didn't you promise to introduce me to some of the Great Cham's emissaries? and weren't the people in the queer costumes that I met at your lodging sheriff's-officers, who had possession of your person and your property?"

To all these demands a reply in the affirmative was returned.

"Didn't you say that one was Rumfooselem-beg, the Great Cham's Master of the Horse?" continued Mr. Nagstflesh; "that another was Ali Tantabogram, the Great Cham's Pipe-holder and Peripatetic Tobacco-Stopper? And weren't they no others, after all, than Silke and Buffer of Chancery Lane?"

"Very true," replied Mr. Sugden with the utmost sang-froid, as he again favoured his Counsel with a familiar nod of intelligence.

"And didn't I let you have a couple of horses, in consequence of all these representations? Now, Sir, what became of those horses? I suppose you didn't pawn them?" observed Mr. Nagstflesh with a complacent smile.

"They're the leaders of the Opposition now," replied Mr. William Sugden.

This reply excited general astonishment, particu-

appeared to be perfectly satisfied with this acknowledgment on the part of the opposing creditor; and when Mr. Stickemin had descended from the box, Mr. Butler sat down, and Mr. Michael Nagstflesh was summoned to the place just vacated by the discomfited tailor.

The second witness having been duly sworn, and the Commissioner having taken a good long stare at him, the examination of Mr. William Sugden was renewed.

"Did you not obtain a horse from me under the name of Adolphus Craschem, son of General Craschem, of Craschem Park?" inquired Mr. Nagstflesh.

"Yes—and it was paid for by my father," answered the Insolvent in a tone of the most noble contempt.

"I know that," said Mr. Nagstflesh. "I merely want to show that you entered yourself for the sweepstakes under a false name."

"When I renewed credit with you a few weeks ago," observed Mr. Sugden, "you knew that my name was not Craschem; but you gave me any thing I wanted on trust, as you said at the time 'that the old fogey would pay for it all again.'"

"I didn't use any such language," exclaimed Mr. Nagstflesh. "A greater falsehood was never uttered under the roof of the House of Commons."

"Proceed with your questions, Sir," said the learned Commissioner very savagely, "and don't banly words with the Insolvent, or—"

And Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz shook his pen with a sublime air of mysterious portent, at the opposing creditor—a movement that excited the admiration of Messieurs Butler and Roughrow to an extraordinary degree.

"Did you not tell me that you were the intimate friend of Twankay Fum, the Great Cham of Tartary?" demanded Mr. Michael Nagstflesh of the Insolvent; "and did you not also inform me that his Majesty, the Cham Twankay, had commissioned you to purchase a hundred horses for him in this country; and ship them on board a junk which you expected every day to arrive in the Pool?"

"There's some truth in that," said Mr. Sugden, "I scorn to tell a lie."

"Well, its about time to entertain that notion," cried Mr. Nagstflesh. "But wasn't I fool enough to believe all you told me?"

Mr. Sugden did not for one moment attempt to dispute his creditor's right to this highly distinguishing and self-imposed title.

I repeat," said Mr. Nagstflesh with emphasis, "wasn't I fool enough to believe you?"

Mr. Sugden again intimated that he was.

"And didn't you get me to go, for the first time in my life, to Margate with you by the steam-boat?" continued the horse-dealer; and didn't you very confidently point out a queer-looking, red-bottomed, foreign-kind of vessel lying at anchor at the mouth of the Thames? and, after all, wasn't it nothing else but the Nore-light?"

"Well, Sir, and what of that?" enquired Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, who began to feel the cravings of a good appetite, and recollected that he had ordered luncheon to be ready at half-past two o'clock.

"What of that, Sir?" exclaimed Mr. Michael Nagstflesh. "why, Sir, he swore that it was his junk come to fetch the horses for his friend the Great Cham."

An agreeable tittering, varied by one or two right-down horse-laughes, welcomed this avowal; and when it had subsided, Mr. Nagstflesh proceeded.

"Insolvent," continued he, "didn't you also ask me to dine with you? and didn't you promise to introduce me to some of the Great Cham's emissaries? and weren't the people in the queer costumes that I met at your lodging sheriff's-officers, who had possession of your person and your property?"

To all these demands a reply in the affirmative was returned.

"Didn't you say that one was Rumfooselem-beg, the Great Cham's Master of the Horse?" continued Mr. Nagstflesh; "that another was Ali Tantabogram, the Great Cham's Pipe-holder and Peripatetic Tobacco-Stopper? And weren't they no others, after all, than Silke and Buffer of Chancery Lane?"

"Very true," replied Mr. Sugden with the utmost sang-froid, as he again favoured his Counsel with a familiar nod of intelligence.

"And didn't I let you have a couple of horses, in consequence of all these representations? Now, Sir, what became of those horses? I suppose you didn't pawn them?" observed Mr. Nagstflesh with a complacent smile.

"They're the leaders of the Opposition now," replied Mr. William Sugden.

This reply excited general astonishment, particularly in that inclosure which we before described as allotted to the audience, and where a gentleman without a coat whispered to another, whose shoes were curiously contrived to let in the fresh air at the toes, that "he knew that there was a good many asses in the House of Commons; but that he never before heard of there being any horses there." The matter was, however, speedily explained by Mr. William Sugden, who set all doubt and uncertainty at rest, by assuring the court that the Opposition was the name of a coach on the Brighton road, and that the horses in question had been sold at a remarkably reduced rate to the proprietor thereof.

Mr. Michael Nagzflesh having thus terminated his opposition, by causing the elucidation of another, Mr. Roughrow arose, brushed a little flue off the handsome velvet facings of his coat, and prepared to interrogate the witness.

"Now, Mr. Michael Nagzflesh," said Mr. Roughrow, "did you not, upon your oath, engage the Insolvent to accept fresh credit of you on his return from France three or four months ago?"

"No, Sir—I did not. He first called upon me—"

"He first called upon you. Well—and what did you say to him?" proceeded the Counsel.

"I asked him how he was getting on," was the answer.

"You asked him how he was getting on. And what reply did he make?" demanded Mr. Roughrow.

"Swimmingly," returned Mr. Nagzflesh.

"Swimmingly," repeated Mr. Roughrow. "And what did you say then?"

"That I was very glad to hear it."

"That you were very glad to hear it. Now, Sir,—upon your oath," continued the Counsel, shaking his brief in a menacing manner, "what took place after this interchange of compliments?"

"He asked me to lend him five pounds, which I did," was the immediate reply.

"Which you did. But was not something said about horses on that occasion?"

"I think I intimated that I had two fine horses to dispose of; but I'm not sure," replied Mr. Nagzflesh.

"You think you intimated that you had two fine horses to dispose of; but you are not sure," said Mr. Roughrow. "Now, Sir, will you undertake to swear that you did not say so?"

"No, Sir, I will not."

"You will not. Did you not tell Mr. Sugden that you would put a commission in his pocket for any order he could get you?"

"That was on another occasion, Sir."

"That was on another occasion. Well—how long after the first call was it, then?"

"The next day."

"The next day," continued Mr. Roughrow.

"Now two more questions, Sir,—and I have done. Did you not through the recommendation of the Insolvent, dispose of a horse to a Mr. Dunn Browne, after you had sold two horses to the Insolvent?"

"I did, Sir," was the answer.

"You did," said Mr. Roughrow, exchanging a significant smile with Mr. Butler, then disturbing three or four papers that lay before him, and putting them in order again. "And—upon your oath—when the aforesaid horse was put into Mr. Dunn Browne's stables, was it not seized with the staggers—did it not fall down—and were not its nostrils plugged up with sponges, to prevent the running of the glanders?"

Mr. Nagzflesh was exceedingly modest in replying to these soft impeachments: an answer in the affirmative was, however, elicited after some trouble, and Mr. Roughrow sat down in triumph, while Mr. Nagzflesh got down in despair.

Mr. Butler now rose to address the court. After the usual preliminary observations, he begged to remind the court that Mr. William Sugden was a very young man still—he might almost say a boy; and certainly many of his pursuits had lately savoured of the puerile occupations of childhood. He would bear out his assertion by reminding the court that the Insolvent, previous to his arrest, had (in order to avoid bailiffs) been compelled to play at hide and seek: he would also admit that the evidence of the opposing creditors had, in one or two instances, fully proven that the Insolvent had been considerably addicted to crackers, and to drawing the long bow. It was also very palpable that the Insolvent had been playing at horses—the traces of which might be discovered in the testimony of Mr. Michael Nagzflesh. He had not, however, proved himself a bolter—although in that way he might follow many a leader. This was an extenuating circumstance; and he should request for his client the kind consideration of the court in reference to it.

The learned Counsel, having drawn breath, then proceeded to dissect the testimony of the opposing creditors, and from the evidence that had been obtained from them by the cross-examination of himself and his learned friend to show that both Messieurs Michael Nagzflesh and Anthony Stuckennin had done all in their power to engage the Insolvent to accept of fresh credit at their respective establishments, with the hope of being subsequently paid by his father, who had already liquidated his liabilities more than once. Mr. Butler then made a few concise remarks relative to the characters of the opposing creditors: he designated one as a dishonest horse-dealer, and the other as a triennial bankrupt; and (as he was aware that the commissioner's veal-cutlet had just been taken into the private room, with a pint of sherry, from the tavern at the corner of the street) he declared his determination of intruding no longer upon the patience (in this sense, synonymous with appetite) of the court, but would leave his client to the well-known impartiality and mercy of his judge.

Mr. Commissioner Buckphiz, who, during the last hour, had cast many anxious glances towards the private door at the end of the stage, hastily ran his eye over the draught of the Imprisonment for Debt Bill, from which he pretended to read a few notes or minutes of the proceedings; and, having repeated all the extenuating circumstances which were urged by Mr. Butler, as the motives of the judgment he was about to pronounce, he declared "that William Sugden was entitled to the benefit of the Act," and ordered him to be discharged forthwith.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

SIR.—Unconnected with the United Temperance Association, or with its periodical The Teetotaler, (as indeed I am with any other Temperance society or its publications), it must at once appear that I make this communication upon general principles.

The New British and Foreign Temperance Society is one of the leading organs for the promotion of total abstinence; and I take upon myself to assert that it is as much its duty to guard the Temperance public against anything tending to interfere with the common object as to use every suitable means for its accomplishment. It strikes me most forcibly that the Committee of that Society are called upon to defend the imputation cast upon them by a paragraph in No. X. of The Teetotaler, relating to a refusal to insert any advertisement coming from the United Temperance Association. A very unfavourable suspicion now attaches itself to that Committee; and if its members have any reasons sufficient to exonerate themselves, it appears to me they owe it to the public and to themselves to make them promptly known, inasmuch as I find that the advertisement rejected by them has appeared in the Temperance Intelligencer, &c.

A whispering, hole-and-corner government is inconsistent with the standing of any society and forms no characteristic of that bold, undaunted singleness of purpose which is necessary to carry out a principle involving the domestic and moral interests of a nation.

I do not mean these observations to be offensively applied: they are made in a spirit of independence, and disinterested anxiety for the prosperity of our good cause.

I am, Sir, your's respectfully,

167, Fleet street.

MINGATE SYDER.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Donations and Subscriptions received by the Treasurer since our last.

	£	s.	d.
Mr. William Elliott, Fore Street . . .	0	2	6
Mr. Caslon, Chiswell Street . . .	1	0	0
Mr. T. Early, Houndsditch . . .	0	10	0
A Friend, Gracechurch Street . . .	0	2	6
Mr. William Ashcombe, Gracechurch St. .	0	2	6
Mr. J. Cooper, Lawrence Poultry Lane .	0	0	0
Mr. Brown, Sen., Curtain Road . . .	0	2	6

REPORT OF TEETOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

HALL OF SCIENCE, CITY ROAD.

A crowded and most respectable meeting was held at this place, on Friday the 25th of August.

MR. HOLLAND was called to the chair.

MR. DONALDSON related an anecdote of a master jeweller, who had once been a determined drunkard, and had nearly brought himself to beggary by his evil habits, but who had lately signed the pledge of total abstinence, and was now doing well.

MR. WILDE (of the "Blues") presented himself as an evidence of the good effects of Teetotalism.

MR. GREY exhibited the still, explained the process, and burnt the spirit extracted from a pint of ale.

MR. GREEN dissected and refuted the arguments lately made use of by Mr. Rowbotham.

MR. BLAIR and MR. HART then each addressed the meeting in eloquent speeches; and the assembly separated at half-past ten o'clock.

MAYLEBONE BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday evening, September 2nd, one of the most respectable and crowded meetings of Teetotalers that ever assembled, was held in Mr. Warde's Assembly room, Circus-street, New-road. The object of this meeting was to form a grand Branch of the United Temperance Association in this district.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, pursuant to notice, took the chair, and addressed the audience at very great length upon the necessity of spreading the doctrines of Teetotalism far and wide.

MR. BAYLIS implored those persons, who were not Teetotalers, to sign the pledge for the sake of their wives, their children, and their relatives.

MR. MEE showed the fallacy of the idea "that men could not do without intoxicating drinks."

MR. BATEAUX made a forceful oration upon the benefits which Teetotalism had conferred upon the working classes.

MR. H. W. WESTON (Secretary to the United Temperance Association) exposed, in a speech of great power, the villainous system of adulteration practised by the wine-merchants, the brewers, and the publicans.

MR. JOHNSON proposed the resolution "that the name of the new branch be the Maylebone Branch of the United Temperance Association."

The resolution was unanimously carried; and the meeting separated at half-past ten o'clock.

MR. HUDSON, THE ADVOCATE.

This gentleman, who is now travelling as one of the accredited agents of the United Temperance Association, has lately visited Leicester, Hinkley, Coventry, Birmingham, Lye, and Stourbridge, where he has delivered lectures upon the grand principles of total abstinence, with the most gratifying success.

MR. MARRIOTT, THE ADVOCATE.

MR. MARRIOTT, another talented representative of the United Temperance Association, has been actively engaged in Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Northamptonshire, in which counties he has exerted himself to his utmost in the Teetotal cause. This gentleman gives a very favourable account of the progress of Teetotalism in those districts, and was pleased to find that so many of the working men, now engaged in the harvest-fields, had adopted the pledge of total abstinence.

KENSINGTON AND BAYSWATER BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The Camden Chapel, Kensington Gravel-pits, was crowded on Monday evening, August 31st; and on the ensuing Monday, September 7th. The audience is generally most attentive, and the doctrine of total abstinence seems fully appreciated, in all its valuable merits, by the members of this flourishing Branch.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, September 2nd.

The meeting at Aldersgate-street chapel was, as usual, well attended, and by a most respectable audience. This evening's assembly is decidedly the most important Teetotal reunion in the metropolis. On Wednesday, September 2nd, the chair was ably filled by MR. GAWTHORP; and the meeting was addressed by Messieurs Marriott, Biddle, Benstead, Betts, and Cuzner.

Saturday Evening, September 5th.

The Aldersgate-street chapel again presented a gay and cheering appearance upon this occasion. The mere moral effect of seeing so many regular attendants at these meetings must be very great, and materially aids the strenuous endeavours made by the advocates of this Association to collect fresh recruits beneath the glorious banners of union,—an union which admits the members of all pledges, and which has in view the laudable object of reconciling all parties and sects, so that only one grand impulse, and not a variety of disjointed efforts, be put in action to forward the progress of Teetotalism.

MR. WILSON, upon taking the chair, expatiated on the preference that should be shown to intellectual pursuits over sensual ones.

MR. WILLIAM DONALDSON (the brother of the well-known advocate) addressed the meeting upon the effects amounting to salvation, which Teetotalism had produced upon his fortune and character.

MR. BENSTEAD continued from last week his observations on the human intellect in its connexion with sensual indulgences.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS then rose to address the audience. His speech forms the leading article in this number of The Teetotaler.

Messieurs Baylis, Glenny (of Hackney) Dawson, Smeeton, and J. H. Donaldson then each addressed the audience in powerful orations.

BETHNAL-GREEN AND SPITALFIELDS BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The usual weekly meeting was held, on Monday, September 7th, at the Temperance Assembly-rooms, Church row, Bethnal-green.

The chair was taken by MR. WILSON; and the following advocates addressed the audience:—Messieurs Reynolds, Eales, Harrison, Rice, Gawthorp and Weston.

The Clerkenwell and Pentonville-Youths' Teetotal Society, will hold their third Public General Meeting at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, on Friday evening, September 15th, at half-past seven for eight o'clock.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

DEAR SIR,—After reading in the Intelligencer, of the 27th of August, the article which relates to Mr. John Scott, and this person's letter to the Editor of the Journal of the same date, concerning his engagement to visit Lincolnshire for the United Temperance Association, I wrote a letter to Mr. Scott on the subject in such plain terms as I suppose were unanswerable, he never having made any reply thereto.

I now publicly state that Mr. John Scott was exceedingly anxious to become a member of the Committee of the Association.—On the very same night of his admission he made an offer to visit Lincolnshire, and requested me to provide him with credentials as Agent, a demand to which I immediately assented. It was then fully understood by the Committee that he would immediately leave London on their account. It however, appears that Mr. Scott procured, as he conceived, a more lucrative situation with another Society, which would not have engaged him had he not thus far committed himself with us; and the most honourable plan would have been for him to have candidly explained the matter to me instead of suffering himself to be made the tool of other parties with a view to injure the Society for which I have the honour to act, or publicly to impugn our mode of business.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

H. W. WESTON,

Secretary to the United Temperance Association.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

This Day is Published, containing Sixteen closely printed pages. Price 3d., Number 1. of

THE ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE, OR A KEY TO TEETOTALISM.

BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.

Author of "Pickwick Abroad," "Modern Literature of France," "Alfred de Rossmu," "Grace Darling," &c.

This work will be continued in weekly numbers at 3d. and monthly parts (stitched in a beautiful wrapper) at 1s. each until its completion in ten sheets. It is presented by its Author to the United Temperance Association, and all its proceeds will be devoted to the furtherance of the cause of Temperance.

PUBLISHED AT THE DEPT OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, 15, Aldersgate Street, London.

And Sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row, Dublin; S. MACKEN & CO. And all Booksellers, News-vendors and Stationers in Town and Country.

AUTOGRAPHS AND SKETCHES OF EMINENT MEN.

Publishing every Saturday, price 2d. and in monthly parts, price 9d., in a new and improved form.

GRANT'S LONDON JOURNAL.

Conducted by the author of "Random Recollections," "The Great Metropolis," &c. Each number contains Portraits of Public Characters. Illustrations of London Life. Tales, Sketches, &c. Original Poetry. Humorous Contributions. Miscellaneous Articles. Articles of Information. Varieties, &c., &c.

The attention of the friends of Teetotalism is requested to GRANT'S LONDON JOURNAL, as, though essentially a literary publication, it has, from its commencement, most strenuously advocated the cause of Temperance.

A series of Autographs and Sketches of all the distinguished men of the day, is now appearing in GRANT'S LONDON JOURNAL, which is pronounced by the press to be one of the most meritorious and elegantly got up publications of its kind.

Published by G. Benger, Holywell-street, Strand, and to be had of all Booksellers and News-vendors.

VAN BUTCHELL ON FISTULA, &c.—Just published, Fourth Edition, in 8vo. cloth boards, price 7s. 6d., enlarged.

FACTS AND OBSERVATIONS relative to a successful mode of treating Piles, Fistula, Hemorrhoidal Excrescences, Tumours, and Strictures, without cutting or confinement. Illustrated with numerous cases. Being a familiar exposition of the practice of Mr. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur.

This Volume presents to us a number of illustrations of his singular success under circumstances that would have induced despair in any professor of less mastery, or less accustomed to accomplish cures where cures seemed impossible. The statements here made are most convincing, and place beyond doubt the superiority of the treatment to which they refer.—Court Journal.

Published by H. Renshaw, sold also by the Author, No. 16, Percy-street, Bedford-square.

A STAUNCH TEETOTALER.

TO NOBLES, GENTLEMEN, OR LORDS OF MANORS.

Wanted by a steady, active man, of industrious habits, a permanent situation as Bailiff, Finder, or Keeper of a Manor or common lands. He is well acquainted with the duties of the office, having for some years filled a similar situation; and the greatest assiduity may be relied on, and the most satisfactory testimonials can be produced as to his character and capacity. A line addressed, post-paid, A. B. Mr. Taylor's, carrier, High-street, Hampstead, will meet with immediate attention.

ROBERT RICHARDS, Manufacturer of SACKS, TARPULINS, TILTS, TENTS, FLAGS, BRD SACKINGS, and every article in Rope and Twine, at the Lowest Prices for Ready Money. Country orders promptly executed.

Address, Robert Richards, 4, Grey Coat-street, Westminster.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY, 94, CANNON-STREET, Near Walbrook.

BLACK TEA. a. d.
The very best Black Tea imported, full-flavoured strong rich Pekoe kind 5 5
Black Leaf wavy Rough Congou, highly recommended 5 0
Strong black leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee-houses 4 5
GREEN TEA.
The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder a strong rich full-flavoured tea, the very best imported 6 0
Fine Hyson cowslip kind equal to any that can be bought 6 0
Young Hyson strongly recommended 6 0
Best Plantation Coffee 2 0
Fine Mocha Coffee 2 0
Finest Sliced Cocoa 6 10
Best Spanish Chocolate 6 10

NEWLY RUPTURED PERSONS

are generally unacquainted with the properties of a Truss, or where to procure the best remedy for that distressing visitation. Read "Cobbett's Legacy to ruptured people." Rheumatic subjects are likewise ignorant that their sufferings can be subdued by external means. A single post letter, on either subject, may be had of WILLIAM COLES, the Patentee and Truss-maker to the Forces, 3, Charing Cross. Those who keep Boyle's Court Guide will find much valuable information on these important subjects. See "Index." Read the Civil Engineer for August.

DR. PERRENGTON'S TONIC APERIENT LIQUEUR.

"The Tonic combined with the Aperient enforces its action without weakening the organs."—Dr. Holland, Physician Extraordinary to the Queen.—The properties of this incomparable medicine are in a great measure shown by its name. It is a Tonic, containing the concentrated essence of the most valuable indigenous and exotic Invigorants, strengthening the Stomach, sharpening the Appetite, exhilarating the Spirits and bracing the Nerves. As an Aperient, it acts with gentleness and cordiality, without griping, nausea, or flatulence. It quickly removes Giddiness, Headache, wind in the Stomach, Spasm and Colic. It is a most effectual remedy for Indigestion, whether arising from debility or excess in Epicurean indulgences. For habitual costiveness it is unrivalled, whilst, to crown the whole, its taste is a combination of the slightest but finest bitterness, with the most exquisite aroma, and delicate flavour that ever met the approbation of the most refined palate. For further information respecting its composition, and virtues the reader is referred to Perrengeton's Popular Treatise on the Stomach, this interesting work is presented to purchasers of the Tonic Aperient, which is sold in Bottles, at 7s. 6d., and 4s. 6d. Wholesale and Retail at the Central Depot, 44, Gerrard-street, also at 6, Bruton-street, Bond-street; by Wilkinson, 248, Strand; Johnson, Cornhill; Decastro and Watson, Knightsbridge; Swire, 14, Edgeware-road; Weatherby, 5, Bridge-street, Westminster; Sangers, Oxford-street, Huntsman, High-street, Camden-Town; King, 332, Surrey-street, Blackfriars-road; Mr. James Sequerra, 132, High-street, Whitechapel; Walker, corner of Grove-road, Boro'; and all Medicine Vendors.

NOTICE.

L. KYEZOR, (From Geneva,) WATCH

AND CLOCK MANUFACTURER, 16, TOTTENHAM-COURT-ROAD, nearly opposite Great Russell-street, and at 17, Upper George-street, Edgeware-road, takes the present opportunity of returning his sincere thanks to the public for the great encouragement he has met with for the last thirty years, and begs to inform them that he continues to employ ten experienced workmen, both French and English, for repairing Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Musical Boxes, &c., of every description. He has made a reduction of one-half the price usually charged by others in the trade.

Common Watch glasses, 3d., Double Flint 6d., Lunet glass, 1s. 3d., Gilt Watch hands, pair, 9d., Watch Dials, 3s., Main-spring, 3s., Verge, 3s. 6d., Hair-spring, 1s. 3d., Watch cleaning, 1s. 6d., Chains, 1s. 6d., Gold Watch hands, pair, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 30-hour Clock, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 8-day Clock, 3s. 6d.

Chronometers, Duplex, Horizontal, Lever, and Repeating Watches of every description, both Foreign and English. Turret, Spring, and Musical Clocks, &c., and every other article in the trade as cheap in proportion.

Every Watch and Clock brought to repair, will be taken to pieces in the presence of the person who brings it, and the fault shown, to prevent the overcharges that are generally made.

L. K. calls the attention of the public to his extensive stock of Clocks, all of which are his own manufacture, and will warrant them free of expense for seven years, provided they will be found 40 per cent. cheaper than any Watchmaker can afford them, they not being the real manufacturers.

N. B. Clocks of every description wound up and kept in repair at 15s. per annum.

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS.

Thomas Bax, Bishopgate Without
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Poultry Lane
Job Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell Spicer, New Bridge Street
Henry Sterry, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Cheap-side
T. G. Darton, Gracechurch Street
Russell Jeffry, Gracechurch Street
Joseph Sterry, Junr., Southwark
Henry Tucker, South Street

A Pocket Diary for 1840, with Life and Annuity Tables, &c., may be had on application at the office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced, some few years ago, by this Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

Arthur Street, West London Bridge. A. A. FRY, Secretary.

ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100

To the Assured, on attaining the Age of 20, 25, 30, 35, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age next Birth Day	50	55	60	65
15	3 8 9	2 3 9	1 15 9	1 15 0
16	2 10 9	2 1 6	1 12 9	1 12 0
17	2 12 5	2 6 3	1 9 9	1 12 0
18	2 14 5	2 7 9	1 2 0	1 15 0
19	2 16 5	2 9 3	2 3 5	1 19 0
20	2 18 9	2 11 0	2 4 8	2 0 0
21	3 1 9	2 12 9	2 5 6	2 1 0
22	3 3 9	2 14 6	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 3	2 16 6	2 8 6	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 9	2 10 3	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 0	2 12 1	2 5 0
26	3 15 9	3 3 9	2 14 0	2 6 0
27	3 19 7	3 6 3	2 16 0	2 7 0
28	4 3 9	3 8 9	2 18 3	2 8 6
29	4 8 3	3 12 0	3 0 3	2 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 3	3 2 9	2 11 6
31	4 18 3	3 18 9	3 5 3	2 13 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 6	3 7 9	2 15 0
33	5 10 9	4 6 6	3 10 6	2 17 6
34	5 18 3	4 11 0	3 13 9	2 19 0
35	6 6 3	4 15 6	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 1 0	4 0 9	3 3 6
37	—	5 7 3	4 4 3	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1 6	4 13 9	3 12 0
40	—	6 8 9	4 18 9	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 9	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 3	4 4 6
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 6
45	—	—	6 11 9	4 10 0

A TEMPERANCE COFFEE-HOUSE

TO BE DISPOSED OF.
Address, Prepaid, to I. N., at Mr. Square's, 12, Pierpoint-row, Islington.

SIGHT RESTORED.

NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.

THIS is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the Eyes and Head.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vade Mecum.

Dr. Andrews also recommended its use as a preventive. (See his report when in Sun. and published in the Times, Cheltenham Journal, and Bristol Traveller, in November, 1831.) He says:—"The herbaceous snuff of the snuff had such an effect on the stomach, as well as the nerves of the head, from the tonic sympathy of the mentis, of the same with the nervous system, that Grimstone's Snuff, when taken frequently must prevent any contagion, and is universal adoption."—Times, 10th Nov., 1831.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield's, Esq., Letter.

THE ECCENTRIC SNUFF-TAKER.

Should trade be dull and sales so rough,

Oh! give me then a pinch of snuff;

Give me my box a pinch to take,

Even when I'm pleased, or pleasure's sake.

When fortune's frown disturbs my mind,

And friends appear to grow unkind;

Relief I seek within my box,

My system is quite or lonesome.

When a true friend perchance I meet,

I cheerfully his person greet.

A hearty "How d're do?" takes place,

When lo! my snuff-box shows its face.

My multifarious box supplies

A recipe for weaker eyes:

That man must be a silly goose

Who thoughtlessly condemns its use.

If my proboscis could but speak,

"I would often say the dose repeat:

Each grateful sneeze and titillation

Excites a frequent iteration.

Then here's my glass in which I boast,

Success to that which I love most.

Reader, I pray don't think me bluff—

Mark well the hint!—GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

To Mr. W. GRIMSTONE, W. H. H. E. Cooper's Arms, Bristol.

30, Broad-street, Bloomsbury.

Observe this Caution—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE IN-

VENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.

Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of

GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

Mr. A. McIntyre, aged 63, No. 8, Silver-street, Golden-square, cured of gutta serena and deafness.

H. Liston, Esq., Marine Library, Ramsgate, Kent, cured of cataract and deafness.

Mrs. Hackett, cured while at Jamaica of gutta serena, &c.

Queen-street, London.

Mr. P. Saunderson, No. 10, Harper-street, Leeds, cured of cataract.

Mr. H. Pluckwell, Tottenham House, Tottenham, Middlesex, cured of ophthalmia.

Mrs. S. Englefield, Park-street, Windsor, cured of nervous head-ache.

Marchioness de Broglie Solari, 48, Charlotte-street, hearing and sight restored.

Decimus Blackburn, Esq., Chertsey, Surrey, head-ache, weakness, and dimness of sight cured.

George Smith, Esq., 6, York-place, Kentish town, weakness and dimness of sight cured by its use.—(See letter.)

Elizabeth Robson, 19, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, aged 72, cured of Ophthalmia and deafness.

Copy of a letter sent to Mr. Grimstone, Feb. 10th, 1840.

Sir,—Having been afflicted with bad eyes for a long time, a friend who had received benefit from using your Eye Snuff, recommended it to me. I have taken the contents of your 2s. 6d. canister, and am happy to say my sight has improved, the weakness and dimness is removed, and, Sir, it is my wish that you may make this known for the good of the public. Yours,

GEORGE SMITH

6, York-place, Kentish Town.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Inventor of Eye Snuff, 30 Broad-street,

Bloomsbury, March 12th, 1840.

Sir—I have been afflicted for many years with a severe pain in my head, attended with a dimness of sight, and during part of my eyes, for which I have had the most medical advice; indeed, I have taken large quantities, without receiving any relief, but I am now delighted to say, with truth that ever since using your valuable Eye Snuff, which I have taken copiously, that is a 2s. 6d. canister weekly, I am free from those excruciating pains, and can read the smallest print, although I am in the 65th year of my age. This is a most economical, and shall be most happy to give it to you or any respectable oculist at my residence as under. I remain, with gratitude, sir, your obedient humble servant.

F. ROSSON

10, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, March 18th.

This other famous Herbaceous Compound of Herbs is sold in con-centers at 1s., 2s., 3s., 4s., 5s., and 10s. 6d., by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists in town and country. In whom Dealers may be supplied. It can be obtained in all the principal towns and cities. A liberal allowance to Shipper, owners, exporters, and all vendors of Grimstone's Eye Snuff. This celebrated Snuff is chosen by a numerous of the globe, and remains in perfect condition on every climate. All Snuffs and Cigars shipped on the shortest notice.

Proprietors of newspapers and periodicals are particularly requested not to insert any of Mr. Grimstone's advertisements without a written order, as no account, in future, will be paid without his authority for the insertion.

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH, Messrs.

R. MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which Messrs. M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation; they are fastened without Springs, Wires, or Ligatures even, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication. DECAYED TEETH filled up and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs. M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Diamond in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Beautified Equal to the Finest Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed. With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery, scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Fish-bury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore-Street.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid to the care of the Printer.

Published for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

London.—J. WILKIN, Printer, 35, Red Cross St. &c.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c., &c.

VOL. I. No. 13.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO THE PUBLIC.

"THE TEETOTALER" is the property of a number of Shareholders, who are all members of the United Temperance Association: the principal meetings of which society are held at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. In order that "The Teetotaler" may be widely circulated amongst that class whose means will not permit them to become subscribers to it, it has been resolved to establish a GRATUITOUS DISTRIBUTION FUND: or, in other words, to receive donations from those who advocate the cause of Teetotalism, and to disburse the amounts so collected in printing a number of copies of the Journal for gratuitous circulation. An appeal is therefore made to the rich and the charitable, in favour of the uneducated and the poor; and even those, who do not profess the doctrines of Teetotalism, are invited to subscribe to the Fund, the object of which is to promote a purely humane and philanthropic view.

Donations to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be received by Mr. H. W. WESTON, Treasurer of the Fund, and Hon. Secretary to the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, No. 12, Basing-Lane, Bread-Street, Cheapside; Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Editor of "The Teetotaler," No. 11, Suffolk Place, Hackney-Road; Mr. STRANGE, Publisher, Paternoster-Row; and Mr. WILSON, Printer, 58, Red-Cross-Street.

A list of the Subscribers to the Gratuitous Distribution Fund will be published, with the several amounts of donations, every month.

Amount of Subscriptions already received £13. 14s. 5d.

THE APOSTLE.
To Illustrate Chapter XI. (No. 14).

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER I.

THE LAPSE OF FOUR YEARS.

Four years had passed away since the union of Victor Melville and Louise. The marriage, during this period, was blest by a boy and girl; and an uninterrupted series of prosperity had seemed to recompense the young couple for the misfortunes of the few weeks prior to their union. Victor had soon found publishers for his works, now that he was no longer the needy author soliciting patronage; and the world greedily sought after and devoured all that was written by the wealthy novelist. He was soon courted by all the eminent literary men of the day; he became a member of scientific institutions and learned societies; and every relation of authors was considered incomplete unless it reckoned him amongst its numbers.

Melville, as we observed at the conclusion of the first part of this eventful narrative, hired a house in a fashionable street at the West End of London, and was soon courted by the wealthy and the great. Young men about town sought an introduction to him, because he was profuse with his hospitality, elegant in his style of living, and liberal with his purse; and families readily accepted the invitations of la cherissime Fauspaise (as our hero's wife was called) to the delicious soupers and parties, the arrangements of which only French taste can fully organize and complete.

Expensive habits were soon contracted by the young man; and, in spite of the occasional remonstrances of his fair partner, he pursued a career of fashionable dissipation which menaced his purse in an alarming manner. But his reiterated asseverations that he could command any amount at the hands of his publishers for anything he chose to write, and the fact that he occasionally brought home large sums for which his wife could not otherwise account, succeeded in tranquillizing her mind. With the amiability which was natural to her disposition, Louise suffered her husband to superintend the full control of their finances, although all their fortune belonged to her; and so long as he behaved kindly to her, and so long as she was enabled to enjoy the pleasure of her children's presence, Louise did not often permit any evil forebodings with respect to the future to enter her imagination. The young mother centered all her affections in her domestic enjoyments; and when occasionally Victor remained abroad until a very late hour, she did not reproach him, because his literary engagements were pleaded as an excuse.

For some time after their union, Melville never touched even the more harmless kinds of intoxicating liquors. He shuddered when he recollected that all the dreadful risks he had run of ending his days upon the gibbet of the malefactor, were to be traced to the vice of intemperance which he had suffered to gain upon him; and he long abjured the most moderate use of wine and strong drink. And, during that interval, he was joyous and happy: he rose early, and sate down to his literary pursuits with pleasure to himself; and all he wrote was remarkable for a vigour of language and a freshness of idea which at once ensured the success of his productions. But, as he became acquainted with literary friends, and as he gradually got introduced to their clubs and places of résunion, he was again induced to partake of a little wine; and then he satisfied —or fancied that he satisfied the scruples of his conscience with the idea that he had seen too much of the dread effects of intemperance ever to indulge to excess again. But the moderate quantity of wine which he drank, soon increased little by little; and now and then—at distant intervals—he was induced to pledge his friends in cups so deep that he experienced the results, both mentally and physically, on the following morning. Dread for the future would then for a moment take possession of his soul; but he quieted these fears and compunctions by the wretched sophistry invariably used on such occasions.

"It is ridiculous to suppose that I can ever become a drunkard again," he would say to himself. "I must not debar myself from a little indulgence, but I will not take more than is proper for me in future. I should be a wretch, indeed, if I could not control my own habits. And then, one cannot appear ridiculous before one's friends: one must do as others do. All I have to do is to be careful."

And, thus, by imitating the evil example of his friends in order not to be laughed at,—and by doing as others did, so as not to be thought singular, Melville soon abandoned those abstemious habits which had characterized his honeymoon, and drank his wine after dinner with all the ease and freedom that distinguish this vicious custom at the tables of the fashionable and wealthy. We however repeat that he did not very frequently suffer himself to be led into an excess; but still the quantity of his daily potations increased by almost imperceptible degrees; and the intervals between the periods when he imbibed too much, became shorter and shorter. He did not perceive these circumstances; or if he did, he called some foolish reasoning to his aid, in order to dissipate gloomy reflections.

On the whole, the first four years which succeeded the union of Melville and Louise, were characterized by that tranquillity and absence of actual misfortune, which the world denominates happiness. Louise expanded from the sweet and retiring girl into the fascinating and amiable woman,—one of those tender mothers, who know how to make their maternal feelings one of the greatest ornaments of their character, without carrying them to the excess of obtrusiveness. Her children thrive in beauty and amiability; and the literary reputation acquired by her husband was the only element of human pride which found a resting-place in her bosom.

Four years thus passed away; and Melville was suddenly awakened to the appalling fact that his expenditure had greatly exceeded his income, and that if he pursued the same costly style of living he had adopted since his marriage, the remnant of the handsome dowry of Louise would soon be swallowed up. He came to this conviction one evening as he was sitting in his study, and during an interval of rest from the fatigue of composition. He was writing a new book; and the sudden phantasy of examining the state of his finances had seized upon him. The result was anything but satisfactory, as we have just stated; and the waste and extravagance of which he had been guilty now struck him with all the violence of remorse. He had been methodical enough to keep memoranda of his expenditure; and, as his eyes wandered over the various items of disbursement in his account-book, he saw the name of his wine-merchant occurring very, very often. He had the curiosity to calculate the amount he had paid during those four years, for the expensive wines with which he had been in the habit of regaling his friends; and the aggregate was so enormous, that he almost started from his seat with dismay. He felt that there must be something wrong in the domestic economy of fashionable households, when the amount of the wine-merchant's bill so greatly exceeded that of the butcher—the retailer of wholesome and necessary food; and then—oh! strange inconsistency! he hastened to soothe the disagreeable reflections awakened by this conviction, in the very liquor the expense of which caused his dissatisfaction with himself. Yes—alone in his study, did he again fly to the bottle for an evanescent consolation; when his wife and beautiful children were a few rooms distant from him, and could have been a more efficient source of happiness than all the artificial delights which he found in the bottle.

Suddenly the door opened, and a servant announced Mr. Terrywhist. Melville, whose cheeks were flushed with drinking, staggered to meet his old acquaintance, whom he had not seen for some time, and desired him to be seated. He then ordered the servant, as a matter of course, to place another bottle of wine upon the table; and when this command was executed, and the domestic had withdrawn, Mr. Terrywhist, whose peculiar failing the reader will probably recollect, expounded the object of his visit.

"My dear Sir," said this gentleman, "I have a most important—a very particular, and a singularly remarkable favour to solicit at your hands—a favour I feel confident you will not refuse, inasmuch as it is an old friend who asks it."

Melville sipped his wine, and awaited the climax of this apostrophe.

"My daughter—my dearest daughter Elizabeth, Mr. Melville," pursued the old gentleman, "is to be married to-morrow. To-morrow, she changes her name of Terrywhist for the equally honourable though probably less euphonious one of Chizzelhurst; and my fondest hope—my most sanguine expectation—my enthusiastic wish is that you will honour us with your company at the déjeuner à la fourchette which Mrs. Terrywhist will provide!"

Melville expressed his readiness to accede to this request; and Mr. Terrywhist drank off a couple of glasses of wine, one after the other, with all the gravity which usually accompanies a good action.

"I felicitate you upon the intended marriage of your daughter," said Melville, after a long pause.

"Ah! you may indeed felicitate me," said Mr. Terrywhist. "I have found a treasure in Mr. Chizzelhurst—a great treasure. I can assure you upon that veracity which was never impeached! In a word, my dear Sir," added Mr. Terrywhist, "my future son-in-law is a man of your stamp—a genius—an unknown Milton—a private Byron—a domestic Scott—a—a—"

"A very clever fellow, I suppose," said Victor, seeing that his companion hesitated.

"Exactly, my dear Sir," answered the old gentleman, grateful for this suggestion. "And if you wish for a proof of my future son-in-law's super-admirable, transcendent, and unparalleled abilities, you have only to peruse this effusion."

As he uttered these words with a more than usual pomposity, Mr. Terrywhist slowly extracted a pink paper from his pocket, and handed it to Melville, who was just sober enough to be enabled to read the following lines, which were addressed "to Miss Elizabeth Terrywhist, by her adoring lover!"—

When a man cannot pay his debts, he Must go to quail my charming Betsy—
And, though the fault may be his,
Still is he doomed to stay in prison.

Such is my case. A large amount
Of love, for which I can't account,
I owe my dearest girl, I own—
But how to pay it, I don't know.

I understand your heart and I,
As in the spider's web the fly,
But there's no Insolvency Court
To which my love can have resort.

As old rag will burn to tinder,
So has my heart become a tinder—
Be careful to the man who sets ye
A good example, dearest Betsy.

So now no more from one who knows
That he is yours from head to toes,
For I'm your last love and your first—
Your old devoted Chizzelhurst!

"Fare!" said Mr. Terrywhist, rising as Melville returned him the paper, "what do you think of that?"

"Excellent," answered our hero, with difficulty suppressing a laugh.

"Good-bye for the present, my dear Sir," said the old gentleman. "We shall expect you and your amiable wife to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock precisely. You shall then have an opportunity of forming the acquaintance of one of the most erudite persons in existence—no other, indeed, than the author of that pathetic poem which you have just read."

Mr. Terrywhist consigned the paper to his pocket with the care which any one would naturally bestow upon so valuable a document, and then gravely took his leave. At that moment the time-piece upon the mantel in Victor's elegantly furnished study struck eleven; and our hero pushed away from before him the writing materials with an impatient air. He felt that he had partaken too copiously of the wine which had effected so deep an inroad upon his property; and, in spite of the flow of artificial spirits which it had produced, he could not avoid the thought that he was again laying himself open to the wiles of a most dangerous enemy. He rose from his chair, with the intention of seeking his wife in the drawing room, and banishing his infelicitous thoughts by hearkening to the melody of her sweet voice, when the door of his study was again opened, and a servant entered the apartment.

"A gentleman wishes to speak to you immediately, Sir," said the domestic.

"Who is he?" demanded Melville.

"A stranger, Sir," was the answer; "and he said that it was no use to give his name."

"Let him come up," returned our hero.

The servant withdrew; and in a few moments the visitor was ushered into the room. Melville advanced a few steps to meet him; but he retreated with feelings of horror and disgust, when he recognized the features of his ancient companion in iniquity—Mr. Tibbatts.

(To be continued in our next.)

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. IV.

BUT America was not always to remain a mere outpost of European discord. The peaceful gaze of genius was upon her; the most brilliant intellect of the age was busily prefiguring to itself the precious benefits that must ensue from the judicious appropriation of her soil. The vanity of the states of antiquity was not satisfied until they claimed a demigod for their founder; the magnificent monument of America may esteem itself honoured in being indebted for its discovery to Columbus; the United States in owing their early settlement to Raleigh. Strange is it, and somewhat like retributive justice, that the victim of the jealousy or weakness of a king, whose excellent notions of kingship have never been surpassed, should have been the planter of a state which proves how possible it is to dispense with kings. His name now excites no emotion in America; but there was a time when it was associated with proud remembrance and fond regret; and it is pleasing," says Mr. Graham, "to observe how the earliest historians of America claim kindred between him and their country, and blend with their narrative occasional references to his fortunes and fate." But it was to the desert effects of this great man that she was indebted for the permanent establishment of English civilization in her wilds. The four attempts made at his own cost entirely failed. It was not until twenty-two years after the landing of the first colony at Beaufort, that the company of merchants, to whom he had ceded his patent, founded James-town, and laid the first basis of a society, which by continuous increase, has at length expanded into a numerous and powerful people.

The stream of colonization, from this period, flowed without intermission, though with various degrees of rapidity, towards the vast Atlantic border of North America. Before the close of the seventeenth century, the name of Virginia, originally given to this extensive region, was confined to a single province; and eleven colonies sprung up, possessing chartered governments, and a population of more than 800,000 souls. The motives and views of the emigrants were various, but almost all intelligent and sound. The spirit of adventurous enterprise with which every fibre of England thrilled, the profound agitation of intellect, of which the first phase was the Reformation, and the second the Usurpation, diffusing an intense desire for action, the wrongs and retaliations of civil discords placing men and principles in deadly opposition to each other; the coarse and selfish liberty, so noble when it is oppressed, so haughty and despotic when it can itself oppress, yet so precious without, glad of a refuge from defeat; religious enthusiasm as in the puritan, gloomy, and almost as savage as the wilderness it sought; or, as in the Quaker, so gentle and so mild as to seem as little capable of resisting the rude buffets of society, as the most fragile vase the hurry and bustle of a boisterous crowd; all these, combined with commercial speculations, and the usual portion of low and sordid gain, composed the projectile force that launched the colonies into their great career. It amuses us, indeed, to read, that, of the first recruits of the little colony planted at James-town, in 1607, the greater part were gentlemen, a few were labourers, and some were jewellers and refiners of gold; and we should be tempted to doubt that any but temporary purposes were contemplated by its founders, if we did not discover that one of the earliest returns made by the colonist, within a year after their settlement, was a batch of admirals, recorders, chronologists, and justices of peace, very respectable ornaments to an old society, but very inconvenient consumers in a new one. The early history of this earliest of the English colonies, during the toils and hardships of its first struggles, especially with its first governor, Smith, is of the most precious interest. The country that could produce so remarkable a man must have possessed, even at that period, rich elements of national character: for his qualities were of that homely, though sterling kind, that are less personal in the individual than indicative of the moral and social influence in which he has been placed. Of undaunted courage, moral as well as physical, purest simplicity and integrity, profound and manly piety, he was possessed of that mental constitution, which bears the unpretending name of common sense, but which in him, as in the future champion of American liberty, attained an elevation which places it almost on a level with genius. Abundant proofs of the qualities we here assign to him, will be found even in the brief sketch we shall offer, in our proceeding notices of the progress of Virginia. An abstract of the history of this colony, as well as that of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, interspersed with incidental allusions to the other provinces, will furnish a tolerable picture of the condition of the American people from the period of their first colonization to that of their revolution.

To be continued.

DRUNKENNESS.

DRUNKENNESS, considered in a physical point of view, is that derangement of the animal economy which is produced by drinking spirituous or fermented liquors. The effects of fermented liquor on the animal economy arises from its stimulating power, or the power which it possesses of exciting the muscular parts, and increased rapidity and strength of action, as well as the nervous and mental qualities to an unusual and unnatural degree of ardour. When the animal functions are carried on with languor and feebleness, from whatever cause, the general sensations of the body are uneasy, restless, and to a degree of pain. Thus, after long fasting, want of sleep, fatigue, or disease, this condition of the frame exists, and prompts us instinctively to the employment of some stimulus. We should then discriminate between a right stimulus and an improper one: a good meal or a warm bath will be found the correct stimulus, and intoxicating drinks will prove the dangerous and unnatural one. The immediate effect of a good meal is the diffusion of a general sensation through the body, the relaxation and softness of the previous state are superseded by a general pleasurable feeling of warmth and energy, accompanied by an indescribable tranquillity and composure, of which the countenance is enlivened with a glow of animation, in consequence of the free circulation through the numerous blood-vessels, and the relaxed and supple muscular parts, which were before languid and stiff.

This natural and necessary degree of excitement, both mental and corporeal, is the result of a proper stimulus—i.e., a hearty and wholesome meal, without the aid of intoxicating drinks. This is the excitement of nature, as consistent with, and according to, the healthy operation of the constitution, and contributes to preserve the frame of life to its latest spark.

But when the healthy excitement is called into requisition, the stimulating effects of the stimulus become diseased. The excitement is improperly quickened, so that the whole surface glows with redness and uneasy warmth—the face is flushed—the eyes become suffused with a degree of redness from the blood being carried into the smaller vessels, which are ordinarily as they ought to be transparent with lymph only. The passions and disposition are also elevated beyond their natural pitch, and a fearful and dangerous reaction must be anticipated. "In the human," says Dr. Johnson, "the constant source of excitement is the desire of courage and bashfulness for confidence. . . . A weak mind and body are not animated by the use of intoxicating liquors, in all its qualities and functions, for above the accustomed powers naturally inherent in the constitution.

This state of most injurious excitement manifests itself in various ways, in different individuals, and also under the influence of different species of liquor. Thus, intoxication from drinking port or other malt liquors, which contain the narcotic substance of the hop or other vegetable, together with much mastic and matter, and are drunk in large quantities, is generally accompanied with more of stupor than the intoxication occasioned by distilled spirits; and the same may be said of the heavier wines, as compared with the lighter or those which contain carbonic acid gas. But the variety of the symptoms of drunkenness depends much more on the natural disposition, and on the corporeal temperament of the individual, than on the species of the intoxicating liquor. We thus see some in their cups mild and gentle, while others are fierce and implacable; this one is complaisant to his enemy, and forgetful of injury; that person is insensible to his friend and thoughtful of revenge. This man is gay and loquacious; that one dull, silent, and sullen; and another is turbulent and loud, making the place of his orgies echo with oaths and imprecations. As in other species of insanity, the inebriated feel not the blush of shame; and the drunkard degrades himself below the brute which he imitates. A man, who is naturally of a merciful disposition, becomes a fiend when under the influence of liquor; and full of truth is the popular phrase that "such-an-one is disguised in drink."

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.

Bridged from the original Tract written

By THE REV. JOHN FRANCIS WITTY.

AMONGST all the discoveries that have been made by philosophers and philanthropists, and all the moral achievements which have ever been effected by political economists, or Christian patriots, no discovery has been made more adapted to accomplish the end in view, and to meet the case of the enslaved and demoralized portion of our fellow-creatures, than that connected with the present temperance movement. Until within the last few years no effectual barrier has been raised against the malignant influence of intemperance, and no means, however good and efficient in other respects, have been successfully employed for impeding the destructive effects of the wide-spreading evil, or for the overthrow of the monstrous idol of Britain's idolatry. A way, however, of effectual and glorious liberty has at length been discovered. The greatest moral reformation has been commenced, and the mighty movement is now producing effects the most astonishingly magnificent. It is a reformation that is based upon imperishable principles,—a machinery of vast and incalculable power, moved by intellectual force, and scientific discoveries. It is formed upon the most extensive scale, and will ere long produce such a mighty and beneficial revolution in our country, as shall occasion the greatest delight to the friends, and promoters of such benevolent objects, and fill with consternation and shame interested opponents of their country's welfare. It is founded with enthusiasm that we entertain such expectations. We look at the chains that have awakened this concern for the enslaved in England, Ireland, Scotland, and America; we think of the instrumentality employed; we look at the amazing change already produced, and contemplate the success which has crowned our Temperance Societies, in the Five Millions enrolled total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors; and we cannot but look forth with confidence to the clouds which have long obscured the prospects of England and Ireland, and expect the removal of an evil which has long been an extensive and destructive curse.

In this solemn enterprise and noble reformation, will not you, brethren of the Church of England, engage? Shall other churches and nations take part in this war against such a monster, as we, and we without our aid? Shall the temperance banner which has gathered millions around it, be unfurled, and we raise no standard in order to stem the awful torrent of iniquity which is every year carrying thousands of our fellow-creatures to the gates of eternity? Can you bear of thousands of broken-hearted widows, miserable wives, and starving children, and feel no distress for the cause of such wretchedness? Is it possible that the withering influence of this curse, as seen in lunatic asylums, workhouses, hospitals, and prisons, and yet we remain indifferent and inactive? Does its pestilential influence extend over the sea and land, villages and towns, amongst the learned and unlearned, Christians and infidels, and shall not our patriotism be aroused, our benevolence excited, and our charity called into active service?

You have nobly and successfully attacked heathenism and idolatry in the distant lands. You have protested against slavery, and with undiminished boldness, are seeking the entire extinction of the slave trade. You have established institutions for widows and orphans, and provided for the afflicted, poor, and blind. Let your Christian charity, which has led you so effectively to overthrow slavery in so many heathen countries, now lead you to join in the attempt now making to emancipate our country from the most fearful slavery, and deliver our fellow-creatures from the most heinous and sanguinary traffic which has ever existed, despite influence, over body and mind. Remember, I beseech you, that it is not for countries you have never seen that I now plead, or for people that are separated by seas and mountains, that I desire to move your sympathy, and engage your benevolent exertions. No, Christian friends, it is in behalf of thousands of your own countrymen. Some are Sabbath-breakers, some sensitives, some prostitutes, some thieves, some blasphemers, and some murderers. All more or less under the malignant and maddening influence of intoxicating drinks. Many struggles with conscience and mental conflicts have been endured before such stages of iniquity were reached, but such are the polluting and emboldening effects of this prolific cause of every species of bodily sensuality and vice, that persons naturally kind and generous, moral and industrious, and in many instances religiously educated, have become hardened and cruel, like and perverse, and when under the influence of this insinuating and insidious poison, have been prepared for the perpetration of the most awful deeds of cruelty or perdition.

With respect to thousands who through intoxicating liquors have terminated a miserable life either by the river, the rope, the razor, the pistol, in the madhouse, in the prison, or in the hospital, you can render no assistance; they have received the wages of sin; and as it regards many now in prisons and lunatic asylums you may be unable to do any thing; yet for the sake of thousands whom you may benefit and save from a drunkard's doom; for the sake of starving wives and weeping mothers; and for the sake of worse than fatherless children, deserted, or doomed to ignorance, misery, and vice—come forward and help us by your donations, subscriptions, personal influence, advocacy, example, and prayers!

MR. ROWBOTHAM'S LAST LECTURE.

THIS overwhelming champion of the publicans determined a few evenings ago to give a lecture against Teetotalism, which should at once annihilate a doctrine professed by five millions of individuals, and establish the cause of the brewers, distillers, and retailers of intoxicating liquors for ever! Placards were accordingly posted all over the metropolis, and advertisements inserted in all the journals, to announce Mr. Rowbotham's intention of delivering an anti-teetotal lecture in a room which he had hired for the occasion in a house up an alley, down a court, in the eminently respectable and fashionable neighbourhood of Rosemary Lane.

It is not necessary to particularize dates; suffice it to say that, on the evening announced, the room, which was airy and conveniently situated up four pair of stairs and a ladder, on the top of the house, close to a large stack of chimneys, and just beneath the eilings,—this eligible place of assembly, we say, was lighted up with a pound of sixes properly distributed, to the utter dismay of three or four fowls that were roosting on the beams which ran across this room. Indeed, Mr. Rowbotham's enemies have declared that the room was nothing more than a loft; but Mr. Rowbotham has since addressed a letter to the Evening Newspaper to deny the foul aspersion.

The forms and chairs were all properly arranged by an old woman who had been paid a shilling in advance for her trouble; and sundry cob-webs had been swept away from the walls and corners. Mr. Rowbotham surveyed these preparations with eyes beaming with delight, and then commenced his calculations as follows.

"Now, I think," said he to the respectable and respected char-woman who had perfected these arrangements, "this will be a glorious evening for me. I should say that this room will hold three hundred people; and I know that it will be crowded to excess. Three hundred persons will go away, with my lecture in their hearts."

"Yes, Sir," interrupted Mrs. Dikings; "and if you gave emagin free grants for nothink, they'd go away with that too in their heads."

"So they would," Mrs. Dikings," said Mr. Rowbotham, with a benignant smile upon the amiable brow of seventy-two who had just addressed him. "But, as I was saying, these three hundred people will talk about my lecture to nine hundred more; because each one must converse about it to at least three; and thus twelve hundred individuals will feel the proper impression I am so anxious to make. Then each one pays one penny admission; and three hundred pence make—how much, Mrs. Dikings? Have you got a bit of chalk?"

The attentive woman gave a reply in the negative and regarded herself with a pinch of snuff.

"Oh, I know," continued Mr. Rowbotham, "the amount will be one pound five. Let me see, then, one shilling the room—one shilling for you—sixpence halfpenny the candles—fivepence halfpenny gin and beer for you and me—two shillings placards; and that makes five shillings. The publican round the corner paid for the advertisements in the papers, and so I shall just have a pound clear for myself. That's capital! If I don't have a regular flow-out of bottled temper, onions, and half-and-half after it's all over my name isn't Rowbotham!"

And as he uttered these words he struck his hand violently—not upon his brow, as a novelist or romance-writer would have made him do—but on the very identical high chair which had been raised upon an inverted washing-tub for himself.

"Hush!" said Mrs. Dikings, "the company's a-comin'."

And sure enough the company did come, at that precise moment, in the person of a small boy who, with his hands in his pockets, proceeded to seat himself upon the form facing the chair and the tub. As soon as this small boy had glanced around him in an approving manner, he relieved the monotony of the scene by whistling, with peculiar ease and grace, the popular air of The Dog's Head Man. Mrs. Dikings, seeing that her presence was no longer required, hastened to the adjacent public-house to disturb her shilling in a favourite beverage of her's, de-acquainted dog's-nose.

The time passed away—half-hour and half-hour succeeded each other, and the company was not increased. The whole audience consisted of the small boy; and not another step ascended the convenient ladder leading to the loft. Mr. Rowbotham snuffed all his candles with his fingers, and his countenance looked blue. He however reasoned that it must never be said that he had not been able to deliver his lecture for want of an audience; so he determined to make the best of a bad job, and begin,

With dire and befitting solemnity, Mr. Rowbotham walked towards the chair, and then turned towards the audience, the audience (which was the small boy) grinning amazingly the whole time.

"Order," cried Mr. Rowbotham; and the small boy immediately commenced chewing an apple.

"Pursuant to notice," said Mr. Rowbotham, "I shall now proceed to take the Chair. Those who are in favour of this motion will hold up their hands."

The small boy held up his hand accordingly.

"Against it," said Mr. Rowbotham: but of course there was no dissentient voice, because there was no other voice at all save the small boy's; and he had already delivered himself in favour of the first proposition. Mr. Rowbotham accordingly proceeded to take the chair; but the top, or rather bottom of the inverted tub took it into his head to give way just at that moment, and the lecturer rolled upon the floor. The small boy, who thought that this was some experiment in natural philosophy, and a part of the evening's entertainment, applauded amazingly; and an old cock, who was roosting on one of the beams, crowed forth in a long shrill note to complete the discomfiture of Mr. Rowbotham.

The accident was however soon remedied; Mr. Rowbotham placed the chair upon the floor, and after two or three "hema" and "ha's" proceeded to address his audience (the small boy) as follows:—

"Respected friend; you have met here—I mean you are come upon a most important business—a matter involving your comforts and your social enjoyments—nay, I may say, your very liberties, and even your life,—yes, for your life is threatened by the doctrines of the Teetotalers."

Here the small boy, who had been gazing very timidly around him from the first moment that the lecturer had commenced, and who had turned ghastly pale when he heard that his life was menaced, rose hastily from the form on which he was seated, made a desperate rush towards the top of the ladder, down which he precipitated himself in the literal sense of the word, and made his escape from the vicinity of the lecture-room with all the speed he could possibly call to his aid.

Mr. Rowbotham was somewhat disconcerted at this rapid retreat of his audience, and for a moment knew not what course to pursue. He found that his credit as a man of genius was at stake; and resolved to create an impression on the people in the street, somehow or another, that he was lecturing to a numerous audience. A thought struck him: it was a happy idea—well worthy the imagination of so great a man; and he hastened to put it into execution. He accordingly hurried to the window, threw it open, and then began bawling away with all his might, sometimes leaning half out of the window, and always keeping close to it, so that what he said might be heard in the street.

"My dear friends," roared the lecturer, "Teetotalism is folly. Water is the most deadly poison you can take, and that is the reason why water on the brain always kills its victims. I also appeal to you, as rational beings—or thinking men, are not people drowned by falling into the water? And what is the dropsy but a quantity of water hanging about the human frame? These are proofs of the deleterious effects of water. Drink gin and beer, my dear friends; there is nothing like gin and beer—unless it's wine, and that I recommend also. Look at the brewers' horses, how fat they are; and they live upon nothing but beer; and see how thin people get in the Union workhouses, because they are deprived of their gin there. All this is common sense, my dear friends. I am proud at addressing this crowded audience," (here he leant out of the window, and roared out the words "crowded audience" at the top of his voice, "and with these words I shall sit down.")

But instead of sitting down, he clapped his hands with all his might and main; jumped up and down the room, kicked down the forms, shouted "Hurrah!" and "Bravo!" and did all he could to imitate the applause of the crowded audience which existed only in his own imagination. He then departed to his own residence; but he did not have the anticipated blow-out of tripe and half-and-half.

On the following morning the daily papers all gave a most flaming account of Mr. Rowbotham's lecture; and the world believed that the "assembly room" was "densely crowded with most respectable persons," and that Mr. Rowbotham "completely succeeded in convincing his hearers of the folly of Teetotal doctrines."

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be glad to avail ourselves of the kind assistance promised by our Hull correspondent, the Rev. J. MESSER. We thank R. M. for his kindness in sending the verses, but we do not think that the insertion of poetry is pleasing to our readers. Poetry is but little sought after, even by the most refined.

Several works for review have been received, and will meet with due attention next week.

THE MARIAGE MERCHANT, a sketch by H. W. WESTON, Esq., will appear in our next.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19th, 1840.

THE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY has refused to allow a piece of land upon his estate in Ireland to be devoted to the use of Teetotalism, and for the purpose of building upon it a Hall where the disciples of this new light of reformation can assemble. We know that the march of improvement, in the shape of railways and other useful constructions, has, like every other good, its own qualifying and necessary portions of evil; and of that evil a part exists in the destruction or alteration of sites which are hallowed by their own natural charm, or sanctified by the associations connected with them. Many a scene of peaceful seclusion has been and is about to be broken into by the great highways along which the interests of the world are, henceforth, to travel in a continuous stream, and with a roar which shall prevent the hush of solitude from ever falling down upon its vallies again; and many a time-honoured edifice, round which the affections of a village, or the reverence of a world, have long learnt to cling, must be displaced by the plough-shares of science—those plough-shares which are levelling all things before them—making pathways over rivers, and under them—and conducting the vehicles of traffic through the hearts of the everlasting hills.

But the MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY was solicited to make no sacrifice, either to the affections of the village, or the reverence of the world, when a philanthropic and humane body of men petitioned the donation of a small spot of ground on which to raise a temple the sanctity and utility of which are second to those of the lanes of religion alone. The selfish—the bigotted—the prejudiced—the narrow-minded peer, found no objection to the request in the associations connected with his own heart and the plat of land solicited; but he doubtless trembled, in the plenitude of his Tory egotism, for the rapid inroads which Teetotalism is destined to make upon all the vices, the evil habits, and the revolting dissipation of the aristocratic orders of society.

THE MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY penned a miserable apology for his refusal,—that apology being based upon a pretended affection for moderate measures of social reform, and an objection to extreme methods. Now any one who knows the MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY, either personally or from report, is fully aware that his lordship is entirely opposed to all reforms whatsoever, however salutary they may be, however necessary, or however applied. Every one knows that, like the majority of his aristocratic compeers, this nobleman is the decided enemy to the interests of the middling and lower orders of society; and that any doctrine, which has a tendency to improve the minds of the working-classes and enable them to think for themselves, is certain to experience a most virulent opposition at his hands. The generality of the aristocracy tremble at the idea of education being propagated amongst the working classes; because education will teach them to contemplate the oppressed condition in which they languish; and the result of mental improvement will necessarily be an anxiety for social and political elevation. All these chances are well weighed and calculated by this intolerant and ambitious peer—this enemy to the working-classes, those pillars of the state, those founders of all the wealth which he and his equally selfish compeers possess; and he knows full well that Teetotalism is essentially calculated to amend the condition of the people. Teetotalism will enable sober parents to educate their children; a new generation will spring up—not a generation of intemperate sets, but a generation of thinkers; and the first use of an unshackled and expanded intellect will be to embrace, with adequate powers of comprehension, all the abuses and tyrannies of which the working masses are the victims. The doctrines of Teetotalism already exercise such powerful influences over the hearts and fortunes of men, and have established so wide a free-masonry, which enables far-separated minds to intercommunicate as it were, by spells less subtle, but more sure, than those of the Rosicrucians of old,—that those doctrines present, even to observers of the more careless class, the effect of some mysterious agency going on before their eyes, and suggest that results, as great as ever were sought from the lost promises of natural magic, are achieved by the magic of a system which indeed involves the principles of long life, perfect happiness, and competent fortune.

THE traveller amid the wild scenery of Derbyshire is struck, on approaching the beautiful vale of Matlock, or the town of Ashbourne, from whatever side, by the aspect of a conical hill, on the top of which are planted, side by side, two (and only two) trees, looking like twin orphans of the forest, and having actually a moral physiognomy which gives assurance of some touching story to the heart. And very touching and tender is the story which they stand there to represent,—making a portion of the lore of these vallies, and always related by the guard of the mail or stage coach which whirls you around the base of Two-tree hill. Two brothers of the neighbourhood, the last of their race,—uprooted from their ancestral soil by the decay of their ancient fortunes, were compelled to seek their bread in distant lands,—and, led by the prospects opened up to them, in opposite directions of the world. Before quitting their native valley, they met upon the hill which bears their record yet; and there they planted, each with his own hand, and side by side, these two trees, as a rallying standard to their hearts, and a pledge that they would one day return from the far places of the earth, to unite their bettered fortunes amid the hills where they were born. And through many and many a dreary winter have those trees stood there, in memory of that covenant of the heart: and through many and many a summer have they lifted up their leafy banners, to wave the wanderers back! But never have those brothers returned to the trying-trees:—never was it given to either to listen to the music which haunts amid their branches,—unless, indeed, the doctrine of Pythagoras be true,—unless the wanderers have come back on the wing of the bird, and the feeling which reared the trees be uttered yet amid their boughs, in the language of song!

Very beautiful are those memorials of the lost ones, amid the silent hills. But sad was the fate of the two brethren who placed those memorials there. The one proceeded to the East Indies; and the other to the West: but England was the point to which each turned his eyes. Never—never did they reach that point again: for dissipation cut them off at an early age,—the one beneath the scorching sun of Hindostan; the other on the sea-girt shores of Jamaica. Thus did the accursed genius of Intemperance destroy the only hope of those loving youths, and invest the fable of Two-tree hill with a sad and painful interest.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Donations and Subscriptions received by the Treasurer since our last.

FROM THE COUNTRY.

	£	s.	d.
Mr. Sulley, Market Harbo	0	5	0
Mr. Samuel Bott, Leicester	0	7	6d
Mr. John Cadbury, Birmingham	0	5	0
Mr. Thomas Thorn, Stourbridge	1	0	0
The Rev. Robert Hurley, Redditch	1	0	0
Mr. Edward Bridges, Tewkesbury	0	12	6

LONDON.

Mr. B. Smith, Wine Office Court, Fleet-st.	0	10	0
Mr. F. A. Galloway, West-st., Southwark	7	0	0
A Friend	0	4	0
Mr. H. Gillellan, Friday Street	0	5	0
Mr. J. S. Benstead, Basing Lane	0	2	6
A Friend	0	5	0

THE WAY TO INDEPENDENCE.

BY "THE PAINTER'S DEVIL."

"Now there was found a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city: yet no man remembered that same poor man. —Then said I, wisdom is better than strength, nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised and his words are not. The words of wise men are heard in quiet more than the cry of him who ruleth amongst fools. —Wisdom is better than war, but one sinner destroyeth much good." —ECCLES. 17.

WORKING MEN of England — mechanics and artisans, — dangerous as the attempt is, still we are resolved to address you: — we say dangerous, because we are well aware that if we attempt to lay before you any plan by which you can raise yourselves in the scale of society — any plan by which you can obtain your moral rights — we shall have the charge of Chartism or Socialism hurled at us with a mighty vengeance: or, if we attempt to interfere with the old, antiquated system of education, at present in vogue, we shall inherit the charge of infidelity: — and all this without the slightest reasonable ground; for Chartism, Socialism, and Infidelity, we most energetically repudiate. Again, there is danger even from yourselves: for how often do you turn again and rend the parties most anxious to save and release you from your present system of degradation.

A few poor men at Preston, six or seven years ago, started a principle which is calculated to work out all that the most philanthropic could ever desire, or that the imagination of the wildest enthusiast could ever depict. This principle — the principle of total abstinence from all that intoxicates — will, if you embrace it, save you from languishing in a state of tyrannical injustice, and enable you to regain all that you have lost: it will raise you in the scale of society, and will give you, in short, the honourable title of rational men: then the corrupt will be the razz de! and whoever then shall oppose the progress of truth, will be swept away in the mighty vortex. The working men of England — too long under the crushing influence of intemperance, bound eyes and hand, have not as yet cleared their mental optics for an extended vision. What makes the glory of a mighty land? The labour of your hands, we say; the undaunted energies of the working classes. As you wander through our mighty cities, every step you take is on your own industry — every thing around is the fruit of your toil, and the result of your skill. Yes, whilst you create wealth for others, which is hoarded up with the greatest care — which is increased by every stratagem, your own hard-earned wealth is tied up in a napkin, and buried in the earth — not bringing in simple, much less compound interest, — for you place it in the till of the publican, who, in return, only bestows that which dethrones reason, and makes you the more easily his dupe. We ask you, What are your plans for obtaining wealth? what keeps you from the pursuit? where are your bankers? what is the interest you receive? where are your speculations, and your projected joint-stock companies?

You are well aware, that the charges are constantly urged against you of a lack of education, and a want of all stake in the government of the country — arguing therefrom a right to deprive you of your elective franchise. We shall consider these two charges separately: and, first, show the reason why you are not possessed of these invaluable boons, and then point out the way to obtain them. And, in doing this, we know we shall, in the mind of every liberal and rational individual, be free from the charge of Chartism.

First — Education. When we look around and see how anxious the Dissenters are to secure to themselves the education of your children; when we look at Mother Church, and see the various well-supported charity-schools under her control, — we are not surprised, that she and the Dissenters should, like two opposition omnibus-men quarrelling for a passenger, strive which shall obtain possession of that which ought to be under your own immediate control. Seeing this, we are apt to suspect interested motives. And when we, with pity, gaze upon the miserable objects of children, dressed in the most ludicrous style imaginable — with their frass hedges, leather breeches, blue stockings, &c.; and when we look at the return you get for this humiliating exposure of your offspring, in the way of education, and find that they are only parrot-like taught the Church of England catechism, to read the Bible, to scrawl their name on a slate, and to do abstinence every time they meet the churchwarden or parson, — when this fact stares us in the face, we say, that it is only the poverty induced by intoxicating drinks, that ever could have induced you to accept the humiliation. With the rapid march of intellect, charity-schools are left behind; and there is no reason why the various grammar-schools, erected in nearly every corporate town, should not be thrown open to the children of the mechanic, as they were originally intended: — there is no reason why the rich should engross all the best schools, where the education is gratuitous, and leave the poor all the inferior ones — the education obtained in which is worse than useless. But we might say, Why be beholden to them at all? pay for the education of your sons yourselves; see that the master does his duty; see that they are instructed in a way which shall tend to raise them in society. Think you, in these charity-schools they will be taught the way to honour, wealth, or fame? No! no! for already "the toe of the peasant treads so near the heel of the courtier that it galls his gibe." Are your sons, being intended to become mechanics, ever taught, in these very charitable institutions, the first principles of mechanical power — the screw, the pulley, or the inclined plane? — are they ever taught the first principles of political economy, the study of which alone can prepare them to defend their rights as tradesmen, and the adaptability of which to the capacity of youth, has been made apparent by Miss Martineau? — No! The extent of the knowledge is, that w-o-r-k spells "work." We say, in conclusion, let no one have the power over the formation of your children's mind, but such as you can place dependence in, that they will do their duty, and fit them not only to fill their present station in life, but for a higher should they be called to it; and urge them on yourselves, with parental authority, to the attainment thereof. The reduction of the publican's score will put you in possession of the means to do this.

Secondly — The want of stake in the country. Who now holds your stakes but the publican? Would not that money which you have paid to this individual, during the last six or seven years, have secured you not only a vote for the borough, but also made you a freeholder for the county? You may start at this; but, as we said before, your money is in a sinking fund, it is not out at compound interest or simple interest either. But let us for one moment calculate what the money you weekly spend in intoxicating drinks, directly or indirectly, would amount to in seven years. Would you take a £100 for it? Five shillings a week, at compound interest, would do that! Then, what would you do with £100? Read the notes appended to this article, and you will see that, by a continued system of economy, you might eventually be the proprietor of a leasehold estate worth £1000. There is no insurmountable bar between

• The truth of this statement will be exemplified in the following extracts from "The Life and Annuity Tables of the National Endowment and Assurance Society, Arthur-street west, London-bridge:" —

I. By the payment of £5 12s. for 14 years, or 2s. 2d. per week, the sum of £100 will become receivable at the end of that period. Thus a person may secure to himself the sum of £1000 at the end of 14 years, by the payment for that term, of the Annual Premium of £56.

II. If a person purchase the unexpired term of 21 years, in a Leasehold Estate yielding a net income of £100 per annum, for £1000, and effect an assurance for that amount, £3 4s. 8d. per cent. per annum for the time; being £32 2s. 6d. a year, leaving a clear income of £67 17s. 6d., which is more than six and three-quarters per cent. for money, and the office will repay him the £1000 at the expiration of the time.

III. As an example of the variable payments, it may be observed, that if a person pay to the office £10 on the 1st of January, 1855, £20 on the 15th of November in the same year, £5 on the 20th of July following, and so on: the whole would be repaid, with compound interest, on the 1st of January, 1845, or, at any more distant period.

IV. A person aged 25 may assure the sum of £100 to be paid to his wife and family at his decease, should that occur within one year, by a premium of £1: if within seven years, by an Annual Premium of £1 2s.; or, whenever the decease may happen, at an Annual Premium of £2 0s. 6d.: being in the latter instance, but little more than 9d. a week; and so on in proportion for any other amount. Thus £2000 may be assured for one year, by the payment of £20, or for the whole of life, by the payment of £40 10s. annually.

V. By the payment of an Annual Premium of £4 2s. 9d. for a child 5 years old, an Endowment of £100 will be paid on its attaining 21 years.

VI. The operations of this Society, are not, however, confined to these limits, but extend to the accumulation, with compound interest, of sums of money varying in amount, and unrestricted as to time of deposit; the repayment of which, to entitle the party to a participation in the Surplus Fund, must be fixed for a period of not less than seven years.

the higher and the middling classes: why should there be between the middling and the lower?

Our faith is strongly placed in the promises of Teetotalism: this faith is the more strengthened by the fact, that all, whose systems are founded on error and selfishness, fear lest the rays of truth, reflected from the burning mirror of Teetotalism, should be directed to their antiquated, crumbling institutions, and, in a moment, reduce them to ashes!

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

William Brett, aged 42, formerly a bread-and-biscuit baker in Grosvenor-street, Grosvenor Square, committed suicide a few days ago, when under the influence of intoxicating drink. The verdict of the jury was "Temporary Insanity, produced by the effect of intoxication."

John Laroux and Henry Davies, medical students, were charged at Hatton Garden, on Friday, Sept. 4th, with stealing several knockers. They pleaded intoxication as their excuse. They were each convicted in the penalty of £5, although the knockers were found in their possession, and although such scamps should have been committed to Newgate for the felony. Another magistrate sent a poor man last week to take his trial at the Central Criminal Court for a similar offence.

Father Mathew's visit to Naas and Athy has induced every drunkard in this county to take the medal. Publicans are striking in all directions. Teetotalism will be of the greatest service to the country, if kept apart from politics. — Leinster Express.

Died, on the 27th of August, at Dromore, county Kildare, at the advanced age of one hundred and thirty-three years, Mrs. Martha Rooke. She had been a most abstemious woman all her life.

Mr. Kirby, the landlord of the White Swan, in Coleman-street, was accused by Joseph Robinson, of Ann's Place, Hackney Road, with assaulting him on Friday night at Bartholomew Fair. The landlord's excuse was that he was drunk; but the Alderman did not admit this apology for the ruffian's conduct. He fined him 10s. and made a minute of his conduct for the guidance of the magistrates next licensing day.

The Sunday Times comments severely upon the conduct of the two drunkards, who were brought up before a police magistrate a few weeks ago, and who pretended that they were Teetotalers. The name of one of these fellows was Merriman; that of the other has escaped our memory. We feel convinced that they had never received any medal or other testimony of their good conduct from any Committee or association of Teetotalers; and we question whether the whole affair was not got up by some miscreant publicans to endeavour to sustain their tottering cause against the giant hand of Teetotalism. We are sorry to see that the Sunday Times takes advantage of this tale to make some most illiberal remarks upon the Teetotalers; and yet this journal affects liberality of principle. It is not by preaching radicalism only that Editors of periodicals will evade the imputation of narrow-mindedness.

In another column of the Sunday Times of last Sunday, we rejoice to find the following observations relative to the Excise Court: — "This court, the terror of many evil-doers, is now closed until November next; but although the commissioners are allowed a little breathing time, not so the unhappy wights who chance to dispense sugar and water with certain other ingredients as genuine beer. These frauds shall be looked after sharper than ever. Whoever will take the trouble to glance over the list of names to which we have given publicity will not only be astounded, but will at once confess that we have worked a very great public benefit, for what can so readily bring sickness to the poor and working man's bedchamber as vilely adulterated beer, the only beverage attainable by him? The thanks of the great body of Teetotalers are also due for the exposures made by us regarding the adulteration of tea. It is the exposure in the public papers, and consequent loss of trade, that the unjust tradesman mostly dreads. Who will say then that such men ought not to be exposed? Certainly none but the blood-sucking scamps who in the guise of reporters hang about the court, and like ghouls that prey upon the charnel-house, feed and fatten upon guilt and knavery. We would drown such in the poisonous wash that they indirectly assist in pouring down the throats of her Majesty's subjects. In conclusion, we give the following advice to such of the licensed victuallers and tea-dealers, that are booked for the next sitting of the court, — not that they deserve anything at our hands, but that we wish to dispose of the swindling vagabonds who have made such a harvest there. This then is our advice: — Should any scamp, calling himself a reporter, wait upon them with offers of suppression, or suggestions as to getting up a petition, let the vexatious feeling engendered in the heart by the unfortunate discovery, find its way into the foot; in other words, at once kick the designing knave into the street. Let the wretches turn to some honest employment, if suitable to their healths, for this we have determined on — no more money shall be extorted to suppress from our journal."

We rejoice to find that the annual nursery of drunkenness, crime, and poverty, ye old Bartholomew Fair, is tottering towards its fall.

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. 3.

If the facility of obtaining ardent spirits and associating with bad company were lessened or removed, protection would be afforded not only to the virtuous and peaceable, but to those victims of the offended law, who, even at the most unripe ages, are permitted upon the present system, to abet and aid each other in devising the most revolting crimes, and in stimulating themselves by liquor to the commission of them. While it can be shown that culprits both become so at first, and are excited to the worst acts of crime by associating in public houses and beer-shops, and especially by the use of spirituous liquors at low prices, so long is the strongest temptation held out to those least able to withstand it; and they are led to violate those laws which, but for such an inducement, would never have been broken.

Crime has progressively increased of late years, more especially in London and Middlesex. The sessions at the Old Bailey afford the best proof of this fact; nor does the increase of population afford a satisfactory solution of the growth of crime. The increased system of drinking will, however, account for most of it; and the repeated confession of prisoners (especially of those under sentence of death) prove that their acquaintance with vicious companions, and their instruction and progress in crime, almost invariably arise from this source. Melancholy are the recitals heard by the governors of felons' gaols, from the old and young of both sexes—the illiterate house-breaker and the educated forger—the offender when first convicted, and the criminal who has grown old in vice—all proving the sense entertained by them alike of the consequences of drinking.

Morals are better than money, and national virtue above a system of finance; and therefore while a government takes care in providing for the pecuniary advantages of the people, it should not hazard the extinction of public morals, and the transformation of the national character. Whatever the duties upon spirits produce in monies numbered, the sordid addition thus derived by the revenue can never compensate for the evils they produce.

Both remotely and proximately, there is no such temptation to crime as is afforded by the drinking of spirituous liquors particularly, and by drinking of beer to a great extent.

More than half of the number of lunatics in Bethlehem hospital, said Mr. Poynder in his examination before the Committee of the House of Commons, became mad through drink; and the number of lunatics has greatly increased within late years.

The annual cost of ardent spirits to the people of Ireland, was upwards of six millions sterling, until Father Mathew began his great work. The habit of intemperance thus took an enormous sum from a country by no means able to afford it, and the sum itself was derived chiefly from the lower orders. Besides that enormous sum, it was, there were other sources of cost,—idleness, for instance, and the time lost by drunkenness, which were an actual dead loss to the country. The loss of a great quantity of grain was a grievous addition; and then the government had to support a numerous military and police establishment, part of whose business was to take care of drunkards, and prevent them from injuring the sober and each other. Police-offices and barracks once seemed to be the only prosperous places in Ireland.

The spirit trade is far from being so profitable to those who carry it on, as has been generally supposed. A few individuals have made their fortunes, and may make their fortunes; but still, taking it as a trade, it is most ruinous. It is pretty generally believed that money made in the spirit trade seldom descends to the grandchild. The opinion of some careful observers is that twelve out of thirteen persons, who have been for any length of time engaged in the retail spirit trade, exhibit, either in their own persons and property, or in the habits of members of their family, melancholy specimens of destruction caused by distilled spirits. Many spirit shops are kept by widows whose husbands killed themselves by drinking. The spirit seller in the suburbs of Belfast, in Ireland, understood the matter well, when he put on his sign-board "The Last Shift;" for assuredly to open a spirit shop is the very last shift.

Supposing a man to drink one glass of spirits, at two pence each glass daily; this would cost him three pounds per annum, which would clothe a poor man respectably.

One of the tests proposed at the time of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1795, was that a person during a prescribed period, till the breaking out of the rebellion, was not to use ardent spirits himself, and was to discountenance its use as far as he could in others.

REVIEWS.

Teetotalism Examined and Rejected. A Dialogue. Third Edition. 12mo. pp. 24. London: J. MASTERS.

We should not have noticed this pamphlet had not the words "Third Edition" caught our eyes; and as we know that the friends of brewers, distillers, wine-merchants, and publicans, will use their utmost endeavours to circulate a work which is opposed to Teetotalism, we shall endeavour to counteract the pernicious effects produced by the sale of the one now before us. We cannot congratulate the author upon the manner in which he has strung his arguments together, the whole arrangement of the pamphlet being as loose as the subject is devoid of foundation; and in one or two instances misrepresentation and exaggeration have verged into wilful and wanton falsehood.

This precious reasoner undertakes to prove that "every creature of God is good, whether of meats or drinks, and is to be used in moderation by them that love and obey the truth, with thanksgiving." If this be the case, then let the author of this pamphlet partake of a decoction of upas-leaves—let him regale himself with hemlock and deadly nightshade—let him chew Bohemian rosemary—let him vary his enjoyments with arsenic—let him stimulate his appetite with prussic acid—or let him have recourse to any of those "creatures of God" which the powers of discrimination, given to us by God, teach us to avoid as the means of certain death.

The author of this work says "that it is right and beneficial to abstain from spirits," because "they are a poison to the human frame." We thank him for an admission which his ignorance has alone suffered him to make. Spirits are alcohol in their pure state; and, if a person must drink something, it would be far better, and far less prejudicial to his health, for him to drink spirit diluted with water, than to partake of wine and beer. In drinking beer and wine, he imbibes a large quantity of alcohol; and this alcohol is so mixed up with the most deleterious drugs, narcotic substances, and mineral poisons, that any man of common sense must comprehend the difference between alcohol so associated, and alcohol in its far purer state.

The author of the pamphlet under notice then proceeds to say "the system of Teetotalism is so extreme, that he would as soon approve of the Popish system of monks and hermits, who flee from sight and contact of the world, for fear it should corrupt them." Teetotalism is an extreme measure; but the case, to which it is applied as a remedy, is also extreme. Extreme cases require extreme remedies; and Teetotalism is the radical reformer that pushes the boldness of its cure to the utter extirpation of the evil. Temperance, or moderation, resembles a physician, who, when called upon to attend a grievous case of mortification, thinks to cure it by gradient and gentle means, whereas the gangrene only spreads the more violently; but Teetotalism is the more experienced disciple of Esculapius who sees at one glance that nothing save immediate amputation of the injured limb will save the life of the patient.

The writer next proceeds to place upon record the following impertinent and illiberal observations:—

"I have heard some pretty tales of these teetotalers: they are like the Turks who proscribe all wine, but will get drunk with it on the sly. The teetotalers have been discovered with a watering near the tea-pot, which upon examination was found to contain gin!"

That there have been some inconsistent individuals, who have signed the pledge of total abstinence, and then relapsed to their habits of intemperance, we do not deny: the proverbial frailties of the human race would not be fulfilled, were not such the case; but that this is the conduct of the Teetotalers generally—or of even a considerable number of them, we deny. A visit to the Teetotal meetings will convince the uninitiated that the Teetotalers are too enthusiastic in their cause to fall easily into a relapse, or to be beguiled to sacrifice to the genius of intemperance. So extreme a measure as Teetotalism prevents its disciples from ever being lukewarm: a real Teetotaler is as enthusiastic in the principle he has adopted, as is the priest of some wooden deity in the wilds of eastern Asia. We accordingly fling back, with proper indignation, the lie in the teeth of the cowardly, unmanly, and unprincipled writer of the pamphlet under notice, and pity him for being compelled to supply a deficiency of sound argument with a wilful falsehood—a falsehood which he knew to be such, when he wrote it down—a falsehood that proves the interested objects of his authorship on this occasion.

This wretchedly ignorant scribe indulges in the vulgar error that Teetotalers make an elaborate use of tea. We will assert with confidence that there is less tea drunk by the Teetotalers than by any body of men; and from the simple fact that they seldom drink at all; because a total abstinence from intoxicating liquors precludes the possibility of frequent thirst, save in the case when salt food may be eaten. The drink of the Teetotalers with their dinner is water, ginger-beer or lemonade. The author, whose merits we are now discussing, might have therefore spared himself all his long dissertation upon the evil effects of tea.

Then because the silly old aunt of this scribe used to say that "water would rot a post," he favours us with a dissertation upon the beverage—which nature has evidently intended for our use. No man was ever the worse for Teetotalism, unless it were some drunkard so far advanced in the stage of physical decay through the use of ardent spirits, that the sudden reaction extinguished the little spark of life which remained in him: but no man in the usual state of health, who adopts the principle of total-abstinence, can be injured by it. Teetotalism does no harm, but much good: even if it be an extreme measure, it is a humane and philanthropic one; and he must have a bad heart who will strenuously oppose a system that has carried happiness into many and many a dwelling whence that happiness had long been banished by the vice of intemperance.

Of course this author quotes the miracle of Cana, in Galilee, as an argument in favour of the use of wine. Every champion of the publicans' cause flies to blasphemy to uphold the damning and accursed system of intemperance: every enemy to Teetotalism seeks to pervert the Bible to a justification of his own infernal doctrines. But "the devil can quote scripture for his purpose;" and if the author of the pamphlet now before us, will turn to two former numbers of this journal, and peruse the papers entitled "The Wines of the New Testament," he will obtain a proper explanation of the miracle of Cana, in Galilee.

By way of conclusion, to this writer, and to all others, who attempt to throw ridicule upon the great cause of total-abstinence, we say.—Teetotalism has resisted the scoffs of the educated, and the wealth of the licensed victuallers; it has triumphed over the encouragement given to intemperance by a misguided legislature, and has thrown down the obstacles raised against it by even the clergy of the Protestant church: it has withstood the gibes of those who are interested in sustaining the credit of a ruinous habit, as the means of their own real interests or fancied enjoyments; and it shall not fall by your force!

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

SIR,—Watching with interest and anxiety any thing connected with the cause of total abstinence, I cannot suffer your answer to "A LATE CONVERT," in your "Notices to Correspondents," in No. X. of The Teetotaler, to pass without trespassing a remark or two upon the attention of your readers. To me your meaning is quite clear, but it might lead a person ignorant of chemistry into error. The ginger-beer, which you tell your correspondent, he can take with safety, is made at the time it is about to be swallowed by dissolving two powders (one composed of carbonate of soda, ginger, and sugar, the other consisting of tartaric or citric acid,) in separate portions of water, adding the two fluids together, and drinking during the effervescence. Without noticing the properties of this kind of beverage, it will answer my present purpose to assert that the habitual use of the ginger-beer which is commonly sold in bottles and is made by exciting fermentation with barm or yeast, can no more be defended than that of table-beer.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

MINGAY SYDES.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

BIRMINGHAM.

The friends of Temperance in Birmingham being most sensibly alive to the dreadful effects already entailed on the working population by the numerous spirit hells now existing, determined to make an appeal to the Magistrates to exercise caution in granting fresh licences. A memorial to that effect was accordingly drawn up, most respectfully couched and read at the Temperance Meeting here August 24th; it received numerous signatures and lay for several days after at various places for additional names. This memorial was presented to the Magistrates on their assembling to hold their annual licensing meeting at the Public Office.—Upwards of twenty magistrates took their seats. The Deputation consisted of Messrs. CADBURY, Rev. J. A. JAMES, MR. PUMPHREY, and others; who energetically enforced the memorial. The efforts of the Temperance Advocates have not been fruitless, for out of nearly one hundred and fifty application, five fresh licences only have been granted, whilst three old ones have been struck off.

Our esteemed correspondent MR. ELIJAH GOODHEAD informs us that in Birmingham alone there are at least 2000 places where intoxicating drinks are sold, and upon an average ten drunkards to each—thus making the fearful number of 20,000 drunkards.

MATO.

FATHER MATHEW visited this place the week before last, and administered the pledge to upwards of one hundred thousand persons. He has now enlisted two millions and a half of persons beneath the banners of Teetotalism. How proud should Ireland be of such a man; and how deeply grateful should the inhabitants of that fine island feel towards their great moral regenerator?

SUNDERLAND.

Teetotalism is progressing well in Sunderland. The meetings are frequent, and are held in the Arcade Rooms. There is also a juvenile Teetotal Society, which is in a flourishing condition. It is a grand subject for contemplation—the future destiny of society, with a rising generation of total abstainers!

DUNDEE.

CAPTAIN JOHN WILSON of the brig Bolivar, in a letter to the REV. J. MESSER, of Hull, which has been kindly communicated to us by this latter gentleman, says, "I am delighted to find that a Total Abstinence Society has been established at Dundee, and that a number of masters of ships have come forward to enrol themselves as members. This is a credit to them, and will afford them the more happiness, as it will entitle them to the applause of all rightly thinking men. I myself became a member of the Total Abstinence Society at Bristol, on the 2nd of May, 1839, at which time I was bound on a voyage to Alexandria; and I resolved during the voyage to give the principle a fair trial. During a fourteenth months' cruise, although in various climates, I abstained entirely from ardent spirits and enjoyed uninterrupted good health. In a short time the whole of my ship's crew became Teetotalers; and a happier set of men never sailed upon the ocean. While at Constantinople I converted the Captain of another brig to the same doctrine. I am rejoiced that the owners at Dundee have now set so noble an example, and I feel convinced that they will reap the benefits of the doctrine, both in respect to themselves and their crews. At all events one grand source of danger will be removed from the vessels which belong to them."—The testimony of this Captain, who has been many, many years in the profession, is valuable indeed; and it is to be hoped that the master of ships at all the maritime towns of the United Kingdom will follow the moral and salutary example of the ship-owners of Dundee.

HULL.

The members and friends of the Hull Tent of Female Rechabites, held their annual festive meeting at the house of Mr. E. Atcock, on Thursday the 3rd inst. After Tea, which was served up in excellent style, Mr. ARON SHAW took the chair. A very animated speech was made by the REV. J. MESSER; and he was followed by Mr. C. F. HANBY and several friends of the order.

STRATFORD.

We are pleased to be enabled to state that the glorious doctrines of Teetotalism are making rapid progress in this town and its neighbourhood. The meetings at the school-room on Tuesday evenings are invariably crowded, and on Thursday, the réunion at the Hall, at Plaistow, presents a most improving, and exhilarating spectacle.

N. B. In our Report of the transactions of the Stratford Branch in our journal of the 5th of September, we said that the Rev. Mr. Baker presented Mr. Catton with the silver medal; whereas this testimony of esteem and respect was tendered by Mr. Smith.

LAMBETH FRIENDLY TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

This total abstinence association holds its meetings at the chapel, Captain's Walk, Vine Street, York Road. The meetings are held twice every week on Monday and Thursday. Teetotalism is making rapid strides in this vicinity, as elsewhere.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, September 9th.

The meeting at the Aldersgate Street Chapel was well attended by a most respectable audience. Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS was called to the chair; and the meeting was addressed at considerable length by this gentleman, and afterwards, in succession, by Messieurs. Johnson, Crump, Biddle, Hart, and Mac Bean.

Saturday Evening, September 12th.

The Chapel in Aldersgate Street presented its usual gay and animated appearance upon this occasion.

MR. WILLIAMS was called to the chair, upon taking which he said that Teetotalism would never cease its endeavours until it had entirely extirpated the use of intoxicating liquors from all civilized nations.

MR. BENSTEAD contended that the use of strong drink was a wilful suicide, and that a man, who died from its effects, should have a verdict of felo de se pronounced over his body by a Coroner's jury.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS said, after some general remarks upon Teetotalism, that it was to be regretted that such a spirit of rivalry should exist between Teetotal societies. He thought that union should be the favourite principle, and the most effectual means of successfully carrying on the crusade against the dissipated habits of the age.

MR. GAWTHORPE said that Teetotalism had emancipated him from a state of slavery by far more wretched than that in which the negroes of the West Indies were plunged before the emancipation.

MR. PRICE detailed the happy results of the total abstinence system in application to himself and his family.

MR. JOHNSON was happy to be enabled to inform the meeting that Lord Glengall had just expressed himself most favourably with regard to the progress and principles of Teetotalism.

MR. JOHNSON.

MR. H. W. WESTON (Secretary to the United Temperance Association,) begs to give notice that the well-known and able advocate, Mr. Johnson, is about to visit Leicestershire and the adjacent counties, on the account of this society, and that he will be happy to render all the assistance in his power to local associations founded on the total abstinence principle.

KENSINGTON AND BAYSWATER BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The Secretary of this Branch has published a notice announcing a course of Lectures to be delivered at the Camden Chapel, Kensington Gravel Pits, in the following manner:—September 14th.—The drinking customs of all nations, by Mr. MEE. Sept. 21st.—Effects of Intemperance on the Human Understanding, by MR. BENSTEAD. Sept. 28th.—The Anatomy of Intemperance, by MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS. Oct. 5th.—The Adulteration of Alcoholic Drinks, by MR. H. W. WESTON. Oct. 12th.—Astronomy, by MR. MEE. Oct. 19th.—The same subject continued. October 26th.—Geology, by MR. WHEELER. November 2nd.—The same subject continued; October 9th.—Education, by MR. STALLWOOD.

MR. HUDSON.

This talented advocate of the United Temperance Association has lately visited Bromsgrove, where the cause of Teetotalism has received a considerable impulse from the exertions of MR. THOMAS DAWSON. At Redditch, the Rev. ROBERT HASLEY has devoted himself most nobly and enthusiastically to the furtherance of the doctrines of total abstinence. The committee of the Teetotalers of this place passed a resolution to the effect "That their President do immediately communicate with the United Temperance Association on the subject of union." On Tuesday—the 5th instant, Mr. HUDSON reached Tewsbury, where he held a meeting at the Theatre. The Committee at this place is composed of most active gentlemen. On the 10th, Mr. Hudson arrived at Gloucester, where Teetotalism is in a flourishing condition.

DIVINE SERVICE AT ALDERSGATE STREET CHAPEL.

MR. J. S. OZNER has been appointed to the care of this Church on the Sabbath day. Divine service is held in the morning at eleven, and in the evening at half-past six. Application for seats to be made at the Chapel after the services. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister.—by MR. H. W. WESTON, 134, Aldersgate Street;—and by MR. J. WILSON, 58, Red Cross Street.

The late extraordinary letter of the celebrated Dr. Bright, of Ely Place, Holborn, written the 3d instant to Holloway, should be read by all classes of persons. This celebrated physician proves that Holloway's Ointment and pills, if used together, are infallible in the cure of old ulcers, bad legs, bad breasts, &c. Holloway has now obtained the patronage of nearly all the greatest physicians of the day; his invaluable ointment and pills ought to be kept in every family for the use of their children. They are sold by all vendors of Patent Medicines throughout the kingdom, and also at Holloway's new establishment, 244, Strand, near Temple Bar.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

This Day is Published, containing Sixteen closely printed pages, Price 3d., Number III. of

THE ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE,

OR A KEY TO TEETOTALISM.

BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.

Author of "Pickwick Abroad," "Modern Literature of France," "Alfred de Rosann," "Grace Darling," &c.

This work will be continued in weekly numbers at 3d. and monthly parts (stitched in a beautiful wrapper) at 1s. each until its completion in ten sheets. It is presented by its Author to the United Temperance Association, and all its proceeds will be devoted to the furtherance of the cause of Temperance.

PUBLISHED AT THE DEPOT OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION, 134, Aldersgate Street, London.

And Sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row. Dublin: S. MACHEN & Co. And, all Booksellers, Newsvendors and Stationers in Town and Country.

TEMPERANCE AND INTEMPERANCE.

This Day is published, price 1s. each plain, or 2s. each coloured.

SIX PLATES, exhibiting the PROGRESS

AND RUINOUS EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE, contrasted with the PLEASURES AND HAPPY CONSEQUENCES OF TEMPERANCE. These Prints are happily conceived, and vividly portray the fatal results of Intemperance, while the happier state of the Temperate Man furnishes a powerful and effective moral.

The set of Six Plates, may be had, 5s. 6d. plain, 10s. 6d. colored. London—Dean & Munday, Threadneedle-street; and J. Pasco, 12, Paternoster-row.

THE CHEAPEST AND MOST ELEGANT BOOKS

Ever printed are the

STANDARD ILLUSTRATED WORKS.

LIFE OF NAPOLEON

500 Engravings.

ROBINSON CRUSOE

400 Engravings.

GIL BLAS

500 Engravings.

ASMODEUS

The Devil on Two Sticks, 200 Engravings.

The Paris editions of several standard works have suggested the idea of publishing a series of works in a similar style of elegance. But our continental neighbours, in their praiseworthy endeavours to produce these gems of literature in a style that proudly challenges comparison with the highest efforts of the typographic art, have essayed alone to place them within the reach of a limited and wealthy class of readers. It is reserved for British enterprise and ingenuity to render a series of works of comparative beauty, attainable by readers of every rank. To effect this no expense or exertion has been spared in the Production of the "Illustrated Standard Editions," and the very great success and popularity which has hitherto attended their Publication is the best criterion of their interest and varied merits. When completed the united series of Napoleon, Robinson Crusoe, Gil Blas, and Asmodeus, the Devil on Two Sticks, will contain less than 1,000 Illustrations, unequalled for beauty of design, artistic skill, and exquisite finish, by the most expensive books hitherto published.

These unparalleled works are issued in Penny Numbers Weekly, and Monthly in parts price 5 pence each, all of which are constantly on sale, and may be obtained of every bookseller in the United Kingdom.

Parts now ready

NAPOLEON, I. to XIV. GIL BLAS, I. to VIII.

ROBINSON CRUSOE, I. to XIV. ASMODEUS, I. to V.

London, W. STRANGE, 21 Paternoster Row, H. Hetherington, Strand; Cleave, Berger, Pathe, &c. &c., and Sold by all Booksellers in town and Country.

REGISTRY FOR SOBER SERVANTS.

AND MECHANICS, 14, ALDERSGATE STREET. Ladies and Gentlemen are respectfully informed that they may hear of Servants of all Classes, who are Total Abstainers from Intoxicating Drinks, on application at the above Office: where Servants of all classes may also hear of Situations.

RUSSELL'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.

AND COFFEE ROOMS, BROADWAY, WESTMINSTER. Was opened under the immediate sanction of the Committee and patronage of the Members of the West Branch of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, on Wednesday, 19th of August, 1840.

WILLIAM RUSSELL, in soliciting attention to the above establishment, most respectfully informs his Temperance Friends and the public generally, that it will be his constant aim not only to render it subservient to the general interests of the Temperance cause, but conducive in every possible way to the comfort and convenience of all who may favour him with their support.

Its contiguity to the houses of Parliament, Sessions-house and Abbey it is presumed will render it a desirable temporary abode to persons visiting Westminster, for purposes either of recreation or business, and for whose convenience good beds and every necessary accommodation will be afforded.

Refreshments of every sort compatible with true Temperance will be furnished at very moderate charges.

The Reading room will be amply supplied with Temperance literature, periodicals, and newspapers, and form a repository also for the sale of all the societies' publications.

N. B. Conveyances to every part of the kingdom by railway; and steam-boats within five minutes' walk of the hotel.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY.

94, CANNON-STREET, Near Walbrook.

BLACK TEA.

The very best Black Tea imported, full-flavoured strong rich Pekoe kind 5 8
Black Leaf wiry Rough Congou, highly recommended 5 0
Strong black leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee-houses 4 0

GREEN TEA.

The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder a strong rich full flavoured tea, the very best imported 6 6
Fine Hyson cowslip kind equal to any that can be bought 6 0
Young Hyson strongly recommended 6 0
Best Plantation Coffee 2 0
Fine Mocha coffee 2 0
Finest flaked Cocoa 0 10
Best Spanish Chocolate 0 10

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 14.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER II.

THE OLD FRIENDS.

MR. TIBBATS was attired in the height of fashion. His hair was well anointed with Rowland's Macassar; his hat was after the fashion of some duke's or marquis's design; his coat was made by Buckmaster—his pantaloons by Anderson—and his boots by Hoby; and in his left hand he balanced a gold-headed cane, while he extended his right to Melville with all the warmth and cordiality of an old and sincere friend. For some moments our hero was so astounded at this sudden apparition of his ancient ally, that he was unable to give utterance to a syllable. Mr. Tibbatts took advantage of this confusion on the part of Victor, and, with the most ineffable coolness, flung himself into a chair after he had seized the young man's hand and wrung it forcibly.

"Well, I am delighted to have found you out at last," said Mr. Tibbatts, passing his fingers through his hair; "your works have made such a noise in the world that I am really quite proud of your acquaintance; and, faithful to my friend as the dog was to Ulysses, I come to congratulate you on your rapid rise to fame and fortune."

There was something so exceedingly ludicrous in the very impudence of this man's manners, that Melville was nearly altogether disarmed of any resentment which he had cherished against him. The effects of the wine he had drunk were also calculated to inspire him with a false spirit of forgiveness, and he followed the example of his visitor by resuming his seat.

"You have indeed made a noise in the world," continued Mr. Tibbatts, who knew full well that the weak side of all men is their vanity, and that flattery, like oil upon the stormy ocean, smooths many an angry ebullition:—"and I have read all your works with the greatest delight. Some of my friends declare that you are the first author of the day; and all agree that you are a perfect Tacitus for the graphic truths of historical description."

"To what am I to attribute the honour of this visit?" demanded Melville, mustering up a sufficiency of courage to put this question to his imperious visitor.

"What! are you griev'd to receive a call from an old friend?" ejaculated Mr. Tibbatts, with a smile.

"I do not know that I have any reason to give you that title," retorted Victor impatiently.

"I hope you do not consider that I am anything else," said Mr. Tibbatts, affecting the most extreme surprise: "I am a Damon to you, and you should be a Pythias to me."

"A very pretty Pythias you made of yourself in the police office when summoned as a witness against me a few years ago," said Melville ironically.

"My dear fellow, I merely adopted a political course," returned Mr. Tibbatts: "if you were hanged, it was no use getting me hanged likewise. I thought the best thing I could do would be to live to prove your innocence. Upon my honour I had no other motive."

"Well, of all the impudent fellows—" began Melville, hovering between an inclination to laugh and a conviction in his own mind that he ought to eject his companion from the house without a moment's delay.

"Stop! stop! my dear fellow," interrupted Mr. Tibbatts: "do not put yourself into a passion. You know that Alexander killed Clitus in a moment of anger; and I have no inclination to be a Clitus just now. But—how is this? I am talking till I am dry,—and—there is not a clean glass upon the table."

Victor started up and rang the bell violently; the footman made his appearance in due time.

"A clean glass," said Mr. Tibbatts very coolly, as he drew off his yellow kid gloves, and placed them very neatly across the brim of his hat. He then drew himself close up to the table, exclaiming, "Well, now I'm comfortable. This is what I call a pleasure—meeting with an old friend again. Ah! my dear Melville, I have often thought of you, my boy, and have been wishing to see you every day for the last four years—"

"Do you recollect how and where we parted," interrupted Victor, with a certain impatience and bitterness in his tone. "We separated at the door of the tribunal of the Old Bailey; you attempted to address me—and I spurned your acquaintance."

"Just the heat of the moment, and a wrong impression," said Tibbatts, without losing one atom of his equanimity of temper. "But here is the clean glass, and no wine."

The servant, who had returned to the room, cast an inquiring glance towards Melville, who seemed buried in a profound reverie. Mr. Tibbatts repeated his observation; and our hero started from his meditative mood. The domestic awaited his master's orders, and Mr. Tibbatts regaled himself with a pinch of snuff from an elegant gold box. Melville was just so far inflamed by wine that he felt glad of a companion—be that companion who he might; and he fancied that there was no good companionship without the bottle. He accordingly issued the necessary command; and in a few moments a fresh supply of the inebriating liquor was placed upon the table.

"Well, this is very fine," said Mr. Tibbatts, sipping the wine with great relish; "very fine indeed. But you can afford good things now, Melville; you can get any thing you like for a book. I should think any publisher must be glad of your assistance?"

"I have no trouble in disposing of my manuscripts," said Melville, softening a little, both from the effects of the compliment and the fresh supply of wine.

"Ah! you are a lucky dog," cried Tibbatts. "Nearly all authors are poor; the ancient authors were poor—and so are the modern, with but few exceptions, of which you are one. Plato was so poor that he was compelled to write his works by the light of the eyes of his cat; but Seneca, who was enormously wealthy, composed an essay on the deceitfulness of riches. Ah! my dear Melville, all the world is talking of you now!"

"I did not think I was so very popular," observed the young man, filling his glass, and passing the bottle towards his companion.

"Popular?" ejaculated Mr. Tibbatts, who saw that Victor's resentment was rapidly melting away: "why no one hears any other author spoken of but you; and that last novel of yours—"

MR. TIBBATS, MELVILLE, AND VICTOR. To illustrate Chapter IV, Period I, No. 2.

"What about that?" demanded Victor, drawing his chair closer to that occupied by Mr. Tibbatts.

"Why! the people actually fought at the circulating libraries to get it first, on the day of publication," said Mr. Tibbatts. "Melville, my boy, here's success to you!"

"Thank you," answered Melville. "The same to you!" and he emptied his glass.

"I myself have had some luck since I saw you last," continued Mr. Tibbatts, after a short pause. "An old aunt of mine died. I was very fond of her, and hearing that she was ill, went to see her. The doctor ordered her to take a little laudanum; and I had to give her the doses. One night she seemed to me to be so bad that I increased the quantity, and the poor old creature died. I knew she had made a will in my favour, and so it turned out. I was determined to be economical in future, and, by way of a beginning, left the parish to bury her. So, you see that I have had a lift in the world," added Mr. Tibbatts; but, as he turned his eyes towards Melville, he perceived a frown upon his face, and he accordingly observed with some degree of precipitation, "But if I had only your abilities, I would soon become as rich as a Cæsar. You are the envy of all aspiring authors."

"I hope I am not proud, either," cried Melville, the frown changing to smiles at this new compliment. "But you don't help yourself."

"I am waiting for you," answered Tibbatts.

"Oh! I have had my share already," said Melville, with a feeble effort to avoid the temptation.

"Well! I cannot drink alone," exclaimed Mr. Tibbatts; "and I thought that the world generally gave you credit for doing the honours of your house with such surprising tact and good taste."

"If I must, I must," observed Melville, determined that the world should not be wrong, although the world had never said any such thing, and he accordingly refilled his own glass, prior to handing the decanter to his companion.

"How very comfortable you seem here," remarked Mr. Tibbatts, after another pause. "I suppose you receive the first literary men of the day at your house?"

"My sources are invariably well attended by all that is fashionable or worth knowing," said Victor.

"I am told that you are courted by the first people in London, quite as a curiosity," returned Tibbatts; "and indeed, with your abilities and personal appearance, this is to be expected."

"I shall be very happy to see you as often as you pass this way," said Melville, after a moment's hesitation; but how could he avoid inviting the man who thought so highly of his literary achievements?

"Oh! I shan't desert you now that I have found you out," said Mr. Tibbatts. "But here's to the health of your family. Come—you must join in this toast."

"I suppose I must," returned Melville; and here was another excuse for another glass.

"I understand that you have a most amiable wife and such fine children," cried Mr. Tibbatts. "I shall really grow jealous of your happiness soon."

"I shall be most happy to introduce them to you, my fine fellow," said Victor, now slapping his companion on the back.

"Melville, my dear boy," cried Mr. Tibbatts, grasping his friend's hand, "I am delighted to see you in this glorious and prosperous condition; and I'll stick to you as long as you live."

A disinterested observer would have seen no reason to doubt this assertion, because it was made on the same principle on which the leech will adhere to the body that it is sucking. Melville was, however, quite affected by such a display of attachment on the part of his friend, and, being in a maudlin state of drunkenness, was almost melted to tears.

"My dear friend, Tibbatts," said he, wringing the other's hand with reciprocal violence. "I am more delighted at this reconciliation on our part than at any thing that has ever happened to me. Bless you, Tibbatts—you are my only friend after all."

"To be sure I am," said that gentleman. "But—I declare—the bottle's empty!"

"Bottle empty!" shouted Melville. "Well—we'll deuced soon have another. Now, then, Tibbatts, what wine will you have? Any thing my cellar can give an old friend like you! What shall it be? Port—sherry—burgundy—claret—champagne,—only say the word."

"Let's have a bottle of champagne, then," cried Mr. Tibbatts, after a moment's reflection.

Victor staggered towards the bell, and pulled it violently. The servant attended the summons, and Victor ordered him to bring two bottles of champagne as soon as possible. The command was obeyed; and the effervescent liquor soon produced a species of raving hilarity in respect to Melville; but Tibbatts continued to drink glass after glass, without experiencing any very evident effects from the sparkling juice of Epernay.

"Excellent wine, this," said Mr. Tibbatts, filling his own and Melville's glass for the fourth time.

"Excellent!" cried Victor, whose eyes flashed fire, and whose cheeks were almost purple with the unnatural excitement.

"Oh! if I only had a chance, like you," said Mr. Tibbatts, shaking his head somewhat gloomily—"if I only had a friend to come forward and assist me at this moment, I should make a fortune."

Now a man, who is himself almost raving and raving with the artificial happiness produced by champagne, cannot endure the sight of the slightest appearance of gloom in a companion. Melville accordingly pressed Mr. Tibbatts to unfold the nature of his wants, and after a considerable display of reluctance on the part of this gentleman, the truth was revealed.

"My dear Melville, I didn't come here to annoy you with my griefs," said Mr. Tibbatts, heaving one tremendous sigh, and washing down another with a glass of champagne.

"But I will know what it is that vexes you," persisted Melville.

"Well, if you must," said Mr. Tibbatts, who enacted his part to perfection. "I suppose I must gratify your curiosity. The truth is, I have a certain opportunity just at this moment—which never may occur again—and if I only had a few hundreds—but—I suppose I must do without them—"

"Now, I understand," said Melville, impatiently interrupting these broken sentences: "how much do you want?"

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Tibbatts, as if he were quite astounded by the question.

"How much do you want?" demanded Melville, doggedly.

"Why—if you must know, about five hundred pounds," replied Mr. Tibbatts, in a tone approaching a whisper.

"You shall have it," cried Melville, dashing his clenched fist upon the table. "I will go and fetch my cheque-book out of the drawing-room, and will do what you require this minute."

"My dear fellow, you will be the making of me!" said Mr. Tibbatts, clasping his host's hand with a warmth that was apparently the most sincere.

Melville hastily withdrew his hand, because he was as anxious to demonstrate his kindness to the designing Mr. Tibbatts, as in his sober moments he would have been inveterate in his hatred against the same individual. He staggered out of the room, and proceeded to the saloon where his wife was sitting alone, her children having by this time retired to rest. The moment Victor entered the apartment and met the glance of his tender spouse, he started, while a deadly pallor overspread her countenance.

"My dear Victor," said she in her usual mild and musical voice, "you have been drinking."

"Nonsense," cried Melville, impatiently; and he began to reflect whether he should not find fault with something, in order to avoid the placid remonstrances of his wife. "Where is my cheque-book?"

"You cannot require it at this time in the night, Victor," said Louise, in a firm tone, but one devoid of all irascibility or even reproach. "Sit down with me—here—and tell me if anything has annoyed you."

"No—no, my dear Louise," returned Victor; "I am not annoyed—on the contrary, I am very happy—I have found an old friend."

"An old friend?" repeated Louise; "and who is he?"

"My old and intimate friend Tibbatts," answered Melville, somewhat impatiently. "Where is the cheque-book?"

"Tibbatts! Tibbatts!" almost screamed the now miserable wife. "What! the wretch who bore false witness against you? Oh! Victor—Victor, spurn him from your house—cast him away from you—he is a viper come to sting you to the heart.—Oh! my dear, dear husband, for once listen to the intreaties of your wife—I implore you upon my knees!"

And as she uttered these words in a tone which indicated the most acute grief, the lovely young woman sank upon her knees before him whom she adored as something more than human.

"Come, come, Louise," he murmured half angrily, "this is childish: Tibbatts is a very good fellow, and I mean to lend him a little money to ensure his fortune."

"Victor, hear me!" cried the distracted lady, joining her hands together. "Be your children, I implore you to hear me,—by all that you hold or deem sacred, I implore you to attend to my words.—Oh! Victor, do not refuse to listen to me! Let not that man remain in this house for one moment longer—"

"Louise, he is my guest," interrupted Melville.

"He is a fiend—he means to do you no good—he will be the ruin of us yet.—Oh! I know—I know he will!" sobbed Louise in so earnest and plaintive a tone that only a man, who was brutalized by strong drink, could refuse to accede to all that was asked in so sweet a voice, and by one so transcendantly beautiful. "It is not often I implore a favour of you, Victor.—I beseech you, do not refuse me this."

"Nonsense—nonsense, Louise," ejaculated Melville, disengaging himself from her embrace, and proceeding towards his writing-desk, whence he took his cheque-book with an air of dogged and desperate determination.

"Victor—Victor—you will break my heart," screamed Louise, falling with her face downwards upon the carpet, and sobbing bitterly.

Melville rang the bell, and coolly desired a female servant who answered the summons, "to attend to her mistress." He then left the apartment, in a state of the utmost indifference in regard to one who loved him with all the enthusiasm and passion of a young and devoted heart, to return to lavish a kindness upon an individual who had already behaved in the most diabolical manner towards him.

Mr. Tibbatts anxiously awaited the return of our hero; and when Melville once more entered the study, with the cheque-book in his hand, that individual's eyes beamed with the most unfeigned delight. Melville sat down, drank off another glass of champagne to expel the reminiscences of the dispute with his wife, and then proceeded to write a cheque for five hundred pounds. It was with the greatest difficulty that he was enabled to fill up the draft; but Tibbatts, by dint of spelling each word for him four or five times over, and occasionally guiding his pen, at length enabled him to complete the task.

"Well, I am very much obliged to you, old fellow," said Mr. Tibbatts: "you will be the making of me with this kindness on your part. Good bye for the present."

"One glass more," stammered Melville.

"Only one, then," said Tibbatts, who was now anxious to take his departure, having obtained all that he at the moment required.

The glasses were poured out and drunk; and the two friends separated, with many vows of uninterrupted good feeling for the remainder of their lives. Melville retired to his couch, without thinking of inquiring after his distracted wife, who had sought the means of consolation in the same room where her beloved children were sleeping; and Mr. Tibbatts took his departure to his own lodgings, with a demonic smile of satisfaction playing upon his lips.

To be continued in our next.

NINTH VOYAGE OF SINDBAD THE SAILOR.

NOW PUBLISHED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

THE Commander of the Faithful was so pleased with the presents sent to him by King Abstinence, and was so anxious to keep up a friendly correspondence with so sage a prince, that he said to me, "Sindbad, you must prepare for another voyage. I am resolved to send King Abstinence a testimonial of my admiration of his wisdom. In thirty days the presents will be ready, and you shall embark on board of one of my own galleys at Balsora." I threw myself at the feet of the Caliph, and implored him to take my gray hairs into consideration; but the monarch seemed so anxious for my compliance with his request, that I could not persist in my refusal. I accordingly assented to his wishes, and in due time embarked at Balsora.

I calculated that by sailing in a certain direction, we should reach the island, in which the dominions of King Abstinence were situate, at the expiration of about sixty days, provided the wind and weather continued favourable. For about six or seven weeks we enjoyed a propitious breeze, and were in a high state of hope, when a sudden change in the atmosphere announced an impending storm. The sailors made every preparation to encounter this calamity; but the tempest came on in a few hours with such appalling violence that the ship was quite driven from its course. The pilot threw his turban upon the deck, and beat his breast with the force of a maniac; and the captain partook of the common alarm. The storm continued for six and twenty days, during which time the ship was buffeted about at the mercy of the wind and waves; and on the morning of the twenty-seventh day, when the storm abated, and land was discovered a head, we knew not whether we were about to touch on a friendly or an inimical shore. When the vessel was about four parasangs from the land, it struck upon a sunken rock of coral, and instantly went to pieces. Every soul perished except myself; and I with difficulty escaped death, by clinging to a piece of the broken mast, on which I floated towards the land.

When I found myself upon the shore, I fell upon my knees, and lifted up my voice in thanksgiving to God and his holy prophet for this happy deliverance. Suddenly, as I gazed around me, I saw the pinnacles and domes of a great city in the distance; and, suspecting that such a place could not be inhabited by savages or cannibals, I determined to hasten towards it. It was only a short time before sunset that I entered the town through one of the principal gates. I addressed myself to the porter, who was sitting in a very singular attitude on a stone by the side of the gate, and inquired the name of the city and of the country in which I found myself. The porter stared up into my countenance with a stupid glance, and muttered, in a tongue with which I was familiar, these words—"Ah! you are the dog of an infidel who stole my trousers the other night from off me, while I was sleeping in this very spot—are you?" and, without more ado, he jumped up, shouting, "Help! help! here's the wretch who stole my trousers!" A crowd of persons soon collected around; but they seemed so confused in their ideas, that they all began laying hold of each other, crying with thick and stammering voices, "Oh! you wretched thief!" and then they all began beating and pummeling each other as hard as they could. At length the porter endeavoured to turn their attention towards me; but they did not seem to understand him, and took him for the thief of his own trousers. While they all began beating and ill-using this man, I stole away from the scene of this extraordinary affray, and entered further into the city.

Seeing a barber's shop open, and thinking that I should there learn all the news, I went in and asked to be shaved. The barber came reeling forward out of his back-room, and took up a large mop with which he began mopping my face. At length, perceiving his mistake, he burst into a loud fit of laughter, and then took to his lather-brush. But he soaped my head all over, and chaunted a drinking song the whole time. After a considerable deal of delay, during which I was too much astonished at all I saw to make the slightest observation, the barber began shaving me:—but the wretch cut off all my beard on the left side of my chin and face, and all the hair off the right side of my head. He then threw down the razor, and swore by the Prophet that he would not shave me one atom more. I was about to remonstrate with him, but he kicked me out of his shop, and refused either to listen to me, to finish shaving me, or to be paid for what he had done. I was therefore compelled to walk through the streets, cutting the most ridiculous figure in the world.

Presently I passed by a caravanserail, or inn, and resolved upon taking up my lodging there. I went in and found the master of the caravanserail leaning against the door-post of his own room, and looking in a most vacant manner at a door opposite. The moment I accosted him, he gave an unmeaning look towards me, and then began singing a song. I asked him if I could have a meal, and he set up a dance; when he had done that, I inquired if I could be accommodated with a lodging, and he rushed upon me like a demon, beating and scratching me with all his might. I made haste to run away from the caravanserail, and the master of it rolled upon a heap of manure in a corner of his yard, laughing like a lunatic.

More astounded than ever, and thinking that my garb probably annoyed the inhabitants of this city, I entered a tailor's shop, to procure a change of attire. The moment I presented myself to the tailor, he jumped up from his seat, fell upon my neck, declared that I was his long-lost father, and then began dancing around me for joy. His wife ran out to see what was the matter; and she immediately darted towards me, caught me by the collar of my vest, and began pummeling me with all her force, exclaiming at the same time, "Ah! you wicked old sinner! you are the conjurer who told my fortune, and said that I should marry a prince, and you come to laugh at me because I have espoused a tailor." "He is my father, my dear," said the tailor. "He is an old magician," retorted the wife. But the tailor, under the singular impression that I was his father, fell upon his wife, and a dreadful conflict ensued between them. They punched, scratched, and beat each other with all their might and main; and I, fearing the consequences of being implicated in their quarrel, made my escape from the shop.

Scarcely had I got a few paces from the door, when a young female came up to me, exclaiming, "Oh! you wretch, to abandon your lawful wife and three children, and leave them in distress; and now you hope to be able to creep about this city without my seeing you; but I knew you directly, in spite of your beard being cut half off."—and, as she thus spoke, she set up such a dreadful scream, that a crowd collected around us in an instant. But, as was the case in the affair with the porter, no one seemed to know who was the particular individual pointed out, and all began attacking and fighting with each other. A dreadful scene of confusion took place, of which I availed myself to slip away amidst the riot; leaving the young female, who had accosted me, engaged in combat with an old man, whom she held by the beard with one hand, and ill-used with the other.

I hurried on, more astonished than ever at what took place. But being dreadfully oppressed with hunger, I went into a baker's shop, and asked for a loaf. The baker was sitting in a sleepy and reeling attitude upon his stool; and when I entered the shop, he contented himself with raising his heavy eyes for a moment, and pointing towards his oven. I understood the signal, and went to the oven; but all the bread inside was burnt to ashes, and I could not find a morsel fit to eat. With a heavy heart I left the shop, and proceeded to a seller of baked meats who lived opposite. There I found the master of the shop lying fast asleep upon the floor, and half a dozen ravenous dogs were preying upon the cooked food on the tables. They had eaten up nearly every thing to the very bone; and I could not venture to interfere with their occupation.

Wondering whether I was destined to starve in this great and populous city or not, I went on a little farther, and to my joy discovered a shop where beautiful comfitures and dried fruits of all kinds were displayed in the window. With an appetite sharpened by previous disappointments, I entered this shop, and found the master, his wife, and five or six children, all sitting in an inner room, and engaged in drinking wine out of large flagons. I expressed the nature of my wants; and the fruiterer very kindly told me to help myself in the Prophet's name, and that I might eat of the best in his shop without paying an asper. Overjoyed at my good luck, I was about to commence an attack upon some fine dates, when a volume of flame and smoke suddenly broke forth from a side room, and nearly blinded me. The house was on fire; and I hastened to save myself by retreating into the street. A dreadful alarm soon prevailed; but no one ventured to adopt any measure to save the fruiterer's family; and so he, his wife, and all his children perished in the flames.

It was now quite dark; and the streets were filled with crowds reeling and rolling about in all directions. A stranger met another stranger, and a fight instantly sprang up between them, because one fancied that the other was an enemy. In fact, a general delusion seemed to prevail around; and disorder, tumult, and danger reigned triumphant in the streets. Suddenly a soldier came up to me, and ejaculated in a terrible voice this dread accusation,—"Unhappy wretch! you are the villain who killed the king's favourite monkey!" "Alas! seignior," said I, "I have not been in this city an hour; and I never saw your prince's monkey in my life." "Oh! you have had an eye upon the prince's monkey all your life, have you?" thundered the soldier; and I was immediately dragged off to a miserable prison, where the gaoler was ordered to supply me with food. He, however, forgot to execute this command, but gave me a book to read, and omitted the lamp by which I was to read it.

On the following morning I was ordered to prepare to stand my trial before the king of the country. The gaoler, upon being desired by me to supply me with some food, as I was nearly famished, offered me a cup of wine, which I greedily swallowed. I then felt a total recklessness steal over me concerning my future lot, and suffered myself to be conducted into the presence of the king without offering any resistance. This monarch was reclining upon a sofa, and near him was a table covered with flagons of wine. His manner of distributing justice was very remarkable. He conferred a title and honours upon a man who was proved to be guilty of murder; and sent a complainant in another cause forth to be hanged instead of the assassin just alluded to. But all these strange decisions were not the result of wilful injustice and cruelty; they proceeded from the strangely confused imagination of the sovereign. When I was brought into his presence, and the accusation against me was mentioned, the king said, "Oh! I perfectly recollect seeing this ill-looking fellow walking about my palace on the day the monkey was stolen; and the manner in which he has endeavoured to disguise himself, by half shaving his hair and beard, proves his guilt. Let him be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and the pieces of his body sent to the four governors of my provinces." In a moment I was led out of the hall of audience, and consigned to the care of a captain of the body-guard, to whom the order for my immediate execution was handed. But the captain misunderstood the command, and immediately set off with me to the residences of the four governors of the provinces. These governors he had hanged, drawn, and quartered, and then began to wonder why he had me still in his custody. Thinking that he had done something wrong, upon mature reflection, he said to me, "Seignior, in the name of the Most High God, and of his Prophet Mohammed, depart from this place, and, as you value your life, never return to the City of the Drunkards!"

This exhortation conveyed to my mind the explanation of all that had before seemed so mysterious to me, and I did not hesitate to follow the captain's advice. I procured a horse, and left the city as speedily as the animal could carry me. When at a little distance from it, I obtained some food from a peasant's hut, and inquired the way towards the nearest sea-port. On my arrival at a maritime town, I fortunately discovered a vessel bound direct for the dominions of King Abstinence, at whose capital city I shortly arrived in safety. I acquitted myself of my commission, and returned in one of this sovereign's ships to Balsora, whence I forthwith hastened to Bagdad, to throw myself at the feet of the Caliph, and give a full account of my mission. The Commander of the Faithful was so struck at all I told him, that he ordered his secretary to take down, in letters of gold, the particulars of my adventures in the City of the Drunkards.

COFFEE.

THERE is a highly interesting manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris, in Arabic, entitled "The Support of Innocence." It relates to the lawfulness of using coffee by the professors of Mussulman doctrines. The author's name is Aijerjiri Alhanbali. It appears that a question arose whether coffee was to be included amongst the intoxicating beverages which the Koran prohibits; and the manuscript proves that it is not. There are many other interesting matters in this manuscript. The use of coffee was first introduced by a famous Sheikh of Arabia Felix, whose name was Dhabani, in the fifteenth century.

The excellence of coffee depends in a great measure on the skill and attention exercised in roasting it. If it be too little roasted, it is devoid of flavour; and if too much, it becomes acrid, and has a disagreeable burnt taste. In Europe, it is usually roasted in a cylindrical tin-box, perforated with numerous holes, and fixed upon a spit, which runs lengthwise through the centre, and is turned by a jack or by the hand. Coffee is used in the form either of an infusion or decoction, of which the former is decidedly preferable both as regards the your and strength. Coffee, as very commonly prepared by persons unacquainted with its nature, is a decoction, and is boiled for some time, under a mistaken notion that the strength is not extracted unless it be boiled. But the fact is just the reverse. The fine aromatic oil, which produces the flavour and strength of coffee, is dispelled and lost by boiling; and a mucilage is extracted at the same time, which also tends to make it flat and weak. The best modes are to pour boiling water through the coffee in a biggin or strainer, which is found to extract nearly all the strength; or to pour boiling water upon it, and set it upon the fire, not to exceed ten minutes. Prepared in either way it is fine and strong. As a medicine, strong coffee is a powerful stimulant and cordial, and in paroxysms of asthma, is one of the best remedies; but it should be very strong, and made with almost as much coffee as water. In faintness or exhaustion, from labour or fatigue, and from sickness, coffee is one of the most cordial and delicious restoratives. There are coffee machines in which the water is boiled, and the steam penetrates the coffee, and extracts, to a great degree, the fine aroma. Immediately after, the boiling water is poured over it. Thus the best coffee is made. As we have already said, in Europe, coffee is generally roasted in a cylinder; in Asia, however, open pans or tin plates are used, and, if the time allow, a boy is employed, who picks out every bean when it has reached the right degree of brownness. The same is done by many French people. The second difference in the Asiatic way of preparing coffee is, that they pound the beans and do not grind them, much preferring the former mode. In Marseilles we have likewise seen coffee pounded. Whether this is really preferable, we do not venture to decide; but experience has taught us that the Asiatic coffee is, on the whole, much better than the European. It improves the beverage very much to moist and grind the coffee just before it is used.

The best coffee in the western part of the world is made in France, where this beverage is in universal request. In England and the United States, coffee is always badly made. Coffee was nearly unknown at Paris until the arrival of the Turkish ambassador, Solymán Aga, in the year 1669. The coffee shrub was originally planted in Jamaica, in 1732. In 1652, Daniel Edwards, a Turkey merchant, brought home with him a Greek servant, whose name was Pasqua, and who understood the methods of roasting coffee and making it into a beverage. This man was the first who publicly sold coffee in England, and kept a house for that purpose in George Yard, Lombard Street.

Many sermons against coffee-drinking are extant, written at the time when it was first introduced into Europe, as there are also many sermons against smoking. We recollect having read the following passage in an old English sermon:—"Men cannot now-a-days wait until the smoke of the infernal regions surrounds them, but encompass themselves with smoke of their own accord, and drink a poison which God made black, that it might bear the devil's colour."

Under date of 31st August, the Board of Excise has issued to the officers of that branch of the revenue a general order, of which the following is a copy:—

"In pursuance of directions from the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, specified by Mr. Gordon's Letters of the 6th and 25th instant, ordered—That no objection be made, on the part of this revenue, to dealers in and sellers of coffee mixing chicory with coffee, or to their having the same so mixed in their possession."

(Signed) CHAS. BROWNE.

Of all the abominable frauds on the part of the most dishonest government of this oppressed country, the permission here accorded is the worst. For the sake of revenue, these despots do not care how they encourage the mal-practices of tradesmen; but what can we expect from a government which sacrifices every principle of honour and integrity for the sake of increasing the revenues? The publican is punished for adulteration; but the grocer is told to adulterate his goods. The Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are about the most unprincipled set of miscreants that ever disgraced a nation. They commit every villainy under the cloak of an assumed liberality of principle. When will the working classes assert their own rights and privileges?

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are much obliged to SPART for his verses, which are capital; but we do not wish to make poetry a characteristic feature in the editorial management of our journal.

Private answers have been sent to about twenty correspondents during the last week.

To L. L. C. we repeat the regret expressed in our private letter; but we cannot undertake to return rejected articles.

We again solicit correspondence from all provincial secretaries to total abstinence associations.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER, 26, 1840.

WHAT a strange spectacle does London present to the eyes of the moralizer in those hours when the lamps are bright, and the natural darkness is rendered visible by the artificial lustre of gas! And how different is this scene in the morning, in the same localities! The cathedrals of the east and the west—St. Peter and St. Paul,—the marts of commerce, and the sails that wait it through the world,—the temples of learning and of the law,—the hospitals of the sick, and the palaces of kings,—the old historic sites, and the records of modern magnificence,—the saloon of pleasure, and the fortalice of power,—the monuments of princes, the mansions of nobles, and the workshops of the poor, meet together in the morning light, and bring all the morals of life into one focus, as all its abodes into a common point of view. But at night, when all these edifices present but a dim outline of colossal darkness in the air, the brilliantly lighted streets are the grand object of attraction.

At first sight it would appear that those streets are filled with naught but the bustle of thrifty prosperity and the features of joy. Crowds appear hurrying in all directions, either bent upon amusement or profitable business; and hearts and footsteps both seem light. But a nearer glance will satisfy the beholder that he is deceived. Beneath the bustle he will distinguish the anxiety of deep suspense; and the beams of joy upon the countenance will verge into sickly smiles of mocking misery. The daughters of crime pass along by ones and twos, dressed in the flaunting garb that tells, itself, the tale of broken hearts, and blighted promise, and crushed affections,—to lose an hour of misery amid the haunts of pleasure and of vice. The man, whom the presence of a despairing poverty has driven from his home, proceeds to the public-house, where he drowns his cares in alcoholic poisons, and joins in peals of laughter which find an echo only on his lips, but not in his heart. And in those self-same streets—amid all that bustling crowd—there winds an individual, who has a smile upon his countenance, and a dread idea in his mind. That individual systematically pursues the nearest paths which lead to Waterloo Bridge, and seeks the dark tide that murmurs beneath those graceful arches, as a welcome escape from the human tide that beats against its avenues—in search of that one pearl no where to be found amid the troubled waters of the world, but which the Thames hides in its mysterious depths—oblivion! And to that bridge go the thoughtful men to muse, and the actor to rehearse, and the author to compose, and the invalid to seek for health,—as well as the suicide to die!

Yes, the streets of London are full of the most appalling misery. Many a despairing heart wanders along, in the hope of flying from its own excess of agony; many a crime is concealed beneath a smiling countenance and a fine attire; and many an innocent soul is belied by a repulsive exterior. But of all the victims of evil passions or pursuits, that circulate through the streets of London, as the blood gushes in the veins and arteries, the wretches who are addicted to the vice of intemperance are the most miserable and the most degraded. They cannot depend upon themselves for their own means of recreation or diversion; they dread the solitude of their own thoughts; they are cowards, who fly from their own ideas, to take refuge in those of their companions at the tavern. They have not even the courage of the suicide, because they dare not leave the scene of their woes and their delinquencies,—they are wedded to the public-houses which have ruined them. They creep about like criminals, and seem to dread the gaze of their fellow creatures. They only breathe freely in the fetid air of the tap-room or the parlour of the tavern; the pure atmosphere of the streets is oppressive to them. They have starving wives—starving children—starving parents at home: misery is before them—misery behind them—misery round about them; and yet they cannot exert one effort of courage over their own degraded souls, and rob their evil habit of one penny to hush the cries of starvation at home, and drive their constant attendant Misery one pace further off. They proclaim their own degradation as they walk along, by their air, their pace, their glances, and their manners. They are lost in body—lost in soul: they look not upon the fair prospect of this world with a joyous eye: and they dare not gaze upon the future prospects of another world at all. Emaciated are some,—bloated are others: pale and lank-visaged the former,—livid and purple the latter: and all are the prey to loathsome disease. Their breath is fetid—their brain is heated—their hands tremble—their frames are weak—their legs totter. They are oppressive to themselves, and oppressive to their acquaintances,—a constant burden to all save the publican, who lives by them.

And of all the hundreds of thousands of people that circulate through those streets of London to which we have alluded, there is no class more numerous than that of the intemperate. This class is composed of all ranks and of both sexes. It is a hideous multitude of self-immolated beings—slow suicides—miserable, miserable maniacs. The members of this class are totally divested of moral energy, or they would shake off the yoke of a monster whose shackles they do not love. They hug a chain which they loathe: they worship a task-master whom they anathematize in certain moments, but to whose resorts they return again. Their wives shed bitter, bitter tears all day, and all night: their sons become the perpetrators of enormous crimes, and their daughters enlist in the ranks of the lowest prostitutes. They set an infamous example to their families, and to their acquaintances. They resemble men who are attacked with the plague; they not only die of the disease themselves, but also communicate it to others who die also. Each drunkard makes more converts to his system of vice, than each good man can enlist beneath the banners of virtue.

Can the reader now wonder, then, that amid the crowds which frequent the streets of London, there should be so many care-worn countenances,—so many features lighted up with sickly smiles, while worms are gnawing at the heart? The drunkards are not really happy either in the midst of their dissipation, or on their way to it;—their wives are wandering about to seek the wretches who desert them: their sons are alert after crime: and their daughters are plying their horrible trade of turpitude. Thus does the drunkard supply the streets with misery and crime,—in his own person, in the person of his wife, in the persons of his sons, and in the persons of his daughters. His crime is not single: its name is legion. One evil thus widely operates upon society;—one evil spreads ruin, desolation, poverty, and vice around. The healthful bloom upon the cheek, the bright lustre of the eye, the felicitous smile, the decision of step, the manly confidence of demeanour, the pride of conscious rectitude, the glow of natural exhilaration,—all, all are effaced by the accursed influence of intemperance!

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

We extract the following abridged remarks from a very clever work, called "AN ESSAY ON INTOXICATING LIQUORS," by T. Herbert Barker, Esq., Surgeon, of Bedford:—

When the strongest, most concentrated alcohol, is introduced into the stomach, it inflames the mucous membrane, and shortly destroys its vitality: the shock is rapidly conveyed to the brain, through the medium of the nerves: and persons have been known to die in so short a time after the exhibition of the spirit, that its absorption into the circulation could not have taken place: but it must have exerted its effects immediately upon the nervous system. That intoxicating liquors produce their effects through the medium of the nerves, rather than being absorbed into the circulation, is very probable from the well-known intoxicating effects of a small quantity of a stimulating liquid when imbibed through a reed a plan of drinking which is pursued, as has been observed, by the Burmese and Siamese people. The fluid makes its impression upon the minute extremities of the nerves of sensation as it passes slowly over the tongue, along the oesophagus, (the gullet) into the stomach, where besides this prolonged impression upon the nerves of these parts, it produces the effects which it ordinarily does when taken rapidly into that organ.

Sir Benjamin Brodie killed several rabbits by injecting concentrated alcohol into their stomachs; and invariably found distinct marks of high inflammatory action in that organ, and extravasation of blood between its coats; and from the absence of any preternatural appearances of the brain, with the exception of a gorged state of its blood-vessels, the inference that the fatal shock is altogether upon the nervous system, was much strengthened. These suddenly fatal effects only follow the introduction into the stomach of the most highly-concentrated spirit. In a more diluted form, and as it exists in the numerous varieties of drinks some of which have been treated of, it acts less energetically, and produces the phenomena of Intoxication.

All stimulating liquors produce a local excitement of the nerves of the stomach, and the sensibility of the organ is increased, attended with a feeling of warmth in that region; in a short time the impression is communicated to the brain and entire nervous system, followed by hilarity of mind, dissipation of care, talkativeness, flushed state of the countenance, increased animation of the features, particularly of the eyes, which present a sparkling appearance. The invariable augmentation of the thirst after drinking inebriating liquors at once, and entirely, renders nugatory the reason which is often assigned by the drunkard for resorting to their use, that of thirst. If thirst do not exist when he commences drinking, this painful sensation will shortly be engendered, and thus will he be induced to drink more deeply and frequently of the intoxicating draught. If at this period of intoxication drinking be persisted in, the individual begins to lose all control of the will; giddiness, double vision, and noises in the ears supervene; the ideas become confused and irregular, and instead of being combined so as to produce joyous feelings, they arise in the mind in the most irregular and unconnected manner. During slight ebriety the prevailing disposition and pursuits of the individual are generally pretty freely disclosed, and hence originated the well-known saying, "in vino veritas." The irritable and ill-tempered become quarrelsome; the weak and silly, boisterous with laughter and mirth, profuse in their declarations of friendship, and in their own minds, capable of mighty achievements; the naturally sad and hypochondriacal are readily moved to tears, and dwell on mournful subjects. In a still more advanced stage of drunkenness, the excitement nearly approaches to that of delirium; the conceptions become more and more disordered, various hallucinations are frequently observed, the face becomes pale, and covered with a cold and clammy perspiration, the eyes vacant, the voice is thick, the voluntary motions are imperfect and unsteady, and at length the voluntary muscles cease to act. Sometimes vomiting occurs at this period, and produces very beneficial effects, much alleviating the subsequent stupor.

After these effects, the phenomena of deep intoxication occur. The powers of voluntary motion entirely fail, the mental faculties are suspended, and in the most severe cases, sensation is completely lost. In most instances this state supervenes gradually: the drunkard feels drowsy, and appears to fall into a sound sleep; but when the attempt is made, it is discovered that he cannot be aroused to consciousness by any effort; and the limbs remain in whatever position they may be placed. The face may be pale or flushed, and there may or may not be vomiting at this period; but the eyes will be vacant, red, and sometimes glazed; the pupils dilated. The head is generally warm, although the body and limbs may be somewhat or considerably cold. The pulse, which was at first excited becomes now feeble and slow, and, in severe cases, the depression of the circulation will be so great, and the powers of life at so low an ebb, that it cannot be felt at the wrists. The breathing may be laborious, and, in severe cases, there may be convulsions which are frequently the prelude to a fatal termination.

The effects of the stimulating liquors will vary with the habits of the person, with the condition of the body, particularly with regard to its strength and fullness of habit, with the kind of inebriating liquid used, and the circumstances of the stomach containing food or not. Many kinds of ale are strongly impregnated with some narcotic principle, besides what is contained in the hops; and these produce more decidedly stupifactive effects in a short time, and possess less of the stimulant properties than spirits, but are equally, if not more, injurious than the other liquors.

The sleep resembling apoplexy which is induced during intoxication, is a wise provision of Nature to restore the exhausted excitability of the system; I remarked the sleep resembling apoplexy, for it is different from the sleep of nature and health, and is more resembling apoplexy than any other disease; and indeed not unfrequently terminates in apoplexy. How numerous have been the instances of sudden death from intoxication! These have been cases where this sleep has been the prelude to death; and in the majority of instances where death has occurred, it has been from apoplexy. We frequently read of persons found dead from intoxication,—of cases where the sleep of ebriety has been the last that has been taken in this world. I have known individuals who have recurred to the intoxicating draught in a condition of comparative health, and have fallen into this state of stupor never again to awake in this life; during the sin of intoxication have they been instantaneously ushered into eternity. Surely if the drunkard were but aware of the risk which he encounters during each of his vicious acts of intemperance, of the attenuated film upon which life hangs in the depth of intoxication, he would be frightened from his destructive course. What will he think when he is told that during the excitement of intoxication, merely a small quantity of fluid is required to be thrown out by the blood-vessels into the cavities of the brain, to cause instantaneous death, but that he has been most mercifully preserved during these debauched states of his system; death frequently happens from this cause during intoxication; and it is not surprising, since it sometimes occurs suddenly without any unusual excitement; indeed, it is remarkable that this result is not more frequent even than it is, with drunkards.

But we will suppose that the individual awakes after some time—which happily is the termination in the majority of instances—in what condition do we then find him? He does not awake as though he had been partaking of "Tired Nature's sweet restorer, balmy Sleep;"

but both physically and mentally is suffering from his debauch: his hands are tremulous, his limbs are weak and unsteady, the surface of his body is susceptible of the slightest impressions, his stomach nauseates all kinds of food, his thoughts are gloomy and desponding, his temper is irascible, and if every moral principle of his nature has not been destroyed by excessive repetition of the vice, his mind is overpowered with the most distressing sense of degradation. The physical effects of the destructive habit are temporarily combated by a recurrence to the stimulant. Happy result for the individual if the effects of a single first debauch produce such a permanent impression upon his mind, as to prevent him from ever afterwards taking an intoxicating quantity of stimulating liquors. It is not infrequent that such disgust is excited by a first intoxication that it has not been repeated; but, if this be not excited after the first ingestion of a large quantity of intoxicating liquors, the tendency to it will be diminished by every subsequent indulgence.

The preceding sketch of intoxication must convince every intelligent individual of the total incompatibility of a continuance in the practice, with health of body, and vigour of intellect. Every appearance indicates a violent commotion of the frame, and however thoroughly some practices may become ingrafted and naturalized as it were, to the system, as to have justified the well-known assertion that habit is second nature, that of intoxication can never be persisted in with impunity. The disturbance of the mental faculties indicates the degree to which the brain has been affected; the appearance of the countenance, the condition of the pulse, and of the surface of the body, indicate the disturbance of the vascular system; in fact that something like a general but temporary febrile action has been set up in the body. The stomach, as has been wisely ordained, is excited to attempt to throw off its offending contents; and the kidneys are actively exercised, after the entrance of the fluid into the circulation, to assist in ridding the system of the baneful agent of intoxication.

If all other intoxications were wanting, none other would be required to convince the most obstinate sceptic of the injurious effects of intoxicating liquors, than those which are observed after the more immediate effects of the poison have subsided. Then, indeed, is the victim truly wretched; his body unhinged, and his intellectual faculties bedimmed and by a continuance in the habit, we may observe the most lamentable spectacle in animated nature, a being with a shattered fabric of a body, and a ruined tenant; reason perhaps dethroned from her seat, never again to be reinstated in the earthly tabernacle.

I would exhort the drunkard to reflect well on his condition during the insensibility of drunkenness. The sleeping brute can be aroused to conscientiousness, and may escape danger if near at hand, but here is a human being, a being endowed with reason, and with the awful responsibilities of his nature appended thereto,—insensible, perfectly helpless, more so even than the newly-born babe,—and this by his own perverse and worse than brutalized will.

CASES OF SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

Extracted from No. III. of the "ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE."

THE Countess Cornelia Bandini of the town of Cesena in Italy, enjoyed a tolerably good state of health, although she had reached the age of sixty-two, and notwithstanding her addiction to ardent spirits and strong wines. Having one evening experienced a sort of drowsiness, she retired to bed at an earlier hour than usual; and her maid remained with her until she fell fast asleep. On the following morning, when the girl repaired to her mistress's bed-room, she found nothing but the remains of the countess's body in the most horrid condition. At the distance of four feet from the bed was a heap of ashes, in which could be distinguished the legs and arms untouched. Between the legs lay the head, the brains of which, together with half the posterior part of the cranium, remained; but the whole of the chin had been consumed. Two fingers had been found in the state of a coal; and the body itself was reduced to ashes. These ashes, when touched, left on the fingers a fat and foetid moisture. A small lamp, which stood on the floor, was covered with ashes, and had no oil in it. The tallow of two candles was melted on a table; but the wicks remained untouched; and the feet of the candlesticks were covered with a certain moisture. The bed was not damaged. The bed-clothes and cover-lids were raised on one side, as if a person had just got up from the bed. The furniture and tapestry were covered with a moist soot, the colour of ashes, which had penetrated the drawers and soiled the linen. This soot, having been conveyed to a neighbouring kitchen, adhered to the walls and the utensils: a piece of bread in the cupboard was covered with it, and no dog would touch it. The same infectious odour had been communicated to other apartments.

Grace Pitt, the wife of a fishmonger at Ipswich, aged about sixty, had contracted a habit, which she continued for several years, of going down stairs in the middle of the night, half-dressed, and smoking a pipe. She was moreover accustomed to partake largely of ardent spirits previously to retiring to rest. One night she got up from her bed, and went down stairs as usual: her daughter, who slept with her, did not perceive that she was absent until the next morning when she awoke. The young woman rose and dressed herself, and then proceeded to the kitchen, where she found her mother stretched on the right side, with her head near the grate, the body extended upon the hearth, and the legs upon the floor. This floor was made of wood, and had the appearance of being burnt without any apparent flame. On beholding this hideous spectacle, the girl ran in great haste to fetch some water, a large quantity of which she poured over the body of her mother, to extinguish the fire which was still burning in the region of the left bosom; but the dreadful foetid odour that was exhaled from the corpse almost suffocated the neighbours who repaired to the daughter's assistance. The trunk was in some measure incinerated, and resembled a heap of coals covered over with white ashes. The head, the legs, the arms, and the thighs had also participated in the burning. The unhappy victim had drunk an extraordinary quantity of spirits on the preceding day, in consequence of having received tidings that another of her daughters had just returned from Gibraltar. There was no fire in the grate; and the candle was found entirely burnt out in the socket of the candlestick, which was close by her. Near the body, there were also a child's clothes and a paper screen, which had not sustained the slightest injury by the fire,—although placed within the scope of its fury, had it been a natural flame.

In the month of February, 1779, Marie Jauffret, widow of Nicholas Gravier, shoemaker, and who resided at Aix, in Provence, France, was burnt to death in her apartment. She had long been addicted to the dreadful vice of intemperance, and her frame was exceedingly bloated and unhealthy when her terrible end took place by means of spontaneous combustion. Messieurs Muraire and Rocas, two eminent surgeons of the vicinity, were commissioned by the local authorities to make a report of the state of the body. They found only a mass of ashes and a few bones, calcined in such a manner, that at the least pressure they crumbled into dust. The bones of the cranium, one hand, and a foot had in some measure resisted the action of the fire. Near the remains stood a table untouched, and under the table a small stove, the grating of which having been long burnt, afforded an aperture through which it is probable that the fire had been communicated: one chair, which stood near the flames, had the seat and fore-feet burnt. In other respects there was no appearance of fire either in the chimney or the apartment; so that, except the fore-part of the chair, it appeared to the medical gentlemen that no other combustible matter contributed to this speedy incineration, which was effected in the space of seven or eight hours.

A woman of Copenhagen, in the year 1692, who for three years had been notorious as a most inveterate drunkard, and who for some time previous to her dissolution, would take no other kind of nourishment, suffered death from spontaneous combustion. She sat down one evening upon her chair to sleep, and was entirely consumed in a few hours, so that on the ensuing morning, no part of her was found but the skull and the extreme joints of her fingers. All the rest of her body was reduced to cinders, and a most horrible stench pervaded the chamber in which this direful tragedy of nature took place.

The following case of spontaneous combustion took place in the year 1773. The victim was a widow of the name of Mary Clues, and was fifty years of age at the time of her death. She had long been addicted to dreadful habits of intemperance; and this propensity increased after the decease of her husband, which took place a year and a half previous to the demise of the widow. For upwards of a year, scarcely a day had elapsed in which she did not drink half a pint of rum or aniseed. Her health gradually declined; and, about the beginning of February, she was attacked by the jaundice and confined to her bed. Though she were incapable of much action, and not in a condition to work, she still continued her old habit of drinking every day, and smoking tobacco. The bed, on which she lay, stood parallel to the chimney of the apartment, and at a distance of about three feet from the fire-place. On Saturday morning, the 1st of March, she fell upon the floor; and her extreme weakness having prevented her from getting up, she remained in that state until some one entered and put her to bed again. The following night she wished to be left alone again. A woman quitted her at half-past eleven, and, according to custom, shut the door and locked it. This woman had put upon the fire two large pieces of coal, and had placed a light in a candlestick on a chair at the head of the bed. At half-past five in the morning, a smoke was seen issuing through the window, and the door was immediately broken open. Some flames, which were in the room, were soon extinguished; and between the bed and the chimney were found the remains of the unfortunate Mary Clues. One leg and a thigh were still entire; but there remained nothing of the skin, the muscles, or the viscera: the bones of the cranium, the breast, the spine, and the upper extremities were entirely calcined and covered with a whitish efflorescence. The furniture had sustained but little injury. The side of the bed next to the chimney had suffered most; the wood of it was slightly burnt, but the feather-bed, the clothes, and covering, were not even singed. The walls and everything in the room were blackened, and a disagreeable vapour pervaded the chamber; but nothing except the body exhibited any strong traces of fire.

THE MADEIRA MERCHANT.

A TALK.—BY H. W. WESTON.

JAMES MAURICE was born near the lovely city of Perth. Being blessed by the most amiable and virtuous of parents, he received a very superior Scotch education. With joy did the authors of his being watch over the development of the intelligence of their only and dearly-loved boy; and with heartfelt anxiety did they look forward to the time when he should leave their humble but happy abode, to launch his frail bark on the ocean of life. He was destined to try his fortune in the counting-house of a distant relative, a wealthy merchant in the great metropolis; and when the dreaded day of separation arrived, the miserable parents bade a long farewell to their beloved son.

On the arrival of the amiable young Scotchman in London, he was immediately taken into the counting-house of his friend, who was an extensive importer of foreign wines; and young Maurice, in his capacity of clerk, was compelled to taste nearly every sample to try its quality. Thus he at first imbibed the relish for intoxicating drink; but at this time his vigorous and healthy constitution seldom or ever yielded to its influence.

The superior talents of Mr. Maurice soon evinced themselves; and never were the merchant's affairs in a more flourishing condition than under the discipline of our hero.

Mr. Maurice soon became a partner in a more extensive business than that of his employer, and his name then stood first in a large firm well known at five or six of the principal ports of the world. His transactions with his bankers amounted to upwards of a quarter of a million annually; and for years the splendid career of our young friend astonished and delighted all who knew him.

At this time he married a most accomplished young lady, the daughter of a wealthy merchant. He took a charming Villa at Dulwich, and many a happy day has the writer passed at that lovely and hospitable retreat. Mrs. Maurice presented him with six children; and never did man look upon a sweeter domestic circle than that composed of this happy family. Every thing that could please the eye or delight the heart was there provided, and all appeared happiness and peace; but luxury crept into the abode, and the merchant imagined that his friends could not be happy unless they were well saturated with wine and other intoxicating drinks, to which it was suspected that the wealthy Maurice himself was somewhat attached.

The habit of excessive drinking has certainly decreased of late among the higher classes of English society; but this favourable change can hardly be said to have reached the merchants and the bons vivants of the City. The luxurious feasting of the City corporations must at some period be brought before the public; and these worthies will doubtless be soon shamed out of their excessive gluttony and drunkenness. It may here be observed by way of parenthesis, that the Grocers' Company spends upwards of £800 for each annual venison dinner. Yes, £800 in one day in each year to tickle the palates of a few individuals, many of whom are poor law guardians, and employed in carrying out the cursed statute which makes poverty a crime, and punishes it with the slow and lingering death of starvation; and it was such Bacchanalian revelries as these that Maurice frequented, to be further initiated in the habits of drinking to excess.

In 1825 the terrible panic came like a simoom upon the face of the commercial world, and shook our mercantile credit to its base. Yes—there came one of those periodical tornados, let loose upon commerce by the juggle of the paper system, and the withering monopoly of that pandering and infamous combination, commonly called by the late Mr. Cobbett, the "Old Lady of Threadneedle Street, and more generally known as the Bank of England."

The house of the wealthy Maurice fell in the general havoc, and the merchant who was a prince one day, saw nothing but ruin and destitution staring him in the face the next. Again and again did he seek solace in the intoxicating cup; and every fresh calamity made his potations the deeper.

The affairs of his house were wound up; a composition was paid to the creditors; and the partners were released, to try their fortunes once more.

Mr. Maurice with some assistance again commenced his business with the Island of Madeira, and soon found employment for two smart schooners. He continued trading for a few years, and supporting his family in respectability; but the accursed habit of drunkenness now began to show itself in all its deformity; and the once joyous and happy countenance of our hero became bloated and disfigured. His hand trembled, his memory failed him, and the lurking shyness of conscious guilt soon compelled his friends to express their sad conviction that Maurice was a lost character!

Owing to some dispute with the custom-house, our poor friend obstinately persisted in not paying a fine, and was thrown into the King's-Bench prison. Ruin now really overtook him; every fraction of his property was stripped from him; his wife and dear family were compelled to fall back on her father, who sent her and the children to some little estate in Scotland, for the sake of economy; and he, deprived of his all, remained in a debtor's prison. If there were no other reason for abolishing the system of imprisonment for debt, a sufficient one exists in the fact, that the habits of prisoners, generally, confirm the poor debtor in the vice of drunkenness.

For twelve long months did poor Maurice linger in this abode of misery, and here he sank down to the confirmed sot. The pot of beer, the pipe of tobacco, and the lewd and filthy song, day after day, passed away his time. He was released; but these low habits never forsook him,—he was indeed lost, besotted, and paralysed; he actually forgot his wife and offspring, he drank all he could get, and he found numbers who gave him drink out of charity. He passed his time in wandering from one public house to another, and often was to be seen about those dens of iniquity in Leadenhall, Newgate, and Billingsgate markets. At length a dread disease overtook him, and the writer with some other friends gained admission for him into St. Bartholomew's hospital. He was taken thither in his rags from an out-port of hell, called the "Dark House," in Newgate-market. A few weeks terminated his wretched existence,—he died there, unvisited and alone! No wife or dear children were near to soothe him. Strong drink had made the father forget the wife of his bosom and the children of their loves; nor did any of them know he was dead until some time after his burial. The writer begged the body of Maurice, and had it interred with the remains of some portion of his young offspring, in a vault which he had erected in his affluence, in Homerton church.

He is gone to another world; his wife and family are dispersed—we scarce know whither; but reflection on his career reminds us of the dread uncertainty of all mundane affairs; and, as we curse the cause, we tremble at the consequences of tampering with intoxicating drinks!

Fathers! for the sake of heaven, never place your sons in a situation where they are likely to deal in alcoholic drinks! Attribute the appalling end of Maurice to his early habit of tasting wine as one of the attributes of his business; and be assured that, as drink punishes and curses its victim, so he that deals in intoxicating liquors, is in some way or other castigated by means of the traffic!

REVIEWS.

The Museum of Mirth; or Humourist's Pocket-Book. Numbers I—XVI. Published every Fortnight. Glasgow: W. Hamilton.

THIS excellent little publication is compiled expressly for the working classes, so that rational amusement may be provided for the poor man, instead of the baneful indulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors. This aim, which is a laudable one, is well worked out; and the sixteen numbers now before us contain some of the most witty and pithy anecdotes and quotations which a discriminating taste could have selected for the purpose. We will give an example:—

"Thomas," said a sponging friend of the family to a footman, who had been lingering about the room for half an hour to show him to the door; "Thomas, my good fellow, it's getting late, isn't it? How soon will the dinner come up, Thomas?" "The very moment you be gone, sir," was the unequivocal reply.

Grant's London Journal. Published Weekly.

8vo. pp. 16. Vol. II. No. 37. London: G. Berger.

This very clever publication, which is conducted by the well-known author of the "Great Metropolis," &c. &c. deserves universal patronage. The original articles are all excellent, and the selections are made with good taste and judgment. The following brief extract is from a capital paper called "The Adventures of Anthony Small-Cash, Esq.":

"Well then," continued my new acquaintance, "you must know that I am in rather an unpleasant predicament, hunted about like a hare. The fact is, some friends of mine are rather too anxious about my comfort, and follow me whether I like it or no. I am fond of giving 'em the slip, though, now and then, as you see—"

"Oh! ah! relations, I suppose," said I. "Kind-hearted aunts."

"Aunts!" exclaimed the stranger with a loud laugh. "No indeed, if you had talked of my uncle, you would have been nearer the truth. I know a good deal more of him than any of my other connexions. But the friends I speak of are no relations, oh! no, not in the least."

"Pressing fellows, perhaps, wanting to borrow money," said I.

"Now you've hit it. They do want money, and what's more, they won't take any refusal. If they can't get it, they'll have me. In fact it's of no use denying it, they are officers."

"Military men!" cried I in astonishment.

"No, bailiffs," carelessly replied my companion.

"Then you are—"

"Nicholas Sharp, Esq., of no particular parish, commonly called Sharp Nick. Occupation, dodging creditors, revenue, round O, accomplishments undeniable. Now you have my history. People say I have a knack for guessing; now tell me am I very far wrong when I say you are in my line?"

The Temperance Messenger. Number for September. New Series. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

A very clever organ for the South Midland Temperance Association, and the adjacent parts. It contains a great variety of matter, and blends amusement with instruction. We quote the following clever remarks:—

WHAT IS THE POSITION OF ENGLAND? She is drunk. In her cities, the gin palaces have raised their shameless fronts, with almost royal splendour; like prostitutes, they pander to the lust of the people for the sake of money till our wretched, ragged, starving, metropolitan poor, are drunk with gin! In the country, the beer-shops infest every village, and every lane; absorb the hard-earned wages of the poor; and consume the children's bread while the father is drunk with beer. It is not known how large a portion of the flower of England's hope, of the rising talent of the country, fall prostrate before the power of wine! Thus England, Christian England, is become the greatest drunkard in the world, if we except her progeny, in New South Wales, who are said, if it be possible, to drink deeper still.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL PROGRESS AND MEETINGS.

BIRMINGHAM.

OUR esteemed correspondent, MR. ELIJAH GOODHEAD, has favoured us with an elaborate report of the meeting held by the Birmingham Temperance Society, at the usual place, on Monday evening, Sept. 14th. MR. PLUMFRET was called to the chair. The audience was addressed by MESSRS. GOODHEAD and SMITH; who were succeeded by that truly renowned champion of Teetotalism, MR. JOHN HOCKINGS, the "Birmingham Blacksmith." This veteran was received with tremendous applause; and his powerful style of elocution, his sallies of wit, his terrific attacks upon those who encourage drinking, and his strong appeals to those present to sign or adhere to the pledge, drew forth the most enthusiastic applause. The details of that oration will long tingle in the ears of those who heard it; and the fruits will be a glorious accession of strength to the Birmingham Temperance Society.

Mr. HOCKINGS said he had been asked whether any good came out of Teetotalism? He would declare, in reply, that some years ago he did not possess five shillings, and now he was worth five hundred pounds. Teetotalism had done this for him, and would do the same for all who tried its principles. Mr. Hockings said that a short time ago he was travelling in a coach in which there were some convicts on their way to the hulks. He (Mr. Hockings,) enquired wherefore one of them sobbed so bitterly. The reason was, that the penitent malefactor "recollected him (Mr. Hockings,) and regretted to say that he had frequently attended Temperance meetings, for the sake of creating a disturbance. If he had signed the pledge, he should not have been in that condition; as drunkenness had led him to commit the crime for which he was then on his way to the place of punishment." Mr. Hockings then alluded to Father Mathew, on whom he pronounced a powerful eulogium.

LAUNCESTON (CORNWALL).

On Friday, August 28th, the members of the Launceston Temperance Institution were edified by the delivery of a Lecture on Tobacco, by Mr. B. A. PALMER, who entered into the history of the plant, and fully explained its injurious effects. The talented lecturer is a young man of considerable intellectual attainments, and who was reclaimed from habits of intemperance at the period of the first establishment of a total abstinence society in Launceston. One Teetotaler, who listened to the lecture with great attention, emptied his snuff-box upon the floor, the moment it was concluded and declared that he would never indulge in the habit again.

We sincerely thank the Secretary of the Launceston Temperance Institution for his kindness in corresponding with us, and shall always be glad to give insertion to his communications. We perceive, by a card forwarded to us, that several interesting lectures are to be delivered at Launceston in the course of the summer. One is upon the "Physiology of Temperance;" we shall give a short account of each.

THE MARINER'S CHURCH, WELLCLOSE SQUARE.

On Monday, August 31st, according to previous announcement, a tea-meeting was held in the Mariner's Church, after which a female Branch to the Saint George's Branch was formed. Mr. MIERS, the Secretary of the latter, was called to the chair, upon taking which he expatiated upon the importance of establishing female total abstinence associations. Mrs. ROBERTS and Mrs. DOUGLAS were amongst the female speakers on this occasion: and they were listened to with the most profound attention. The new branch was denominated The St. George's and East Smithfield Female Branch.

GLOUCESTER.

Teetotalism has many able and staunch supporters in this city. Mr. E. HUDSON, one of the travelling advocates of the United Temperance Association, gave lectures there, to very crowded audiences, on the 13th and 14th instant. These lectures were received with much enthusiasm; and great benefits will result to the cause of total abstinence in this city.

HALL OF SCIENCE, CITY ROAD.

On Friday, the 11th instant, a crowded meeting of Teetotalers assembled at this place. Mr. DONALDSON (the brother of the well-known advocate) was called to the chair. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, and by Messrs. HART, CLUES, JAMESON, ROBERTY and J. H. DONALDSON. The Hall will be open every Friday evening, on which occasion every pledge of total abstinence will be administered.

VIRGINIA STREET, CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

A meeting of this association was lately held in the Glass-house, opposite the entrance to the London Docks, East Smithfield. The room was crowded to excess. The Rev. S. HUTCHINSON was called to the chair. The audience was addressed by this gentleman, and by Messrs. KESLEY, BLACKMORE, ROBERTS, JOHNSON, ROBERTY, SULLIVAN, and GRAY, in a most powerful and impressive manner.

THE MARLBOROUGH BRANCH OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The usual weekly meeting at Mr. Warde's Assembly Rooms, Circus Place, New Road, took place on Wednesday evening, Sept. 16th. The chair was taken by Mr. H. W. WESTON, Secretary to the United Temperance Association; and the audience was addressed with great effect by Messrs. TODD, MAC CURRY (of Chelsea), COLLINS, and SMITH (of Stratford.)

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday, Sept. 16.

Mr. CRUMP, the Registrar of this Association, took the chair at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, on this occasion. He made an excellent speech upon the general merits of Teetotalism, and produced a sensible impression upon the audience.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS said that if there were a few occasional relapses from the doctrine of total abstinence to the habits of dissipation, they only occurred on the parts of those who were not sincere from the commencement.

Mr. BENSTEAD spoke upon the necessity of consistency, and exposed the folly of the moderation-doctrine by showing the impossibility of its universal application, whereas the principle of total-abstinence possessed the characteristic of unity in that respect.

Mr. ANDERSON implored the miserable and degraded drunkard to hasten and sign the pledge, as the only means of salvation from domestic, moral, and physical ruin.

Mr. BLACKLEY made a most powerful speech, in which he adduced fresh arguments in favour of Teetotalism.

Saturday, Sept. 19.

Mr. H. W. WESTON, the Secretary of the United Temperance Association, took the chair, and opened the business of the evening in a speech eminently calculated to forward the interests of Teetotalism.

Mr. BOWLER (of Kensington) gave a most favourable account of the progress of Teetotalism in his vicinity.

Mr. BENSTEAD continued his observations from Wednesday night on the necessity of consistency.

Mr. MEE exposed the ruinous consequences of frequenting public-houses, and the folly of people talking of political freedom, while they were shackled in the moral slavery of intemperate habits.

Mr. WILLIAM DONALDSON made a powerful appeal to those present to induce their children to sign the pledge of total abstinence.

Mr. BATEY adduced arguments to prove that the working man can perform his labour better without intoxicating drinks, than with them.

GREENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

One of the most crowded meetings that has ever taken place at the Aldersgate Chapel, was held there by this excellent society on Friday evening, Sept. 18th under the presidency of the Rev. Doctor TRACY, D.D. On the platform were noticed Messrs. R. P. BATGER, (Secretary to the Society,) J. H. DONALDSON, G. W. M. REYNOLDS, H. W. WATSON, &c. &c. The chairman made a most admirable speech upon the grand effects of Teetotalism in respect to the rising generation, and the Report of the Secretary, Mr. R. P. BATGER, was received with the applause due to a narrative of success and triumph in the great cause of total abstinence.

MEETING OF THE SHAREHOLDERS OF "THE TEETOTALER."

A General Meeting of the Shareholders of The Teetotaler journal took place on Monday evening, Sept. 21, at Pepperell's Coffee House, Golden Lane. Mr. R. P. BATGER took the chair. The Secretary, Mr. H. W. WESTON, laid a statement of the position of the journal before the meeting: and a vote of confidence and thanks was awarded to that gentleman, and to Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, the Editor. It was then resolved that the sum of two hundred pounds should be immediately raised upon the issue of the remaining shares, in order to send agents into those distant parts, where the journal is as yet scarcely known, and to adopt the necessary measures to secure an increased circulation.

From the Secretary's Report, it appeared that the sale of the journal had been so great that several of the back numbers were being reprinted: (Number V., second edition, is already out.) The Shareholders were much pleased with the Secretary's statements, and resolved to support the journal to the utmost of their ability.

A vote of thanks was awarded to the chairman, and to Messrs. CRUMP (the Registrar of the United Temperance Association,) EM-

BERSON (the Treasurer) GAWTHORPE, and WILSON, for having especially interested themselves in the business.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WORKS BY G. W. M. REYNOLDS, ESQ.

Mr. TEGG, having purchased the copyrights of the following popular Works, the whole of which are Stereotyped, is enabled to offer them at reduced prices:—

PICKWICK ABROAD;
Or The Tour in France,
With Forty-one Steel Engravings, and Thirty-three beautiful Wood Cuts.
Now Sold at 12s.—Originally published at 21s.

GRACE DARLING;
Or The Heroine of the Fern Islands.
With Twenty Steel Engravings.
Now Sold at 4s.—Originally published at 6s.
Printed for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside.

TEMPERANCE AND INTEMPERANCE.

This Day is published, price 1s. each plain, or 2s. each coloured.

SIX PLATES exhibiting the PROGRESS AND RUINOUS EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE contrasted with the PLEASURES AND HAPPY CONSEQUENCES OF TEMPERANCE. These prints are happily conceived, and vividly portray the fatal results of intemperance, while the happier states of the Temperate Man furnishes a powerful and effective moral.

The set of 6 Plates may be had, 5s. 6d. plain, or 10s. 6d. coloured.
London—Dean and Munday, Threadneedle-street; and at the United Temperance Association.

Publishing every Saturday, price 2d. and in monthly parts price 9d., in a new and improved form.

GRANT'S LONDON JOURNAL.

Conducted by the author of "Random Recollections,"

"The Great Metropolis," &c.
The attention of the friends of Teetotalism is requested to GRANT'S LONDON JOURNAL, as, though essentially a literary publication, it has, from its commencement, most strenuously advocated the cause of Temperance.

Published by G. BERGER, Holywell-street, Strand, and to be had of all Booksellers and News-vendors.

DIET—"INGLIS'S DIGESTIVE BREAD"

Is extremely easy of digestion, wholesome and nutritious."

—Dr. Walker.
"From the excellence of the materials of which it is composed and the healthful stimulus it produces on the intestinal canal, it cannot fail to prove an invaluable article of diet to all classes of persons, especially those engaged in sedentary employment."—Dr. Spilman.

"Ingles, New-street, Covent-garden, makes very good brown bread. It is well for those who live in town, to know where to find it."—See Graham on Diet and Regime.

"Attend to Diet, regulate your stomach, and that will regulate all the rest of the human frame."—Abernethy.

"My family have been in the habit of eating your brown bread for several years past, and I consider it particularly wholesome and nutritious, and superior to any bread of the kind I have as yet partaken of."—George Jewell, M.D.
Upwards of 100 testimonials may be seen at the shop.
New-street, Covent-garden.

With the Magazines, will be published, in 8vo., containing sixty-four closely printed 8vo. pages, and stitched in a neat wrapper, Price 1s. Part I. of

THE ANATOMY OF INTEMPERANCE,

By G. W. M. REYNOLDS.

This work is a complete Key to Teetotalism. It will be completed in eight weekly numbers at 3d. each, and in two monthly parts, at 1s. each.

Depot of the United Temperance Association, 13, Aldersgate Street;

And sold by W. Strange, Paternoster Row; S. Macher & Co., Dublin; and D. Campbell, Glasgow.

A New Weekly Publication for Teetotalers

This Day is Published, Part I, Price Fourpence, of

THE LADIES' KITCHEN DIRECTORY.

EDITED BY A LADY.

With Illustrations on WOOD and STEEL.

London: Published by J. FELLOWS, 36, Tottenham Court Road, and may be had of all Booksellers and Venders of this Publication.

NOTICE.

L. KYEZOR, (From General) WATCH

AND CLOCK MANUFACTURER, 16, TOTTENHAM-COURT-ROAD, nearly opposite Great Russell-street, and at 17, Upper George-street, Edgware-road, takes the present opportunity of returning his sincere thanks to the public for the great encouragement he has met with for the last thirty years, and begs to inform them that he continues to employ ten experienced workmen, both French and English, for repairing Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Musical Boxes, &c., of every description. He has made a reduction of one-half the price usually charged by others in the trade.

Common Watch Glasses, 3d., Double Flint, 6d., Lunet Glass, 1s. 3d., Gilt Watch Hands, pair, 9d., Watch Dials, 3s., Main-spring, 3s., Verge, 3d., Hair-spring, 1s. 3d., Watch cleaning, 1s. 6d., Chains, 1s. 6d., Gold Watch Hands, pair, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 30-hour Clock, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 8-day Clock, 3s. 6d.

Chronometers, Duplex, Horizontal, and Repeating Watches of every description, both Foreign and English. Turret Spring, and Musical Clocks, &c., and every other article in the trade as cheap in proportion.

Every Watch and Clock brought to repair, will be taken to pieces in the presence of the person who brings it, and the fault shown, to prevent the overcharges that are generally made.

L. K. calls the attention of the public to his extensive stock of Clocks, all of which are of his own manufacture, and will warrant them free of expense for seven years, confident they will be found 40 per cent. cheaper than any Watchmaker can afford them, they not being the real manufacturers.

N. B. Clocks of every description wound up and kept in repair at 15s. per annum.

SIGHT RESTORED. NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED BY THE USE OF GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

Copies of Testimonials given gratis by all Agents.
Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.
This is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the eyes and head. It will prevent diseases of a Scrofulous nature affecting the nerves of the head. In cases of a nervous head-ache it is completely efficacious, and gives a natural sweetness to the breath. It may be taken as frequently as other snuffs, with the most perfect safety and gratification to the consumer. Wash the eyes every morning with warm milk and water, to remove whatever secretion may have been produced during the night.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vale Mecum.
Dr. Andrews also recommends its use as a preventive from contagion.

G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield, Esq.'s Letter.

Observe this Caution.—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE INVENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.
Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

Mrs. A. Cole, No. 7, Skinners' Almshouses, aged 69, sight restored and head-ache cured, Jan. 9, 1840.

W. Verlin, Esq., inflammation cured, Youghal, Ireland.

J. J. Protherne, Esq., sight restored and head-ache cured, Waterford.

J. W. Chester, Esq., sight restored, Ballyclough, Glebe, Mal-lor.

J. B. Lachfield, Esq., cured of ophthalmia; Whitehall, and Thatched House Tavern.

Mrs. Guppy, 36, Nelson-square, Blackfriars-road, cured of ophthalmia.

Miss Mary Roades, Market-place, Winslow, Bucks, cured of ophthalmia; witnesses to her cure, Mr. John Roades, father, and R. Walker, Esq., a magistrate.

To Mr. Grimstone, 39, Broad-street.

Sir,—Having read in several public journals many testimonials the editors of which have thought them worthy their attention, in many instances so much so as to call the invention of which I believe you are the proprietor, and consider it of such vital importance to the preservation of sight, as to recommend its universal use. Now, sir, to my case, during my residence in Jamaica, I suffered much from inflammation in the eyes and head, which brought on a continued nervous headache. I had all the advice that the medical gentlemen of those parts could afford, but all to no purpose. My uncle, Mr. Frederick Hill, a gentleman well known to those parts, was recommended to send to your agent at Kingstown for some of your Eye Snuff; and I believe he paid to the value of 3s. for every one of the 1s. 3d. canisters; this I know, it was cheap at any price. I was relieved before using the contents of four canisters, and from that time I have ever used it with the most happy result. You may circulate this testimony for the good of others, who may be sceptical as to the real utility of your Eye Snuff.

I am, your's gratefully, M. HILL.

1, Bull's-head court, Great Queen street, Lincoln's inn.
G. J. GUTHRIE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. Read G. J. Lachfield's letter.

A FEW EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESS.

From Blackwood's Lady's Magazine, for May, 1838. To Mr. Grimstone, on his valuable invention of the Eye Snuff, made from British Herbs, for the diseased organs of the head and eyes.

Great was the power that did to man impart
Creative genius and inventive art;
The second prize is not less, Grimstone, thine;
Wise was thine head and great was thy design.
Our precious sight, from danger now set free,
Wives, widows, fathers, praiser sing to thee.

ELIZ. ROBSON.

Copy of a letter sent to Mr. Grimstone, Feb. 10, 1840.
Sir,—Having been afflicted with bad eyes for a long time, a friend who had received benefit from using your eye snuff, recommended it to me. I have taken the contents of your 2s. 4d. canisters, and am happy to say my sight has improved, the weakness and dimness is removed; and, Sir, it is my wish that you make this known for the good of the public.

6, York-place, Kentish-Town. Your's, GEORGE SMITH.

To W. Grimstone, Esq., Inventor of Eye Snuff, 39, Broad street, Whitehall, March 8, 1838.

Mr. Grimstone—Sir, I think it but justice that I should offer my acknowledgments to you for the great benefit I have derived from the use of your most exquisite fragrant compound, composed of herbs, called Eye Snuff; its action on the membrane of the nose, causing the lachrymal glands to discharge in a manner truly surprising, and by that means to cleanse the cornea, that my eyes became healthy, strong, and performed their wonted duties in a manner that I have not known the blessing of for six years. The renowned G. J. Guthrie, Esq., recommended me to try your Eye Snuff prior to my undergoing an operation. Many thanks to him for his suggestion; thanks to your invention, that operation will not be necessary. Sir, you have my permission to make this known in any manner you may think best. I am, sir, your obedient servant, J. B. LACHFIELD.

P.S.—Sir, be pleased to send to the Thatched-house Tavern, St. James's street, a 4s. 4d. and 8s. 4d. canister. You can send the change in the parcel for the enclosed half-sovereign. J. B. L.

This letter is attested to by G. J. Guthrie, Esq., F.R.S.
Sold in canisters at 8d., 1s. 3d., 2s. 4d., 4s. 4d., 8s., and 15s. 6d., each, by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists, in town and country. A liberal allowance to shippers, owners, captains, and all vendors of Grimstone's Eye Snuff. Foreign and British Snuffs and Cigars of the finest quality. All orders made payable in London. Letters must be post paid. Manufactory, Howl yard, London.

N.B.—Grimstone's Eye Snuff will keep in any climate.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY
94, CANNON STREET, Near Walbrook.

BLACK TEA.

The very best Black Tea imported, full flavoured strong rich Pekoe kind 5 8
Black Leaf wiry Rough Congou, highly recommended 5 8
Strong black leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee houses 4 6

GREEN TEA.

The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder, a strong rich full flavoured tea, the very best imported 6 6
Fine Hyson crowslip kind equal to any that can be bought 6 0
Young Hyson strongly recommended 6 0
Best Plantation Coffee 2 0
Fine Mocha Coffee 2 4
Finest flaked Cocoa 0 10
Best Spanish Chocolate 0 10

Now Ready,

A REPRINT OF NUMBER V. OF THE TEETOTALER.

With Number V. is given, gratis, the beautiful lithographic drawing of Father Mathew administering the pledge to D. O'Connell, Esq. M.P.

W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row.

In a few days will be published, Price 1s., and containing all the Chapters of the Tale that have been published in the first 12 Numbers of "THE TEETOTALER," forming PERIOD I., of

THE D R U N K A R D S P R O G R E S S ;

BY G. W. M. REYNOLDS.

The work will be printed in demy 8vo., and will be stitched in a very neat wrapper. A liberal allowance made to the Trade. The work is illustrated with Six beautiful Woodcuts.

Depot of the United Temperance Association, 134, Aldersgate Street; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; by MACHEN and Co., Dublin; and DUNCAN CAMERON, Glasgow.

With the Magazines, on the 30th instant, will be published, Price Ninepence, stitched in a neat wrapper, and containing Numbers 11, 12, 13, and 14,

PART III. of

THE TEETOTALER.

Persons who live in isolated or retired spots, will find the mode of publication in Monthly Parts a very great convenience; as many booksellers can procure these parts with their periodical parcels, when their convenience might not permit them to supply the weekly numbers.

All Booksellers, Newsreaders, and Stationers, in the United Kingdom, will receive orders for the Monthly Parts of THE TEETOTALER.

W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row.

UNDER THE ESPECIAL PATRONAGE OF HIS LATE MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY—As the following letter received from Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley, Keeper of the Privy Purse, testifies.

"Sir,—I am honoured with the King's command to express His Majesty's sense of your polite attention in sending the two bottles of Essence of Ginger. His Majesty has been pleased to direct me to forward you ten pounds in payment for it—inclosed you will find that amount—I am, Sir, yours obediently, H. WHEATLEY."

St. James's Palace, June 25th, 1835.
To Mr. Decimus Woodhouse."

WOODHOUSE'S ETHEREAL ESSENCE OF GINGER is particularly recommended to all cold phlegmatic, weak and nervous constitutions; it is certain in affording instant relief in Spasms, Cramps, Flatulence, Languor, Hysterics, Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Sensation of Fulness, Pain and Oppression after Meals; also those Pains of the Stomach and Bowels which arise from Gouty Flatulencies; Digestion however much impaired, is restored to its pristine state, by the use of this Essence for a short time, if taken in Tea, Coffee, &c. &c. it corrects their flatulent tendency; also this Ethereal Essence warms and invigorates the whole system, and will be found on experience, a happy substitute for those spiritual cordials, which at the moment they seem to revive, are insidiously undermining the very principles of life and health, in short as a domestic remedy, a remedy for the Traveller by sea or land, nothing can be more convenient or efficacious, as a few drops in water, forms a tea of any strength.

The undamed, and 208 other medical men, have given certificates of their unqualified approbation of the value of the Essence, as also of its superiority over all other similar preparations. Drs. James Johnson, Physician to His Majesty, A. T. Holroyd, S. Ashwell, R. Rowley, A. Middleton, C. London, D. Davies, Surgeon to their Majesties, J. Pereira, G. Pilcher, F. Salmon, F. Tyndal, J. H. Curtis, Aurist to his Majesty, C. Millard. In bottles 2s. 6d.; 4s. 6d.; 10s. 6d. and 21s. each.

Also WOODHOUSE'S PATENT CORN PLASTER, for affording instant relief, and eradicating CORNS and BUNIONS without pain or danger. This plaster acts by softening and destroying the Corns or Bunions, and defending the affected parts from the pressure of the shoe. Thus its use is perfectly safe and certain in affording relief in ten minutes, if a cure is not effected; in boxes 1s. 14d. and 2s. 9d. each. These preparations are prepared only by DECEMUS WOODHOUSE, Operative Chemist Extraordinary to his late Majesty at his Laboratory, 13, Little James-street, Bedford row, of whom it may be had wholesale, also retail of Hooper, 45, King William-street, London Bridge, T. Butler, 4, Cheapside, Sanger, 150, Oxford-street, and of all Medicine Vendors. N.B. Be sure to ask for Woodhouse's.

CAUTION. To prevent imposition, be sure to see the name of DECEMUS WOODHOUSE, 13, King William-street London Bridge, is engraved on the Government Stamp, otherwise cannot be Genuine.

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH. Messrs.

MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which Messrs. M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation, they are fastened without Springs, Wires, or Ligatures seen, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication. DECAYED TEETH filled up and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs. M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Enamel in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Beautified Equal to the Finest Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed. With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery, scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Finsbury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore-Street.

ROBERT RICHARDS, Manufacturer of
SACKS, TARPULINGS, TILTS, TENTS, FLAGS,
BED SACKINGS, and every article in Rope and Twine, at the Lowest Prices for Ready Money. Country orders promptly executed.

Address, Robert Richards, 4, Grey Coat Street, Westminster.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A MEETING of the BRANCH will be held at the ROYAL BATH THEATRE, KENSINGTON, on TUESDAY, September 29. Chair to be taken by G. W. M.
REYNOLDS, Esq.

DR. PERRENGTON'S TONIC APERIENT LIQUEUR.

"The Tonic conjoined with the Aperient enforces its action without weakening the organs"—Dr. Holland, Physician Extraordinary to the Queen.—The properties of this incomparable medicine are in a great measure shown by its name. It is a Tonic, containing the concentrated essence of the most valuable indigenous and exotic Invigorants, strengthening the Stomach, sharpening the Appetite, Exhibiting the Spirits, and bracing the Nerves. As an Aperient, it acts with gentleness and cordiality, without griping, nausea, or flatulence. It quickly removes Giddiness, Headache, wind in the Stomach, Spasm and Colic. It is a most effectual remedy for Indigestion, whether arising from debility or excess in Epicurean indulgences. For habitual costiveness it is unrivalled; whilst, to crown the whole, its taste is a combination of the slightest but finest bitterness, with the most exquisite aroma and delicate flavour that ever met the approbation of the most refined palate. For further information respecting its composition and virtues, the reader is referred to Perrengeton's Popular Treatise on the Stomach: this interesting work is presented to purchasers of the Tonic Aperient, which is sold in Bottles, at 2s. 9d. and 4s. 6d., Wholesale and Retail at the Central Depot, 44, Gerrard-street; also at 6, Bruton-street, Bond-street; by Wilkinson 248, Strand, Johnston, Cornhill; Watkins, High-street, Mary-le-bone; Swire, 14, Edgware-road; Weatherley, 5, Bridge-street, Westminster; Sanger's, Oxford-street, Huntsman, High-street, Camden-Town; King, 252, Surrey-street, Blackfriars Road; Mr. James Sequeira, 132, High-street, Whitechapel; Walker, corner of Grove-road, Borough; Watson, 126, High Holborn, and all Medicine Vendors.

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS

Thomas Bax, Bishopsgate Without
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Pountney Lane
John Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell Speer, New Bridge Street
Henry Sterry, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Cheapside
T. G. Darton Gracechurch Street
Russell Jeffry, Grace church Street
Joseph Sterry, Jun. Southwark
Henry Tuckett, South Street.

A Pocket Diary for 1840, with Life and Annuity Tables, &c. may be had on application at the office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced, some few years ago, by this Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

Arthur Street, West London Bridge. A. A. FRY, Actuary.
ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100.
To the Assured, on attaining the Age of 50, 55, 60, 65, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age next Birth Day.	50	55	60	65
15	2 8 9	2 2 9	1 18 9	1 15 0
16	2 10 9	2 4 6	1 19 9	1 16 0
17	2 12 8	2 6 3	2 0 9	1 17 0
18	2 14 8	2 7 9	2 2 0	1 18 0
19	2 16 8	2 9 3	2 3 3	1 19 0
20	2 18 9	2 11 0	2 4 6	2 0 0
21	3 1 9	2 12 9	2 5 6	2 1 0
22	3 3 9	2 14 6	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 3	2 16 6	2 8 6	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 9	2 10 3	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 0	2 12 4	2 5 0
26	3 15 9	3 3 9	2 14 0	2 6 0
27	3 19 7	3 6 3	2 16 0	2 7 0
28	4 3 9	3 8 9	2 18 2	2 8 6
29	4 8 3	3 12 0	3 0 3	2 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 3	3 2 9	2 11 6
31	4 18 3	3 18 9	3 5 2	2 13 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 6	3 7 9	2 15 0
33	5 10 9	4 6 6	3 10 6	2 17 0
34	5 18 3	4 11 0	3 13 9	2 19 0
35	6 6 3	4 15 6	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 1 0	4 0 9	3 3 6
37	—	5 7 3	4 4 8	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1	4 13 9	3 12 0
40	—	6 9	4 18 9	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 9	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 3	4 4 0
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 0
45	—	—	6 11 9	4 10 6

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the Depot of the United Temperance Association, 134, Aldersgate Street.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell, Glasgow; Machen & Co., Dublin, and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

London:—P. P. THOMAS, Printer, 12, Warwick Square.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 15.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER III.

THE BREAKFAST.

"WHAT is the use of making yourself and me miserable also?" demanded Melville pettishly of his amiable young wife, on the morning after the adventures related in the two preceding chapters.

"Oh! Victor, you know not my heart, if you think that I would willingly afflict you," answered Louise, endeavouring to smile through the tears that trickled down her charming countenance; "but I tremble—I am afraid—I dare not contemplate the future—now that your mortal enemy has become a visitor to this house. It is not for myself that I fear, Victor,—oh! no—believe me, I can support all the evils of penury and want: but when I think of our dear children—of those little beings who smile so innocently upon us, and amuse us with all their winning ways,—oh! it is then, Victor, that I tremble for the consequences of this renewal of your intimacy with that man!"

"This is childish, Louise," said Melville, endeavouring to console his afflicted wife;—"this is childish. The truth is, I am almost ashamed to admit that I had drunk too much last night,—and that—when in that state—"

"When in that state, my dearest husband," interrupted Louise, "you would sacrifice anything to that which you call friendship! Alas! friendship is often nothing more than a coin with which one man endeavours to cheat his neighbour; and intoxication blinds the eyes to the baseness of the metal."

"True, dear Louise," answered Melville: "I will not cultivate this man's friendship."

The young and affectionate wife threw herself into her husband's arms, and poured forth her gratitude for this promise in terms so endearing, that Melville anathematized his own brutal conduct on the preceding evening, and of which he entertained a slight reminiscence, towards so amiable and fascinating a creature. He gazed upon her with the most melting tenderness, and whispered words of consolation and promise in her ears. Suddenly she disengaged herself from his embrace; and, impelled by the thought of the moment, hastened to a table on which lay a beautiful Album, or "scrap-book." In this volume were several of Melville's own compositions; and to one of these did Louise refer at that moment. It was an additional source of consolation to her to peruse the following lines, which Victor had addressed to her; and copied into the Album, only a few weeks previous to the period of which we are speaking:—

TO MY WIFE.

How beautiful art thou, my love,
The angel of my life,
The star that leads me safely through
The world's distress and strife,—
The beacon on the rock of hope
That cheers me from afar!—
How beautiful art thou, my love,—
My angel, and my star!

INTERVIEW OF LOUISE AND MELVILLE, IN NEWGATE.
To illustrate Chapter XII. (No. 11.)

Our children have thine own blue eyes,
In which affection gleams,—
Their lips have caught from thine the smile
That ever on them beams:—
When sorrow steals into my soul,
And clouds hang o'er my brow,
The first to wean me from despair,
My well-beloved, art thou!

The mind, when in that desert-state,
By Hope's pure manna fed,
Revives, as flowers beneath the dews
Which April mornings shed:
For all th' endearing sentiments,
And all the bliss of life
Are mark'd by the two tender words
Of children and of wife!

How beautiful is the belief
Which Moslems still maintain—(Alas! that sages should have shown Such visions to be vain!)
That echoes are the voices of Those souls in worlds of bliss,
Which e'er repeat the words of them
They lov'd and left in this!

Oh! should'st thou pass from hence away
Into another sphere,
Before the sun has also clos'd
Upon mine own career,
"I love thee!" are the words which on
My lips shall e'er be found,
That, though in other realms, thou still
May'st echo back the sound!

How beautiful art thou, my love
The angel of my life,
The star that leads me safely through
The world's distress and strife,—
The beacon on the rock of hope
That cheers me from afar!—
How beautiful art thou, my love,—
My angel, and my star!

"When I peruse these lines, Victor," said Louise, with tears in her eyes, as she closed the Album, "I feel convinced that you could not wish to make me or your children unhappy!"

"Never—impossible!" ejaculated Melville. "I was idiot enough to lend, or rather to give that fellow Tibbatts some money; but if he ever call again, I will dismiss him with contempt from my presence."

This promise entirely relieved the beautiful wife from all further uneasiness, and a servant at this moment announced that the vehicle which had been ordered, was ready at the door, to convey the expected guests to the house of Mr. Terrywhist.

From an early hour on that same morning, had every thing been in bustle and confusion at the abode of this gentleman. When the cat's-meat man passed by with his wheelbarrow, Mr. Terrywhist felt persuaded that the bridegroom had just arrived in his carriage; and he rushed down stairs to receive him with such precipitation, that he strangely unsettled the equilibrium of Mrs. Jubbins, who was cleaning out the hall. Then, when the collector called for the water-rates, Mr. Terrywhist scampered to the door with such extraordinary alacrity, that the aforesaid collector retreated to a considerable distance, under the apprehension that assault and battery were meditated against him. In a word, the usually tranquil and sedate Mr. Terrywhist was as lively as if he had swallowed a pound of quicksilver; and Mrs. Jubbins was mortally offended with her once respected master, because when she delicately and gently remonstrated with him for kicking over her pail in his hurry to rush to the door every time there was a knock, he had coolly desired her to go to the hottest place he could think of at the moment. But as this respectable female probably fancied that journey to be somewhat too long, she undertook a shorter one just round the corner to a gin-shop, where she regaled herself with a quarter of rum.

At length Mr. Terrywhist was gratified by the arrival of Mr. Chizzlehurst, who made his appearance in excellent spirits and a new suit of clothes. Mr. Chizzlehurst was a gentleman on whom beneficent nature had conferred an abundance of bright red hair: his eyes were light green (an ominous colour in respect to jealousy), his lips large and thick, and his face curiously studded with freckles. He fancied himself to be a very clever person, and was particularly fond of intruding his verses upon any one who would listen to him. But he was tolerably well off; and riches, like charity, cover a multitude of sins. Indeed, the police magistrates of London often corroborate this assertion of ours by their own decisions: inasmuch as they slightly reprimand those delinquencies in the rich for which the poor man is abused and sent to the tread mill for three months.

"My dear Mr. Chizzlehurst, I am so delighted to see you," exclaimed Mr. Terrywhist, grasping the right hand of his intended son-in-law with uncommon violence.

"There is nothing like punctuality, my dear sir," answered Mr. Chizzlehurst. "As I have observed in one of my poems—

When one has promised to be married,
If he can't walk, he must be carried:
E'en on a donkey should he ride,
Rather than disappoint his bride:—
Or hire a dog-cart, or a stretcher,
So long as he don't fail to fetch her."

"Really Hudibrastic, I declare!" ejaculated the admiring Mr. Terrywhist. "What a facility you have for poetry to be sure!"

"We might convert your remark into a pleasant little distich," said the red-haired votary of the Muses: "for instance:—

In manners few so well are versed
As Mr. Thomas Chizzlehurst."

"Capital! excellent!" shouted Mr. Terrywhist; but as some of the relatives and friends now began to arrive, it was deemed prudent by the happy father to hasten the ceremony as quickly as possible. He accordingly rang the bell, and enquired whether Miss Betsy was ready, as the carriages were waiting. In a short time that young lady made her appearance, blushing like a peony, and casting her eyes upon the ground in a sentimental manner which quite charmed the poetic lover. The bride's mother then issued some necessary orders to Mrs. Jubbins relative to the breakfast: and the party shortly proceeded to the church where the nuptial knot was duly tied. On the return of the cavalcade to the house, Mr. and Mrs. Chizzlehurst were duly complimented upon their happy union by Melville and Louise, who had arrived at Terrywhist Terrace in the meantime.

A most delicious repast was now served up; and what with the succulent provisions, and the happy jests that prevailed, the little party continued to make themselves very comfortable. Only one accident occurred to disturb the hilarity of the scene, and this was brought about by Mrs. Jubbins, who had stepped round the corner so often to drink the health of the newly-married couple at the public-house, that, when she made her appearance in the parlour of her master's dwelling with the teakettle in her hand, she stumbled over the cat, and emptied a portion of the boiling water upon Mr. Terrywhist's foot. The old gentleman literally roared with pain; but Mrs. Jubbins was forgiven, at the intercession of Mr. Balls, who was one of the guests.

"Accidents will occur in the best regulated families," said Mr. Balls, as he made a desperate attack upon a pigeon-pie which stood near him.

"They will indeed," assented Mr. Chizzlehurst: "and it is to that that I allude in one of my poems, when I say—

He who at each mishap is flurried,
Is like the cat by bull-dogs worried."

"I have often asserted, and I now maintain," said Mr. Terrywhist with his usual pomposity of manner, and his solemn enunciation, "that Mr. Chizzlehurst is one of our most talented young aspirants to the heights of Parnassus, and I see no reason for changing my opinion. Chizzlehurst, your health,—and may happiness attend you and Betsy."

Mr. Terrywhist filled his glass with Sauterne wine, (for this was a dejeuner à la fourchette, with all the usual appurtenances and concomitants in the shape of liquors,) and this example was imitated by all the gentlemen present. Melville drank a few glasses with peculiar zest; and when he became exhilarated with the wine, his conversation grew animated and interesting. He saw that his sallies amused those present, and he considered that the old adage must be true, which says, "wine is the soul of wit." No evil habit has obtained so much support in respect to delusive sayings of all kinds, as that of drinking!

There was, however, one young gentleman present, who did not partake of the wine, and who wished the bride and bridegroom all possible happiness, without pledging the hope in the glass. This gentleman was a friend of the bridegroom's; and the circumstance of such abstinence somewhat astonished our hero. At the expiration of an hour and a half from the commencement of the meal, the post-chaise, which had been previously ordered for the purpose of conveying the happy couple to the house they were in future to occupy, drove up to the door. We shall not dwell upon this portion of our tale; suffice it to know that the poetic Mr. Chizzlehurst handed his cara sposa into the vehicle; and the newly-married pair departed, followed by the prayers of the mother, and the admiration and complacent approval of the father.

"Let us now drink one more glass to the health of the happy pair," said Mr. Terrywhist. "But, my dear Mr. Thornton," added the worthy host, addressing himself to the abstemious gentleman before alluded to,—“you do not follow our example."

"I hope you will not think me rude," was the reply, "or consider that I am less anxious than yourselves for the prosperity of the newly married couple; but the truth is, I never partake of intoxicating liquors."

"What!" ejaculated Melville, in astonishment, "you refuse a generous glass of wine, sir?"

"Certainly I do," was the quiet answer, "and for the very simple reason, that I do not consider it to be at all generous, either in its quality or its effects."

"You drink spirits and water, perhaps?" said Mr. Terrywhist.

"Neither wine, nor spirituous, nor malt liquors of any kind," rejoined Mr. Thornton, who was a good-looking young man, and endowed with pleasing, and quite unassuming manners.

"Probably your health will not allow you those indulgences?" said Melville, who began to take some interest in the subject of conversation.

"On the contrary, my health is unexceptionable," answered Thornton; "and it is for the purpose of conserving that state of salubrity that I abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks."

"This is a species of self-mortification which I cannot understand," said Melville, emptying his glass.

"Do you imagine it a greater punishment to abstain from an occasional indulgence and enjoy constant health, or to use that occasional indulgence, and invariably feel the ill effects of it?" demanded Mr. Thornton:—"or, in other words, which is preferable—health, or sensual enjoyment?"

"I do not conceive that a moderate use of wine or other strong drink can be ruinous to the human frame," said Melville.

"The least quantity of alcohol imbibed into the human frame is hurtful," answered Mr. Thornton: "and the constant diffusion of it throughout the body must weaken the physical energies, by the mere process of excitement and reaction."

"But wine and beer are strengthening," retorted Melville, somewhat angrily.

"That is the usual delusion, my dear sir," said Mr. Thornton, mildly. "Nutriment alone affords strength—strong drink produces excitement: but nutriment and excitement are two very different things. The former supports the human frame; the latter obviously enfeebles it."

"And yet the labourer in the field cannot toil without his beer," said Melville, almost in a contemptuous tone of voice.

"That is also a delusion, my dear sir," continued Mr. Thornton. "Strength to labour is only given by nourishment: and wholesome food is the proper means of producing that effect. Nutriment emanates from substantial aliment: and thus wine or beer can only be so far nutritious as in the proportion of the solid substance to which they can be reduced. A gallon of ale does not contain more nourishment than is equivalent to about one pound and a quarter of barley; and thus a good penny loaf contains more nutriment, and that of a more wholesome kind, than a gallon of strong ale. In the same way it can be proven that a bottle of the best port-wine does not contain as much nutriment as one quarter of a penny loaf of good wheaten bread."

"But man requires a certain stimulus, at all events," persisted Melville, who saw that he could not controvert this system of reasoning.

"A proper and necessary excitement is afforded by nutritious food, by exercise, by physical or intellectual employment, and by the mere variation of occupations. It is evident that nature has not formed us in a manner adapted to the idea that alcoholic drinks are necessary conditions of our being, seeing that we are better without them. If you be ill, the medical man orders you to abstain from those liquors, because they are heating and unnaturally exciting: and if they excite the blood improperly when you are ill, they do not fail to produce the same effects when in a state of health."

"On the score of indulgence, then—as a means of enjoyment and conviviality?" urged Melville.

"If the indulgence be a vicious one, and calculated to produce moral, physical, and social evils," said Mr. Thornton, "we should not demonstrate so much weakness as to wish to adhere to it. The most moderate use of strong drinks places a dangerous temptation in our way: we do not sit out in life with the idea of being drunkards; but the habit grows upon us by means of its own fascinating powers. That is the reason which induced me to adopt the only safe and sure principle—the principle of total abstinence."

"I certainly should advocate the moderate use of strong liquors," said Melville.

"My dear sir, abstinence is by far more easy than moderation," answered Mr. Thornton; "and be assured that the boldest and most courageous often submit to a temptation by only slightly connecting themselves, in their habits, with it. We see evil customs grow upon us by degrees: from stealing a penny, the thief proceeds to the plunder of a pound; and so does the moderate drinker of one glass gradually turn into the confirmed drunkard, after having passed through all the various phases of temperance—a little more—a little more still—a very little more still—a little too much—a great deal too much—and then habitual indulgence."

"But are the consequences of the indulgence so fatal as to render such a principle of self denial necessary?" demanded Melville.

"No one can calculate the evil effects of intemperance, because some of them are very remote, and others are not always seen," replied Mr. Thornton: "but, be assured, sir, that three fourths of all the crime, all the poverty, and all the disease, which prevail around, may be directly or indirectly traced to the vice of intemperance."

"But total abstinence is so extreme a measure," said Melville: "it is almost absurd!"

"Extreme cases require extreme measures," was the ready answer. "Society is in an extreme case of crime, poverty, and disease,—and to so extreme a case only an extreme remedy can be applied."

"Would you, then, propagate this doctrine?" inquired Melville.

"I hope to see such a doctrine one day not only propagated, but also embraced by thousands," was the answer. "We are now towards the end of the year 1830—and I will venture to prophesy that in less than ten years millions will have abundantly seen the good effects of this principle. It is impossible that society can tolerate the evil of intemperance much longer. The working classes, who particularly suffer by it, will doubtless arouse themselves to exertion, and be the first to embrace the only means of their earthly salvation."

"You speak enthusiastically," said Melville.

"And this observation of yours reminds me that I have probably incurred the imputation of discourtesy by endeavouring to force my opinions upon you at a moment when you are engaged in the very occupation which my arguments tend to discountenance," said Mr. Thornton.

"You have considerably interested me," cried Melville. "I shall be most happy if you will visit me at my own house, and enable us there to continue this discussion."

"I shall accept your kind invitation," replied Mr. Thornton, to the infinite delight of Louise, to whose mind this novel idea of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, had imparted a species of hope, relative to her husband, which quite cheered and enlivened her. She reflected that the wife was the greatest sufferer by the intemperate habits of a husband: and although no selfish feelings were allowed to find a resting-place in her mind, she could not avoid entertaining a fond anticipation of total reform on the part of Victor, for the sake of himself—of her—and of his children.

After they had taken leave of Mr. and Mrs. Terrywhist, and during their ride back to London, Melville seemed plunged in the deepest meditation. When questioned by Louise as to the nature of his thoughts, he said, somewhat impatiently, "I cannot help reflecting upon all that this Mr. Thornton has been saying to me."

Louise smiled, for she saw that conviction was working upon the mind of her husband, in spite of himself.

(To be continued in our next.)

ANIMAL LIFE AND HEAT.

LIFE, in the earlier periods of scientific knowledge, was attributed only to animals. With the progress of science, however, it was extended to plants; and man, who had been hitherto regarded as a distinct order of being, was now considered but as a higher animal, intimately connected with the whole chain of the organised world. The great discoveries in chemistry, magnetism, electricity, and galvanism, have shown that those elements and principles, on which rest the laws of life, pervade nature in the most various forms and combinations; that there is no harsh and abrupt distinction between the animate world and the inanimate, but, on the contrary, one intimate connexion between the energy which makes the crystallizing mineral follow the law of the strictest regularity, or the stone fall from the height, and that which makes the heart of man beat. The difficulty of defining animal life has, therefore, been greatly increased. What is animal life? What constitutes an animal? Since mankind began to cultivate philosophy, they have sought in vain for a definition of life. It would require much more metaphysical discussion, to enter at all satisfactorily into this subject, than the character of this article allows; and we are constrained to offer the reader only a few remarks upon this most interesting subject. Linnaeus defined an animal as an organised being, and sentient being. An animal is, indeed, organised; but are not vegetables organised also? Animals are endowed with sensation; but are all, without exception? and do not some plants possess this faculty? Locomotion is not a more certain characteristic of animals than life or irritability: for many animals are destitute of this power, and vegetable like plants, the images of torpidity and insensibility. Neither are the chemical characters of animal substances more distinct: animals are chiefly composed of azote, and vegetables of carbon; but, among the latter, some are, like the former, composed principally of azote. Azote, or nitrogen, is a permanently elastic gas, transparent, colourless, and inodorous. In whatever point of view we consider those two kingdoms of nature, we find them blended in so many ways, and separated from each other by such imperceptible gradations, that it is impossible to draw a line at which we can affirm that life ends, and the vegetable begins.

Animal heat is that property of all animals by means of which they preserve a certain temperature, which is quite independent of that of the medium by which they are surrounded, and appears rather to be in proportion to the degree of sensibility and irritability possessed by them. It is greatest in birds. The more free and independent the animal is, the more uniform is its temperature. On this account the human species preserves a temperature nearly equal, about 96°—100° Fahr., in the frozen regions of the pole, and beneath the equator; and on this account, too, the heat of the human body remains the same when exposed to the most extreme degree of temperature. In fact, cold at first rather elevates, and extreme heat rather depresses the temperature of the human body. Fordyce and Blagden endured the temperature of an oven heated almost to redness; and two girls in France entered a baker's oven heated to 269° Fahr., in which fruits were soon dried up and water boiled. Francisco Martinez, a Spaniard, exhibited himself, a short time since, in Paris, in a stove heated to 270° Fahr., and threw himself immediately after into cold water. Blagden was exposed in an oven to a heat of 257° of Fahr., in which water boiled, though covered with oil. There is also a remarkable instance of a similar endurance of heat by the convulsionnaires, as they were called, upon the grave of Saint Medardus, in France. A certificate, signed by several eye-witnesses, among whom were Armand, Aronet, the brother of Voltaire, and a Protestant nobleman from Perth, states that a woman, named La Sonnette, lay upon a fire nine minutes at a time, which was repeated four times within two hours, making, in all, thirty-six minutes, during which time fifteen pieces of wood were consumed. The correctness of the fact stated is allowed even by those who were opposed to the abuses in which it originated. The flames sometimes united over the woman, who seemed to sleep; and the whole miracle is to be attributed to the insensibility of the skin and nerves, occasioned by a fit of religious insanity. These facts are the result of a law of all living substances; viz., that the temperature of the living body cannot be raised above certain limits, which nature has fixed. There is also an increased flow of perspiration, by means of which the heat of the body is carried off. The extreme degrees of cold which are constantly endured by the human frame without injury, are well known, and are to be explained only by this power in the living body to generate and preserve its own heat. The greater the irritability of individuals, whether from sex, or age, or peculiarity of constitution, the greater the warmth of the body: it seems also to depend, in part, upon the quickness of the circulation of the blood: thus children and small animals, whose circulation is lively, feel the cold least. Increased activity and motion of the body, as in walking, running, &c., and diseases of increased excitement, as fever and inflammation, produce a similar increase in the temperature of the body. All this justifies the conclusion that animal heat depends chiefly upon the irritability of the body, and is thus most intimately connected with the state of the nervous system.

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. IV.

A CRIMINAL in Newgate observed, some time since, that he could not pluck up courage to enter a man's house in the dead of the night, and take the chance of being shot in it, or of being hung when he got out of it, unless he were well primed with liquor first.

There is a striking difference between spirits and beer, in their mode of operation. Beer makes persons first heavy, then stupid, and then senseless: the beer-drinker becomes more drunken than the drinker of spirits, and shows his condition more. In the case of dram-drinking, the effects are not so stupifying. Spirits are less narcotic, but more exciting than beer; they increase and irritate the passions, and prepare the soul for the perpetration of the most infernal schemes.

All public riots have been encouraged by drinking. Cashman, the rioter, who was executed a few years ago in London, declared on the day before his death that he had been drinking spirits repeatedly before he joined the mob. It was in evidence on that occasion, that some of the rioters who were tried and acquitted, as well as others who were examined, but not put on their trials, had been drinking spirits at Spitalfields, and on the road to the city. The peace-breakers in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire invariably drank spirits before the different attacks. The effect of liquor upon the Irish, in every scene of depredation and murder, needs only to be adverted to as the means of fomentation of the most atrocious and appalling crimes.

The best security and cheapest defence of nations is a moral population.

Drinking produces obduracy and hardness of heart,—distaste for labour, and waste of time,—an insatiable love of the habit, which renders it almost a necessity and condition of existence,—neglect and contempt for religion,—and injury to life and health.

One of the most fatal circumstances connected with the habit of drinking is, that it enervates and debases the mind so as to deprive it of its natural vigour, and prevent the success of every effort for its own deliverance.

Drinking deranges the animal economy, weakens the nerves, destroys the digestive powers, obstructs the secretions, and destroys the life. The stomach is kept by it in a state of constant excitement, and, by the frequent application of an artificial stimulus, at length loses its tone, and refuses to perform its office; the appetite becomes vitiated and fails; the liver and lungs become the subjects of incurable disease: depression of spirits invariably accompanies drinking; dropsy and consumption, paralysis and apoplexy are evident consequences; and nearly all fevers and inflammatory diseases are found fatal to the case of dram-drinkers, because the blood of such persons is remarkably destitute of oxygen, and can therefore afford little or no antiseptic resistance to such diseases.

George Crabbe painted the gin-shop as a great snare-trap. Each new spirit-house is decidedly a pest-house, no matter how respectable it may be in reference to its owners. Most of the London gin-shops, however, are of the basest character, being houses of aggregation, and the nurseries of prostitution and crime.

(To be continued.)

MR. J. HOCKINGS' LATE PROCEEDINGS.

THIS redoubtable and faithful friend of the cause of total abstinence has lately been prosecuting his endeavours to forward the good work, with considerable success.

On Monday last the "Birmingham Blacksmith," as he is denominated, proceeded to those fairs in the neighbourhood of Birmingham at which he disposes of his goods. He will, however, endeavour to be in London in about a month or five weeks; but he cannot, as yet, specify the exact time. Mr. Hockings has been hard at work ever since he left the conference at Bournemouth. For some days he has spoken six hours at in-door and out-door meetings, and has spoken altogether, since that period, two hundred and seven hours,—exertions by which he has obtained upwards of fourteen hundred signatures. After having given a week's gratuitous labour to the conference, his is indeed hard work for eleven weeks together! It is, however, nothing for one like Mr. Hockings, who "has a good pair of bellows, and who is an out-and-out member of the Coldstream Guards." The towns he has lately visited are as follows: Blackburn, Oldham, Duckenfield, Wrighton, Pocklington, Leavington, Bugthorpe, Bishop Wilton, Gowthorpe, Market Weighton, Howden, Seaton Ross, York, Millington, Butwith, Leeds, Todmorden, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, Pontefract, Doncaster, Wakefield, and Otley.

Desirous of changing the scene of by-gone days (when he was accustomed to take his hard-earnings to the publican, who was thus enabled to parade his wife down to the watering-places) Mr. Hockings now keeps his money for himself; and he treated his wife and one of his children to a trip of pleasure to Burlington Spa. He there had an excellent meeting. His next visit was to Scarborough, where he held two meetings in the Grand Assembly Room. On the following day, he had an out-door meeting on the sea-sands, where upwards of two thousand people were present. Of that number, there were several hundreds of the most respectable visitors, who were at the waters for the benefit of their health. After addressing them for more than two hours, Mr. Hockings went to another meeting in the Bethel chapel, where he addressed the male members. His wife, unwilling that he should have all the applause, got up and addressed the females. An impression was thus made that will not soon be forgotten. His next meeting was at Grinstead, whence he proceeded to Brighton. At Whitby he was present at the opening of the New Temperance Hall. Here, likewise, his wife claimed part of the laurels. Having formed the acquaintance of an influential and benevolent lady of Leeds, of the name of Lupton, and who was a very zealous friend of the temperance cause, Mrs. Hockings, in union with this lady, and some others, agreed to form a teetotal society. Accordingly, the bellman was sent round to call the females together, and a fine gathering there was; but when they were assembled, no one was there to address them, save Mrs. Hockings, who, with the zeal of a staunch teetotaler, got up and expatiated upon the fact, that it was the females who are the sufferers through the effects of strong drink, as it is at the public-house that the kindest of husbands are robbed of their hard-earnings, and rendered brutal to the fondest wives. During the festival and the opening of the Hall, between two and three hundred signed the pledge. Mr. Hockings then proceeded to Thornton, Selby, Bradford, Leeds, Wakefield, Huddersfield, and then home.

It is thus that the "Birmingham Blacksmith" is so nobly sacrificing his own time to the welfare of his fellow-creatures; and most truly is sympathy enlisted in the favour of his wife—of Mrs. Hockings—who so strenuously follows the example of her husband, and preaches to her fellow-countrywomen the principles of the glorious doctrines of total abstinence. Proceed in your course, O worthy couple! and your death-beds will be beds of roses; your parting sighs will be delivered up amidst the calm tranquillity of the mind; and crowns of glory will await you in heaven!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. B. B.'s article shall appear in our next.

A FRIEND TO DRUNKARDS will perceive that there have been numerous refutations to the arguments to which he alludes, in this Journal. We will, however, shortly give an entirely chemical dissertation upon the subject.

A STANCH TEETOTALER's letter shall be communicated to Mr. H. W. WESTON, the Secretary to the United Temperance Association.

Private answers have been forwarded to C. D., E. M. P., N. S., D., ELIZA, WILLIAM MORGAN, ESQ., A. B., Hampstead, A. B., Hackney, and H. W. W.

Mr. J. F. DAVIES's plan shall appear in our next, if possible.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 3, 1840.

THE publicans are mightily alarmed at the rapid progress of Teetotalism; and, in order to throw discredit upon its doctrines and its disciples, they have recourse to a thousand infamous stratagems, the mere conceit of which bears ample testimony to the villainy of their dispositions. Demoralized by the mere fact of constantly gazing upon scenes of crime, and by perpetually hearkening to the depraved conversation that takes place within their dwellings, the landlords of public-houses are necessarily lost to all the finer feelings of morality, and look upon strict integrity as a characteristic of folly in him who practises it. They view with alarm any prospect of the decline of their own business; and are far from particular as to the methods by which they endeavour to throw obstacles in the way of the rapid progress of Teetotalism. At first they hired lecturers to hold forth at public-meetings against the new doctrine; and, when they found that this plan was only calculated to injure their own cause by exposing the weakness and infamy of it, they had recourse to another system—the infernal policy of which could only have been imagined in a gin-palace, or worked out by its proprietors.

The plan to which we allude is thus arranged:—One or more individuals are hired by these publicans to create a disturbance in the streets at night, and thus compel the police to interfere. The rioters are accordingly taken into custody; and on the following morning they are placed at the bar of a public police-office. The desired aim is thus accomplished: the magistrate questions the delinquents relative to the cause and circumstances of their improper proceedings of the previous night; and the answer given by the offenders is, "that they are very sorry for the disturbance they occasioned; but that they hope the magistrate will excuse them as they have been Teetotalers for three or four years, and have only broken their pledge in this instance." Probably one will add that "he has received a medal, or the thanks of a committee, from some Teetotal association;" and all this is detailed to "his worship" with such an air of truth and contrition, that the tale is believed, and the whole transaction is published in the newspapers. We need scarcely inform our readers, that the villains, who thus suffer themselves to be made the debased tools of the publicans, never have even contemplated an action so worthy as the signing the pledge of total abstinence.

In this manner the landlords of public-houses adopt schemes to throw discredit upon the professors of Teetotalism. The uninitiated individual, who peruses such a case as the one just mentioned, in the London journals, very naturally forms a conclusion to the effect that there are many relapses amongst those who sign the pledge. We, however, do not hesitate to say, that these relapses are not to be taken as a proof of the fallacy of Teetotal doctrines, but as a sad testimony to the villany of a certain set of designing men. If an individual be sincere when he signs the pledge—if he give the principle a fair trial of some weeks—and if he be a person who is determined to judge with impartiality, he will not relapse—he will not fall away from his pledge, because he will arrive at the conviction of its excellence. But where the individual, who signs, is neither sincere in his intentions of adhering to the principle of total abstinence,—or where he has so little manly courage as not to be able to resist an occasional craving after strong drink, during the first days of his noviciate,—in such a case as this a relapse is almost certain to occur. In the former instance, the ranks of Teetotalism gain a good, a just, and an honourable supporter: in the latter, they lose a wretch, who is so mentally and physically degraded—so divested of moral courage—so wedded to filthy habits—and so obstinate and prejudiced in respect to a doctrine which alarms his grovelling soul by its purity, that he would sell the personal safety of his children—the honour of his sons, and the chastity of his daughters—to obtain the means of gratifying his base passions!

Those persons, who are denominated Teetotalers, and who adhere to the principle of total abstinence, are ornaments to their country, and the glory of the moral world. They present to the rich and the aristocratic portion of society, an example of self-denial which should bring the bloated archbishops, the luxurious rectors, and the dissipated inhabitants of the universities, to shame. They—the working classes—alone have the interest of the nation at heart,—they alone seek to purge society of the causes of crime, poverty, and disease,—they alone endeavour to inculcate doctrines of the brightest morality—and they alone manifest in respect to social improvement, a wisdom which far exceeds all the laboured enactments of a legislature. While the senators of England are encouraging, both by example and by law, the vice of intemperance,—while the government upholds the system as a means of revenue,—and while a statute allows the public-house to be open on the Sabbath, while the shop of the baker is closed,—a measure of reform is threatening the evil habits of the great; and the principle of Total Abstinence, now so generally adopted amongst the working classes, is hailed as the only means of undermining the vices, the tyrannies, the monopolies, and the oppressive conduct of the government.

The working-classes of England have long been held in chains by a set of unprincipled and profligate task-masters, who have fattened in idleness upon their toils. The working-classes are the pillars of the nation. We can prove the assertion. Commerce, manufactures, and labour, are the sources of wealth and prosperity; and the working classes are the real agents in promoting or extending these. If the reapers in the field, the workmen in the warehouse, or the sailors in the ships, refuse to perform their several avocations,—will the aristocracy undertake to do their duties? will the vagabond Marquis of Waterford apply his hand to the ploughshare? will the semi-murderer Earl Waldegrave grasp the sickle? will the Marquis of Londonderry take his seat at the loom? or will the young rake Lord Castlereagh assume the garb and functions of a sailor? No: indolence and dissipation have unfitted them for any really manly pursuit;—and they are only the sculptured cornices which are upheld by the plain pillars of unembellished architecture. Such is the relative position of the aristocracy and the working-classes: were we wrong then, in declaring that the latter are the true support of the nation?

Yes,—the working classes are the pillars of the state; and from them shall all salutary reform emanate. The government may support the privileges of the publican—the wealth of the brewers may be expended to render their liquor more attractive—and the aristocracy may affect to ridicule the mere mention of the words "total abstinence;" but the voice of the working classes is louder than that of the aristocracy; the moral energies of the masses are more powerful than the wealth of the monopolizers; the fate of the publican, it is evident, is in the hands of his customers; and the government must yield to the force of a torrent which it cannot stem. Every thing, then, is favourable to the working classes in the furtherance of the great scheme of Teetotalism: all we shall now say to them is, "Unite and prosper!"

EXTRACTS FROM "PICKWICK ABROAD."

"WERRY 'ansome cab at the door, Sir," observed Mr. Weller, as he arranged his master's shaving apparatus: "and a nice little tiger I see in it, too," added the domestic.

"God bless me!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick: "quite a tame one, I hope, though, Sam—is it not?"

"Oh! very tame, Sir," replied that gentleman: "the fact is, Sir, you might play with him, and he wouldn't be over dangerous."

"How delightful!" ejaculated Mr. Pickwick, rubbing his hands: "I once heard that Kean had a tame lion; but I never knew before of people keeping young tigers."

"Not at all uncommon, Sir," remarked Mr. Weller. "The on'y thing that strikes us ven talking o' tigers, is, that them as I alludes to ain't real vons, Sir."

"Stuffed, I presume," said Mr. Pickwick, "and put into the cabriolet as an ornament. Very picturesque, I dare say."

"Out again, Sir," playfully observed Mr. Weller. "Them tigers air on'y small boys dressed up in tights and tops, Sir."

"Ah! I see,—a name for young servants," cried Mr. Pickwick. "But why are they called tigers, Sam?"

"To frighten away duns, Sir," answered Mr. Weller, seriously. "Them tigers are the quietest hanimals living, Sir, as long as their mas'er's friends calls at the ouse: but if so be a creditor has the oudacity to knock at the door, them chaps springs upon 'em like vild beastesses, and scratches their eyes out, or does them some other corporal harm, vich accounts for their nicknames o' tigers. Ven a tradesman brings in goods, they are ciwility his-self; but ven he is imprudent enough to ask for his money, no selvidges is vorse than them."

"Singular,—very singular!" cried Mr. Pickwick, gliding gracefully from his bed, and shivering from top to toe. "Cold morning, Sam,—is it not?"

"So cold, Sir," responded Mr. Weller, "that von is glad to put his hands any-vere, as the thief remarked ven he vos discovered vith his fingers in the gen'leman's pocket."

"Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, when they were once more arrived at the hotel, "tell the landlord I wish to speak to him immediately."

"Very good, Sir," returned that gentleman: "but I rayther think he's en-gaged for the moment, Sir, as the lawyer's clerk said to the poor client."

"What makes you think so, Sam?" enquired Mr. Pickwick.

"Cos I see him lookin' at two dancin' bears, Sir," responded Mr. Weller, "just as ve drove into the yard o' the hot-tel, Sir?"

"Letter, Sir," said Mr. Weller, one morning to Mr. Pickwick, as that gentleman was discussing politics and buttered toast with his two friends at the breakfast-table.

"How much is it, Sam?" demanded Mr. Pickwick, extracting a gold coin from his pocket. "Well, here's a sovereign, I declare: I really took it for a Napoleon."

"At all events, it ain't an affliction, Sir," observed Mr. Weller, "although they does call 'em sufferins. But wouldn't it be a good thing for the poor if it rained such afflictions as them there?"

"You are right, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, returning to the toast with that sort of appetite, which is a relish bestowed upon the indigent portion of the community that they may like what they eat, while it is seldom enjoyed by the rich, although they may eat what they like.

"Vell, Sir," continued Mr. Weller, bestowing upon Mr. Hook Walker a patronizing wink, and a nod upon Mr. Chitty, "this is the horigin o' the story. A countryman in Kentucky, Sir, goes to a grocer, and says, 'Vot 'll you give for eggs to-day, old feller?'—'Seventeen cents,' vos the reply: 'for there has been a meetin' o' the grocers, yesterday—leastvays in the afternoon, and they von't wote no higher terms.'—The countryman drives away, and calls agin next week. 'Vell, Sir,' says he to the grocer, says he: 'for there's been another meetin', and them's the prices as vos unanimously chosen.'—That wouldn't do—neither: the countryman walks his lucky!"

"What is that, Sam?" cried Mr. Pickwick. "Made his fortune, I suppose?"

"Oh! no, Sir—it's on'y a fashionable phrase as is much in wogue vith members o' parli'ment, young gen'lemen about town, and sich like chaps; and it means that he vent away," explained Mr. Weller. "But the countryman comes a third time, vithout no eggs at all. 'Have you any for sale to-day?' says the grocer, who vos quivite out. 'No,' says the countryman, 'I ha'nt: eggs raly is eggs, now.'—'Vot does all that mean?' says the grocer, says he: for he'd had a wery considerable order for eggs, and vos villin' to give any price for 'em now.—'Vy, simply this,' answers the countryman, 'that the hens has had a meetin' too, and woted not to put their-selves to the vexation an' trouble o' layin' eggs for ten cents a dozen.'"

"Shooting in June!" exclaimed Mr. Tupman, with a look of unfeigned horror, as he espied an old cow tranquilly feeding at a little distance.

"But, I say, Winkle—do you see that—that—"

"That what?" cried Mr. Winkle, casting a searching glance around, and drawing close to his friend's side.

"That bull," said Mr. Tupman. "Doesn't he seem very savage?"

"So verry savage, Sir," interrupted Mr. Weller, who had overheard this dialogue, "that I wouldn't be them butter-cups and dasies for a trifle. Blest if I don't think he'll dewour 'em all!"

"I'm not afraid of English cattle," observed Mr. Winkle, "because I know them. But French bulls—"

"Is vorse than Irish vons, Sir," added Sam.

"Winkle, I'm ashamed of you," said Mr. Pickwick, sternly. "You ought to feel your own importance, Sir, and know that man is the lord of the creation. His sagacity and boundless talents have placed all other living things within his power: the largest animals become his prey as well as—"

At this moment, just as every one present was regarding the venerable orator with the deepest attention and respect, the aged cow before alluded to, made a sudden start, and set off in a smart trot towards that part of the field in which the party was walking. Mr. Pickwick was the first to perceive this strange movement; and, prompted by that sagacity and boundless talent he had just been so highly extolling, he prudently took to his heels, and never once looked behind him till he had crossed the adjacent stile, and was beyond the reach of danger. On a subsequent occasion, Mr. Chitty, in a letter to a friend thus poetically described this important event:—"As the winged lightnings dart from the clouded canopy above, when the Almighty has unbarred their adamant gates, so did the great Pickwick run like the devil when an old cow was after him."

FATHER MATHEW.*

Extracted and abridged from a very clever Memoir of the great apostle of Temperance. By M. P. HAYNES, Esq.

MR. MATHEW was born October 10, 1790, at Thomastown, near Cashel, in the county of Tipperary. His father, James Mathew, of Thomastown, son of James Mathew, of Two-Mile Borris, near Thurlis, was left an orphan at an early age, and was taken under the care and patronage of his uncle, Major-General Mathew, of Thomastown. The Rev. Mr. Mathew's mother was daughter of George Whyte, of Cappa-Whyte, Tipperary, who was married to the niece of the celebrated General Mathew, of whom honourable mention is made by Sheridan, in his life of Swift.

Mr. Mathew lost his parents at an early period of life, and was then adopted by the amiable and accomplished Lady Elizabeth Mathew, who placed him under the tuition of the Rev. Denis O'Donnell, the late respected pastor of Tallagh, county Waterford. About the age of thirteen, he was sent to the lay academy of Kilkenny, so long and so ably conducted by the late Rev. Patrick Magrath, Catholic rector of Pilltown and Ennistogue, in the diocese of Ossory. It is said by Mr. Mathew's contemporaries, that he was a special favourite of the discriminating president of this establishment. After remaining there for seven years, he was, by the direction of the Most Rev. Dr. Bray, sent to Maynooth, to pursue ecclesiastical studies, to which state he felt himself called. After some time, stimulated by the example of two old Capuchin friars, of Kilkenny, to embrace their order, he repaired to that city, and there remained until his appointment to a mission in Cork. On Easter Saturday, in the year 1814, he was ordained in Dublin, by Dr. Murray, after having remained for some time under the care of the Very Rev. Celestine Corcoran, of that city.

We have stated that Mr. Mathew is a CAPUCHIN, and no doubt many of our readers will be prompted to inquire "WHAT IS A CAPUCHIN?" Amongst the Roman Catholics the clergy are of two classes, viz. the "Regular," and the "Secular." The functions of the ministry they possess in common; but the Regulars take certain vows, which the others do not. They are also formed into "Orders" or bodies, which is not the case with the Secular priests. They mostly live in communities, and have special rules for their government, which they pledge themselves by solemn vows implicitly to obey. With the names of many of their orders, our readers are no doubt familiar. There are the Jesuits, the Cistercians, the Carmelites, the Dominicans, and many others. The Capuchins are a branch of the

* The best portrait of this distinguished individual, was given, gratis, with Number V. of "The Teetotaler;" and is still presented on the same terms to all purchasers of that Number of this Journal.

"Friars minors," founded by Francis of Assisium, in 1226. Some idea of the importance of the Franciscan Order amongst the Catholics may be formed from the fact, that of them no less than forty-five have been Cardinals, and five Popes. The Capuchin branch of the order was established in 1525, by Mathew Baschi at Urbino, and was sanctioned by Clement VII. The Franciscan rule of life entails much hard labour, and prescribes great self-denial. The monks wear a grey habit, with a black patch upon the back of the cloak. Their beards are not shaved close, but are long and clipped. When members of this order do not live in communities, but mix with the world as Father Mathew does, they do not observe their rule as to dress.

With the person of Father Mathew most of our readers are in some degree familiar, from the numerous portraits which have been published of him. Though stout, he is not corpulent, and his frame is calculated to endure great fatigue. His countenance is ruddy; it is however the ruddiness of teetotal health—a gratifying contrast to the rubicund stain which is produced by "potations strong and deep." His eyes are blue, and large: they are intelligent, though not sparkling;—his hair is very dark, indeed it is almost black; he has a Roman nose, and the expression of his countenance upon the whole is indicative of great steadfastness of purpose, unaccompanied with any hauteur, but softened with a smile of great and peculiar blandness. In temper he is one of the most even men in the world; and this has been his character from his boyhood.

At the outset of his great work, Father Mathew was in the habit of receiving the signatures of those who took the pledge. As their numbers increased, he rested satisfied with having their names enrolled. The early mode of taking the pledge has been thus described by an eye witness:—

"The ceremony is simple and affecting. At Cork it is usually performed in a room in Mr. Mathew's house, where a small number are assembled at a time, who, kneeling in a semicircle before him, repeat the words of the pledge 'to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, except used medicinally and by order of a medical man, and to discountenance the cause and practice of intemperance.' A short prayer and the Father's blessing conclude the ceremony, after which each person repairs to a side table, where sits a clerk, who inscribes their names in the register, and delivers to each a medal and a copy of the rules of the society; for which a small sum is paid by all those who can afford it."

The words of the present pledge are as follows:—

"I promise, with the Divine assistance, as long as I will continue a member of the Teetotal Temperance Society, to abstain from all intoxicating drinks, except for medicinal or sacramental purposes; and to prevent, as much as possible, by advice and example, drunkenness in others."

In administering the pledge, the Rev. Mr. Mathew is somewhat peculiar. He has a fine, rich, and sonorous voice. He pronounces the words slowly and with great distinctness. The Rev. Mr. Birmingham says—"I don't know whether it may have struck others, but I have never failed to be impressed with the manner in which he pronounces the word drunkenness. He divides the syllables of this word, speaks them with peculiar emphasis, and by the energy of his voice, and a particular expression of countenance, as if he were loathing and execrating something, he would seem to heap all possible reprobation on the vice, the name of which he thus so strikingly pronounces." After pronouncing the words of the pledge, he gives the multitude his blessing—or rather, he invokes upon them the blessing of Him "from whom all blessings flow," in the following beautiful words of genuine Gospel simplicity, and of truly Christian import. The words are, "MAY GOD BLESS YOU, AND GIVE YOU GRACE TO KEEP YOUR PROMISE."

An allegation against the reverend gentleman is, that he has pecuniary emolument in view. There never was so unfounded a charge. At the outset of his career, not less than 60,000 medals were given away by him: he paid the rent of a place in Cork for the teetotal meetings: scores of pounds were paid by him for the relief of those who travelled many miles to take the pledge from him: upon him devolved the expense of providing cards and paying his writing clerks: wherever he preaches a charity sermon, he practices what he preaches by giving a liberal donation: to the funds for erecting chapels he is a free giver: to numerous charities in Cork he is a donor of large sums: to the most distinguished of those who take the pledge from him, he gives silver, and even gold medals: to the poor, who cannot pay for medals, he still directs them to be given: and in addition to all these heavy drawbacks upon his income, he has long been engaged in erecting, upon the voluntary system, a temple for the accommodation of his people, which, in architectural magnificence, will excel any which the Law Establishment, with all its wealth, has raised in the sister island. When money was offered him by the teetotalers of Liverpool, to aid him in his labours, he respectfully declined accepting it.

Passing over several other places which Father Mathew has visited, we must briefly notice his visit to Dublin in March last. He administered the pledge, in the metropolis, in a wide open space near the Custom-house. The weather was bad, and a drifting rain fell during nearly the whole of the several days that the good man was occupied. He received no less than 70,000 new members. One of the most pleasing circumstances connected with his visit to Dublin was his being entertained at a tea party in Trinity College, when several of the students took the pledge. He expressed great delight at this, using almost the same words as upon a similar occasion, when he met the students of the College of Maynooth. Differences in religion are entirely banished from his views. To the students in Trinity College he gave silver medals.

We must here reluctantly withdraw from the contemplation of these pleasing labours. Mr. Mathew has recently been to Castlebar, in the county of Mayo, and he there enrolled immense numbers. He was in this town during the assizes: for it is at such periods that he avails himself of the presence of the peasantry, as it is a strong characteristic of the Irish that, whether they have business or not, they attend the assizes. At Castlebar, Judge Crampton called upon Father Mathew and received from him a silver medal. His lordship has for years been a teetotaler, and so was the late Judge Vandeleur—an upright, if not an able man. A rumour was spread that Judge Crampton knelt before Father Mathew and took the pledge: and will it be credited that his lordship was therefore made the subject of bitter invective and furious attack? Good, however, was the result: for the upright judge published a letter in which he triumphantly defended the great regenerating cause.

The very peculiar Marquis of Londonderry has recently "said his say" upon teetotalism. He owns large estates in Ulster, and has refused a site for a building to be raised by his teetotal tenants. The reasons he gives for this resolution are just such as might be expected from him. He says "teetotalism" is going too far. He never made that objection to the drunken orgies of his cherished Orange lodges; and though he opposes teetotalism, his opposition will be vain. It is now making a rapid progress amongst the strong-headed, independent, and intelligent people of Ulster. Mr. McCurdy, of Belfast, is a powerful advocate of the cause: he utters more sense in half an hour than Lord Londonderry could write in half a century, even if assisted by his hopeful son, Lord Castlereagh; and by the columns of the Northern Whig we are happy to find that teetotal societies are rapidly gaining ground, in Belfast, and throughout the important province of Ulster.

In his progress through the country, Father Mathew does all in his power to avoid any unnecessary public excitement; and, if possible, he invariably declines the honours which the people would pay him. He travels in the most unostentatious manner; and we believe it is a fact that Mr. Purcell and the excellent Mr. Bannock—whose coaches and cars run in every part of Ireland—have directed that no charge shall ever be made to the apostle of temperance.

None of the losses to the revenue, which were so lugubriously predicted, have resulted from the progress of the teetotal cause: on the other hand, great public savings have been made. The county rates have been diminished by the smaller number of prisoners in the gaols: the Grand Jury cess has been lessened by the diminution of the police force; and the frightful item in the public accounts for "Administration of Justice in Ireland," has been most materially diminished. Sessions-business has wonderfully fallen off: sharking attorneys are looking out for honest employment: process-servers are becoming decent men, but useless: and the magistrates at petty sessions have not half so many opportunities of doing injustice as formerly they had. The money hitherto spent in whiskey is spent in new shops, in clothing, solid food, and household furniture. Thus the revenue will be compensated for the loss of the whiskey duty. It will get from habits of comfort what it so long extorted from the victims of vice. The Irish are now a sober people. They have banished from amongst them the phrensy of mad drunkenness—and, what is worse, the stupefying effects of continual—early and late—muddling. Their great powers of enduring labour will now be developed; and, ere long, their industry must be rewarded—their skill must be encouraged—their enterprise must be crowned. We use the word must, for it is impossible that a country so rich, and that a people so endowed by heaven with every high quality, can long remain in misery, to which no nation affords a parallel, now that sobriety has established its sway.

Now that Ireland is sober and peaceful—now that her garrisons are empty, and her places of worship are full; now that the judges have little to do, and that habits of steadiness, of study, and of forethought are spreading around—may we not hope that the Irish absentee gentry will return to "the halls of their fathers," in which they are strangers? May we not venture to hope that better feelings will not enter into the relations between landlord and tenant? Gladly would we hail the happy day when just treatment will banish discontent, and when the "live and let-live" principle will shed its protecting and fostering influence over every farm, holding, and cottage in the sister island. —[We strongly recommend a perusal of the original work, from which these extracts are made, to our readers. It is published in 8vo., at the low price of Three Pence, by T. White, 53, Wych-street, Strand. See TEETOTALER.]

THE BASHFUL MAN.

We extract the following amusing tale from "Grant's London Journal," which is one of the most entertaining and instructive cheap periodicals of the day.

You must know that, in my person, I am tall and thin, with a fair complexion, and light flaxen hair, but of such extreme sensibility of shame, that on the smallest subject of confusion, my blood all rushes into my cheeks, and I appear a perfect full-blown rose. Having been sent to the university by my father, a farmer of no great property, the consciousness of my unhappy failing made me avoid society, and I became enamoured of a college life. But from that peaceful retreat I was called by the deaths of my father and a rich uncle, who left me a fortune of thirty thousand pounds. I now purchased an estate in the country; and my company was much courted by the surrounding families, especially by such as had marriageable daughters. Though I wished to accept their proffered friendship, I was forced repeatedly to excuse myself, under the pretence of not being quite settled: for often, when I have rode or walked with full intention of returning their visits, my heart has failed me as I approached their gates, and I have returned homeward resolved to try again next day. Determined, however, at length to conquer my timidity, I accepted of an invitation to dine with one whose open easy manner left me no room to doubt a cordial welcome.

Sir Thomas Friendly, who lives about two miles distant, is a baronet, with about two thousand pounds a-year estate, joining to that I purchased; he has two sons, and five daughters, all grown up, and living with their mother and a maiden sister of Sir Thomas's, at Friendly Hall, dependent on their father. Conscious of my unpolished gut, I have for some time past taken private lessons of a professor, who teaches "grown gentlemen to dance;" and though I at first found wondrous difficulty in the art he taught, my knowledge of mathematics was of prodigious use in teaching me the equilibrium of my body, and the due adjustment of the centre of gravity of the five positions. Having acquired the art of walking without tottering, and learned to make a bow, I boldly ventured to obey the baronet's invitation to a family dinner; not doubting but my new acquirements would enable me to see the ladies with tolerable intrepidity; but, alas! how vain are all the hopes of theory, when unsupported by habitual practice. As I approached the house, a dinner bell alarmed my fears, lest I had spoiled the dinner by want of punctuality; impressed with this idea, I blushed the deepest crimson, as my name was repeatedly announced by the several livery servants, who ushered me into the library, hardly knowing what or whom I was. At my first entrance I summoned all my fortitude, and made my new learned bow to Lady Friendly; but, unfortunately, in bringing back my left foot to the third position, I trod upon the gouty toe of poor Sir Thomas, who had followed close at my heels to be the nomenclature of the family. The confusion this occasioned in me is hardly to be conceived, since none but bashful men can judge of my distress; and of that description the number I believe is very small. The baronet's politeness by degrees dissipated my concern, and I was astonished to see how far good breeding could enable him to suppress his feelings, and to appear with perfect ease after so painful an accident.

The cheerfulness of her ladyship, and the familiar chat of the young ladies, insensibly led me to throw off my reserve and sheepishness, till at length I ventured to join the conversation, and even to start fresh subjects. The library being richly furnished with books in elegant bindings, I conceived Sir Thomas to be a man of literature, and ventured to give my opinion concerning the several editions of the Greek classics; in which the baronet's opinion exactly coincided with my own. To this subject I was led by observing an edition of Xenophon in sixteen volumes, which (as I had never before heard of such a thing) greatly excited my curiosity, and I rose up to examine what it could be. Sir Thomas saw what I was about, and, as I supposed, willing to save me trouble, rose to take down the book, which made me more eager to prevent him, and hastily laying my hand on the first volume, I pulled it forcibly; but lo! instead of books, a board, which by leather and gilding had been made to look like sixteen volumes, came tumbling down, and unfortunately pitched upon a wedgewood ink-stand on the table under it. In vain did Sir Thomas assure me there was no harm; I saw the ink streaming from an inland table on the Turkey carpet; and, scarce knowing what I did, attempted to stop its progress with my cambric handkerchief. In the height of this confusion, we were informed that dinner was served up, and I with joy perceived that the bell, which at first had so alarmed my fears, was only the half-hour-dinner-bell.

In walking through the hall, and suite of apartments to the dining-room, I had time to collect my scattered senses, and was desired to take my seat betwixt Lady Friendly and her eldest daughter at the table. Since the fall of the wooden Xenophon, my face had been continually burning like a firebrand, and I was just beginning to recover myself, and to feel comfortably cool, when an unlooked-for accident rekindled all my heat and blushes. Having set my plate of soup too near the edge of the table, in bowing to Miss Dinah, who politely complimented the pattern of my waistcoat, I tumbled the whole scalding contents into my lap. In spite of an immediate supply of napkins to wipe the surface of my clothes, my black silk breeches were not stout enough to save me from the painful effects of this sudden fomentation, and for some minutes my legs and thighs seemed stewing in a boiling caldron; but recollecting how Sir Thomas had disguised his torture when I trod upon his toe, I firmly bore my pain in silence, and sat with my lower extremities parboiled, amidst the stifled giggling of the ladies and the servants.

I will not relate the several blunders which I made during the first course, or the distress occasioned by my being desired to carve a fowl, or help to various dishes that stood near me; spilling a sauce-boat, and knocking down a salt-cellar; rather let me hasten to the second course, where fresh disasters overwhelmed me quite.

I had a piece of rich sweet pudding on my fork, when Miss Louisa Friendly begged to trouble me for a pigeon that stood near me; in my haste, not knowing what I did, I whipped the pudding into my mouth, hot as a burning coal; it was impossible to conceal my agony, my eyes were starting from their sockets. At last in spite of shame and resolution, I was obliged to drop the cause of torment on my plate. Sir Thomas and the ladies all compassionated my misfortune, and each advised a different application: one recommended oil, another water; but all agreed that wine was best for drawing out the fire; and a glass of sherry was brought me from the sideboard, which I snatched up with eagerness; but, oh! how shall I tell the sequel? whether the butler by accident mistook, or purposely designed to drive me mad, he gave me strongest brandy, with which I filled my mouth, already dazed and blistered. Totally unused to every kind of ardent spirits, with my tongue, throat, and palate, as raw as beet, what could I do? I could not swallow; and clapping my hands upon my mouth, the cursed liquor squirted through my nose and fingers like a fountain, over all the dishes; and I was crushed by bursts of laughter from all quarters. In vain did Sir Thomas reprimand the servants, and Lady Friendly exhort her daughters; for the measure of my shame and their diversion was not yet complete. To relieve me from the intolerant state of perspiration which this accident had caused, without considering what I did, I wiped my face with that ill-fated handkerchief, which was still wet from the consequences of the fall of Xenophon, and covered all my features with streaks of ink in every direction. The baronet himself could not support the shock, but joined his lady in the general laugh; while I sprang from the table in despair, rushed out of the house, and ran home in an agony of confusion and disgrace, which the most poignant sense of guilt could not have excited.

REVIEW.

Bacchus. An Essay on the Nature, Causes, Effects, and Cure, of Intemperance. By RALPH BARNES GRINDROD, Esq., Surgeon. Third thousand. 12mo. pp. 335. London: J. Pasco.

(CONCLUDING NOTICE.)

ACCORDING to promise we must once more return to this very clever book, and again do we recommend all our readers to hasten and peruse one of the best essays in the English language. Had Mr. Grindrod been in France, and had he written his book in the language of that country, the government would have conferred upon him the honourable distinction of the knighthood of the Legion of Honour, and the more substantial recompense of a good pension in addition thereto; but here, in England, when was talent ever rewarded by the government? when did the author of a book ever receive an honour or a pension, unless he were a friend of the ministers? A man must be mad to exclaim, "England, with all thy faults, I love thee still!"

But—recommenda a munda. The work under notice has experienced the success which it deserved, and has elicited universal approbation wherever it has been perused or reviewed. It is evidently the fruit of a severe toil—the produce of a rich and well-stored intellect, which has been duly watered by the most refreshing dews of nature. No book has ever fallen into our hands that has exemplified a more unwearying spirit of research than this. The number of works referred to, or extracted from, is astonishing; and the judgment with which those references are made, and the taste manifested in the selection of quotations, are also peculiar qualities belonging to this author. We do not praise the work, because we entertain the same opinions; but because we feel convinced that it is all we state.

The Appendix is by no means the least valuable portion of Mr. Grindrod's "Essay;" and from it we shall call a few observations to lay before our readers:—

The food of women who suckle their own children is frequently very improperly selected. The quantity of the milk, not the quality of it, is studied. It is a well-known fact that this secretion partakes very much of the nature of the diet that is used,—that is to say, certain particles pass through the breast unassimilated. All drinks containing ardent spirit, such as wine, punch, caudle, ale, and porter, must impregnate the milk; and thus the digestive organs of the babe must be quickly injured. * * * Porter is generally permitted in large quantities on these occasions—a beverage highly improper and dangerous.

The observations emanate from the pen of Doctor Trotter, physician to Lord Howe's fleet, and are quoted by Mr. Grindrod in his appendix. We shall quote one more extract from this portion of the "Essay;" it is a paragraph borrowed from Dr. Rush, the celebrated American physician:—

The solitary instances of longevity which are now and then met with in hard drinkers, no more disprove the deadly effects of ardent spirits, than the solitary instances of recoveries from apparent death by drowning, prove that there is no danger to life from a human body lying an hour under water.

No advocate of Teetotalism should ever attempt to enter deeply into the subject, without having previously read "Bacchus."

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

ONE of our readers of the Teetotaler has forwarded to us the following extract as a contrast between the French and English relative to Drunkenness. It is an extract from a letter to a friend from Paris:—"The superior condition of the lower classes of France is owing, no doubt, in a great degree, to the comparative absence of drunkenness. There may be a good deal of merry-making from cheap wine outside the barriers among the Parisian operatives on a Sunday or holiday; but drunkenness, brutal, degrading, an habitual drunkenness, the besetting vice of our lower orders, would appear to be almost unknown here.

"I have not, since I entered France, seen a single person in a state of intoxication. We are apt, in England, to give ourselves airs, and speak with affected horror of French indecency and immorality. We should do well to look to our own gin-palaces and the condition of the lower classes in our great towns before we thank God we are not like our neighbours—publicans and sinners."—Monthly Chronicle. "Letters from the Continent."

BLACKSMITH'S BOTTLE.

A blacksmith in extensive business had a bottle that held exactly a pint; and in the large village in which he resided it was soon known in its various trips to the stores as an exact gauge for that quantity, and on its appearance for replenishing, was relied without recourse to the measure. This bottle became celebrated—18 years it performed the drudgery of being the medium of conveying the ruinous beverage to the owner and the workmen. During this long course of service, the shop, in which it was so conspicuous an appendage, was three times consumed by fire, but each time the bottle was found among the ruins uninjured. Phoenix-like it rose, and was taken again into active service. It was kept in motion like a weaver's shuttle, and such zealous devotees at the bacchanalian altar were the possessors, that it has been known to convey fourteen shillings' worth of the poison in a single day to the occupants of the shop. The bottle well served its owner, who has recently passed into the grave at the age of sixty. The veteran toger, indeed, possessed a constitution, which, but for that pernicious habit, promised to carry him to the age of many a temperate pilgrim, that of eighty or more, and instead of competency to the survivors, has left the little bottle as his only legacy. This veteran bottle has been the means of conveying more wealth from its owner and the workmen, than would suffice to purchase the most extensive and valuable farm the country could boast of.

CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.

A man in Maryland, notoriously addicted to this vice, hearing an uproar in his cottage one evening, had the curiosity to step without noise to the door, to know what was the matter, when he beheld his servants indulging in the most unbounded roar of laughter, at a couple of his negro boys who were mimicking him in his drunken fits, showing how he rolled, and staggered, how he looked, and nodded, and hiccupped, and tumbled. The picture which these children of nature drew of him, and which had filled the rest with so much merriment, struck him so forcibly that he became a perfectly sober man, to the unspeakable joy of his wife and children.—Chambers.

TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

IRELAND.

MR. O'CONNELL, M. P. has forwarded the sum of five pounds to the Tralee Teetotal Society; and has desired his name to be inserted for a donation of one pound annually, upon the books of the Association.

THE MARQUIS OF LANDSOWNE has addressed a letter to the REV. THEOBALD MATHEW, the great apostle of temperance, enclosing a cheque for one hundred pounds, and requesting Ireland's regenerator to "apply it to the use of any one of the institutions for the benefit of his poor countrymen in which he takes an interest." The noble Marquis compliments Father Mathew upon "the extraordinary success of his unremitting endeavours to introduce amongst the Irish confirmed habits of temperance and self-control."

SWAN RIVER.

A recent letter from this colony announces the pleasing intelligence that a Total Abstinence Association has been lately formed there, and that one of the public-houses is consequently closed. Since the establishment of this society, the health of the colony has improved amazingly, and the Total Abstinents are in a fair way to make rapid fortunes. Good land may be had at five shillings an acre, and the most delicious fruits of all kinds are now more than abundant in the markets,—they are absolutely wasted. A man who is at all addicted to drinking in this colony, has not the slightest chance of living any length of time. A subscription has already been set on foot for the purpose of raising a sufficient sum to erect a Temperance Hall for the Swan River Total Abstinence Association.

PLYMOUTH.

This town has just been visited by MR. WEDLAKE, a Cornish miner, who is now devoting himself to the advocacy of Total Abstinence. He is himself a living testimony to its saving influence; and being gifted with a powerful and thinking mind, and a fearless zeal in the advocacy of our cause, he is eminently qualified to attack the strong holds of prejudice and appetite. This he has accomplished most successfully here: his originality of manner and matter have attracted crowded meetings.

IPSWICH.

On the 30th of August, the First Report of the Ipswich Total Abstinence Society was read at the opening of the Hall. This Report is now published, and contains a cheering account of the progress of total abstinence principles in that town. Upwards of a hundred working men have affixed their names to the following document:—"We, the undersigned, have worked upon the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks for the space of time appended to our several names, and bear our voluntary testimony to the fact of being as well in health, as able to do our work, and more happy in our general feelings and condition than when in the habit of using malt liquors, &c." No argument can resist the practical experience of these working men, who have neither interest nor reason to propagate a falsehood, especially when their own habits are so materially involved in the matter. The Report gives a most favourable account of the condition of the Total Abstinence Associations at the following places:—Aldborough, Beccles, Bungay, Bury St. Edmund's, Framlingham, Harwich, Great Oakley (Essex), Stowmarket, Stradbroke, Wickham-Market, Woodbridge. The Ipswich Society now consists of 609 male adults,—200 juvenile members,—54 reclaimed drunkards, 7 of who are now members of christian churches.

AMPTHILL (BEDFORDSHIRE).

On Monday the 20th September, a Rechabite Tent was opened in this beautiful little town. The interest attached to the good cause in this place is great. Success is attending the labours of Teetotalers there; and we hail with delight this fresh proof of their activity.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

The Wednesday evening meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel was crowded to excess. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair; and the audience was addressed, after this gentleman, by MESSIEURS PADDINGTON (from Winchester), WILLIAM DONALDSON, BOWLER, MEE, CUENER, STALLWOOD (Secretary to the Kensington Branch), and H. W. WESTON (Secretary to the United Temperance Association).

The Saturday evening meeting was also well attended. We have no room this week for any extended Report of the proceedings.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY.

Since the formation of this important branch, every thing wears a cheering aspect with regard to the success of the society: indeed, so energetic has been the conduct of the members, that, no sooner was the subject of the first general meeting brought forward, than a subscription was instantly set on foot for the payment of all contingent expenses. On Tuesday last, a grand meeting was held at the Royal Bath Gardens, MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS in the chair. We must postpone all further notice of this grand assembly until next week.

KENSINGTON AND BAYSWATER BRANCH.

A series of most interesting lectures are being delivered at the Camden Chapel, Kensington Gravel Pits, on Mondays and Thursdays, by some of the most talented advocates of Teetotal principles.

EAST LONDON AND SPITALFIELDS BRANCH.

A crowded assembly of the members of this branch was held on Monday last at the rooms, Church-street, Bethnal Green. This branch has effected great good amongst the inhabitants of that district.

MARYLEBONE BRANCH.

Mr. Ward's assembly rooms, Circus-street, New-road, were crowded, as usual, on Wednesday last, Sept. 23.

LECTURES FOR THE WORKING CLASSES, ALDERSGATE CHAPEL.

MR. JAMES MEE will deliver a course of Lectures on every Friday evening in October, at 8 o'clock—on Astronomy, Geology, &c.—Tickets, Two-pence each, may be had at the Depot, 134, Aldersgate-street.

Correspondents will please address all communications for the Depot of the United Temperance Association, to Mr. H. W. Weston.

* * We take this opportunity of correcting an error which appeared in our tenth number. The Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youths' Teetotal Society holds its weekly meetings for youths only at Mr. Dennis's Coffee-House, Jerusalem-Passage, every Tuesday evening, and not every Thursday evening as then stated; and we may also mention that a registry has recently been established at the same place, for youths who are Teetotalers, of good moral character, and out of employment.—[Ed.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. HENDERSON has just published the following new works:—

SISTER ANNIE;

A Novel translated from the French of Paul de Kock.

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

Demy 8vo. Price 2s. 6d.

II.

THE LAST DAY OF A CONDEMNED.

Translated from the French of Victor Hugo,

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

12mo. price 6d.

III.

THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE.

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 3s.

Also nearly ready, Vol. I. of

THE HISTORY OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS.

G. Henderson, 7, Old Bailey.

BEST AND BOLDEST!!!

HERAULD'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE for October will contain an article upon the all-absorbing subject of

TEETOTALISM;

By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, Esq. This article will contain an account of the rise and progress of Teetotalism, and the history of the principal Temperance Associations in London. The further contents of this popular Magazine, are as follows:—1. Psychological Medicine; 2. Persian Reminiscences; 3. Theatrical Reform; 4. Knowles's New Play; 5. Chartism and Socialism; 6. Tales, comic and serious; and 7. Poetry of the first order.

London: Sherwood and Co., Paternoster Row.

EAST LONDON

CHARTIST TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

RULES AND OBJECTS.

1. That this Association be denominated the East London Chartist Temperance Association.—2. That the affairs of this Association shall be managed by a Committee of ten, chosen by the first members who join it; with an addition of one to the Committee, to every ten Members.—3. That the Members of the Committee shall be elected every three months. Seven to form a quorum.—4. That the Committee shall meet once a week; or oftener, if necessary.—5. That there be a General Meeting of the Association every month for the admission of Members—to receive reports and the transaction of general business.—6. That no rule or article shall be altered without the consent of a majority of the Members, all of whom shall receive a week's notice of the same.—7. That each Member be recommended to subscribe One Penny per week to defray the expenses of the Association.—8. That it be the duty of this Association to advance the moral and intellectual welfare of the Members; by lectures, discussions, or any other means.—9. That the Members of the Association are earnestly recommended to take an interest in the welfare of each other by trading with, and endeavouring to procure employment for, any of the Members who are in want of the same; and in order to facilitate this object, a record of each Member's trade or occupation be kept by the Secretary, and read over at the general monthly meetings of the Association.—10. That as early as the Funds will allow, a convenient place shall be hired for the use of the Association; and a Library of useful books be established, in order that the Members may spend their leisure hours profitably, and set a good example.—11. That the Members of this Association adopt as their motto the following beautiful rule of justice—Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you.—12. In order that harmony of sentiment and unanimity of action may characterise the Association, all discussion on questions of Theology is expressly forbidden.—13. That persons desirous of becoming Members of this Association must abstain from all intoxicating drinks one week previous to their admission, in order to try the principle and prevent a relapse.—14. That, to prevent embarrassment in the pecuniary affairs of the Association, the Committee shall not allow the debts of the Association to exceed, at any time, the sum of ten shillings, except by the consent of a majority of the Members, given at any public meeting.—15. That the following be the pledge and qualification of Membership:—

I VOLUNTARILY consent to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, except prescribed by a medical person; and, as Temperance applies to all things, I renounce the use of Tobacco as a common habit, injurious alike to health and good morals; and pledge myself not to use it, except as a medicine; and do further declare that I will use all moral and lawful means to cause the People's Charter to become the Law of the Land.

CHAS. H. NEESOM, Secretary, 75, Hare Street, Bethnal Green. To whom all communications may be sent, post paid.

THE ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.—

A Young Man, who fully understands the Oriental Languages, and who is accustomed to tuition in English, writing, &c. &c. is desirous of obtaining employment, either as an USHER in a school, or as TUTOR in a gentleman's family. Address, post paid, to E. E. 2, Long Lane, Smithfield.

SIGHT RESTORED.

NERVOUS HEAD-ACHE AND DEAFNESS CURED.
Under the Patronage of his late Majesty, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the Lords of the Treasury.

THIS is universally recommended by the Faculty for its efficacy in removing Disorders incident to the Eyes and Head.

Dr. Abernethy used it, and termed it the Faculty's Friend and Nurse's Vade Mecum.

Dr. Andrews also recommends its use as a preventive. (See his report when in Sunderland, published in the Times, Cheshire Journal, and British Traveller, in November, 1831.) He says—"The herbaceous quality of the snuff had such an effect on the stomach, as well as the nerves of the head, from the tenacious sympathy of the membrane of the nose with the nervous system, that Grimstone's Eye Snuff, when taken frequently must prevent any contagion entering the System, and recommends its universal adoption." Dated 10th Nov., 1831.

G. J. GRIMSTONE, Esq., F.R.S.—This eminent surgeon strongly recommends Grimstone's Eye Snuff. See J. B. Lachfield's, Esq. Letter.

THE ECCENTRIC SNUFF-TAKER.

Should trade be dull and times go rough,
Oh! give me then a pinch of snuff;
Give me my box a pinch to take,
Even when I'm pleased, for pleasure's sake
When fortune's frowns disturb my mind,
And friends appear to grow unkind;
Relief I seek within my box,
My system is quite orthodox.
When a true friend perchance I meet,
I cheerfully his person greet,
A hearty "How d'ye do?" takes place,
When to my snuff-box shows its face
My pulverulent box supplies
A recipe for weaker eyes.
That man must be a silly coxse
Who thoughtlessly condemns its use
If my proboscis could but speak,
"I would often say the dose repeat."
Each grateful sneeze and titillation
Excites a frequent iteration.
Then here's my glass in which I toast,
Success to that which I love most.
Reader, I pray don't think me blue—
Mark well the hint—GRIMSTONE'S SNUFF.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, W. H. H. E. Cooper's Arms, Bristol.

39 Broad street, Bloomsbury.

Observe this Caution—W. GRIMSTONE is the SOLE INVENTOR, and the only genuine is prepared by him.

Read a few cases of Sight Restored by the use of GRIMSTONE'S EYE SNUFF.

Mr. A. M. Lister, aged 63, No. 3, Silver street, Golden square, cured of gutta serena and deafness.

H. Lister, Esq., Marine Library, Ramsgate, Kent, cured of cataract and deafness.

Mrs. Blackett, cured while at Jamaica of gutta serena, &c. Queen-street, London.

Mr. P. Sanderson, No. 10, Harper street, Leeds, cured of cataract.

Mr. H. Pluckwell, Tottenham House, Tottenham, Middlesex, cured of ophthalmia.

Miss S. Englefield, Park-street, Windsor, cured of nervous head-ache.

Marchioness de Broglie Solari, 46, Charlotte-street, hearing and sight restored.

Decimus Blackburn, Esq., Chertsey, Surrey, head aches, weakness, and dimness of sight cured.

George Smith, Esq., 6, York-place, Kentish town, weakness and dimness of sight cured by its use. (See letter.)

Elizabeth Robson, 19, Bell-street, Edgeware road, aged 44, cured of Ophthalmia and deafness.

Copy of a letter sent to Mr. Grimstone, Feb. 10th, 1840.

Sir—Having been afflicted with bad eyes for a long time, a friend who had received benefit from using your Eye Snuff, recommended it to me. I have taken the contents of your 2s. 4d. canister, and am happy to say my sight has improved, the weakness and dimness is removed, and, Sir, it is my wish that you may make this known for the good of the public. Yours, G. GEORGE SMITH.

To Mr. W. Grimstone, Inventor of Eye Snuff, 39 Broad-street, Bloomsbury, March 25th, 1840.

Sir—I have been afflicted for many years with a severe pain in my head, attended with a dimness of sight and darting of fire in my eyes, for which I have had the first medical advice. Indeed, I have taken large quantities, without receiving any relief, but I am now delighted to say with truth that ever since using your valuable Eye Snuff, which I have taken copiously, that is a 2s. 4d. canister weekly, I am quite free from those excruciating pains, and can read the smallest print, although I am in the 64th year of my age. This is my third testimony, and shall be most happy to give it to you or to any respectable enquirer at my residence as under. I remain, with gratitude, Sir, your obedient humble servant, E. FORSEX.

19, Bell-street, Edgeware-road, Marylebone.
This odoriferous Herbaceous Compound of Herbs is sold in capsules at 2d., 1s., 3s., 4s., 5s., 6s., and 12s. 6d., by all wholesale Tobacconists, Merchants, and Druggists, in town and country, by whom dealers may be supplied. It can be obtained in all the principal towns and cities. A liberal allowance to Shipowners, owners, captains, and all vendors of Grimstone's Eye Snuff. This celebrated Snuff is shipped to all quarters of the globe, and retains its benign qualities in every climate. All Snuffs and Cigars shipped on the shortest notice.

Proprietors of newspapers and periodicals are particularly requested not to insert any of Mr. Grimstone's advertisements without a written order, as no account in future, will be paid without his authority for the insertions.

ORIGINAL COMMISSION

TEA COMPANY,
94, CANNON STREET, Near Walbrook.

BLACK TEA.

The very best Black Tea imported, full flavoured strong rich Pekoe kind. 5 5
Black Leaf wavy Rough Congou, highly recommended. 5 0
Strong black leaf Congou, for taverns and coffee houses. 4 5

GREEN TEA.

The finest pearl leaf Gunpowder, a strong rich full flavoured tea, the very best imported. 6 6
Fine Hyson coverlip kind equal to any that can be bought. 6 0
Young Hyson strongly recommended. 6 0
Best Plantation Coffee. 3 0
Fine Mocha Coffee. 8 4
Finest Baked Cocoa. 0 10
Best Spanish Chocolate. 0 10

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT

AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS.

Thomas Bax, Bishopsgate Without
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Pountney Lane
Job Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell Spicer, New Bridge Street
Henry Sterry, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Cheapside
T. G. Darton, Gracechurch Street
Russell Jeffry, Gracechurch Street
Joseph Sterry, Jun., Southwark
Henry Tuckett, South Street.

A Pocket Diary for 1840, with Life and Annuity Tables, &c. may be had on application at the office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced, some few years ago, by this Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

Arthur Street, West London Bridge. A. A. FRY, Secretary.

ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100.
To the Assured, on attaining the Age of 30, 35, 40, 45, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age next Birth Day.	30	35	40	45
15	2 8 9	2 2 9	1 18 9	1 15 0
16	2 10 9	2 4 6	1 19 9	1 16 0
17	2 12 9	2 6 3	2 0 9	1 17 0
18	2 14 8	2 7 9	2 2 0	1 18 0
19	2 16 8	2 9 3	2 3 3	1 19 0
20	2 18 9	2 11 0	2 4 6	2 0 0
21	3 1 9	2 12 9	2 5 6	2 1 0
22	3 3 9	2 14 6	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 3	2 16 6	2 8 6	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 9	2 10 3	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 0	2 12 4	2 5 6
26	3 15 9	3 3 9	2 14 0	2 6 0
27	3 19 7	3 6 3	2 16 0	2 7 0
28	4 2 9	3 8 9	2 18 3	2 8 6
29	4 5 3	3 12 0	3 0 3	2 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 3	3 2 9	2 11 6
31	4 18 3	3 18 9	3 5 2	2 13 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 6	3 7 9	2 15 0
33	5 10 9	4 6 6	3 10 6	2 17 0
34	5 18 3	4 11 0	3 15 9	2 19 0
35	6 6 3	4 15 0	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 1 0	4 0 9	3 3 6
37	—	5 7 3	4 4 3	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1 0	4 15 9	3 12 0
40	—	6 9 0	4 18 9	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 9	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 3	4 4 0
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 0
45	—	—	6 11 9	4 10 6

DR. PERRENGTON'S TONIC APERIENT LIQUEUR.

"The Tonic combined with the Aperient enforces its action without weakening the organs."—Dr. Holland, Physician Extraordinary to the Queen.—The properties of this incomparable medicine are in a great measure shown by its name. It is a Tonic, containing the concentrated essence of the most valuable indigenous and exotic Invigorants, strengthening the Stomach, sharpening the Appetite, Exhibiting the Spirits, and bracing the Nerves. As an Aperient, it acts with gentleness and cordiality, without griping, nausea, or flatulence. It quickly removes Giddiness, Headache, wind in the Stomach, Spasm and Colic. It is a most effectual remedy for Indigestion, whether arising from debility or excess in Epicurean indulgences. For habitual costiveness it is unrivalled; whilst, to crown the whole, its taste is a combination of the slightest but finest bitterness, with the most exquisite aroma and delicate flavour that ever met the approbation of the most refined palate. For further information respecting its composition and virtues, the reader is referred to Perrengeton's Popular Treatise on the Stomach, this interesting work is presented to purchasers of the Tonic Aperient, which is sold in Bottles, at 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., Wholesale and Retail at the Central Depot, 44, Gerrard-street, also at 6, Bruton-street, Bond-street, by Wilkinson, 245, Strand, Johnston, Cornhill, Watkins, High-street, Mary le Bone, Swire, 14, Edgeware-road, Weatherley, 3, Bridge-street, Westminster, Sanger's, Oxford-street, Huntsman, High-street, Camden-Town; King, 282, Surrey-street, Blackfriars Road, Mr. James Sequeira, 152, High-street, Whitechapel, Walker, corner of Grove-road, Borough; Watson, 126, High Holborn, and all Medicine Vendors.

RECENT DISCOVERY IN TEETH. Messrs

MORGAN and TULLY respectfully wish to inform the Public that after many years of indefatigable research, they have discovered quite a new description of MINERAL TEETH, that surpasses all previous inventions for Beauty and Durability, never changing Colour, and being impossible, from their natural Appearance, for the closest observer to detect them from Human Teeth. The method in which Messrs M. and T. fix these Teeth does not require the extraction of the remaining Roots, or any painful Operation: they are fastened without Springs, Wires, or Ligatures, and are guaranteed to restore the Articulation and Mastication, DECAYED TEETH filled up and perfectly restored to their former Soundness, without Heat, Pain, or Pressure, by Messrs. M. and T.'s infallible Cement, which hardens to Enamel in a short time. Teeth Scaled and Beautified Equal to the Finest Enamel. Children's Teeth Regulated and Properly Managed. With every other Operation appertaining to Dental Surgery, scientifically performed on the most moderate Terms. 1, Finsbury Place, South, Directly Facing Fore-Street.

DR. GARDINER'S WORM MEDICINE, after

forty years' unparalleled success, proofs of which may be seen in the vast collection of Worms in the Museum. Dr. Long-acre, especially recommends itself to the many thus afflicted, as also parents and guardians, on whom it is an imperative duty to observe those leading symptoms by which worms are generally detected—as irregularity of appetite, itching of the nose and seat, starting in the sleep, grinding of the teeth, dry cough, constant thirst, wasting and general debility, fits, and, if neglected, decline and death.

Prepared (only) and sold by the Doctor's grandson, J. S. GARDINER, as above; also, by EDWARDS, St. Paul's; SANDERS, Oxford-street; BARCLAY, Farringdon-street, and most respectable Medicine Vendors, in boxes 2s. 6d. (for children) 4s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and 21s. The Cordial Tincture to be used with the Pills, in bottles, 1s. 1d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

UNDER THE ESPECIAL PATRONAGE OF

HIS LATE MOST GRACIOUS MAJESTY—As the following letter received from Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley, Keeper of the Privy Purse, testifies.

"Sir,—I am honoured with the King's command to express his Majesty's sense of your polite attention in sending the two bottles of Essence of Ginger. His Majesty has been pleased to direct me to forward you ten pounds in payment for it—inclosed you will find that amount—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, H. WHEATLEY."

St. James's Palace, June 25th, 1835.

To Mr. Decimus Woodhouse.

WOODHOUSE'S ETHERAL ESSENCE OF GINGER is particularly recommended to all cold phlegmatic, weak and nervous constitutions; it is certain in affording instant relief in Spasms, Cramps, Flatulence, Languor, Hysterics, Heartburn, Loss of Appetite, Sensation of Fulness, Pain and Oppression after Meals; also those Pains of the Stomach and Bowels which arise from Gouty Flatulencies; Digestion however much impaired, is restored to its pristine state, by the use of this Essence for a short time, if taken in Tea, Coffee, &c. &c.; it corrects their flatulent tendency; also this Etheral Essence warms and invigorates the whole system, and will be found on experience, a happy substitute for those spiritual cordials, which at the moment they seem to revive, are insidiously undermining the very principles of life and health: in short as a domestic remedy, a remedy for the Traveller by sea or land, nothing can be more convenient or efficacious, as a few drops in water, forms a tea of any strength.

The undersigned, and 208 other medical men, have given certificates of their unqualified approbation of the value of the Essence, as also of its superiority over all other similar preparations. Drs. James Johnson, Physician to his Majesty, A. T. Holroyd, S. Ashwell, R. Kewier, A. Middleton, C. Loudon, D. Davies, Surgeon to his Majesty, J. Pereira, G. Pilcher, F. Salmon, F. Tyrrel, J. H. Curtis, Aurist to his Majesty, C. Millard. In bottles 2s. 6d.; 4s. 6d.; 10s. 6d. and 21s. each.

Also WOODHOUSE'S PATENT CORN PLASTER, for affording instant relief, and eradicating CORNS and BUNIONS without pain or danger. This plaster acts by softening and destroying the Corns or Bunions, and defending the affected parts from the pressure of the shoe. Thus its use is perfectly safe and certain in affording relief in ten minutes, if a cure is not effected, in boxes 1s. 1d., and 2s. 9d. each.

These preparations are prepared only by Dr. Decimus Woodhouse, Operative Chemist Extraordinary to his late Majesty at his Laboratory, 15, Little James-street, Bedford row, of whom it may be had wholesale, also retail of Hooper, 45, King William-street, London Bridge, T. Butler, 4, Cheapside, Sanger, 120, Oxford-street, and of all Medicine Vendors.

N.B. Be sure to ask for Woodhouse's. CAUTION. To prevent imposition, be sure to see the name of Dr. Decimus Woodhouse, 15, King William-street London Bridge, is engraved on the Government Stamp, otherwise cannot be genuine.

MURRAY'S WRITING INKS.

The above celebrated Inks, which are made of Black, Red, Blue, and the Blue that turns Black, are rapidly superseding most others now in the market. Those persons who may be annoyed by the absence of the requisite qualities in writing Ink, Brilliance of colour, extreme fluidity and permanence, are requested to make trial of Murray's Writing Inks, when they will find that in them they have been attained in perfection. They may be had at every Stationer's, Bookseller's, and News-Vendor's Shop in London, and the Country, and of the sole Proprietor and Manufacturer, Douglas M'Mullan, 33, Myddleton Street, Clerkenwell, London.

NOTICE.

L. KYEZOR, From Geneva WATCH

COAST AND CLOCK MANUFACTURER, 16, Tottenham Court Road, nearly opposite Great Russell-street, and at 17, Upper George-street, Edgeware-road, takes the present opportunity of returning his sincere thanks to the public for the great encouragement he has met with for the last thirty years, and begs to inform them that he continues to employ ten experienced workmen, both French and English, for repairing Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Musical Boxes, &c., of every description. He has made a reduction of one-half the price usually charged by others in the trade.

Common Watch Glasses, 3d., Double Flint, 6d., Lunet Glass, 1s. 3d., Gilt Watch Hands, pair, 8d., Watch Dial, 5s., Main-spring, 8s., Verge, 5s. 6d., Hair-spring, 1s. 3d., Watch cleaning, 1s. 6d., Chains, 1s. 6d., Gold Watch Hands, pair, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 10-hour Clock, 1s. 7d., Cleaning 5-day Clock, 5s. 6d.

Chronometers, Duplex, Horizontal, and Repeating Watches of every description, both Foreign and English. Turned Spring, and Musical Clocks, &c., and every other article in the trade as cheap in proportion.

Every Watch and Clock brought to repair, will be taken to pieces in the presence of the person who brings it, and the fault shown, to prevent the overcharges that are generally made.

L. K. calls the attention of the public to his extensive stock of Clocks, all of which are of his own manufacture, and will warrant them free of expense for seven years, confident they will be found 40 per cent. cheaper than any Watchmaker can afford them, they not being the real manufacturers.

N.B. Clocks of every description wound up and kept in repair at 15s. per annum.

BARINGTON'S ELIXIR OF RHUBARB.

No much praise cannot be given to the individual who having an inclination to drunkenness, joins the Temperance Association, but the difficulty is found great, owing to the weakened state of the stomach, but if the justly celebrated medicine "Barrington's Elixir of Rhubarb" were taken for a short period, at the time of joining the Association, it would be found to give tone to the digestive organs, restore them to their healthy action, and relieve at once that distressing feeling of weakness and oppression which all spirit drinkers experience on first becoming Teetotalers. The action of this medicine is to assist, not force nature; and it is used with the greatest success in all diseases arising from Indigestion; namely, Bilious Head-aches, Diarrhoea, Spasms, Constipation, Gravel, Gout, and Rheumatism. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. by J. Kitching, Proprietor, 22, Queen-street, Cheapside; Messrs. Barclay, Farringdon-street, and all respectable Chemists.

All Communications for the Editor, to be addressed, post-paid, to the Depot of the United Temperance Association, 134, Aldersgate Street.

Published, for the Proprietors, by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell, Glasgow; M'achen & Co., Dublin; and Sold by all Booksellers in Town and Country.

London.—P. P. Thomas, Printer, 12, Warwick Square.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 16.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER IV.

A HUMOROUS SCENE.

THE conversation with Mr. Thornton had awakened a strange train of reflection in the mind of our hero; and Louise faintly hoped that the observations of their new acquaintance would lead to ultimate good in respect to her husband. Her delicate mind could not appreciate all the horrors of intemperance; and although she saw but little more than mere mental degradation and debasement in the practice of that hideous vice, she still anxiously hoped that Mr. Thornton would be the means of inculcating into the bosom of Melville a principle which would for ever place a barrier between him and an indulgence in intoxicating liquors. She did not therefore attempt to interrupt the chain of her husband's reflections; and the moment they reached their own home, Melville retired to his study, where he sat down with the determination of considering the subject in all its bearings.

Melville's meditations were interrupted by the entrance of a domestic who handed him a letter. He opened it, and found that it was a circular from the secretary to a joint-stock company, in which he had taken shares to a considerable amount. The circular required his immediate presence at the office of the company, where a meeting of the shareholders was to take place. Glad of a means of abstraction from the numerous subjects of serious thought that weighed upon his mind, our young hero ordered his cabriolet; and at the appointed time drove to the offices of the British and Foreign Equitable Lucifer-Match Joint-Stock Company, in Bridge-street, Blackfriars.

The "Board-Room" was thronged with as motley a crowd of gentlemen as the eye could wish to gaze upon. Some were dressed in the first style of fashion, and others had scarcely taken the trouble to dress at all. Old and young—washed and unwashed—polite and vulgar—to the number of about fifty, formed the miscellaneous audience to whom a stout gentleman standing behind a mahogany desk was addressing himself. The individuals who formed that audience were seated upon a number of forms that had been placed in rows, at one extremity of the apartment, for their accommodation; and although the characteristics of their personal appearance were so essentially varied and diversified, one common expression seemed to animate their countenances. The same light falls upon all objects, though each receives the lustre in a different manner; and thus did the same gleam of satisfaction illumine fifty physiognomies in as many discrepant fashions. The broad grinning face—the wizen countenance, partially relaxing from its accustomed serenity—the pursed-up lips, but laughing eye—the complacent smile—and the placid expression of contentment, were all visible upon that occasion.

The stout gentleman, who was standing at the mahogany desk, was about fifty years of age. His complexion was swarthy,—a circumstance which gave an air of uncleanness to his whole person; his forehead was high and broad, and seemed to indicate the full extent of the intellectual qualities possessed by its owner; and his restless dark eye had an expression of cunning and suspicion which would never enlist a phrenologist in his favour. His voice was sonorous, and authoritative in tone; his manners were familiar, and consequently somewhat vulgar; and, when he moved, a slight lameness was perceptible in his gait.

THE BREAKFAST PARTY.

To illustrate Chapter III., Period II., No. 15.

"Gentlemen," said the individual, whom we have briefly sketched, "according to the forms prescribed by the sixtieth article of the Deed of Settlement, which constituted our Company, I have summoned this meeting to communicate to you the condition of those self-acting lucifer-matches, the idea of which was founded by your capital, and has been worked out by my talent and experience."

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Bubbel," exclaimed one of the shareholders; "but I thought that there was to be no general meeting of the shareholders until the expiration of six months from the foundation of the Company."

"Unless the Director considered it necessary to the interests of the shareholders, to summon such meeting," observed Mr. Bubbel, endeavouring to apply this corrective in his most mellifluous tone; "and such an opinion is now entertained by me. I do not feel myself justified, gentlemen—I may say, I do not even feel comfortable, at having been entrusted with so large a sum, and not being called upon to give any account of the operation for which it was advanced, for so long a period as six months. Gentlemen, I am too conscientious to keep you in the dark relative to your own affairs; and I think—I flatter myself, gentlemen—I fondly imagine, in a word, that you will not blame me for my scrupulousness."

"What a straightforward honourable man!" whispered one of the shareholders to his neighbour.

"Oh! I knew very well, when I received the circular," was the answer, "that every thing was right; and yet my foolish wife declared that she had a presentiment that every thing was wrong."

"Those women are terrible with their presentiments!" remarked the first speaker. "It was only a few days ago that my old mother dreamt that the great sow was dead; and when we went to look into the sty, we found it was well and hearty as you or I."

"Upon your honour!" said the other, very naturally surprised at this remarkable event. "But let us be quiet,—Bubbel is going on."

"The success of our lucifer-matches, gentlemen," resumed the Director, as soon as his last words had made a favourable impression upon his audience,— "the success of our lucifer-matches has exceeded my most sanguine expectations."

Here the worthy Director was welcomed with such a clapping of hands, thumping of sticks and heels upon the floor, and shouts of "Bravo!" and "Hear!" that he was compelled to conceal his emotions in his pocket-handkerchief; during which manifestation of his modesty he was observed to shake very much. The shareholders immediately conjectured that he was overpowered by the sensitiveness of his feelings; but a clerk, who was peeping through the key-hole of the door has since declared that Mr. Bubbel was nearly convulsed with laughter,—doubtless at the ludicrousness of some idea which just then flitted across his fertile imagination.

"Yes, gentlemen," continued Mr. Bubbel, after a long pause, during which his feelings and the dust which had both been excited by the applause of the shareholders, had had due leisure to subside—"yes, gentlemen, I may safely say that the British and Foreign Equitable Lucifer-Match Company has altogether exceeded my most sanguine hopes."

"He is already going to offer a dividend, I declare," whispered a shareholder to his companions.

"I'll be bound he is!" coincided another.

"Fifteen per cent., perhaps," suggested a third.

"I'll buy your shares at ten per cent. premium, Slivers," said one fat old gentleman to a very thin young one.

"No, I thank'ee, Binks," was the immediate answer, accompanied by a shake of the head, that intimated the resolution of Mr. Slivers not to part with the slips of paper on which the words "One hundred pounds" had been printed in large red letters in the midst of sky-blue flourishes.

"But it was not simply to inform you that my most sanguine hopes have been exceeded, gentlemen," continued the Director, after another pause, "that I convened this meeting. My object was far more important to the interests of the concern than that announcement; and I can assure you that it gives me the greatest pleasure thus to meet you all—well and happy—in the 'Board-Room,' of the Company's offices. My only regret is that you did not all take more shares in this profiting and profitable enterprise, at its commencement:—I regret it, because you are all personally known to me; and the hundreds of other shareholders who dwell in England, Germany, Belgium, and elsewhere, are total strangers to me. They however reap, or rather will reap, equal profits from the concern; and I could have wished that it would be my pleasant and pleasing duty to divide those profits amongst you." But regrets are useless, gentlemen; let us forget that we ever entertained them."

"I wish I had taken a few more shares," observed Mr. Binks to Mr. Slivers.

"So do I," said Mr. Slivers to Mr. Binks.

"I shall first make a few observations relative to my administration of the affairs of the Company, ere I unfold the object of this assembly," resumed Mr. Bubbel. "I have neglected nothing that could ensure the prosperity of the enterprise, and conduce to the interests of the shareholders. I put into force many ingenious schemes to give publicity to the matches; and I do not fear contradiction when I assert, that they all perfectly succeeded. For instance, I wrote a pamphlet containing a desperate libel upon another Lucifer-Match Company; an action was brought against us, and we had to pay fifteen hundred pounds for damages. This was all I wanted, and the sale of our Lucifers instantly increased. Again—in pursuance of the same correct line of policy, I have kept open house to all individuals who are likely to benefit the undertaking; and in order to produce a favourable impression upon those persons, I furnished my house anew from top to bottom. I did not spare my wines; but, by buying a very large quantity at once, I saved the Company at least ten per cent. in this outlay. You therefore perceive, gentlemen, that I neglected nothing which might conduce to the interest of the establishment. In order to devote as much time as possible to the business of the office, I purchased a cabriolet and horse, as my house is at a considerable distance from London—at Richmond, gentlemen; and to be punctual, I procured a handsome chronometer watch, which now lies, gentlemen, upon this desk. But all these items are duly entered upon the books of the Company;—and those books, gentlemen, are open to your inspection. From the observations which have just fallen from my lips, you will see that I have religiously fulfilled the pledges I made to you when I received the sacred trust you deposited in my hands. I promised to economize your money: the transaction of the wines shows that I have not been unmindful of the vow. I swore to adopt all legal and legitimate measures to insure the sale of our matches: an action for libel was immediately courted. I declared that I would devote myself entirely to the business of the Company: I purchased (as I before informed you), a cabriolet to insure an early attendance here in the morning, and to enable me to remain at my post until within an hour of dinner time in the evening. What, gentlemen, has been the result of this unwearied attention—this conscientious behaviour—this prudent and politic line of conduct? Need I repeat the words I uttered just now? Shall I once more assert, in the most solemn manner, that the British and Foreign Equitable Lucifer-Match Joint-Stock Company has exceeded my most sanguine expectations? Yes, gentlemen, it has done so! It has only swallowed up one hundred thousand pounds, the amount of the capital subscribed. It has existed for the period of six months, and it only requires a fresh advance of capital for the purpose of buying a whole forest to cut down to make into Lucifer matches."

As when a sudden squall sweeps the surface of a calm and waveless sea,—as when a bo-constrictor darts from a tree upon the unsuspecting traveller beneath; or as the merchant receives the tidings that his bankers have failed,—so came this appalling communication to the assembled body of shareholders. All the members of that body were suddenly convulsed, as if they had possessed a common neck in modern fulfilment of the wish of the ancient Roman, round which a rope had been twisted with the tightness of the eastern bow-string in the hands of the Bostandji-baschi: Mr. Bubbel marked the effect produced by his disclosures, and calmly played with the handsome chronometer watch before alluded to, like the animal that, "hushed in grim repose, expects its evening prey."

"Binks, I'll sell my shares now," suddenly exclaimed Mr. Slivers, kindly relenting.

"Slivers, I'll not buy your shares now," as abruptly returned Mr. Binks, prudently reflecting.

"A hundred thousand pounds!" exclaimed another shareholder.

"All gone!" cried a fourth.

"Fifteen hundred pounds damages in the action!" ejaculated a fifth.

"And law expenses to boot," observed a sixth.

"He can't make us pay for the cab," said a seventh.

"Nor for the wines," added an eighth.

"Nor for his furniture," super-added a ninth.

"How much money did you receive in all?" demanded Mr. Binks of Mr. Bubbel.

"How much?" repeated that gentleman, with ineffable nonchalance; "why—exactly one hundred thousand pounds."

"And how much is there left?" inquired Mr. Slivers.

"One hundred thousand noughts," answered Mr. Bubbel, chuckling and rubbing his hands—probably with a view of imparting a little of his own good humour to his audience: a task in which he however experienced as miserable a failure as Warren Hastings did when he attempted to prove to the world that he was an innocent and an injured man.

"One hundred thousand pounds sterling in three short months!" exclaimed Melville.

"I beg your pardon," cried Mr. Bubbel: "two of the months were long ones: this is the thirtieth day of September, of the year 1830: and consequently the Company existed in both July and August, each of which has thirty-one days."

"The time, then, has been short enough!" grumbled Mr. Binks. "But what's to be done?"

"Oh! that is very simple," said Mr. Bubbel. "All I require is an advance of capital—there is no other obstacle to the purchase of the forest. How much shall we say, then, gentlemen?" exclaimed the Director, rubbing his hands together.

"It's very easy for you to stand there asking for money and rubbing your hands," returned Mr. Slivers: "as for me, I wash mine of the whole transaction;" and, having uttered these words, he left his seat and the room.

"In that case, gentlemen," said the Director, "this meeting is dissolved. I wish you all good morning."

And having uttered these words, the celebrated Mr. Bubbel limped out of the room, hastened to his cabriolet which was waiting for him at the street-door, and proceeded to Radley's Hotel, where he ordered an excellent dinner, to which he had already invited two or three of his fashionable friends. Amongst these was Melville, who cared but little for the loss of a few hundred pounds which he had sustained in the British and Foreign Equitable Lucifer-Match Joint-Stock Company; and who forgot all the sage observations made to him in the morning by Mr. Thornton. He returned home at a very late hour, in a dreadful state of intoxication, and found Mr. Tibbatts awaiting his return in his study.

(To be continued.)

TEMPERANCE VERSUS INTEMPERANCE.

ARTICLE THE FIRST.

"Observe
The rule of not too much, by temperance taught."
MILTON.

TEMPERANCE is a bridle of gold; and he who never allows it to fall from his hand, "is more like a God than a man;" for, having made the human beast a man again, it contributes to heighten humanity into divinity.

In imagination I lately visited an Association of persons who, beginning to awake to the evils of intemperance, and resolved to forsake it, had assembled to devise expedients for aiding and confirming themselves in their good intentions. So true is it that we no sooner form a sincere resolution of amendment, than the beneficent God comes more than half way to our aid, that the company, on coming together, found the place of their meeting pre-occupied, and almost filled with preternatural incentives and encouragements to persevere.

These consisted, principally, of venerable personages of all ranks and times, who received them with looks of cheering complacency; and who, on uttering a sentence of caution or encouragement, slowly and successively withdrew. Many of the sentences so uttered I distinctly remembered to have read; and am convinced, from various circumstances which then transpired, that those who uttered them were their original and veritable authors, who, being dead, were thus allowed to speak.

The first, an eminently venerable man, placing his finger on a page of a book which he carried, read a passage which I recognised as Genesis ix. 20, &c.; and as he read, tears of penitence and looks of compunction, marked his patriarchal face. On the head of the next was the "likeness of a kingly crown;" and as he departed he pronounced, emphatically, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise." A train of ruddy and athletic men next walked forth, the personifications of health, followed by a majestic person wearing the prophetic vestments, who said to them, with an air of divine authority, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts the God of Israel, Because ye have obeyed the command of your father, not to drink any strong drink, therefore shall ye never want a man to stand before me for ever." Two others then departed in company; and as they went one of them said, in a tone of benignant entreaty, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess." And the other instantly added, "For the drunkard shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Next went an aged man with his son, and pointing at him with delight, exclaimed, "This my son was dead and is alive again, he was lost and is found; rejoice with me." And the son knelt to receive his blessing.

Of those that followed, most of them, instead of speaking, deposited a paper on the table, which was immediately opened and read by one or other of the company. The first was, Ebrii gignunt ebrios, and signed "Plutarch;" this the reader interpreted as, "one drunkard begets another." The next bore the subscription of "Tully," which, translated, is as follows:—"Better be a temperate old man than a free-living youth." The philosophers were followed by a train of kings and nobles, represented by a patrician of Venice, who laid on the table a book on the art of prolonging life, by Lewis Cornaro. These were succeeded by the poets, in whose name Shakspeare exclaimed,

"Ask God for temperance, that's the appliance only Which your disease requires."

To which Milton added, with the sonorous voice of an organ,

"Observe
The rule of not too much, by temperance taught,
In what thou eat'st and drink'st, seeking from thence Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight."

Statesmen, moralists, and preachers next disappeared, each depositing on the table, as he passed, some memento or sentence to the same effect as those which had preceded them. One of these was evidently by Camden, and stated that "the English, which, of all the northern nations, had been least drinkers, and most commended for their sobriety, learned, by the Netherland wars, to drown themselves with immoderate drinking; and by drinking to others' healths, to impair their own;" leaving it to be inferred that, as the poisonous habit is not indigenous, but exotic, it may yet be eradicated. Another was subscribed by the venerable name of "Hale," and ran thus,—"If ever you expect to have a sound body, as well as a sound mind, carefully avoid intemperance. The most temperate and sober persons are subject to sickness and diseases, but the intemperate can never be long without them." A third bore the name of "Cecil, Lord Burghley," and contained the following:—"Banish swinish drunkenness out of thine house, which is a vice impairing health, consuming much, and makes no show. I never heard praise ascribed to the drunkard, but for the well-bearing of his drink; which is a better commendation for a brewer's horse or a drayman, than for either a gentleman or a serving-man." "Temperance," said another, "that virtue without pride, and fortune without envy, gives ease of body and tranquillity of mind,—the best guardian of youth, and support of old age." And to this was appended the name of "Temple."

But to proceed with the account of the incidents which took place after the reading of these and many similar sentences was ended: the venerable assemblage having nearly all departed, the association now remarked, for the first time, that the walls of their room exhibited a number of devices relating to the subject under their consideration. On one side appeared the brutal bacchanalian orgies; on another, the drunken broil between the Centaurs and the Lapithæ: here, Alexander, in the frenzy of intoxication, rushing on his friend Clytus; and there, a squalid wretch dragged away by Disease and Remorse from a family perishing with want through his drunken habits. In one place, the apologue of the demon offering to his victim the choice of three sins, and smiling at his choice of drunkenness, well knowing that, when drunk, he would be ready to commit the other two; and in another, a body in a state of spontaneous combustion; whilst the whole of the upper part of the room was occupied by a representation of Temperance enthroned, crowned by a hand from the clouds, and surrounded and supported by groupes of happy faces, denoting health, plenty, hope, honour, and religion.

(To be continued.)

TEETOTALISM IN ITS EFFECTS.

TRUTH has always met with its opponents, and absurdities of every kind have been raked up, for the purpose of ridiculing its adherents and supporters:—but the fire kindled at the altar of truth, burns higher and brighter still by raking, even though the stirring be by the hand of an enemy; still the flame ascends; the hand of him who would put it out is burnt by it; and all endeavours to quench it are in vain. Thus has it been, and thus it is, with Teetotalism. Fire from heaven has lit the flame on the altar of philanthropy and christianity;—interest cannot quench it;—surrounded by enemies on every side, who strive not a little to pull down the altar and put out its fire, yet it burns "higher still, and higher." The victim is placed on the altar. Drunkenness has consumed its thousands;—Alcohol, the giant demon, has had an altar died in blood, watered by widows' tears,—unmoved has listened to orphans' wails, to moralists' cold remonstrances; and has rejoiced in his work, of destruction. His day is past; he has consumed, but he is now himself consuming on the altar of Truth;—every ear shall hear the exulting shout of millions of his redeemed slaves, who stand around the altar;—the ear that has been deaf to the shout must now listen to the fervent thanksgiving;—the eye that blinded itself to the giant strides of the great moral reformation can no longer remain closed; it opens on a sight it would fain never have seen; it can now discern the truth it never wished to know, that alcohol is tottering on his legs, that his fall is inevitable; and publicans gaze

"And turn in horror from 'that sight.'"

Glad news! how many a heart beats with delight at the joyful intelligence, that the energies of more than five millions of Teetotalers are employed in wiping away Britain's foulest spot—driving from her shores her greatest curse. It is no visionary scheme, yet to be begun; it is doing, operating, and every day brings near the glorious much-to-be-desired end. The opponents of Teetotalism attempted to reason, but Reason was not found on their side; now, no absurdity is too great for them in their unholy warfare. But the fight is nearly ended; we have wrested from them all their weapons, and employed them for their own destruction: ridicule is the only missile they have left; and this is so contemptible, and harmless, that the Teetotaler would be unwilling to deprive them of it, since its bungling attempts serve only to cause the hearty laugh at the fireside of many a Teetotaler. True, the press, the public journals, (in which line, be it remembered, the "Licensed Victuallers" have a property,) still cry loudly against us; but it is as a man standing on the sea-shore in a storm, and raising his voice against the roaring of the elements; and when we consider who are the opponents of Teetotalism, generally, we have a soothing thought in the reflection, that "to be dispraised of some is no small praise."

But I would speak not only of general effort, or the general enthusiastic joy. Could you but hear the tale of every reformed drunkard in our land, or look into the home of every Teetotaler, what a voice would they utter! How would they bear witness to the individual benefit Teetotalism had conferred on them. For some years I knew a man, a blacksmith by trade, and father of a large family, whose habits of intemperance had rendered him the nuisance of his neighbours, and his family's curse. The father—whose example and whose precept should have been the guide of his children's youth, whose return at the close of day should have been welcomed by the wife's cheerful smile, the children's joyful shout, and the homely supper—had become hateful in his children's eyes—a curse to himself and family; his return was looked forward to with heavy heart, as it brought neither peace, comfort, nor supper; but one, who in a state of filthy, brutal intoxication had lost alike the feelings of a parent and a man—rolling into his dirty hovel, striking her whom he had promised "to love and to cherish," cursing those young innocents on whose head he should have prayed only for blessings, making a hell at home, (if by that sweet name his wretched hut could be called,) a hell in his own breast, and daily hastening on to a hell which would be his portion for ever! I saw it myself, a truly wretched scene—I shuddered as I gazed on it; I shudder as I think of it now.

Such was the man who one evening presented himself to sign the pledge of our society at B—, in Oxfordshire. I feared—I felt confident he would never keep it—yet he did; and oh! how does he rejoice in it now! He is one of the most active members of the society. See his home now—it is worthy of the endearing name of home; it is all the Englishman's home should be; and his wife herself told me that she desired no comfort which she had not got. His children are well clothed, and well fed, and educated in the British school. This is not all: the husband is an ornament to a religious community, whereas five years ago he was a disgrace to the name of man. This I have seen; but the description I have given will serve as one for thousands of such instances. Search for yourselves, you will find it so.

Teetotalers! ye have put your hand to the plough; look not back! Onward—ever onward; there is much ground yet to be possessed—ye have done much: let your success encourage you to do more; you cannot labour in vain—the end must be accomplished—let your united voices reply, "It shall!" Tens of thousands are wishing you "God speed;" drunkenness is fleeing from before you; do not give him time to rally. There is work for every Teetotaler in his or her sphere: let each one work "while it is called to-day;" "what thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," and God help you. "Be not weary in well doing."

G. B. B.

Newport Pagnell.

THE TEETOTALISM OF THE TURKS.

WE extract the following sketch of the rise, glory, and decline of the Ottoman empire from "THE ANATOMY OF INTemperance; OR, A KEY TO TEETOTALISM,"—a new work now publishing in weekly Numbers, at 3d. each, and monthly Parts, at 1s. each:—

The Ottoman empire dates from the commencement of the thirteenth century of the Christian era, or from the eighth of the Hegira: but the history of the ancestors of Osman, its founder, commences about a century before that period. His grandfather, Solyman-Shah, settled in Armenia, at the head of fifty thousand souls, in the year 1224, A.D. (621. A.H.); and his death led to the dispersion of the tribe. Ertoghul, one of his sons, at the head of only four hundred families, proceeded to the vast plains which are situated on the eastern side of Erzerum. During this march Ertoghul came up with two armies that were engaged in close combat; and he determined upon lending his assistance to the weaker side. The belligerents were the Tartar Moguls, and the Seljuks. The latter were enabled to defeat their enemies, through the timely aid of Ertoghul; and Aladdin, sovereign of the victors, bestowed certain lands, on condition of fiefal tenure, on the chieftain who had so opportunely appeared as his auxiliary. Ertoghul soon made himself master of the adjacent castle of Karadjahissar, which belonged to the Greeks of Byzantium; and, at his death, his son Osman succeeded to these possessions. Upon this slender fabric was raised the fabric of Ottoman grandeur; and in a few years after the death of the Sultan Aladdin, the ambitious Osman raised the trophies of his dominion and glory upon the ruins of the Seljuk empire.

It is said that Osman foresaw all the future puissance of his nation in the following manner. He was staying with a venerable Sheikh, of the name of Erdebali, of whose daughter Malkhatoun he was deeply enamoured, when he one night dreamt that the moon, which suddenly increased to a vast magnitude, issued from the breast of Erdebali, and hastened to conceal itself in his own. He then thought that a tree sprung from his loins; and this tree, which rapidly increased in beauty and size, covered with the shade of its boughs, the lands and seas, as far as the horizon, of three parts of the world. Beneath this tree were Mounts Caucasus, Atlas, Taurus, and Hæmus, which seemed to be four columns supporting that immense canopy of foliage. From the roots of the tree flowed the river Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Danube, all covered with ships like the surface of the ocean. The fields were filled with abundant harvests, and the hills crowned with thick forests, whence emanated delicious springs which meandered amongst woods and groves of rose-trees and of cyprus. In the valleys, far as the eye could reach, were cities ornamented with domes, cupolas, pyramids, obelisks, columns, and magnificent towers, upon all of which glittered the crescent; and around those towers were the galleries whence emanated the voices of muezzins calling the Faithful to prayer. The leaves of the vast tree were elongated in the form of sabres; and suddenly a violent hurricane turned the points of those weapons towards the principal cities of the European continent, but especially towards Constantinople. This city, which is situated at the point of junction of two seas, and two continents, resembled a diamond set between two sapphires and two emeralds, and thus appeared to form the precious stone of a vast ring, the circumference of which embraced the world. Osman was about to place this ring upon his finger—when he awoke!

And this dream was fulfilled. Osman taught his followers to obey that law of the Prophet which interdicted the use of inebriating drink; and thus their moral and physical energies remained unimpaired and fitted to work out grand aims. The Greeks were enervated with the luxuries of the period, and the scimitar was found a more successful weapon than the cross-handled sword of the Christians. The soldiers of Osman followed the patriarchal habits of frugality which rendered them hardy and invincible in war; and the undisciplined squadrons of barbarian Turks, whose only drink was water, foiled in every direction the well-trained warriors of the Grecian phalanx. Osman was succeeded by a long line of sultans who punished with death the infraction of that law of the Prophet which forbids the use of wine; and the empire increased in grandeur and importance with a rapidity which alarmed the remainder of the known world. The iron-clad chieftains of Europe were successively routed by the sturdy Musselmans; the flower of Austrian chivalry fell upon the battle-plain, in its vain attempts to resist the progress of the Ottomans.

For some time the Byzantine empire had tottered towards a certain and speedy fall. It changed but little from the fifth to the twelfth centuries, and progressively languished more and more, in the incessant series of revolutions by which it was harassed. Its frail and convulsive existence vegetated in a perpetual crisis, the elements of which were conspiracies in the palace, the intrigues of patriarchs or eunuchs, a literary court, an ingenious and degraded people, a remnant of taste for the arts without genius to execute the promptings of that tendency, the invention of tactics without military valour, a political knowledge without energy and without success, and a love of dissipation and an addiction to wine which knew no bounds. The government was feebly carried on in the midst of a vain luxury and a laborious and sterile policy. Amidst the new societies which were forming at that epoch all over Europe, Constantinople existed as a fossil-remnant of the old world, with its Græco-Roman civilization, its imperial domesticity, and its old laws applied to new interests.

It was in the year 1453, that the Sultan Mahommed II. appeared beneath the walls of Constantinople at the head of two hundred and fifty thousand men. For upwards of a century that the Ottoman empire had now existed, the Greeks had been compelled to submit to the incessant inroads of their neighbours, whose European capital was Adrianople, and whose Asiatic metropolis was Brusa. Calculating upon the enervated condition of the Byzantines, and confident in the powers of his own forces, Mahommed II. determined to fix the chief standard of the Ottoman nation upon the palace of the successors of Constantine. The history of the siege is replete with the most interesting incidents; but our space does not permit us to enter into detail. Suffice it to say that the Mussulmans triumphed over the Greeks, and that Constantinople became the capital of the Ottoman empire, on the 29th of May, 1453.

From that moment the fortunes of the Ottomans progressed at a more rapid rate than they had even done before this conquest; and those hardy warriors, whose constant beverage was sherbet or water, even in the midst of the most arduous campaigns, acquired a dominion which far exceeded the greatest empire ever founded by mortal man before or since. In the reign of Solyman the Magnificent, the Ottoman empire extended from the northern frontiers of Transylvania to the southern cape of the Morea; it reached the Austrian and Venetian boundaries on the western side, and spread to the confines of Persia in the east; it included the northern states of Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Syria, and the islands of the Levant; and the emperor of Austria, and the republic of Venice, were fain to pay tribute as a condition of their safety. This grand empire was achieved in about two centuries, Solyman the Magnificent having ascended the throne in the year 1517. So long as the wise regulations, which repressed the use of intoxicating liquors, were maintained with despotic vigour, nothing could resist the valour of the Turks in the field of battle. But as the Ottoman empire attained to its highest pitch of glory in the time of Solyman I., so did it also imbibe the elements of decline in the same reign. Solyman changed the law, which punished with death the use of wine, into a fine of one asper for every glass that was drunk by a Mussulman; and he encouraged the introduction of the juices of the grape into the suburbs of the capital, where they were vended by Christian and Jewish merchants. From that moment, the Ottoman empire began to decline in its power and glory: the former energy of the Turks yielded to the enervating effects of a dissipation, which, though progressing only in private, still progressed with fearful rapidity; and this secret and hidden luxury destroyed those physical powers which had triumphed over superior discipline and skill, and impaired those intellects which demonstrated a capacity for the most difficult political combinations.

For upwards of a century after the death of Solyman I., the history of the Ottomans is little better than a perpetual succession of anarchy, revolutions, insurrections, and disasters. Sultans deposed and murdered—Grand Viziers chosen and executed—extortions on the part of the Janizzaries, cruelties on that of the sovereigns—and insubordination on the part of the Pachas of the empire—form the basis of the narrative of this interval. At length, Mahommed IV. determined upon entrusting the great seal of the empire to an individual who was strongly recommended to his highness by numerous partisans.

The call to prayer, "God is great!" echoed from the summit of every minaret in Constantinople, at the moment when Kœprilu-Mahommed received from the Sultan the dignity of Grand Vizier. The nomination of this individual gave universal dissatisfaction throughout the empire; for few foresaw the future greatness of this illustrious man, to whom it was reserved to revivify the fading lustre of the Ottoman star. But a short space of time was sufficient to demonstrate the talents and abilities of this statesman; and the progress of the Ottoman empire towards its fall was effectually arrested during his viziership. One of his first enactments was to suppress the licentiousness that had crept into the barracks of the troops, and into the private dwellings of the inhabitants of Constantinople; and, by promulgating an edict of severity against the use of wine, Kœprilu-Mahommed succeeded in restoring the people to the patriarchal simplicity of their former manners, and the abstemiousness of their ancient habits.

But Kœprilu-Mahommed died after having held the reins of the Ottoman empire for a period of only five years; and his son Kœprilu-Ahmed, although he partially sustained the glory of the empire, still gave an unbridled license to the pursuits of pleasure and dissipation. It is true that Kœprilu-Ahmed won many grand battles, and that to him the Ottoman coronet of laurels was indebted for many an additional wreath of the ever-green emblem of glory. But it is also true that the nation relapsed into a habit of dissipation which was more or less encouraged by the example of this great warrior; and, at his death, the increased ostentation displayed by Kara Mustapha-Pacha, his successor, and the luxury practised by this ambitious and dissipated man, led to all the disasters which resulted from the failure of the siege of Vienna, and to the rapid decline of the Ottoman empire from that period. It was at the head of two hundred and twenty thousand men that Kara Mustapha encamped beneath the walls of Vienna, on the 14th of July, 1683. Had not the Grand Vizier permitted the most enervating dissipation to prevail throughout his army, he might have made himself master of the Austrian capital. But he allowed time for the Poles and Germans to march against him; and on the 12th of September, King Sobieski attacked the mighty armament of Ottomans at all points. The Christians had passed the preceding night in prayer—the Mussulmans in dissipation. The battle was long and bloody; but at seven o'clock in the evening Vienna was delivered. As soon as the sun had set, Sobieski sat down in the captured tent of the Grand Vizier, as he had done in the morning on the mountain of the Calenberg, to address a letter to the queen, the only joy of his heart, the charming and well-beloved Mariette. In this letter he said to her,—"I have not as yet seen all the booty; but it far exceeds that which we acquired at Chocim; four or five quivers, ornamented with rubies and sapphires, are alone worth thousands of ducats. Thou shalt not say to me, my love, that which the Tartar women say to their husbands when they return empty-handed from the battle,—Thou art not a warrior, because thou hast brought no trophy of thy valour!" It is impossible for me to give thee an idea of the refined luxury which reigns in the tents of the Grand Vizier: there are baths, little gardens, fountains, aviaries, and the most delicious wines preserved in ice."

Thus was it that Vienna was delivered; and the destructive flood of Ottoman power, which had already, in the reign of Solyman I., a hundred and fifty-four years previously, dashed its billows against the walls of the Austrian capital, as against the defensive rampart of Christianity opposed to the barbarism of the east,—after having now presented itself in a more menacing and impetuous form than ever, disappeared—never to return.

From this period the history of the Ottoman empire down to the present day is merely a continued series of disasters and defeats, with an occasional exception, when the glory of the Turks again recovered an evanescent lustre. The Austrians gradually reconquered all the provinces and strongholds on the north of the Danube; and the Persians regained possession of their lands which had been wrested from them by their victorious neighbours. We shall not enter into farther detail respecting the fates of the Ottomans: suffice it to say that the introduction of habits of dissipation into their domestic privacy became the signal for their decline; and thus within a period of four centuries, did this gigantic power present to the view the three distinct phases of progressive might, the height of power, and the rapidity of decay. The Ottoman empire is a colossus which extends its powerful arms over Asia and Europe at the same time; and when the hour for its fall shall arrive, according to the common destiny of all empires, it will cover three parts of the world with its ruins.

THE AGED SOLDIER.

SLOWLY he pursued his way to dispose of the last remnant of his property, which the long sickness of his aged companion, the wife of his bosom, constrained him to part with to add to her comfort. It would leave him without a farthing, dependent upon the charity of the world for support. He seemed lost in thought; and though the busy crowds with hasty steps passed and repassed he heeded them not. His brow wore the gloom of care; and the rigid expression of his features bore ample evidence of the agony within. His thin grey locks, attenuated and scanty dress, and feeble steps, attracted no attention from the happy throngs who, boasting of their liberty and independence, gaily pursued their own career, unheeding the aged soldier whose valour won those blessings. Liberty and independence were the watchwords of his youth; and as the sounds met his ear, a gleam of native fire from his eyes, and his lips essayed to speak, but the remembrance of unrequited suffering choked his utterance. He glanced at his wounds—a shudder ran through his frame, and he groaned aloud at his country's ingratitude. The paroxysm was soon past; it was but the repetition of many such an heroic martyr's spirit, which prompted him in early life to brave both battle-field and halter, was called again to rouse his sunken spirits. Just then the antic gambols of a passing troop of school-boys presented to his mind a faithful picture of happy security. "No," exclaimed the grey-haired veteran with exultation, "I have not fought, I do not live in vain; and though now neglected, perhaps despised, posterity will yet do justice to the soldier of the revolution."

Years rolled on, and the long-delayed compensation for toil and suffering was ultimately granted. Again I saw the veteran soldier: he was seated in the porch of a neat little cottage, situated in the midst of a highly-cultivated garden, recounting to his grand-children the deeds of the revolution, and praising with lively ardour the virtues of the great and good Lafayette. Content and happiness burned in his countenance; and as he mentioned the object of his early toil,—the completion of our independence, and the unrivalled prosperity to which our nation had arrived—tears fast flowed down the channels of his deeply-furrowed cheeks. They were tears of gratitude, that the soldier's services were at last required, and the evening of his days made happy by the justice of his government.—American Periodical.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to inform L. M. D. that we neither know nor care whether the imputation against a certain individual, relative to the silver forks or spoons, be true or false.

We shall always be glad to hear from our esteemed correspondent, Mr. CROOK.

We deeply regret that we have it not in our power to oblige F. W. S. F. we think those are the initials; but we sincerely deplore his situation. We should have replied to his two letters sooner, but take each communication in its due rotation, and answer at leisure.

J. V. H.'s clever letter shall appear next week. Extracts from Mr. BENSTADT'S Lecture will also be given in our next.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 10, 1840.

THE clergy of the church of England has not only set its face against the propagation of the doctrines of Teetotalism, but many of its members have openly come forward to oppose them. Now, if Teetotalism be not all that its disciples suppose, it is at least more right than wrong, because it preaches abstinence from a vice instead of adherence to it. Consequently, even admitting it to be at best but a measure in whose favour we can say nothing more than that "it is more right than wrong," and "something better than merely innocent,"—even, on these grounds, should Teetotalism have found supporters amongst the professed ministers of the gospel.

But when we know and prove that Teetotalism is one of the greatest blessings ever introduced into the constitutional statute-book of society,—when we reflect upon the infinite good it is calculated to work, by redeeming the lost daughter of crime from the paths of that prostitution into which intemperance first plunged her, and by reclaiming the miserable drunkard, whose vices have entailed nakedness and starvation upon his family,—when we contemplate the beneficial effects of education which will be obtained through the means of this new doctrine,—and when we turn towards the crowds of mechanics and artizans, who repair to the altar of God on the Sabbath day, instead of to the gin-palace;—oh! it is then that we feel convinced that Teetotalism is even something more than "a mere innocent doctrine,"—and something more than "a principle which is rather on the right side than on the wrong!"

Clergymen of the church of England! the doctrines of Teetotalism have dried the tears of the long-miserable wife, and have given bread to children who were once pale and emaciated with starvation;—the principles of total abstinence have turned men away from the paths which lead to the ale-house, and taught them to pursue those that conduct their steps to the shrine of the ALMIGHTY;—the new system of philanthropy has penetrated even to the soul, and wrung the heart of the lost girl upon the public streets;—and this same doctrine of Teetotalism has made sons respect their venerable fathers—and daughters love their aged mothers—and fathers fondle their innocent children—and mothers take pride in the offspring that was once neglected—and friends respect the rites of brotherhood and good-fellowship. Yes—clergymen of the church of England! Teetotalism has done all this;—and the advocates of its doctrines are not designing, nor interested, nor selfish men;—nor do the principles themselves militate against the pure inspirations of the gospel. Why, then, do ye refuse to enlist yourselves beneath the banners of so glorious a cause? and why do you come forward to oppose us? Are you ignorant of the nature of our doctrines? if so—come and be initiated in them; for they are plain—rational—and founded upon the most simple rules of common sense? Are you too proud to unite with the working classes in propagating so great a principle? If so, you are wrong, because that same principle has raised them to a higher elevation than even that on which ye stand, while ye oppose us? Or are you influenced by sheer wickedness, and by an aversion to abandon a habit which you contracted at the Universities in your youth, and which has grown upon you with your ripening years?

Clergymen of the church of England! my soul is exceeding sorrowful for you; for full well do your motives appear to be based upon sheer wickedness!

As ministers of the gospel, ye should have been the first to embrace the great doctrine which makes men better; and ye are not contented with remaining passive,—ye even oppose that doctrine! Ye should have come forward to support a principle which will make your ministry the more easy, and which will teach men to respect the scriptures that ye uphold;—and yet you wilfully stand in the way of moral improvement and social regeneration. Ye should have been the first to set an example of self-denial to your flocks;—and ye are the last! Ye should have acted up to the doctrines which ye preach, and have shown the world that ye are really the disciples of the lowly and the humble-minded Jesus;—and ye cling with avidity to your luxurious dishes, and your rich red wines! Ye should discountenance hypocrisy;—and ye are the veriest hypocrites upon the face of the earth. Ye should exert yourselves to maintain the dignity of religion;—and ye bring it into contempt. Ye know that your fraternity is as proverbial for hypocrisy, dissimulation, and licentiousness, as that of the civic body of London is for gluttony;—all this ye know, and ye will not seek to retrieve your characters by a self-denial which your degraded natures and narrow-mindedness dare not contemplate! Clergymen of the church of England! the Christian religion will find more staunch and able supporters in the advocates of Teetotalism, than in all your ostentatious and pompous preaching!

The mitred bishops, intolerant, gluttonous, dissipated, proud, illiberal, and vain—the portly rector, who makes a speculation of the Christian church, and employs some miserable curate to perform that duty for eighty pounds per annum, for which he obtains a salary of thousands—and all the dissipated embryo priests, who make the cloistered halls of the Universities of Cambridge and of Oxford echo to the noise of their lewd songs, ribald discourse, and drunken revels;—all these are the opponents to the doctrines of Teetotalism; and, all bishops, rectors, and graduates as they are—they are not worthy to shake by the hand one of the humble artizans or lowly-minded mechanics who inculcate the sublime lessons of total abstinence from the platforms of temperance meetings!

There are a few noble exceptions to the general rule, relative to the malignant opposition of the clergymen of the Church of England to the doctrines of Teetotalism. But we are now speaking upon the broad basis of the general rule; and, in so doing, by implication, we eulogize and extol those few glorious exceptions! And again, let us award the due meed of praise to those dissenting ministers who have come forward in crowds to join the apostles of total abstinence from intoxicating poisons; and let us compliment these preachers of the gospel upon a line of conduct which ought to bring to shame the licensed vicars of the established church. The dissenting ministers are for the most part inclined to further the good cause, because their morals have not been ruined in early youth by an abominably vicious education; and the clergymen of the established church are opposed to Teetotalism, because they do not choose to resign an indulgence which they imbibed at the infernal hot-beds of every crime, vice, and degrading characteristic—the Universities!

THE PASTOR'S PLEDGE.

WE have before stated that we should extract from this very clever little work, by the REV. W. ROAF; and we now hasten to fulfil our promise:—

The practice of total abstinence from wines was enjoined upon all persons seeking eminence in the service of God.

The Nazarites, among others, were entirely to abstain from all the fruits of the vine, lest they should become bodily or mentally unfit for their functions. And lest they should mistake fermented for unfermented liquor, lest they should be deceived by any wicked characters, envious of their sanctity, and employed by Satan, they were on no account to touch anything that came from the grape. Thus was it with the Nazarites, of which Paul was one. They were peculiarly devoted to God, and were to abstain entirely; as, if they touched the grape, it might excite a desire for its fermented and drugged juice. The Rechabites abstained, and the blessing of the skies clearly followed that remarkable people for several centuries. True, they were rewarded for their obedience to their father; but we ask, whether the father's command was not well pleasing to God? At the Passover, every fermented substance was to be laid aside, a caution most scrupulously observed by the Jews at the present day. To make "assurance doubly sure," they manufacture a wine from dried grapes for the occasion, at least when fresh fruit cannot be obtained; and we know that the syrup, even in these times, is often preserved in jars under ground, for many months. Similar to this, we believe, was the wine our Lord used; and which was much inferior to the new wine made from fresh grapes. Hence, he says, with inimitable beauty, "I will no more drink of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom;" signifying by the difference of old and new grapes, the difference between the church below and the church above: had the wine on that sacred occasion been fermented, the figure would have had neither point nor beauty, as the older it is the better. At Cana, the Redeemer wrought a miracle, by converting pure water into wine to supply the assembled guests. But it is impossible to suppose, that he who was to fulfil all righteousness, to combine in his own person, and perfect in his own example, the triple character of prophet, priest, and king, would have begun to manifest his glory by creating an intoxicating liquor; when total abstinence from such liquors was almost the only thing in which those three offices agreed. Is it credible, that he, whose disciples were to abstain from all appearance of evil, and to be a peculiar people, would sanction the use of an article destructive to the souls for whom he was about to die?

The injunction of total abstinence is laid on Christian bishops by St. Paul in his epistles—thus they correspond with the servants of God mentioned by Ezekiel, and with all who wish to be sanctified when they draw near to him. In these restrictions God has wisely consulted our two-fold natures. His service requires the full efforts of both; and both would be impaired by the use of strong or fermented liquids. Hence, those holy women, who were to bring illustrious characters, such as Samuel, Samson, and John, into the world, were to avoid all these drinks. God employs the right means for his purposes; and in the present day, by numerous attested facts it is proved, that the offspring of intoxicated persons are much more diseased, weak, and depraved, than those of total abstinents. Oh! how I wish the saints of the Most High would, both in their separate and collective characters, follow in the glorious train of the eminent departed ones: and especially at the holy communion of the body and blood of Christ, I wish they would use unfermented wine.

FRENCH POPULAR AIRS.

NO. I.—THE VETERAN CORPORAL.*

Translated from the French of De Berenger.

FORWARD, brave comrades, in full many a fight,
Your muskets charg'd—those arms prepar'd to kill
The tears you shed around me yester-night,
I almost feel upon my forehead still.
When peace incentive urg'd me to retire
From busy scenes of tumult and of war,
Fool that I was to fancy that the fire
Of glory still might be my leading star!
Slow be thy solemn pace—
Nor weep thy comrade's doom;
For short is now the space
Between him and the tomb!

Struck by a stripling, deck'd with misus'd power,
My sword alone could vindicate the blow:
Such was the crime that thus advanc'd the hour,
When as meet penalty my blood must flow!
At Austerlitz and Arcole have I bled—
'Twas mine the snows of Muscovy to brave;
And now an angry moment that has fled,
With stern decree, condemns me to the grave!
Slow be thy, &c. &c. &c.

Soldiers! would ye against the cross I wear
Exchange a limb?—Yet, in the bloody fray,
When monarchs fled before our armies—there
I won that cross which is your mark to-day.
Full oft at eve the hist'ry of each fight
Has chang'd the hours to minutes, as we sat
Around the board on which the wine was bright:—
Alas! that glory's stamp'd my present fate!
Slow be thy, &c. &c. &c.

And there is one among ye who knows well
My native village. Thither let him hie,
Henceforth in blest tranquillity to dwell,
Nor seek those paths that haste the hour to die.
In early youth, amidst my father's lands,
Devoid of care, 'twas mine to rove at will,
Or pluck th' inviting fruits with eager hands:—
Alas! a tender mother loves me still
Slow be thy, &c. &c. &c.

Whose mourning voice my fate seems to deplore?
It is the widow of my comrade slain!
From Russian snows her infant child I bore,
Tended it night and day, and soothed her pain.
Else had they perish'd in that cheerless land—
For none was found to succour them but I:—
And now, with suppliant voice and uprais'd hand,
She prays to heav'n to bless me ere I die.
Slow be thy, &c. &c. &c.

Let not th' accursed bandage stop my view:
The warrior may not shrink—though face to face;
He find himself with Death!—My friends, adieu—
We enter now upon the destin'd place!
Mark well your aim—be sure to let your eye
Rest on the glittering cross in battle won.
Once more, adieu—and may the Lord on high
To every mother safe restore her son!
Slow be thy solemn pace—
Nor weep thy comrade's doom;
For short is now the space
Between him and the tomb!

DISEASES BROUGHT ON BY DRINKING.

APROPLEXY is the name applied to a disease which occurs very suddenly, as if a blow had been inflicted upon the head, and deprives a person of consciousness and voluntary motion, while the respiration and action of the heart continue, although much oppressed. In a complete apoplexy, the person falls suddenly, is unable to move his limbs or to speak, gives no proof of seeing, hearing, or feeling, and the breath is stentorian or snoring, like that of a person in deep sleep. In a case less intense, the symptoms are more moderate. Consciousness sometimes remains in part; some power of motion is retained upon one side, or in some parts at least; the speech is not entirely lost, but is only an unintelligible muttering of incoherent words. The immediate cause of this disease is an affection or injury of the brain, or of some portion of it; and it is most commonly produced by a fulness of blood in the head, either remaining in the blood-vessels, or poured out in or upon the brain, from their rupture in some part, and in sufficient quantity to exert considerable pressure upon that organ. As the state of the whole body depends much upon the sound condition of the brain and nerves, it is evident that such an unnatural state of these organs cannot continue long without danger to life. Genuine complete apoplexy is decidedly produced by the pressure of blood (whether extravasated or not) upon the brain. This arises from the destruction of the equilibrium or balance of the circulation by various causes, by which an unnatural quantity of blood is forced into an otherwise healthy brain, or the brain and its vessels so weakened, that they are unable to sustain the pressure of the usual quantity of blood. Some of these causes operate directly upon the brain, as strong passions, hard study, exhaustion from fatigue, &c.; others, indirectly, through the medium of the stomach, as when this disease is produced by indigestible food. But of all the most dreadful causes of apoplexy,—of all the evils calculated to produce the horror of a sudden and dreadful death,—the most certain and frequent is the use of intoxicating liquors.

* The subject of this air is the Veteran Corporal's address to his comrades, as they led him forth to the place of military execution.

PARALYSIS is characterised by an abolition or suppression of voluntary power, or of sensation—sometimes of both, and preceded sometimes by numbness and sense of weight in the head, or vertiginous affection; sometimes a sense of weeping, or numbness, precedes the full attack, and occasionally there is a twitching or catching of the member affected. It has been supposed that, when paralysis is thus ushered in by nervous feelings, such as those just mentioned, the disease is then in some portion of the nervous system unconnected with the brain; but, when it occurs suddenly, or without these precursors, that then the effect has been brought about by some prior condition of the central system. This is the more general principle of the malady; and nothing is more calculated to dispose the nervous system to the susceptibility of palsy than the use of intoxicating liquors.

ANOREXIA, or indigestion, may be caused by either excess or abstinence in the use of solid food. An over-distention of the stomach, especially by fluids, considerably injures its proper tone; and long fasting renders the stomach feeble by inducing a bad quality in the juices secreted. Nothing, however, tends to promote indigestion so much as the use of intoxicating liquors.

DROPSY is a preternatural collection of serous or watery fluid in the cellular substance, or different cavities of the body. It receives different appellations according to the particular situation of the fluids, either in the cellular membrane, the cavity of the cranium, the chest, the abdomen, the uterus, or the scrotum. It is produced by frequent salivations, preceding diseases of great virulence, the sudden striking in of eruptive humours, ossification of the valves of the heart, aneurism in the arteries, tropical weakness, exposure for a length of time to a moist atmosphere, but chiefly to the use of intoxicating liquors.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION is attributed to spirituous liquors, which, being continually in contact with the stomach, and penetrating through the tissues, become absorbed to such an extent, that the approach of an inflamed body, in most cases, is sufficient to cause combustion. A spirituous smell is invariably observed in the bodies of those persons who die from indulging too freely in the use of alcoholic liquors. From a paper read some time ago at the Royal Academy of Medicine in Paris, by M. Julia Fontenelle, it appears, first, that those who have died of spontaneous combustion, have always indulged to excess in alcoholic liquors; secondly, that this combustion is not always general, but sometimes partial; thirdly, that it is rare in men, and that the women in whom it has occurred were of all ages; fourthly, that the body and entrails have constantly been burned, whilst the feet, hands, and top of the cranium have been very frequently preserved from combustion; fifthly, that it is not necessary for the presence of an inflammable body for the development of spontaneous human combustion; sixthly, that water, instead of extinguishing the flame, appears to give it more activity, and, when the flame disappears, the internal combustion continues; seventhly, that these combustions take place more frequently in winter than in summer; eighthly, that those in whom this phenomenon occurs, experience an intense internal heat; and, ninthly, that combustion develops itself suddenly, and consumes the body in a few hours. This is one of the most horrible of all the afflictions brought about by the use of intoxicating liquors.

The minor diseases produced by the same cause are almost innumerable; but amongst the most prominent may be quoted sickness at the stomach, obstruction of the liver, headache, nervousness, and vomitings. MADNESS is one of the most terrible fruits of the same production, but accursed tree, the deadly shade of which has been so long spread over the earth! Is it not rational, then, as well as humane for the rotaries of Teetotalism to advocate a total abstinence from those infernal poisons which produce such terrible results? or shall we suffer mankind to languish in affliction and misery of every species, without pointing out the way to salvation?

THE DEADLY VENGEANCE.

WE have been induced to translate the following extract from a powerful tale by H. DE BAZZAC, a celebrated French writer, in consequence of the wild originality which marks it:—

The chamber which Madame de Merret occupied, at the Breteche, was situated in the rez-de-chaussée. A small cabinet, of about four feet in depth, hollowed out from its massive wall, served as her wardrobe. Three months previous to the evening whose adventure I am about to relate, Madame de Merret had been so seriously indisposed that her husband had selected a separate chamber, on the first floor, which he still continued to occupy. By one of those mere accidents against which foresight cannot provide he returned home, on the evening in question, two hours later than was his custom, from the circle in which he ordinarily sought the journals and political gossip with his provincial neighbours. His wife believes him to have been long since returned,—in bed, and asleep, but the invasion of France had been the subject of an animated discussion,—the match at billiards had been a warm one. For some time past, M. de Merret had contented himself with asking Rosalie if his wife had retired to bed; and, on her reply, generally in the affirmative, had gone immediately to his own room. This night, however, the fancy took him, on his return home, to present himself in the chamber of his wife,—for the purpose, perhaps, of relating to her the story of his loss at billiards; and instead of calling Rosalie as usual, he went straight to the door of her apartment,—lighted by the lamp which he placed on the first step of the staircase that led to his own room. His tread, easily recognisable, echoed along the arched corridor. At the moment in which the Count turned the key of his wife's chamber, it appeared to him that he heard the door of the little cabinet closed; but, when he entered, Madame de Merret was alone, standing before the chimney. The husband innocently concluded, within himself, that Rosalie was in the closet, but at the same time, a suspicion, faint and uncertain as the ringing of bells in the air, arose within his mind. He looked steadfastly at his wife, and fancied he discovered a sort of trouble in her eyes.

"You return late to night," said she; and her voice habitually so sweet and clear, was slightly broken and tremulous. M. de Merret did not answer, for at this moment Rosalie entered—not from the cabinet—and her appearance was like a thunder-stroke to the Count. He walked about the chamber, passing from one window to the other, with measured motion and folded arms.

"Have you learnt any ill-tidings, or are you unwell?" timidly asked his wife, while Rosalie proceeded to undress her. The Count made no answer.

"Leave me," said Madame de Merret to her femme de chambre. "I will arrange my hair myself."

When Rosalie was gone—or believed to be gone, for she remained some minutes in the corridor, M. de Merret placed himself in front of his wife, and said coldly,—

"Madame, there is some one in your closet."

The Countess looked in her husband's face with a calm air, and with perfect simplicity.

"No, Monsieur."

That "no," agitated M. de Merret,—he did not believe it, yet never had his wife looked more religious and pure than at that moment. He rose, and moved forward to open the door of the cabinet; when his wife took his hand, and stopped him, and looking on him with an air of deep melancholy, she said, with a voice of singular emotion:—

"If you find no one in that closet, remember that all will be at an end with you and me!"

The sad and perfect dignity expressed in the attitude of his wife restored to the Count his profound esteem for her, and inspired him with one of those resolutions to which there wants but a vaster theatre to make them immortal.

"No, Josephine," he said, "I will not go, whatever might be the issue: I feel that we should be forever separated. Hear me! I know all the purity of your mind; I know that you lead a holy life; I feel that you would not commit a mortal sin, at the expense of life."

"Here," he continued, "is your crucifix; swear to me, before God, that there is no one in that cabinet. I will believe you, and will never open its doors."

Madame de Merret took the crucifix—and calmly said—

"I swear!"

"Louder!" said M. de Merret, "and repeat after me,—I swear, before God, that there is no one in that cabinet."

She repeated the sentence unmoved.

"It is well," said the Count coldly; and, after a moment's silence, he added (examining the crucifix of ebony incrustated with silver and richly sculptured).—

"You have a beautiful ornament there of which I had no knowledge."

"I purchased it at Duvivier's," she said; "who bought it of a Spanish monk, when that body of prisoners passed through Vendôme, last year."

"Ah!" said M. de Merret as he hung up the crucifix on the nail from whence he had taken it. He rang the bell, and his summons was promptly answered by Rosalie. M. de Merret advanced rapidly to meet her, led her into a recess of the window which looked upon the garden, and said, in a low voice,—

"I know that Garennot seeks you in marriage—that poverty alone prevents his entering upon house-keeping,—and that you are waiting until he shall have acquired the means of establishing himself as a master mason. Go to him, then; desire him to come hither with his trowel and tools. Manage to awaken no one in his house but himself,—and his fortune shall exceed your hopes. Take my master-key to let yourself in, at your return; and, above all, leave this house without speaking to any one. If not!"—his frown completed the sentence,—and Rosalie departed on her errand.

"Jean!" cried M. de Merret, fiercely, from the corridor; and Jean, who was at once his coachman and confidential servant approached.

"Go all to bed!" he said aloud, making a sign to the servant to draw nearer; then added, in a low voice,— "when all are asleep—sleep, mind—you will come down and let me know."

And then, M. de Merret, who had not lost sight of his wife, while he gave these orders, returned calmly to her side before the fire, and began quietly relating to her the events of his billiard match, and the political discussions of the circle which he had left. When Rosalie returned, she found M. and Madame de Merret chatting amicably, by the fire-side. The Count had recently been occupied with some repairs in the lower apartment of the mansion; and, as plaster is scarce in Vendôme, and its expense greatly increased by the carriage from a distance, he had bought a considerable quantity of it at once, which was now lying at hand. This circumstance suggested to him the design which he proceeded to put in execution.

"Garennot is come," said Rosalie, in a low voice.

"Did him enter," replied the Count; and the cheek of Madame de Merret grew pale as she beheld the mason approach.

"Garennot," said the husband, bring from the coach-house hither as many bricks as will wall up the door of that cabinet; you will use the plaster which is left to bind them."

Then, drawing Rosalie and the workman towards him, he said, in a whisper—"Hear me, Garennot! You will sleep here to night, but to-morrow morning you shall have a passport for a foreign land, and must depart for a town which I will appoint. I will give you six thousand francs for your voyage; you will remain ten years in that town; or, if you should be weary of it, you shall have permission to establish yourself in another, provided it be in the same country. You will take Paris on your way, where you will wait for me. There I will secure to you, by deed, a further sum of six thousand francs, to be paid to you at your return, in case you shall have fulfilled the conditions of our bargain. At that price, you are to preserve the most profound silence as to what you shall have done here this night. For you, Rosalie, I will give you ten thousand francs,—not to be paid you till the day of your marriage, and on the condition of your marrying Garennot. But secrecy or no money."

"Rosalie," said Madame de Merret, "come and dress my hair."

The husband walked quietly backwards and forwards in the room, watching the door of the cabinet, the mason, and his wife; but without exhibiting any distrust of either. The work of Garennot could not proceed without noise, and Madame de Merret seized a moment when the mason discharged some bricks on the floor, while her husband had reached the further end of the chamber, to say to Rosalie:—

"A thousand francs, yearly, dear girl, for you, if you can contrive to bid Garennot leave a crevice at the bottom!" Then aloud, and with perfect composure, she added,— "Go, girl, and help him!"

Monsieur and Madame de Merret remained silent during all the time that Garennot took to wall up the door. This entire silence was a matter of calculation on the part of the husband, that he might not afford his wife the opportunity of uttering words of double meaning; and on Madame de Merret, it was one of prudence or of pride. When the wall had attained half its elevation, the shrewd mason seized a moment when the Count's back was turned, to strike with his mallet, on one of the two panes of glass which were let into the door, an action which gave Madame de Merret to understand that Rosalie had spoken to Garennot;—and then, they three saw for a moment, at the glass, the scare and sad face of a man, with black hair and eyes of fire; and before her husband had turned in his walk, the poor lady had time to make a sign to the stranger, which bade him hope. At four o'clock, and towards the dawn of day, for it was the month of September, the construction was completed. The mason remained under the guardianship of Jean; and M. de Merret slept in the chamber of his wife.

The next morning when the Count arose, he said carelessly:—

"Ah! I remember, I must go to the mairie for a passport."

He took his hat, walked towards the door, then returned, and took down the crucifix. His wife started with joy:—"He will go," thought she, "to Duvivier's." As soon as her husband had left the house, Madame de Merret rang for Rosalie; and, in a voice hoarse with agitation, exclaimed,

"The pickaxe, the pickaxe, and to work! I watched last night how Garennot worked; we shall have time to make an aperture, and close it again."

In the twinkling of an eye, Rosalie brought the instrument to her mistress; who, with an ardour which no words can describe, set about the demolition of the wall. Already had she struck out some of the bricks, when, in taking her aim to apply a more vigorous stroke than hitherto, she beheld M. de Merret at her side,—and fell senseless.

"Place the Countess on the bed!" coldly said the Count.

Foreseeing what was likely to happen during his absence, he had laid this snare for his unhappy wife. In the mean time, he had written to the mayor, and sent for Duvivier. The jeweller arrived at the moment when the disorder of the apartment was once more repaired.

"Duvivier," said the Count, "did you not purchase some crucifix from the Spaniards who passed through this town?"

"No, Monsieur!" said the jeweller.

"I thank you—that is all," said the Count, flinging a savage glance on his wife.

"Jean," added he, turning towards his confidential valet, "let my meals be served in the chamber of Madame de Merret—the Countess is ill, and I will not leave her till her health is restored."

The remorseless husband stayed twenty days by his wife's side:—and when during the early portion of that dreadful time, sounds were, at times, heard from the walled-up cabinet, and Josephine strove to implore his compassion for the dying stranger, he replied to her wild gestures, without permitting her to utter a single word:—

"I have sworn upon the cross, that there is no one there."

GEORGE FAULKNER.—When Foote was acting in Dublin, he introduced into one of his pieces, called "The Orators," the character of George Faulkner, the celebrated printer, whose manners and dress he so closely imitated, that the poor fellow could not appear in public without meeting with the scoffs and jeers of the very boys in the streets. Enraged at the ridicule thus brought upon him, Faulkner one evening treated to the seat of the gods all the devils of the printing-office, for the express purpose of hissing and hooting Foote off the stage. Faulkner placed himself in the pit to enjoy the actor's degradation; but when the objectionable scene came on, the unfortunate printer was excessively chagrined to find, that so far from a groan or a hiss being heard, his gallery friends partook of the comical laugh. The next morning he arraigned his inky conclave, inveighed against them for having neglected his injunctions, and on demanding some reason for their treachery, was lacerated ten times deeper by the simplicity of their answer:—"Arrah, master," said the spokesman, "do not be after tipping us your blarney; do you think we did not know you? Sure 'twas your own sweet self that was on the stage, and shower light upon us if we go to the play-house to hiss our worthy master."

REVIEWS.

Facts and Observations relative to a Successful Mode of Treating Piles, Fistulas, &c. By S. J. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon.

Accoucheur. Fourth edition. pp. 164. London: H. Renshaw.

THE author of this work has obtained so extraordinary a reputation, not only in England, but also throughout the civilised world, for his wonderful cures in the most afflicting maladies to which the flesh is heir, that it would be but a work of supererogation to reiterate his praises here. He has quite changed the medical jurisprudence of hemorrhoidal excrescences, and has substituted a process of cure, instead of the knife, which never fails. The gratitude of thousands is due to this gentleman; and we believe that a most extensive practice has rewarded his exertions. The volume now under notice is a record of the most important cures he has effected; and we ourselves are here enabled by the testimony of several of our friends to corroborate the good opinion usually entertained of Mr. Van Butchell by the world at large.

A Fine Specimen of Teetotal Victory. 12mo. pp. 12. Sheffield: G. Chaloner.

This vulgar and execrable trash has been penned to support the speech of a Rev. Mr. J. Bromley, who held a discussion some time back with Mr. F. R. Lees of Leeds. Mr. Bromley was completely vanquished: he had not a leg to stand upon,—and he acknowledged the fact. But some officious friend of his has put pen to paper, and written a farrago of rubbish, which he is pleased to denominate "The Sherrild Chaps' Opinion of the Trumpe-up Triumph," &c. This is the second title connected by the monosyllable, "or," to the one which stands at the head of this notice. A more contemptible production than this pamphlet we have not often seen; and as we do not choose to make unsubstantiated statements, we shall proceed to adduce proof to corroborate our opinion. The pamphlet is supposed to be in the shape of a letter to a friend. One passage says:—

My dear Friend, Mr. Lees proved as clear as mud, that alcohol is poison; and that it is not a creature of God; and this was food for the totalisers.

If Mr. Lees stated that alcohol was a slow poison, he only advanced the truth; for alcohol is contained amongst the list of poisons in the medical works of all writers, and in all pharmacopœias. And sure, nothing deserves the name of poison more than this spirit, which operates so fatally, although slowly, upon every part of the human frame.

Mr. Lees said that alcohol did not help digestion. He was again right: alcohol *injur*es digestion; and alcohol itself is never digested; because the process of digestion is separating the fluids from the solids; and no known process can reduce alcohol to a substance. It insinuates itself into every membrane of the frame, produces excitement when there, and leaves weakness behind it after evaporation by means of unnatural perspirations.

Here is another specimen of the "Sherrild (this is his orthography) Chaps'" vulgarity and ignorance:—

Again, relative to this victory, Mr. Bromley alludes to Timothy, and says, "Take a little wine;" and asks, why a little if it was not intoxicating? Why, says Lees, suppose it to be medicine, why not a little? Why, because Mr. Bromley says that Timothy was to take it instead of water; and therefore it was taken dietetically.

Now wine may be occasionally used medicinally, in the same way as poisons are—such as arsenic, prussic acid, benbane, fox-glove, &c.: but this admission does not necessarily include the general use of that which proves beneficial in cases of sickness. Again:—

Indeed alcohol is the base of almost all the tinctures; and without it they can neither be made nor kept; which tinctures have proved the greatest blessings imaginable to tens of thousands of the human species.

This is only another argument in favour of the medicinal use of intoxicating liquor; and against that Mr. Lees did not argue. Mr. Lees only vituperated the general use of it; and in doing so he manifested a superiority of wisdom over the defeated Mr. Bromley.

TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

WHITEHAVEN.

THE Rev. Mr. KELLY, a Roman Catholic priest of Wigan, commenced a series of most successful lectures on Friday week, in the Catholic chapel in the South-road. He administered the pledge to an immense number of persons, who knelt round the altar to ratify the sanctity of the vow. On the morning (Sunday), a second lecture took place; and hundreds of recipients flocked to the standard of FATHER KELLY. This new order of things quite confused the publicans, whose houses on that evening were literally deserted. On Sunday week the reverend gentleman gave his third and farewell lecture; and the number of his converts to teetotalism were then increased to one thousand. A tavern was immediately converted into a temperance coffee-house, to which the miners flocked in crowds, leaving the public houses quite empty.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Teetotal Meetings at this town are invariably well attended. Mr. JOHNSON, the advocate of the United Temperance Association, attended at one of those réunions on Monday week, he being on a visit to that place; and on that occasion Messrs. HILL and KIRBY, and the above-named gentleman, addressed the audience in most impressive terms. Mr. HILL stated, that during the past year no fewer than twenty-five brewers and a hundred and fourteen inn-keepers had become bankrupts in England. Surely Teetotalism has had some share in this destruction; and although we regret the sorrows of our fellow-creatures, we rejoice at any signs of the progress of our great principle.

REDDITCH.

It is now nearly eleven months since a Teetotal Society was formed in the populous village of Redditch. Since its formation vastly important results have followed. The drinking usages of the place have received a considerable check; and not a few who were the dupes of intoxicating drink, have become blessings to their families and friends. Some of them have joined Christian churches, and are now a credit to the Christian name.

CORK.

A grand meeting of Teetotalers was held in Cork, on Monday, the 29th of September. Mr. WILLIAM MARTIN, the president, was called to the chair; upon taking which, he read a letter from the secretary of the Carrick-on-Suir Society, which stated that he had received £400 for to build a savings bank, a hall, &c. for the use of the members. The meeting was then addressed by Messrs. WILLIAM LOONEY, ROGER SULLIVAN, the Rev. I. DONKATT, WILLIAM DUDLEY, JOHN MAGUIRE, &c. The able advocate, Mr. GEORGE COX, was also present, but did not speak. The addresses of the orators were most effectual and impressive; and numerous pledges were received at the expiration of the business of the evening. The meeting was adjourned until the following Monday.

LANCASHIRE.

A letter from Mr. JOHN HOCKINGS to a gentleman in London, says that "the cause of Teetotalism is prospering gloriously in Lancashire." Mr. HOCKINGS has been to the Preston Festival, which lasted a week, winding up with an excellent tea-meeting, the provisions being supplied by the ladies of Preston. Mr. HOCKINGS proceeded to Lancaster, and held good meetings in the theatre. At Darwin, upwards of a thousand persons were collected in a few hours to hear this well-known champion of the great principle. At Blackburn, the theatre was taken for three nights; Mr. LEES, from Leeds, spoke on the first night.

TOWN NEWS.

FINSBURY AND HOXTON YOUTHS' SOCIETY.

The first anniversary of the above society was held at Ebenezer Chapel, Old Street Road, on Tuesday, September 29th, 1840. After a hymn had been sung, Dr. OXLEY was unanimously called to the chair. The meeting was addressed by this gentleman, and then by MASTER PARRETT. The Rev. H. REED spoke next; and he was followed by Messrs. S. WILLIAMS and J. H. DONALDSON. Dr. OXLEY gave a donation of ten shillings, and Mr. OAKLEY of two shillings and sixpence.

METROPOLITAN ROMAN CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday evening last, the assembly of this admirable association was very numerous, at the Meeting-house, Castle Street, Clerkenwell. Mr. CHARLES FITZGERALD, formerly Editor of The True Sun, was called to the chair. The audience was very ably addressed by this gentleman, and by Messrs. CALLANAN, IRONS, and CARROL. This branch is much indebted to the real and unwearied exertions of Messrs. CALLANAN and CARROL.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

The meetings at the Aldersgate-street Chapel on Wednesday and Saturday are invariably well attended. We earnestly invite the friends of Teetotalism to visit this place of assembly on either or both of those evenings.

Chelms Auxiliary.

A grand meeting of this Auxiliary will be again shortly held at the Bath Gardens Theatre.

Marylebone Branch.

A well attended Tea-meeting was held by the members of this Branch at Warde's Rooms, Circus Street, City Road, on Wednesday week, Mr. H. W. WATSON in the chair. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the chairman, and by several other able advocates.

THE TEE TOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 17.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS

A TALE—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER V.

THE FIRE.

"My dear Melville, how are you?" exclaimed Mr. Tibbatts, rising from a chair in which he had ensconced himself: "you seem as happy as Apicius after a good dinner."

"Mr. Tibbatts," began Melville, recalling to mind his promise to his wife not to see this man any more.

"What! is it thus that you ceremoniously address your old friend?" interrupted Tibbatts. "You see I did not use any ceremony with you. I have been waiting upwards of two hours for you, and I resolved to make myself comfortable."

He pointed towards the table, and Melville saw that a decanter of wine and a glass stood before his visitor.

"I ordered it up myself," said Tibbatts: "I thought I might take that liberty."

"Well—what do you require of me?" demanded our hero, less impatiently than before.

"Nay—you must not be cross," cried Tibbatts. "Come—show me a welcome, or I shall depart at once. Pledge me in this."

He filled two glasses, handed one to Melville, and took the other himself. Melville gazed at him for a minute, and then tossed off the contents of his glass. He then stretched forth his hand to Tibbatts, and called him by the most familiar and endearing names.

"Well—I heard you famously eulogised the other night," said Tibbatts, endeavouring to turn the conversation upon a subject which he knew would flatter the weak side of his companion.

"Indeed!" said Melville, flinging himself into an arm-chair, and preparing to converse and drink with Tibbatts on a footing of perfect intimacy.

"Ah! at a gay party, where there were some very clever fellows; and they all agreed that you are one of the first writers of the day."

"I am not vain," stammered Victor; "but still one likes to hear what the public says of one's writings."

"Here is success to your next work," cried Tibbatts. "If it be like the others, it will beat Cicero for eloquence."

"Your health, Tibbatts," said Melville.

"By the way, my dear fellow," cried the visitor, after a moment's pause, "you can do me a little favour if you like. I don't want to bother you about money concerns—you have already lent me some—we will settle one of these days; but here is a little thing to which if you just put your name, I shall be excessively obliged. If not—nothing but ruin, absolute ruin stares me in the face; and if you do, I shall make a fortune."

As he uttered these words, Tibbatts handed a long slip of paper to Melville, who had just sense enough left to see that it was a bill of exchange; he could not, however, precisely define the writing or figures upon it, and appealed to his visitor relative to the amount.

"Oh! only a paltry hundred and fifty," returned Tibbatts hastily. "All you have to do is just to write your name across it for me—make it payable at your banker's—and the thing is done."

Melville hesitated for a moment, intoxicated as he was, and Tibbatts coolly filled the glasses. Our hero drank off the contents of the one which stood near him, and then seized the pen which Tibbatts presented to him.

At that moment the door of the room slowly opened, and Louise entered. Her countenance was deadly pale—the traces of tears were visible upon her cheeks—and her lips quivered with alarm and emotion. She held her hands clasped before her, and her whole appearance wore an air of such deep melancholy, that it would have melted the heart of an anchorite. Yet so lovely was she in her mournfulness, that it seemed as if all the distressing or evil passions of frail humanity could not injure or efface one particle of the transcendent beauties of that fair creature's person. There was such grace in her attitudes, and such meekness in her manners, that a more interesting being was never condemned to shiver at the cold blasts of this rude world's storms. The fancy of poesy would almost have imagined that the direst grief would have turned to smiles at her presence.

Melville turned round to see who was entering the room, and he started when he saw that it was his wife.

"My dear Louise," said he, "I will join you directly in the drawing-room. I have business with this gentleman."

"It is as I was afraid it would be," she murmured; and then she stood motionless and speechless for some minutes, uncertain what to say or do.

In the meantime Tibbatts sat uneasily in his chair, and Melville was partially sobered by the sudden appearance of his wife.

Louise at length cast her eyes towards the table, and perceived the bill of exchange. Her first allusion had been made to her husband's condition,—an allusion which only the excess of her grief could have forced from her lips; but when she saw that document thus lying prepared for his signature, and knew just so much of business as to make her aware of its purpose and design, she suddenly burst forth into a violent flood of tears, and sunk at the feet of her husband, exclaiming, "Oh, Victor!—do not ruin your dear, dear children."

This appeal of a tender mother in favour of her innocent and beloved offspring produced only that effect which such appeals invariably do upon the man whose intellect is impaired with wine, and whose tender sympathies are temporarily destroyed by the same cause. Melville was irritated at what he termed a "scene," and sharply rebuked his wife for her conduct.

"Oh, Victor!" she exclaimed, in a voice that was scarcely audible through her tears, "I would not reproach, but your words pierce like an arrow to my heart. You have been guilty of unkindness towards me, because I pleaded for my children's sake,—and you have made my very heart bleed,—that heart which always was, and always will be faithful to you. Oh! you should not sully such love as mine with the breath of suspicion—the suspicion of selfishness. Do you no longer love me yourself? Oh! speak—speak!”

The suspicion of the tender and affectionate wife was founded upon truth: intemperance had gradually undermined the affection of Victor for his wife. His soul had lost the flower of its magnanimous youth,—its sympathies were deadened, and a secret remorse rendered it melancholy, without preserving it from fresh faults. Oh! doubtless there is in love a sanctuary into which we cannot return when we have made one false step beyond its boundary; and the barrier which separates us from evil, and which we throw down, cannot be raised again. Error succeeds error—outrage follows upon outrage—and bitterness increases like a torrent whose embankments have given way. Who can define the termination of these ravages? Still never had the conduct of Melville robbed the soul of Louise of the smallest portion of that enthusiasm which characterized her love. Alas! she was so pure and virtuous in mind, that she never should have hoped to have found a heart worthy of her,—never could she have inspired a love that would correspond with her own; because never could worship be worthy of her divinity! If men do not yet know the true nature of that homage which is pleasing to the Almighty, how can they find upon earth that grain of pure incense, the perfume of which has not as yet ascended to heaven?

The appeal made to Melville was made in vain. He surveyed his wife with an angry countenance,—she reiterated her supplication in the name of her children; and his countenance relaxed not from its sternness; and when she almost fell senseless at his feet in a paroxysm of grief, he thrust her from him,—for he was under the influence of the demon of intemperance!

Suddenly Louise exerted an almost superhuman courage over herself, for she remembered that a person besides her husband was in the room, and that she had probably given way to her emotions somewhat unseasonably. She rose, cast a look of the deepest—deepest despair upon her husband, and then rushed precipitately out of the room, evidently unable any longer to restrain the ebullition of her agonising feelings.

Melville was annoyed at what had taken place; and partly from a feeling of obstinacy, and partly because he did not choose to seem to Tibbatts to be led by his wife, he unhesitatingly affixed his name to the bill which lay before him. Thus did he sacrifice every feeling of humanity and of love to the friend who had proved so treacherous once,—while the tender wife, who had presented him with all her fortune, and the endearments of all her attachment, was weeping bitter, burning tears over her two innocent children, in a room at a little distance!

When Mr. Tibbatts had obtained all he required, he took his departure, laughing covertly at the facility with which he had induced his victim to comply with his requests.

As soon as he was gone, Melville drew his chair near the fire, and endeavoured to reflect upon the scene that had just taken place. Amidst the thousands of vague ideas which filled his imagination, there was one which he did not like to contemplate. He felt that he had dealt brutally—inhumanly to the woman who loved him so tenderly, and so well,—who had visited him in his dungeon, who had clung to him when all the world deserted him, and who had laid her fortune at his feet;—and he was ashamed of his conduct,—ashamed, even amidst the recklessness and the indifference which invariably characterize the mind under the accursed influence of liquor.

It seems that Melville must have fallen asleep in his chair, in the midst of his ruminations, and that, by some sudden movement, he threw one of the candles down upon a heap of papers lying on the table. It is, however, certain that he awoke, started up, and experienced a strange sensation which appeared akin to suffocation. He rubbed his eyes—a noise like that of a distant torrent fell upon his ears, and to his horror he found that the room was enveloped in flames. Uncertain how to act, he rushed wildly towards the door, and thence into the passage, exclaiming, “Fire, fire!” in a tone of agony and alarm. A natural impulse drove him to the chamber of his wife, whom he found weeping over her two children. The innocents were sleeping together in a little bed at the foot of her own; and it seemed a sin to disturb that soft and guiltless slumber. Louise started up in a state of horrible suspense, when the portending cry of her husband fell upon her ears.

“Fire! fire! Louise,” he exclaimed. “For God’s sake, save the children.”

He then ran back again into the passage to summon the servants; and by this time the whole house was filled with a dense volume of smoke. The table in Melville’s study stood near a book-case, the wood-work of which was probably the first object to catch the fire from the table, and afford food for the devouring element. Thus, in the course of a very few minutes, the whole room was in flames; and the devastating rage of the infuriate devourer was speedily communicated to the adjacent premises.

And then arose throughout the spacious dwelling that bustle and confusion, and those wild cries, which only added to the terror of the scene. Servants flew about in all directions, scarcely knowing what course to adopt, unless, indeed, it were to save their own property from the fury of the destroyer. An alarm was quickly spread in the neighbourhood; the engines of the vicinity arrived; the crowds collected in the street; and all the awful solemnity, and the wild confusion attendant upon a conflagration of the kind were there displayed. The red volumes of flame poured forth from the windows, and made the surrounding darkness of the night the more profound; the flickering glare played upon the countenances of the myriads of persons assembled in the street; and the cracking of beams, the fall of bricks, and the roar of the destroying element, formed a dread combination of sounds for the ears of those present.

Melville was quite sobered by the terrible occurrence of which he felt persuaded that he was the cause. He ran to the study with the view of ascertaining whether it would be possible to extinguish the fire; and when he saw that this hope was useless, he returned to the chamber of his wife, whom he found in a state bordering upon distraction. The poor young woman was paralysed with alarm, and unable to exert herself. Melville implored her to rise and save the children; he scarcely knew what he said to her. Seeing that there was no time to be lost, he caught his wife in one arm, and then hesitated which child to take in the other. He then ran towards the door, to see if any one were coming, but no one hastened to his assistance. He ran back again towards the spot where his wife and children were; he again took Louise in one arm, and he endeavoured to clasp the children in the other, but he could not. They were both awake, and were crying bitterly—they scarcely knew why. Determined to save one, and return for the other, he rushed out of the room with his wife and the little boy. He precipitated himself down the stairs as quickly as he could—the dense volumes of smoke nearly blinded him—and he saw with sentiments of indescribable horror, that the fire was gaining upon the room communicating with the staircase on the second floor, where he had left his child. He succeeded in reaching the street—he there deposited his wife and little boy upon the steps of the front door, and rushed once more amidst the burning ruins to rescue his infant daughter.

With the speed of lightning did he climb the stairs to the first floor, and there he paused for an instant to recover breath, for the smoke almost suffocated him. He looked upwards—the flight of steps above his head was enveloped in flames; and burning pieces of wood were falling in all directions. He hesitated no longer—a sensation of unutterable alarm seized upon him as he took that transitory survey of the scene—and he turned to ascend the stairs. But a volume of flame opposed his passage; he attempted to force his way through it; and the heat was intolerable. The cries of his daughter at that instant met his ears; they sounded like the cries of a dying child.

“Papa! papa!” screamed the little being; and that tender appellation rang in his ears.

He again rushed forward to ascend the stairs—he was determined to dare all to save that dear, dear child who was thus imploring his succour. But, oh—horror! the staircase gave way—the burning beams fell with a tremendous crash, and no means of access to the floor were now left. Melville tore his hair with the fury of a maniac—he raved—he cursed—he foamed at the mouth! The flames drove him from the spot where he stood, down several steps; and, like a madman, did he stand upon the uppermost step that was left of the ruined stairs, shrieking amid the roar of the devouring element, “My child! my child!”

Suddenly he felt a dizziness come over him—the smoke nearly suffocated him; and, yielding to the impulse which prompts us to cling to life in all circumstances, he rushed down the steps towards the hall.

Louise hastened to meet him; she was now recovered, and had anxiously awaited his return.

“My daughter! my daughter!” she exclaimed, “where is she?”

“Oh, God!—oh, horror!” ejaculated Melville: “I am the murderer of my own child!”

(To be continued in our next.)

TEMPERANCE VERSUS INTEMPERANCE.

ARTICLE THE SECOND.

BUT the stock of wonders was not yet exhausted. Returning to the various objects which were still awaiting examination on the table, the company appeared to be particularly struck with the following. The pale, hard, shrunken liver of a drunkard; Hogarth’s “Gin Alley;” “An Infalible Receipt,” &c. To make a man divulge the secrets of his friend, let him take one glass more than his wont; to illustrate the doctrine of transmigration, let him repeat the dose, and his soul will pass into the body of some strange beast; to prove the existence of demons, let him repeat the dose again, and he will strikingly resemble the possessed swine, spoken of in Scripture, and well-nigh deserved, if not actually incur, the same fate; a humiliating spectacle; or, Socrates and Cato drunk: a picture of the first drunkard; with the quaint but striking motto, “Satan’s Triumph; or, the Second Fall of Man;” and a representation of the contents of the drunkard’s glass, as magnified by a moral microscope in the solar light of eternity, exhibiting nothing but a glass full of lucid flame, alive with knotted and writhing worms, more hateful than the imagination had ever conceived.

Two books remained to be noticed. The first proved to be a volume of the “Temperance Penny Magazine;” every page of which teemed with warnings against intemperance, and with encouragements to the opposite virtue. The other, to my great surprise, was an old book which I had just been reading, and in the margin of which I had marked many interesting paragraphs: two or three, with the permission of the company, I proceeded to read:—

“I can no better compare these cups, than to watering-pots, that water the garden of vices, which come up so thick and fast.”

The drunkard, devil-like, is a sinner, who cannot be content to be wicked alone, but he must needs tempt others to the same wickedness also.

"Drunkenness is the greatest disgrace a man can put upon himself or others. Why shall it not be reputed to be as great a dishonour to be laid by the heels by this sin, as to be put in the stocks or a prison? Suppose a company of rude and impudent servants should combine to abuse their master, a person of noble birth, and great honour; to that end they should wheedle and gull him into a pleasant humour, make him very merry, and, when they have levelled him down to a familiarity, they take his place, and play the master; they then put out one candle, and anon another, and then come the grooms and footmen, and paw upon him, and at last lay him under the table, or in a meaner place. Thus the divine reason is abused by the senses, and the inferiors being little better, or rather, in that, worse than brutes, make sport with their master.

"Again, imagine a noble person to have many graceful and useful servants under him, and if they be not true and officious to him, it is his fault and not theirs; and this noble person being out of humour, he turns one out of his place, and then another, until he have left him none to help him: would it not be a very ignoble action? Would he not, when come to himself, repent, and do so no more? Is it not like this, when the noble reason and affections are depraved by lust, do serve his senses, and the members of his body, even those that were born with him, bred with him from the very cradle, went to school with him, lay in the same bed with him, and are as dear to him, when he is himself, as his very eye, hands, and feet; but he doth cast them off by the insinuation of wine; the eyes fail, the hands shake, the legs wave like reeds; neither foot nor mind sufficient for the performance of duty. And though they are next day taken home again, yet for aught he knew, they were quite gone, never to be seen till the resurrection. It is a high offence to our glorious Creator; it perverts the end of our redemption; it unmans the man; and is a contempt of death, the grave, and hell itself. If men had any reverence for their God, Creator, Saviour, Sanctifier; if any honour for their own nature; if any sense of mortality, and of the reference this mortal life has to eternal life, they would never leave it thus, throw away their time thus. How curious are men of their own pictures, of their children's faces and shapes, of the monuments of their ancestors! how enraged at the violation of thier daughters! And will you, with your own hands, by the ungrateful abuse of plenty, deprive, defile, swill, and prostitute yourselves? What, if you were stripped, by your own servants, of your own clothes, and they should put on you their liveries or frocks, would you brook it? Yet a gentleman is a gentleman in the meanest garb; but you are not men when you undress or put off sobriety. In a word, it is a great sin; and what if the Lord call you away while committing it?"

Under the combined influence of this pointed appeal, and of the impressive circumstances which had preceded it, a series of resolutions, which the members had prepared for the occasion, were unanimously adopted, binding them forthwith to the conscientious observance of the strictest temperance, and to a strenuous endeavour to promote it in others. And as if to confirm them in these noble intentions, letters, were read, either from those, or concerning those, who, having formerly numbered among their compotators, had been invited to join them in their present reformation. One of these letters was dated from a gaol; a second from a poor-house, imploring a trifle to enable the wretched writer to gratify his thirst for the poison which had already dragged its victim to the edge of the grave; a third imported that the person expected to write was at present an inmate of a lunatic asylum; and a fourth dated from the bed of death, and signed with the palsied hand of death, contained this sentence: "A victim of intemperance, and one of your former companions, warns you—flee, flee from the fatal cup; at the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. My breast, at this moment, is filled with these coiled and gnawing reptiles; my heart is compressed in their writhing folds; they have bred within me the worm that dieth not. Flee, flee from the fatal cup."

When the meeting was about to break up, I took the liberty of making the following remarks:—"Gentlemen, were an account of the preternatural scenes which this room had witnessed to-night to be reported, the relation would be considered an idle tale. But wonderful as are the sights which your eyes have seen, and the sounds which your ears have heard, could your senses have been adequately opened, you would have perceived greater things than these. The whole intelligent universe is interested in the proceedings of this evening. Angels have bent over you, a great cloud of invisible witnesses have encompassed you, God himself has approved and has recorded your vow in the book of his remembrance. But though heaven approves, expect not to escape the ridicule of earth. On this subject allow me to quote a sentence or two from the author with whom I have already made you acquainted. Drinking of healths he speaks of as a prologue invented by the great enemy to introduce the tragic scenes of intemperance which so frequently follow. 'And it is most likely to deceive and take, because it hath the face of friendship, and the good looks of love and kindness. And he that dissents from it looks like some odd peevish humourist, an unhewn piece of moroseness, that will not fall in and close in the square of society, and, therefore, is fitter to live by himself, and to keep home, than to come abroad. And if the dissent breed an argument, the consenters clearly carry it by the poll; and they that oppose it are judged to wrangle against points of honour, civility, breeding, good manners, good nature, yea, innocence, and the received custom of all sorts and qualities of men, men of great virtue and accomplishments. How ridiculous doth that odd man look that makes not one among them! as ridiculous as if he wore a high-crowned hat lined and faced with scruples, a deep ruff, and a fur gown; as if he were made up of scruples, formality, and seriousness.' This witness is true; and you must expect to prove it. So little progress have societies like yours made in England, and so little has the subject engaged the consideration even of what is called the religious world, that you will seldom be able to avow your principles without falling under the suspicions of the company. Looks of wonder will be exchanged, difficulties started, cases supposed. One will deem you an enthusiast with an hobby; another will fear that you have a crotchet in your head; and another accuse you of warring against social enjoyment. But persevere; you have a testimony within, and a record on high. Look upon yourself as divinely appointed to the task. You are moral heroes, who deserve, and will ultimately receive, the thanks of the community. The time will come when, awaking as from a long and drunken dream, the entire people will form a grand, national Temperance Society. It will be your honour to be numbered among its founders."

The assembly broke up; and the members, who had never before met without leaving their humanity behind them, now depart with humanity invested with a kind of divinity.

FATHER MATHEW.

WE again recur to Mr. HAYNE's excellent biography of this gentleman, for further extracts:—

There is another allegation against Father Mathew's movement, which charges it with a political design. Over and over again has Mr. Mathew disclaimed all connexion with politics. Let those who charge him with such designs, say when he displayed them? What political society does he belong to? When did a political allusion escape his lips? What is his political creed? For what political object is he striving? These are questions which must be answered before the accusation we are noticing can be substantiated; and, unless it is substantiated, it ought not to be made. If it were necessary, hundreds of extracts from his speeches might here be inserted, to show that politics have no power in his impulses. O'Connell has even refrained from openly joining him, lest a political character should be imparted to his motives. Where, then, is the ground—what is the pretence, that Father Mathew entertains political designs? No! he has merged the politician in the philanthropist: he aims at the regeneration of Ireland by the culture of sobriety amongst her people: he has no other policy than that of his divine Master. It is true, indeed, that a people rescued from excess—with clear heads and uninfluenced passions—will approach the legislature in an attitude of greater moral power, to ask the removal of the wrongs and the redress of the grievances which have laid Ireland low; but this increased moral and political power, though it is the consequence, is not the end or the aim of teetotalism. Is the practice of virtue to be abandoned, or denounced, because it makes people more able to be nationally great, more socially happy, and more politically powerful?

Father Mathew has not given to party what was meant for mankind. From the political arena he stands aloof; and in religious discussions—which are seldom profitable, never edifying, and generally productive of rancour—he does not engage. The Cross is his standard: he excludes none from his ranks—because, upon the tree of ignominy, the Saviour's blood was shed for all. Mr. Mathew has had the co-operation of members of various religions: he and they have felt and laboured together as brethren, and as the servants of a common Master, inviting all to his vineyard. He said in Dublin:—"After this great moral change, no employer will inquire of what creed the man is whom he is about to engage. No landlord, who may be about to let his land, will trouble himself to find out of what sect or party a person offering to take it may be. His only question will be, 'Is he a teetotaler?' and, if so, that will be a sufficient recommendation." Again, in addressing an immense crowd at Nenagh, he thus expressed himself:—"The spectacle that presents itself this day is very edifying. It is very delightful to see persons of all religious persuasions co-operating in the one grand cause of charity." Upon another occasion he said:—"Notwithstanding political views or religious belief, there is no difference of opinion on this point: we all agree as to the benefits resulting from teetotalism—it is a green spot on the desert of life, where all can meet and co-operate for the general good of their fellow-creatures." We shall only make one more extract, and it is impossible to contemplate one which more powerfully applies to the point. Mr. Mathew, in speaking of the Cork Teetotal Society, used these striking words in his speech several months ago at Nenagh, in the hitherto disturbed, but now teetotalised and peaceful county of Tipperary:—

"It consists of upwards of 700,000 members, embracing persons of all religious denominations—Dissenters, Society of Friends, and members of the Established Church. One of the great objects of the Teetotal Temperance Society is, that there shall be no religious animosity: every man shall worship God according to his own conscience; and any one who violates this understanding, is not worthy to be a member, and shall be expelled from the society."

Here is religion, genuine and undefiled. This is not the rancour of the partizan: this is not the raving of the bigot: this is not the language of a haughty exclusionist. It is the language of love: it is the language of Him who came to breathe peace on earth and good will to men. This is the language Ireland wants: it is congenial with the generous hearts and dispositions of her people. Soon may it be heard in every valley, and ascend every hill: fixed may be its abode in every heart; and may it be cherished round every fireside, from too many of which the foul workings of religious strife have so long banished the happiness which it is the province of religion to confer.

Many of the near relatives of Mr. Mathew are members of the Church of England, and amongst his "best friends" are Presbyterians and Quakers. A circumstance occurs to us here which we cannot but mention, as showing that the teetotalers in London are as uninfluenced by religious prejudices as their brethren in Ireland. Mr. John Giles, a Quaker, was the founder, and is still a LEADER—(we use not the term invidiously)—of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total-abstinence Society. He zealously co-operates with them, and they with him. Men of all creeds unite for political purposes, and why should they not combine for moral objects?

The following is a strong instance of Mr. Mathew's readiness to meet the view of those who differ from him in religion. When Catholics receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, they do not, as is well known, partake of the cup. In the original pledge the exception of taking wine "for sacramental purposes" was not inserted. This was pointed out to Mr. Mathew, and he immediately added it, and it has ever since been retained. This showed at once the scrupulous exactness of the Protestant and dissenting teetotalers, and Mr. Mathew's readiness to meet them, in the broadest spirit of religious toleration.

How happy should we be if we could state that no contrast has been afforded to this truly Christian demeanour and conciliatory course which Father Mathew has pursued. Such has unhappily not been the case. In the House of Lords, a Noble Marquis (Westmeath) has denounced the Teetotal cause as a Popish device to make Irish men sober.—Does he mean that virtue becomes vice when practised by a Catholic? An allegation so wanton—so absurd,—and yet withal so characteristic of the Marquis, deserves no further comment.

Another notable discovery concerning Mr. Mathew, is, that he is doing "the Devil's work." This discovery has been made by a clergyman of the Established Church in Ireland, and we feel at a loss to surmise from what source of inspiration the pious conclusion was drawn. We believe, however, it is the first time his Satanic Majesty had the honour of receiving so good a character, and we cannot believe that he would have received it now, if the Parson of Cashel—who would not admit Father Mathew to Cashel's famed rock to administer the pledge—had been better acquainted with his Devilship. We do not seek to interfere with any man's opinions; but this discovery, that Satan is the great patron of sobriety, and that therefore it ought not to be encouraged, is certainly one of the most extraordinary inventions of these super-ordinary times.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

SIR,—It is really surprising to find, after so much has been said of the injurious effects of alcohol upon the working man, that any society professing to have for its object the diffusion of useful knowledge, should still continue to laud the virtues of "merry brown beer," or "the more insidious punch-bowl." We, however, find, on perusing the Monthly Supplement of the Penny Magazine of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, for the month of August, that the delusion is still held forth to the world as being necessary. I shall now give an extract or two from that periodical, trusting its insertion in your widely-spreading journal will be the means of assuring our Teetotal friends that useful knowledge is not always the result of a perusal of that work, and that to make any periodical really interesting and useful, it should be based on total abstinence principles.

After speaking of the mode of cutting corn in various places, and hiring labourers to perform the work, we are told that "when the season of the year is considered in which the reaping is generally performed, the weather frequently being hot and sultry, and also the posture in which the reaper's body is almost constantly placed, the back being bent to a horizontal position, when closely followed during a long day, it is as severe labour as almost ever falls to the lot of the husbandman. Hence it is that the custom generally prevails of providing the reapers with beer, of a good or middling quality, where it is not usual to supply any at other seasons. Even with those who take reaping by 'the great,' and are not in a condition to brew their harvest drink, it usually is part of the agreement that the labourer is to receive so much money per acre, with a stipulated allowance of malt liquor or cider." It would be advisable for the proprietors of that "magazine" to read the "Testimonies of Agricultural Labourers" in reference to these drinks, and then the probability is that they would pause before they introduced any thing relative to them other than a denunciation against them.

After assuring their readers that in wet seasons "the grain begins to germinate and grow," and that "sprouted barley is entirely unfit for malt," and after speaking of the feasts and holidays generally prevailing at that period, they go on to say, "But at the harvest home supper, to which all are invited who in any way may have assisted in securing the crops, besides the abundance of boiled and roasted, and plenty of merry brown beer, with the more insidious punch-bowl on many occasions, there is generally the village Orpheus with his rustic violin ready to strike up some jocund air, when the whole party join in the rural country-dance; and thus, once a year, amidst eating, drinking, dancing, and merrymaking, the hardships and toils attendant on a life of labour, as well as the difference of rank and station, are for a time laid aside, and apparently forgotten."

If the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge" think it right to advocate the use of the body- and soul-destroying drinks used in this country (and why should they not, when they have for their chairman the patron of jerry shops?), the "Total Abstinence Societies," with their millions of members, think it right to advocate the non-use; and the day is not far distant when farmers and others will be made to pay for their work in the currency of the realm, and not in beer, cider, or any other alcoholic drink.

Wishing every success to the associations of our country for the suppression and extinction of intemperance, I beg to remain,

Yours truly,

J. V. H.

An honorary member of the United Temperance Association.

DELIRIUM TREMENS.

We extract the following description of the dreadful malady, from Barker's "ESSAY ON INTOXICATING LIQUORS,"—a work which we have already favourably noticed:—

The disease which is characteristic of habits of intoxication, and which may almost be said to be peculiar to confirmed drunkards, is the Delirium Tremens, or which is more accurately designated Delirium with tremor. It is a disease involving the whole nervous system, and varies from the slightest form of nervous tremor with spectral illusions, and accelerated pulse, to the most alarming state of vital depression, muscular agitation, and mental alienation. It has been observed particularly to attack persons who had long addicted themselves to intoxicating liquors, and who suddenly suspended their use. On its approach it is attended with general debility; coldness and clamminess of the hands and feet; nausea and sometimes vomiting, particularly in the morning; inappetency, and even aversion from animal food; excessive perspiration from slight exertion; headache and giddiness; the spirits are much depressed; the patient sighs frequently; his countenance is anxious; he complains of oppression in the region of the heart; is anxious about his affairs; is rather restless and watchful; and his hands are somewhat tremulous. In a short time, the restlessness becomes incessant, and the countenance assumes a peculiar wildness and anxiety; his temper is very excitable; and he is tormented with mental illusions, which are generally of a low or melancholic kind. He sees objects where their presence is physically impossible; is continually haunted by frightful creatures, or occupied with the most extravagant ideas, and is constantly endeavouring to avoid them. He becomes altogether sleepless, and the tremor of the hands and of the tongue continues without remission; he is talkative, continually occupied with the objects of his delusions; he cannot be kept in one place; and, when opposed, is sometimes so violent and noisy as to require confinement. The disease may now terminate favourably, with yawning, drowsiness, and profound sleep; or the symptoms which have been described, may assume a more aggravated form, accompanied with more complete depression of the powers of life; the patient makes violent and excessive struggles, attended with profuse perspiration; the tremor in the hands increases, and not infrequently extends to the whole trunk; the perspiration becomes more and more cold, and, as has been remarked, exhales a peculiar smell, between a vinous and alliacious odour; the patient talks incessantly and very rapidly; the violence of the delirium increases, and continues until shortly before death, when a calm takes place; but sometimes the patient is carried off suddenly in a convulsion.

Delirium tremens may alternate with epilepsy, as has been observed by DR. COPELAND. Shortly before I had the honour of residing with that eminent physician, he was called to a man, reduced in circumstances from habits of intoxication, who had experienced two or more attacks of delirium tremens. He was seized with an epileptic fit, brought on by a fear of being run over by a carriage near his own house. He had a return of the delirium tremens upon recovery from the paroxysm.

These effects are almost invariably produced by habitual intoxication. Similar effects have, however, been recorded, which had been produced by the use of opium, belladonna, and other poisons. The impressions upon the stomach are communicated to the nervous centres; the renewed irritations of the brain and nervous system exhaust their power; the important organ, through which the intellectual faculties act, being no longer in a sound condition, the manifestations of the mind itself become altered; the memory and judgment particularly become enfeebled and unsound. During each debauch there is a temporary loss of reason; the frequent recurrence of this intellectual aberration, especially if a predisposition to insanity exist, will at length and for ever end in the annihilation of that faculty by which man is pre-eminent above all other created beings.

Delirium tremens is a disease which frequently terminates the existence of persons who have been addicted to drinking, particularly worn-out drunkards; and has been observed by some medical practitioners to lapse into scarlet and typhoid fevers, cholera-morbus, and rheumatism. The appearances which have been observed after death from this disease, have been effusion of serum in the ventricles of the brain, and between its membranes; great congestion of the vessels, particularly of one of the membranes of the brain, (the pia mater) which were filled with coagulated blood, (as observed by MORGAGNI); effusion of serum at the base of the brain, (by DR. STARK); and congestion of the brain and of its membranes, and of the liver, (by ARMSTRONG).

FRENCH POPULAR AIRS.

NO. II.—THE REMINISCENCES OF THE PEOPLE.

Translated from the French of De Berenger.

FRANCE shall sing Napoleon's glory

In the humble cot for ever;—

Fifty summers hence she'll never

Listen to a stranger's story.

At eve shall meet each village swain.

To hear some aged crone recite

The deeds of other days again,

And thus to while away the night.

"Well," they say, "the nation's heart

Constant clings to Bonaparte;

Him we adore!

Mother, speak of him once more,

Oh! speak once more!"

"—It was in my youthful day—

Many since that one have flown—

That the great Napoleon

Pass'd the cot in grand array.

I laboured hard to climb the hill,

For I was drest in garments gay;—

Methinks I see his cock'd hat still,

And riding coat of homely gray.

When he came, I shook with fear;

But he said, 'Good day, my dear!'

So kindly too!"

"—Mother, then he notic'd you,

He notic'd you!"

"—Scarce a year had pass'd away,

When I saw his princely train,

And Napoleon once again:

To the church he went that day.

And they were blythe and happy all,

Thro' crowds admiring moving on;

While thousands cried, 'May blessings fall

From heav'n on Gaul's fav'rite son!'

Sweet the royal champion smil'd,

For he thought upon his child,

The infant dear!"

"—Mother, 'twas a glorious year,

A glorious year!"

"—Then, when battle rag'd around,

When oppress'd by foreign foes,

Braving danger, he arose—

He to succour France was found!

One night—I never shall forget—

A knocking led me to the door;

Great God! mine eyes Napoleon's met,

Follow'd by gorgeous trains no more.

In the chair where I am seated,

Sate the Hero, and repeated

Words of despair!"

"—Mother, what! is that the chair,

Indeed the chair?"

"—He by hunger was oppress'd;—

Sorry food could I provide;

Then his dripping clothes he dried,

And obtain'd a partial rest.

At length awaking from his dreams,

He mark'd the tears of sorrow fall:

'Be calm,' he cried, 'for fortune beams

As yet upon the land of Gaul!'

Here's the goblet whence his lip

Deign'd my humble wine to sip,

Forgotten never!"

"—Mother, you will keep it ever,

Will keep it ever!"

"—Yes! Behold—regard it well!

He, whose head a Pope had bless'd,

By his foemen was oppress'd—

In a distant isle he fell!

France, tir'd of hope, believ'd at last

He ne'er could come her rights to save;

And now the ocean must be pass'd

By those who wish to mark his grave.

When the tidings met my ears,

Frequent were my bitter tears,

My grief to tell!"

"—Mother, Heaven keep thee well;

God keep thee well!"

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS

We beg to inform L. M. D. that if we see any more silly allusions, in the journals to which he refers, either to ourselves or to the Association to which we have the honour to belong, we shall at once boldly and fearlessly publish the whole transaction about the silver forks and spoons, together with certain other little particulars which have come to our knowledge, and with which it is little supposed that we are acquainted. We do not wish to be the aggressors in any case, but we have already shown that we will be insulted no where with impunity. We again declare most positively that we will publish the whole of the pleasant little episodes in the life of a certain individual, without the slightest disguise either of name or of circumstances, if these ill-natured, spiteful, and cowardly allusions be continued.

We thank ELIZA KINSBY, of Manchester, for her communication, which however contains interest of too purely a local nature for insertion in our journal.

We shall be glad to hear from our correspondent at Ambleside: we have already noticed the Marquis of Lansdowne's letter to Father Matthew.

We sincerely thank MR. NEWCASTLE, of Newcastle, for his kind hints, by which we shall profit. We strongly recommend "THE NORTHERN TEMPERANCE RECORD" to all our readers, as a faithful and skilful organ of Teetotal doctrines. It is published every month, price one penny, at Newcastle.

A WATER DRINKER's letter is excellent. We shall endeavour to make room for it shortly.

Private answers have been returned to all letters not acknowledged above, and which have been received between the 1st and the 12th of October.

We intend to commence, in the next Number, a series of "SECTORS OF OUR ADVOCATES." The first will be a biography of MR. CRUMP, the registrar of the United Temperance Association.

With the next Number of this Journal will be given, gratis, A Beautiful Lithographic Print. Orders for the Teetotaler are received by all Booksellers.

We beg to state most distinctly that MR. JAMES MCCURRY, of Chelsea, is not a member of the United Temperance Association.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER, 17, 1840.

THE springs of a false judgment are four: or rather the causes of error are four.

The first cause of error is rashness, or the being determined on the conclusion, before the evidences are properly weighed. This must be an error; because, in matters of probability, the conclusion should depend upon the sum total of all the evidences. But suspense is painful to most minds; and therefore we are apt to determine on the conclusion, before we have weighed the evidences. Thus, there is no cause of error so prevalent amongst the opponents to Teetotalism as rashness.

The second cause of error is the being determined by one argument, to the exclusion of all others. Now, on dubious subjects and matters of mere probability, there is never one argument alone sufficient on which to ground our assent; for our assent should, after having heard and weighed all the arguments on both sides, impartially depend on the preponderation of the sum total. But the opponents of Teetotalism found all the fabric of their reasoning upon the one single argument of the propriety of a moderate use of intoxicating liquors.

The third cause of error is, there being a mixture of different qualities in the same person or thing. When reasoning about the expediency of any thing, which is likely to be in future either beneficial or prejudicial to us, we should neither determine to receive nor reject it for one argument alone. Some people, as soon as they find the fallacy of two or three arguments adduced in favour of a system, reject the whole; but this conduct is both ridiculous and wrong; because every proposition should depend upon its own merit, and not upon the propositions associated with it; for truth and falsehood frequently go together. And yet the opponents to Teetotalism lay hold of the one fact of an occasional relapse from total abstinence to intemperance, as an argument subversive of the whole system.

The fourth cause of error is habitual principles. Every one has some notions, which he had in his childhood, and cannot tell how he got them, and therefore thinks they were implanted in his breast by nature. We have also some pre-conceived opinions; those are such as we have picked up since our childhood, but which have remained with us a long while. To these we are partial; so that often no arguments in the world are able to convince us to the contrary. Some will ask whether any partiality can be so strong as to determine a man's will or assent? The answer is affirmative; because a man's assent depends upon the arguments he recollects; consequently he will always better recollect the side to which he is most partial. And if a man sit down to read a book, in order to prove, not settle his opinion, he attends to every thing that strikes him on this side, almost totally neglecting every thing he meets with on the other; and if a sentence will bear a double interpretation, he always renders it agreeably to the opinion he has advanced. We may thus see the influence of partiality:—If you hear the determination of two judges on a cause in a court of justice, they will give it with the greatest deliberation, caution, and seeming doubt; but ask the parties concerned in the cause, and they will tell you with the greatest confidence and assurance how it should be settled; viz., each on his own side. The causes of partiality are four,—tenacity, interest, singularity, appearance. Tenacity is the having maintained or held an opinion a long while, and for that reason supporting it. Interest clearly holds a man to be partial to his own side in a lawsuit, for instance. Singularity is the maintaining one opinion that contradicts the opinion generally in vogue, because a paradox causes the professors of it to be remarkable. Appearance is that exterior which is assumed in order to induce people to think we are what we would wish to seem; and thus all the world is only composed of appearances. Now, the opponents of Teetotalism urge an habitual principle,—viz., the necessity of the use of intoxicating liquors for the working classes (a proposition entirely assumed) as an argument against the new doctrine. To this habitual principle they cling with tenacity; because their interest prompts them to uphold a fascinating indulgence: they assert a paradox in opposition to the experience of millions of Teetotalers and to the dictates of common sense; and they assume the appearance of impartial and disinterested reasoners, whereas their very opposition to a right and humane principle conveys to the sensible man a conviction of the dishonesty or hypocrisy of their motives.

Where error is involuntary, it certainly is not culpable. As the will has a certain power over judgment, by defeating prejudices, so far as it is properly or improperly placed, we are culpable or responsible. In all cases where assenting or not assenting is thought to draw consequences of moment after it, and good or evil to depend on choosing the right or wrong side, the mind sets itself seriously to work, to inquire, to examine the probability: there, doubtless, it is not our choice to take which side we please, if manifest odds appear on either side. The greater probability will, in that case, determine the assent: and a man can no more avoid assenting or taking it to be true where he perceives the clearest evidence,—i. e., greater probability, than he can avoid knowing it to be true when he perceives the agreement or disagreement of any two ideas. And if this be allowed, the foundation of error will be in wrong measures of probability. Is it not, therefore, the duty of all men calmly to consider the arguments for and against Teetotalism, and not to condemn this great principle without so much as thinking of an investigation? There is one thing that keeps people more in error than all the rest put together, which is this,—the giving their assent to common received opinions, as if the first propagation of them could not be wrong. Thus is the idea that stimulants are necessary and useful on all occasions, a common opinion, which, in the origin, was wrong.

THE PUBLIC ACCUSER.

Extracted from "PICKWICK ABROAD."

I HAVE NOT selected the anecdote that will be developed in the progress of this tale, for the purpose of making a pedantic display of my extensive acquaintance with French history, but merely to furnish an interesting specimen of "the deeds that were done" by the principal agents of the Revolution in the Reign of Terror.

Fouquier-Tinville was seated in his private cabinet, busily employed in the examination of certain documents that lay spread out before him upon the table. His countenance wore an expression of austerity that rendered his appearance terrible in the eyes of those who sought his presence for the usually fruitless purpose of supplicating a favour on the part of some accused friend. Seldom was it that Fouquier-Tinville mingled sentiments of benevolence and mercy with the details of the proces-verbal it was his duty to present to the Revolutionary Tribunal. His eloquence was invariably directed against the life of him whom he indicted; and his arguments were deemed more persuasive in ensuring a fellow-creature's doom, than the memorable words of the Roman senator who concluded every paragraph of his oration with the terrible injunction—"Delenda est Carthago!"

Fouquier-Tinville, the Public Accuser, had been employed about an hour in the careful scrutiny of the various papers that lay before him, when a low knock at the door of the cabinet for a moment diverted his attention from the study in which he had been absorbed. He desired the individual, who thus disturbed him, to enter; and when Lafleur, his faithful page, presented himself, the republican said sternly, "What, Lafleur! despite of my strict orders, my privacy is thus invaded! Am I never to enjoy a moment's tranquillity?"

"May it please Citizen Fouquier-Tinville," replied the page submissively, "a young person, who refuses to deliver her name, insists upon being indulged with a private audience."

"Admit her," cried the Public Accuser, hastily cutting short Lafleur's story, and waving his hand impatiently. The command was immediately obeyed, and a lovely young female, of about eighteen, was ushered into the room. Lafleur retired as soon as this ceremony was performed, and Fouquier-Tinville desired his beautiful visitor to be seated, and explain the nature of her business. The stranger hesitated as if she were at a loss how to reply; and probably over-awed at finding herself in the presence of the dreaded functionary of the Revolutionary Tribunal, as well as instinctively to place herself in an attitude befitting one who has a boon to solicit, she sank upon her knees at the republican's feet, and suffered her head to repose upon her breast. Her long luxuriant hair fell in graceful ringlets over shoulders and a neck of dazzling whiteness; and the position of the lovely girl enabled the licentious glance of Fouquier-Tinville to catch "short glimpses of a breast of snow." Her figure was modelled in the most faultless symmetry; her clasped hands were diminutive and fair; and her feet and ankles were small, even to girlish proportions. For some moments the Public Accuser gazed in rapture upon the beauteous creature thus bent down before him; and she, on her part, did not interrupt the silence that prevailed.

"Rise, citoyenne," said Fouquier-Tinville, at length feeling the embarrassment of their mutual situations; "and be not afraid to make me acquainted with the object of your visit."

The stranger obeyed this species of command, that was nevertheless delivered in a tone of voice intended to be soothing; and when she raised her head, and stood before the Public Accuser with innocence and candour depicted upon her heavenly countenance, he thought he had never before gazed on aught so lovely. Her dark black eyes were replete with all the fire and vivacity that virgin chastity and sorrow could not even entirely suppress; her red lips apart disclosed a set of the whitest teeth; the symmetry of her bust and sylph-like waist were displayed to the greatest advantage; and her appearance seemed to partake rather of celestial than terrestrial origin. The Public Accuser's heart beat quickly, as he gazed upon those ravishing beauties.

"What is thy name, citoyenne?" he inquired, perceiving that his fair visitor's timidity almost tied up her tongue.

"Marguerite d'Ermanville," was the reply.

"Ah!" exclaimed Fouquier-Tinville, with a start of surprise: "meseems, that name is not entirely strange to me, nor unfamiliar to my ears."

"My father is a retired merchant and well known at Nantes," said Marguerite, fancying that her words conveyed a suggestion not to be misunderstood.

"True!" cried the republican, turning to one of the papers he had been examining a few minutes before; "your father, citoyenne, is unhappily included amongst those two hundred and thirty prisoners whom citizen Carrier sent to Paris, some eight or ten days ago, to be tried at the tribunal appointed by the Committee of Public Safety for the purpose."

"This I know already, citizen Tinville," said the heroic girl; "and it is to procure an alleviation of the miseries now endured by my unfortunate parent, that I have ventured to intrude myself upon your notice."

"My authority extends not to a mitigation—"

"That also I am aware of," interrupted Marguerite. "The trial must take its course; but the health of my already sufficiently afflicted father need not be offered up as an additional sacrifice to the fanatic enthusiasm of my misguided countrymen."

"Maiden," said Fouquier-Tinville sternly, "those words, uttered by another mouth than thine, had been the self-accusation of an audacious fool."

"Pardon me, citizen—but sorrow has made me reckless of my life."

"What is thy request, then, belle citoyenne?" inquired the Public Accuser, taking her hand, which she did not attempt to withdraw.

"The two hundred and thirty Nantois are perishing in the prisons of the Luxembourg," said Marguerite d'Ermanville. "A dangerous epidemic disease rages amongst them—my father is sorely afflicted with the malady—we have applied in various quarters to procure his removal to the hospital of the Hôtel Dieu—and, having failed, were referred to you."

"You ask no more!" ejaculated the Public Accuser, astonished at the smallness of the maiden's demand.

"No more," was the answer; "and if I be successful in obtaining the grant of this boon, my heart will be relieved from a heavy load."

"It may be done—it is possible to accomplish it," said Fouquier-Tinville, musing, and revolving a hellish project in his mind. "But," he added, suddenly, "you said 'we applied in various quarters,'—to whom did you allude?"

"To my mother and myself," replied Marguerite, a tear trickling down her beautiful cheek.

"Tis well," observed Tinville; and he paused for some moments, during which he threw himself on his chair, appeared desirous of communicating his wishes to the innocent girl, and yet dared not address her in a disrespectful manner. "Call to-morrow morning, citoyenne—and I will decide," at length exclaimed the Public Accuser, an evanescent flush passing over his countenance—"to-morrow, at one o'clock precisely—and fail not to be punctual."

"A father's life depends upon my punctuality," cried the admirable daughter: "fear not any delay on my part."

"Stay—," said the republican, after another moment's reflection: "come not hither—I have my reasons, citoyenne—but meet me on the terrace that overlooks the Seine, in the Gardens of the Tuileries."

"I will be there," returned Marguerite, a gleam of joy passing over her countenance:—"depend upon my punctuality—I will be there!"—and with these words, which she repeated several times, she curtsied profoundly, and took her leave of one whom public report had represented to her as the most unbending and inaccessible of men, and whose presence she had at first sought with sentiments of horror as profound as those with which she would have approached the den of a venomous serpent or rabid animal.

Delighted with the reception she had experienced, and the prospect of alleviating the sufferings of a beloved father, however great might be the price she would be doomed to pay, Marguerite d'Ermanville issued from the hotel of the Public Accuser with a light heart and airy tread. She crossed the Pont des Arts, traversed the large parallelogram of the Louvre, and turned into the Rue Saint Honoré, down which she walked a few paces in the direction of the Halle. Presently she stopped at the gate of a house of modest appearance,—looked up to assure herself that she had not mistaken the number, and entered, the building in which the apartments occupied by herself and mother were situate. Those apartments were on the fifth floor, and thither the beautiful girl hastily mounted with the same light heart and airy tread as when she retired from the presence of Fouquier-Tinville. The door was opened by a lady, who had probably numbered forty summers, and who immediately saluted Marguerite by the appellation of "Daughter!"

"My boon will be granted, dearest mother!" cried the amiable girl, as they both hastened into the modest sitting-room which formed a portion of the suite inhabited by them. "My boon will be granted,—the Public Accuser is not so terrible as we were led to believe, and to-morrow I am to meet him on the terrace of the Tuileries."

"Oh! my dear—dear—unhappy daughter!" cried Madame d'Ermanville, hiding her face with her hands, and sobbing bitterly; for her only hope was now placed in a kind Providence.

"What, mother?" exclaimed Marguerite, rising—for she too well comprehended the cause of her parent's fears; "do you think that I will now flinch from that duty I have imposed upon myself? Do you imagine my heart to be so weak that I will not encounter any danger,—when my poor father's life is in jeopardy? Full well did I know the fatal price that will be required to release my father, and my resolves were—and are still—as inflexible as the ancient laws of the Persians and Medes! He took my hand—I did not withdraw it: he gazed upon me with an eye of desire, and I refrained from reproach! Relying on the interposition of Divine Providence, I feel assured I shall remain spotless and chaste."

"Noble-minded girl!" cried Madame d'Ermanville, whose face was wet with tears wrung from her eyes by feelings of bitterest agony: "and wouldst thou hazard all thy young hopes and golden dreams, and suffer them to be withered by the glance of a monster! O Marguerite—my dear, dear daughter!"—and the unhappy parent fell upon the neck of her only child, and poured forth the effusion of her sorrows on that devoted being's bosom.

"Mother," said the heroic girl, endeavouring to stifle her own grief, the better to soothe her parent's woes,— "mother—dear mother—this is unworthy of you: an imperious necessity urges me onward; to-morrow will decide the fate of your daughter. Who knows but that, through a gracious Providence, even the flinty heart of Fouquier-Tinville may relent, and that he will assist the sick prisoner on account of his child's tears, and not at the price of her honour?"

"Vain hope—alas! dear Marguerite," sighed Madame d'Ermanville, sinking into a seat, and fruitlessly essaying to dry her tears. "The Public Accuser knows not the name of 'Mercy.' That word has long been banished from the political, and even the private dictionary of this unhappy land. My heart is nearly broken, Marguerite—but thine, dear child—how will it support all the horrors that are in store for thee?"

"Enough—dear mother; terrify me not by gloomy anticipation. I again assure you, as solemnly as if I were standing before my Maker, that nothing can change the determination I have adopted. So, dry those tears, dear mother—stifle those sighs—and remember that your child will render herself worthy of her parents; for she can make that sacrifice which thousands would deem the most deadly of all disgrace!"

"And Emile de Gaston," said Madame d'Ermanville.

"Ah! mention not that name!" cried Marguerite, a fearful pallor overspreading her lovely countenance: "him must I renounce for ever!"

"Poor Emile!" returned the unfortunate mother, as she contemplated the approaching wreck of all her daughter's fondest designs and wishes: "little does he think, while away—and fighting the battles of his country—little does he suspect—"

"Mother—would'st thou drive me mad?" exclaimed Marguerite, clasping her hands together in all the wildness of sorrow and despair. "Let me repel the advance of reflection—let me shun thought—let me not hear the name of one whose love I must renounce for ever!"

"O God! where is thy justice? does thine omniscience sleep?" cried Madame d'Ermanville, whose mental sufferings were almost too great for human nature to support.

"Blaspheme not," said Marguerite solemnly: "haply the Almighty has not yet abandoned us!"

It were in vain to endeavour to depict the wretchedness that filled the bosoms of those two unhappy women. Nor would it be possible to say how they passed the remainder of that day, and the ensuing night. A sleepless couch was doubtless pressed by either, and each pillow was watered with an abundance of heart-wrung tears. The morning dawned gay and jocund upon their sorrow, as it were in derision; and the sun was bright, and nature was blythe and sportive, as if to mock the anguish that gnawed at the heart's core of a miserable mother and a daughter whom Hope had nearly forsaken.

The morning's repast was scarcely touched, and hardly a word was spoken on either side. Grief with them was now dumb—their wounds were deep, but the orifice was barely perceptible. An occasional exchange of looks betokening unutterable horror—occasional sighs, and occasional tears—were all that indicated the acuteness of a woe reciprocally felt. Hour after hour passed away; and at length mid-day was proclaimed by the iron tongue of the clock at the Louvre. Marguerite started at the sound—hastily rose from her seat—and hurried to her bed-room to arrange her toilet. A quarter of an hour was thus expended—the self-devoted victim decked herself out for slaughter—not in the meretricious garb of an alluring coquette—but in the sober and modest vestments befitting a maiden who might be almost said to resemble Jephthah's daughter, the one being sacrificed by the commands of an imperious necessity,—the other by those of a father,—the one issuing forth to save a father, the other condemned by a father—but both sufferers on account of those fathers!

Not a tear stood in Marguerite's eye as she bade adieu to her heart-broken mother. An unnatural calmness pervaded her countenance—a placidity, that was in itself terrible to gaze upon, usurped the seat of a more expressive agony.

"Oh! no—thou shalt not go—thou must not leave me—stay—Oh! stay—quit not the mother who bore you!" cried the distracted parent, as she folded her votive daughter in an agonizing embrace. "Stay—Marguerite—rush not upon destruction—death, for us all, will be preferable to your dishonour—Oh! stay—stay!"

"Mother!" said Marguerite in a tone scarcely audible, and rendered hoarse with inward emotion: "again I say that my resolves are inflexible; a father's existence depends upon my courage—filial duty has charged me with an important mission—and that vicarious task shall not be neglected."

"You go, then, Marguerite—you go—and I am to mourn the loss of my daughter's honour! Oh! Marguerite—my child—my child!"

Mademoiselle d'Ermanville imprinted one more kiss on the lips of her disconsolate mother—the clock at the Louvre struck the half hour—she summoned their only domestic to take charge of her parent—and, with a firm step, hastened out of the room. During her short walk to the appointed place of rendez-vous, she did not once waver in her intentions—her mind was nerved to rescue a father whom she adored!

Arrived on the terrace, Marguerite sank almost exhausted upon a seat; and scarcely had she time to collect her scattered ideas, reinforce her courage by all the arguments her imagination and filial piety could suggest, and prepare herself to receive the addresses of the Public Accuser, when Fouquier-Tinville made his appearance at her side.

"C'est bien, belle Marguerite," said the republican functionary, as he took the hand of the trembling girl, who was astonished—even in the intense agony of the moment—to observe that his hand also trembled. "I was afraid—that is, I thought—" and for the first time in his life, Fouquier-Tinville was at a loss to find words to express his ideas.

"You were afraid that I should not keep my appointment," said Marguerite, a ray of hope darting across her mind, when she again remarked the agitation of the Public Accuser.

"That, in fact, was the subject of my alarm, belle citoyenne," muttered Fouquier-Tinville; "but I find that—"

"That your fears were unfounded, citizen," added Marguerite; then, in a tone of extreme bitterness, she said, "Knowest thou not that the life of a father is so precious to his daughter that she will make any sacrifice that will eventually contribute to a parent's welfare?"

"My ears are unused to lessons of morality, jeune demoiselle," said the republican, relinquishing the fair hand he held in his, and rising from the stone bench on which he had been seated: "let us make the best of the present moment. I propose that we shall proceed to the Café —, and there partake of a slight repast."

"I am ready to obey your orders," rejoined Marguerite, also rising, and accepting the proffered arm of Fouquier-Tinville, who led her towards that extremity of the terrace, whence a flight of steps enabled them to descend upon the quay.

"Wherefore take this path?" inquired Marguerite, clinging to the arm of the Public Accuser as if destruction were at her heels.

"Oh! I had forgotten," cried the fierce republican, with a species of ironical smile; "but, no matter—since we have come so far, it would be ridiculous to turn back!"—and with these words the heartless ruffian dragged the almost fainting girl across that fatal spot on which the guillotine was erected, and which is to-day known as the Place Louis Seize.

There was the fatal instrument—the bright knife glittering in the rays of the meridian sun—the cords gently waving backward and forward to the breeze—the plank raised perpendicularly, as if in preparation for some victim about to be lashed to the moveable board—the narrow platform raised three feet above the level of the ground—and the heap of sand beneath the exact spot where the hatchet fell on the neck of the condemned.

This horrible spectacle—the bloody paraphernalia of death—struck terror to the heart of Marguerite d'Ermanville. But Fouquier-Tinville trembled not—neither did he pretend to notice the pain his cruelty caused the unhappy girl whose charms he intended to immolate to his lusts. They passed by the frowning poles of the guillotine—they continued their way over the magnificent Place Louis XVI., where a monarch had lately suffered, and where hundreds daily perished—they proceeded in the direction of the Palace of the Minister of the Marine, and pursued their course up the Rue Royale. The Public Accuser cast a scrutinizing glance around him—seemed satisfied that none of his acquaintances was nigh—and, having thus apparently tranquillized himself on that head, he led his companion to a private cabinet in the Café —. A copious breakfast—dejeuner à la fourchette—or, to suit the appellation given to that meal in the English language, luncheon—was speedily served up, to which he himself did unequivocal honour, while Marguerite suffered the highly-seasoned meats to remain untouched on her plate, and the generous wines unsavouried in her glass.

"You do not justice to the fare I have provided for you, belle citoyenne," said Fouquier-Tinville, during an interval occasioned by the removal of a course and the preparation of another. "May I desire to be informed if—if—" "My resolves are still unchanged," returned Marguerite, a slight blush animating her countenance which sorrow and alarm rendered deadly pale.

"Pledge me in a glass, sweet maid," cried the republican, as he tossed off a bumper of Champagne, and cast a familiar glance at his intended victim. "What! you refuse, Marguerite? Dost thou know that—" "But Fouquier-Tinville hesitated as before: an indescribable emotion—a sentiment of awe— invariably checked him when he was about to utter any thing indelicate or offensive. Marguerite was in appearance, as well as in face, chastity itself: her very purity restrained the republican within certain bounds, and operated like a magic charm upon him. He was unaccustomed to such society that halo of innocence—that perfume of chastity inspired him with a certain dread—an uneasiness he could not account for—a discomfort that increased every moment. He dared no longer gaze for any length of time upon that virgin countenance—he could not brook the tranquil but imploring look of her whose reputation he wished to destroy. His compliments were with difficulty conveyed in an intelligible manner—his tongue refused to give utterance to the words that his passion would have dictated—he, who expected to have been a conqueror, was himself conquered. His lion-heart, always thirsting after blood, sank in the presence of virgin innocence—his brain became confused—he repented of his cruelty—he could have fallen at the feet of the injured girl near him—he could have licked the dust on which she walked, to demonstrate his contrition. The usually haughty, uncompromising, remorseless republican was reduced to the submissiveness of a lamb by the majesty of beauty combined with purity and virtue!"

"No!" said Fouquier-Tinville, starting from his chair, and striking the table forcibly with his clenched fist—"no, Marguerite! you shall depart from this place as chaste as when you entered it—and in the course of future years, there may be found at least one being who will have learnt to bless the Public Accuser!" "Citizen Tinville, what mean you?" cried Mademoiselle d'Ermanville, unable to believe her own ears. "I mean, jeune demoiselle," returned the republican, "that I will conduct you back to the terrace where we met—and that I will now hand you the document I intended to have given you when my desires should have been gratified;"—and with these words Fouquier-Tinville gave Marguerite a sealed paper. The trembling girl opened the welcome envelope, and hastily glanced her eyes over the contents. "Gracious heavens!" she exclaimed, falling upon her knees at the feet of the Public Accuser—"my father then is pardoned!" "Yes," rejoined the republican functionary: "my interest with the members of the Revolutionary Tribunal was sufficient to ensure that single act of mercy."

"My benefactor—my best friend!" exclaimed the over-joyed maiden, grasping the hands of the individual at whose feet she knelt, while he himself wept plentifully, and for the first time; for it was the most delicious moment of his stormy life.

"Rise, Marguerite—rise!" cried Fouquier-Tinville, "and let us retrace our steps. My time is precious—and you, Mademoiselle, will be glad to communicate the pleasing intelligence of your father's release to the mother of whom you before spoke. Rise—for in an hour your parents shall reward your filial love; and, in future, think not that I shall be indifferent to your welfare. No—the Public Accuser will ever be happy to hear any good tidings concerning one who perhaps has some reason to be grateful to him."

"Some reason!" exclaimed the delighted Marguerite. "Oh! so long as I live shall your kindness be remembered, nor will I ever fail to bless a gracious Providence."

The waiter was then summoned and paid, and Fouquier-Tinville reconducted Marguerite to the terrace where he had met her, and where he now bade her adieu. She essayed a repetition of all the expressions of gratitude her generous imagination could dictate; but he stayed not to hear them, and waved his hand to her as he speedily withdrew from her presence.

What more have I now to relate? Marguerite returned to her mother, whose tears she speedily dried—and in the course of the evening Monsieur d'Ermanville was restored to the bosom of his family. Precisely three months after, Emile de Gaston espoused the beautiful and heroic girl; and the principal character that figured in the gay drawing-room of the ancient merchant's spacious abode at Nantes, was the Public Accuser!

TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

NEWPORT PAGNELL.

THE Quarterly Meeting of the Aylesbury Temperance Union, and the annual meeting of the Newport Pagnell Branch, were held here on Monday 5th ult. In the morning, the delegates from the various auxiliaries met for the transaction of business. Dinner was afterwards provided for the friends in a very large tent erected for the purpose. In the middle of the day, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, large parties arrived from Buckingham, Northampton, Bedford, Ampthill, Fenny Stratford, and other places. At half-past three the procession was formed, and this was the signal for commencing some of the most disgraceful proceedings ever witnessed. The procession consisted of a large number of Rechabites and Teetotalers, attended by various flags and banners, and a brass band of Teetotalers from Dunstable. While parading the town, the members were attacked in a most brutal and ferocious manner; one of the flags was torn to atoms, and a Teetotaler from Ampthill was knocked down, and so seriously injured, that he was at first believed to have been killed; he was carried home insensible.

On the party assembling in the tent for tea, the disturbance was again renewed. Every species of annoyance was resorted to: Mr. G. LUCAS, a magistrate was on the spot; but his presence produced no effect; the constables being wholly unable, and but little disposed to attempt to quell the riot. The members in going into the tent were insulted, abused, and assaulted: women even were not free from the brutal usage of the drunken mob; and a lady was knocked down in attempting to enter the tent. Notwithstanding, the forbearance and good feeling manifested by the Teetotalers was admirable.

Immediately opposite to the tent is a public-house, "The Flowing Tankard," kept by a fellow of the name of WOODLEY; and here flowing tankards were freely served to stimulate and enrage the ruffians, who, whenever their energies flagged, repaired thither to obtain fresh supplies of beer, and returned to their work of disturbance like so many demons let loose from hell! It has since been discovered that the disturbance was plotted previous to the festival, and that meetings had been held at the "Flowing Tankard," for the regular organization of the drunken beasts. Tea was commenced amidst a din of tin kettles, &c. on the outside of the tent. When tea was over, Mr. WILLIS of Dunstable was called to the chair; and the business of the evening proceeded.

BIRMINGHAM.

Wednesday the 7th inst., the annual meeting of the Birmingham Temperance Society was held at the Town Hall, and was numerously attended. Amongst those present were Mr. JOSEPH STURGE, Mr. F. ROOM, the REV. MR. GEDGE, the REV. MR. SIRREE, the REV. MR. HOLT, MR. CANNERY, DR. LLOYD, MR. BENBOW, surgeon, and other influential gentlemen of the town. At a quarter past seven o'clock the REV. THOMAS MOSELEY, rector of St. Martin's, took the chair.

Thursday the 8th, MR. MINGAY SYDER delivered two interesting lectures in connection with the Temperance question. The body of the hall was filled by working men, who appeared to take a deep interest in the subject. The lecturer had arranged, in front of the organ gallery, a large number of chemical apparatus and drawings of the human frame to illustrate his subject.

WAKEFIELD.

In consequence of a false report which has been industriously circulated by certain "abstainers" from truth, that the Wakefield Youths' Temperance Society were only acting on what is termed the "short," or least rigid pledge, a meeting of the Society was held on Tuesday evening last, in order to give a public and unequivocal denial to the statement; and also to present to Mr. Ward, of the Temperance Hotel, who has also been made the subject of similar slanderous reports, a silver medal, as a token of the high esteem in which his character and services are held by the Society.

SAMUEL HOLDSWORTH, Esq., occupied the chair.

NEWCASTLE.

Little has appeared for some time in the Record respecting the proceedings of the Newcastle Society, and we have only space now briefly to advert to them. Suffice it to say, that the spirit of primitive Teetotalism has arisen again amongst us, and many have been stirred up to the energetic exertions of their first love, and our cause is actively proceeding amongst us. The weekly meeting has been numerously attended, and steps are in progress to open a second. The Gateshead Society has also again commenced weekly meetings. Much spirited out-door effort has been made. On Sunday last, September 27, nine open-air meetings were held, and large and attentive audiences listened to the glowing truths of Teetotalism—religiously enforced. In addition to these, Mr. BORMOND has been called out as an additional agent in the district, and there is no good reason why we ought not to have two more.—Northern Temperance Record.

KILLARNEY.

A Temperance Hall is to be immediately erected in this place. The EARL OF KENMURE has subscribed the liberal sum of one hundred pounds towards the accomplishment of this aim. The cause of Teetotalism is progressing well in Killarney, as in every other part of Ireland, with the exception of Cork, where intemperance has for the moment obtained the victory over the new doctrine.

LIMERICK.

MR. O'CONNELL, M. P., at a public dinner given at Limerick, on Wednesday, October 7, said that, during the Clare election, some time ago, the anticipators of FATHER MATHEW's doctrine had abstained from the use of all exciting liquors in the name of their common country. But it was only for one week. It was, however, the abstinence of that week which beat down Wellington and Peel;—it was the water-drinkers of Clare that carried emancipation; it was the moral dignity of those men who could triumph over their habits and conquer their passions—who could overcome every passion save their love for their country—that enabled so great a measure to be carried.

MAURICE O'CONNELL, M. P., signed the pledge to FATHER MATHEW about a fortnight ago.

TOWN NEWS.

QUEEN'S BENCH PRISON.

A meeting was held in the Queen's Bench Prison, on Wednesday, September 30, at No. 1, of 3 Staircase, for the purpose of forming a Youths' Branch to the South London Youths' Association for the Suppression of Intemperance, to be called the Queen's Bench Youths' Branch; Mr. G. C. SMITH in the chair.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

This admirable association is doing wonders. It will hold its fourth public general meeting on Friday evening, October 16, at Castle-street Chapel, at eight o'clock precisely.

ISLINGTON YOUTHS' SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTEMPERANCE.

A grand meeting of this association will be held on Monday, October 19, at the Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide Square, Shepperton-street, New North Road, Islington. The chair will be taken by Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, at eight o'clock precisely, that gentleman having been honoured with an invitation to preside on the occasion. It is expected that several well-known advocates will address the meeting.

LONDON TRADES' HALL.

We have received a very clever letter from Mr. W. FARREN, Junior, the Hon. Sec. to this excellent institution, calling our attention to its advantages, and showing that it is "fundamentally identified with temperance." The use of a Trades' Hall would be to take the artisans and mechanics away from the public-house, and, by providing them with means of recreation, at this institution, raise them to that eminence in society which, by their utility to the commonwealth, they ought to occupy. Mr. FARREN concludes his letter in the following effective manner:—"Will the Teetotalers of London then come forward at once and make common cause with us? What are prejudice, privilege, and society against a work so noble, so commanding, so good? The Trades' Hall Pledge is 'to promote the moral and social improvement of the working classes, and to secure the erection of a Hall where the meetings of trades may be better and more economically accommodated than at public-houses.'"

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

MR. JAMES MAX will deliver a series of Lectures for the Working Classes, at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Fridays, the 16th and 23d of October, on Astronomy, and on Friday, the 30th of October, on Geography and History. These Lectures will be illustrated by globes, diagrams, and a zodiac.

The meetings on Wednesday, the 7th, and Saturday, the 10th instant, at the Chapel, were, as usual, well attended. The Wednesday evening meeting at this place is by far the best held by any association or institution of Teetotalers in London.

Kensington and Bayswater Branch.

We have for some time had it in contemplation to give an analysis of a very clever Lecture delivered by MR. BENSTEAD, at the Camden Chapel, Kensington Gravel Pits, on the 21st of Sept. instant.

MR. BENSTEAD began by noticing the difficulties of bringing a "Lecture upon the Influence of Intoxicating Liquors upon the Human Understanding" before a mixed audience. He expressed his determination of avoiding all scientific inquiry and metaphysical subtleties; and he declared that, if questioned as to the nature of the human mind, he should not be able to give a very satisfactory account of it, the question being almost a sealed book to humanity. The mind is, however, God's distinguishing and special gift to man; and MR. BENSTEAD's object was to show the folly, absurdity, and wickedness of deranging the functions of the body, which react upon the mind, by any evil indulgence. MR. BENSTEAD, in obedience to the Cartesian doctrines and the system of Locke, explained the means by which the mind obtained its ideas through the medium of the sensations; and by proving that the brain is the seat of the mind, he skilfully demonstrated the dreadful effects of intoxicating liquors upon that brain. The brain is guarded by the Deity against external injuries; but it is not made proof against the poison which man may imbibe into his system, and which thus affects the region of the medullary substances. MR. BENSTEAD concluded his lecture with a powerful essay upon the advantages of health, and the means of preserving it, and produced a powerful influence upon his audience. His reasoning was logical, and yet simple, throughout; and, while he took a high ground in reference to his subject, he nevertheless so arranged his paths that the most simple-minded could traverse them by his side.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY.

Want of space has hitherto prevented us from noticing the disgraceful conduct of some of the members of the Chelsea Auxiliary to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, on the occasion of the grand meeting held at the Bath Gardens Theatre, by the Chelsea Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS (the chairman), MR. MEE, and the REV. MR. ADENRY, had addressed the audience with considerable effect, when some of the accessories of the rival society endeavoured to create a disturbance. After a little trouble, the rioters were reduced to silence, and MR. REYNOLDS proceeded to inform the audience that all this malignity and spite were to be traced to a man of the name of BALFOUR, a rag-merchant, in Chelsea. MR. H. W. WESTON, the secretary to the United Temperance Association, then assured the meeting that a person of the name of JABEZ BURNS was also more or less concerned in the attempt at disturbance; and the audience expressed its indignation against Balfour and Burns with loud hisses and groans. The announcement that the United Temperance Association had succeeded in forming a powerful auxiliary in Chelsea, was received with deafening shouts; and the committee of this new Auxiliary had every reason to be gratified with the result of the praiseworthy exertions used by all its members to accomplish this important aim.

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. V.

IT is a curious fact, that though the British provinces in America, now composing the United States were born as it were but yesterday, and in full daylight, and though every incident connected with their progress is in print, there are few countries whose early history it is more difficult to write, from the want of accessible materials. MR. GRAHAME, whose volumes* testify to his research, complains bitterly of this dearth, and declares that could he have foreseen the expense he was forced to incur, he doubts if he could have encountered it. In the Advocate's Library, at Edinburgh, there was absolutely nothing; the British Museum, though possessing many rare works, is "exceedingly defective;" and he was finally obliged to take a journey to Gottingen, "where he found an ampler collection of North America literature than any, or indeed, all the libraries of Britain could supply." This is strange enough, but it is far more so that there does not, as we are informed, exist an entire collection of works on the subject even in the United States; and as incredible as strange, that an extensive and nearly complete one containing the richest materials for the history of both Americas, cannot find a public or private purchaser in either of them.*

Having alluded to this difficulty of finding original authorities for the early colonial history of the United States, we proceed with the best materials we can get to sketch the rise and progress of Virginia, meaning to dwell with some minuteness on the first few years of its existence.

It was on the 26th of April, 1607, that three small vessels, under the command of Newport, an enterprising officer, dispatched by the company to which Raleigh assigned his patent, after sending a whole night under bare poles, discovered the American coast, and made for a headland, which, in honour of the Prince of Wales, was called Cape Henry. The original destination of the fleet was to the unfortunate settlement of Roanoke; but it was with pleasure the emigrants found themselves driven into a spacious bay, bordered by a country, "rich with fair meadows, and goodly tall trees; and such fresh waters running through the woods" as, says the Hon. Mr. Percy, "I was almost ravished with the sight thereof." After exploring the bay for several days, they discovered the mouth of the Pamhatan, which they ascended until they found an eligible spot upon its left bank. In honour of their king they gave it the name of James River, as they did that of James Town to their embryo settlement. Here they pitched their tents, and set actively to work in felling trees, and other operations which their position required. Thus, after five months of absence from their native land, the little knot of adventurers found a home in the western world, and English arts and civilization were once again brought face to face with the forest and the savage, destined after many a rude assault to triumph over both. The region, too, into which chance had conducted them, spoke cheerily to their hopes; for if in some parts dense and boundless woods rose up like a sullen buttress to oppose them, in others there was many a soft and gentle spot to woo and welcome their approach; for they were in a country "neither mountainous nor yet low, with such pleasant plain hills and fertile valleys, one prettily crossing another, and watered so conveniently with their sweet brooks and crystal springs, as if art itself had devised them."

By the instructions appended to the royal charter obtained from James I. the company of adventurers was empowered to name the first colonial council, to be composed of not more than thirteen residents; to which was confided the right of electing a president from its own body, and displacing its members at the will of the majority. There was also committed to it the full exercise of all legislation and executive power, with this restriction, that its laws should be conformable to the laws of England, and should only hold good until altered or made void by the king, or his council for Virginia. It was authorised to imprison or transmit to England any persons endeavouring to tempt the people from their allegiance; to punish with death all persons found guilty of sedition, mutiny, murder, rape, incest, and adultery, by a jury; and to inflict upon minor offenders, after a single hearing before it, corporeal punishment, imprisonment, or fines. It was commanded to encourage the practice and advancement of religion, and especially to diffuse it among the natives, towards whom the most just and upright treatment was prescribed; any deviation from which was prohibited under the severest pains and penalties, to be inflicted at the discretion of the president and council. Finally the king reserved to himself and his successors, the privilege of issuing future orders or instructions to the several resident councils, "under the seal of the king's council for Virginia." "Such are the important features of these instructions, which, if they do not evince, as has been alleged, much regard for the constitutional liberty of the subject, seem at least to have conferred as much as the present condition of the colony required. What is honourable in them is the marked and solemnly enjoined equity and good faith which was to guide the colonists in their traffic with the aborigines; a consideration under the circumstances of vastly greater moment than any distribution of political rights.

(To be continued.)

* We allude to Mr. Warden's unique and well-known collection.

† This was contrary to the law of England. GRAHAME, in his enumerations of crimes punishable by death, omits this one—which appears singular, when we afterwards find him noticing, and accounting favourably for its being made a capital offence by the first colonist of Massachusetts. The strong sectarian bias of this writer greatly impairs the value of his work.

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT

AND ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS.

Thomas Bax, Bishopsgate Without
Joseph Cooper, Lawrence Poultry Lane
Job Heath, Blackman Street
W. Revell Spicer, New Bridge Street
Henry Sterry, Trinity Square
Jasper Capper, Cheapside
T. G. Darton, Gracechurch Street
Russell Jeffry, Gracechurch Street
Joseph Sterry, Jun., Southwark
Henry Tuckett, South Street.

A Pocket Diary for 1844, with Life and Annuity Tables, &c. may be had on application at the Office.

This important improvement upon Life Assurance was first introduced, some few years ago, by this Society, and continued peculiar to it until other Offices perceived its value.

Arthur Street, West London Bridge. A. A. FRY, Secretary.

ANNUAL PREMIUMS TO SECURE £100.
To the Assured, on attaining the Age of 50, 55, 60, 65, or earlier, in case of Death.

Age next Birth Day.	50	55	60	65
15	2 8 9	2 2 9	1 18 9	1 15 0
16	2 10 9	2 4 6	1 19 9	1 16 0
17	2 12 8	2 6 3	2 0 9	1 17 0
18	2 14 8	2 7 9	2 2 0	1 18 0
19	2 16 8	2 9 5	2 3 3	1 19 0
20	2 18 9	2 11 0	2 4 6	2 0 0
21	3 1 9	2 12 9	2 5 6	2 1 0
22	3 3 9	2 14 6	2 7 0	2 2 0
23	3 6 3	2 16 6	2 8 6	2 3 0
24	3 9 4	2 18 9	2 10 3	2 4 0
25	3 12 4	3 1 0	2 12 4	2 5 9
26	3 15 9	3 3 9	2 14 0	2 6 0
27	3 19 7	3 6 3	2 16 0	2 7 0
28	4 3 8	3 8 8	2 18 2	2 8 6
29	4 8 3	3 12 0	3 0 3	2 10 0
30	4 13 0	3 15 3	3 2 9	2 11 6
31	4 18 5	3 18 9	3 5 2	2 13 0
32	5 4 0	4 2 6	3 7 9	2 15 0
33	5 10 9	4 6 6	3 10 6	2 17 0
34	5 18 3	4 11 0	3 13 9	2 19 0
35	6 6 3	4 15 0	3 17 4	3 1 0
36	—	5 0 0	4 0 9	3 3 6
37	—	5 7 3	4 4 5	3 6 0
38	—	5 14 0	4 9 0	3 9 0
39	—	6 1 0	4 13 9	3 12 0
40	—	6 9 0	4 18 9	3 15 0
41	—	—	5 4 6	3 18 0
42	—	—	5 10 9	4 1 0
43	—	—	5 17 3	4 4 0
44	—	—	6 4 6	4 7 0
45	—	—	6 11 9	4 10 6

DR. GARDINER'S WORM MEDICINE. After forty years' unparalleled success, proofs of which may be seen in the vast collection of Worms in the Museum, 71, Long-acre, especially recommends itself to the many thus afflicted, as also parents and guardians, on whom it is an imperative duty to observe those leading symptoms by which worms are generally detected—as irregularity of appetite, itching of the nose and seat, starting in the sleep, grinding of the teeth, dry cough, constant thirst, waste, and general debility, fits, and, if neglected, decline and death.

Prepared only and sold by the Doctor's grandson, J. S. GARDINER, as above; also, by EDWARDS, 52, PAULS; SANDER, Oxford-street; BAKER, Pall-mall; and most respectable Medicine Vendors, in Boxes 2s. 9d., for children 4s. 6d., 10s. 6d., and 21s. The Cordial Tincture to be used with the Pills, in bottles, 1s. 12d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 10s. 6d.

SPLENDID LITHOGRAPHIC DESIGNS.

With the next Number of

THE TEETOTALER

will be given, gratis, No. 1. of a

SERIES OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Of the evils of Intemperance, developed by the life of a Working-man. No extra charge will be demanded for the Journal. The Series will be complete in six plates.

G. HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey; and W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row.

NOTICE.

L. KYEZOR, (From Geneva) WATCH AND CLOCK MANUFACTURER, 16, TOTTENHAM-CORRAT-ROAD, nearly opposite Great Russell-street, and at 17, Upper George street, Edgeware-road, takes the present opportunity of returning his sincere thanks to the public for the great encouragement he has met with for the last thirty years, and begs to inform them that he continues to employ ten experienced workmen, both French and English, for repairing Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Musical Boxes, &c., of every description. He has made a reduction of one half the price usually charged by others in the trade.

Common Watch Glasses, 3d., Double Flint, 6d., Lunet Glass, 1s. 3d., Gilt Watch Hands, pair, 9d., Watch Dials, 3s., Main-spring, 3s., Verge, 3s. 6d., Hair-spring, 1s. 3d., Watch cleaning, 1s. 6d., Chains, 1s. 6d., Gold Watch Hands, pair, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 30-hour Clock, 1s. 3d., Cleaning 8-day Clock, 3s. 6d.

Chronometers, Duplex, Horizontal, and Repeating Watches of every description, both Foreign and English. Turbot Spring, and Musical Clocks, &c., and every other article in the trade as cheap in proportion.

Every Watch and Clock brought to repair, will be taken to pieces in the presence of the person who brings it, and the fault shown, to prevent the overcharges that are generally made.

L. K. calls the attention of the public to his extensive stock of Clocks, all of which are of his own manufacture, and will warrant them free of expense for seven years, confident they will be found 40 per cent. cheaper than any Watchmaker can afford them, they not being the real manufacturers.

N. B. Clocks of every description wound up and kept in repair at 15s. per annum.

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, No. 2, Old Bailey, London; and sold by WILLIAM STRANGE, Paternoster Row; by MACHEN & Co., Dublin; by D. CAMPBELL, Glasgow; and by all booksellers in the United Kingdom.

All communications for the Editor to be addressed, post-paid, to the care of Mr. George Henderson, the Publisher. Monthly parts stitched in neat wrappers.

THE TEEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 18.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER VI.

THE POT-HOUSE ORATOR.

"My child! my child!" echoed Louise, catching up the death-note uttered by her husband, and experiencing in that moment of unutterable alarm, all the anguish of a bereaved mother.

She dared not ask her husband any more: she read upon his countenance—she saw in his manner—she heard in his words, all the history of that dear infant, swallowed up, amidst its cries and its prattling, in the ruins of the house. And how must that poor child have suffered in the embrace of the terrible element!—Oh! she dared not think of its agony; but she pressed the boy that was left to her, in an agony of woe, to her arms.

The fire gained upon the building with fearful rapidity; and, in spite of the exertions of the fire-men, the entire house was consumed. It was with the greatest difficulty that the adjacent dwellings were saved from the contagious fury of the element; but all Melville's beautiful furniture was swallowed up in the ruins. His plate and jewels were preserved; and amidst the latter were the ornaments worn by Louise's deceased mother, and which Captain Dorvalliers had left to his adopted daughter. But the jewel most valued—the brightest ornament of the domestic circle—one of the dearest treasures, was lost in the conflagration,—never to be restored; and that was the sweet girl, with the blue eyes like its mother's eyes, the innocent smile, the curling flaxen hair, and the soft winning and affectionate ways!

We must not pause to depict the grief of the unhappy parents on account of this loss. Melville was some time before he was aroused from a state of lethargy to a sense of the necessity of taking his family to some temporary residence; and then he seemed as if his intellects had nearly forsaken him. He asked for wine; and when some one in the crowd was foolish enough to comply with the request, he drank deeply of the liquor that was offered to him.

He proceeded with Louise, his remaining child, and his servants to an adjacent hotel; and on the following morning, he sat down to look into the state of his affairs. He saw that he was on the eve of absolute ruin, unless he at once adopted arrangements and plans of economy for the future; and he proposed to his deeply afflicted wife to move a short distance into the country.

Louise was almost heart-broken at the terrible loss which she had sustained; but she still felt that she had a duty to perform to the child that lived. She accordingly exerted herself to think upon the plans proposed by her husband; and she ventured to suggest that a return to her own native land would probably be the best means for the moment of recovering from the shock which they had sustained by the loss of their property, and the horrible fate of their daughter. Melville however represented to his wife that his literary interests required his residence in England; and it was accordingly determined upon to take a small house in the neighbourhood of London. Louise ventured to exact a promise from her husband that he would not see Mr. Tibbatts again; and the readiness with which he solemnly gave it, re-assured the afflicted wife.

A cottage was hired in the vicinity of the metropolis; and for some weeks Melville seemed to have totally abjured all desire to enter into society, or to resume the gay life he had lately led. He was deeply impressed with the idea that he had indirectly caused the death of his child; and the last cries of that innocent being constantly rang in his ears.

But, in process of time, Melville found his way to a public-house in the neighbourhood of his new dwelling; and he, who so lately had been the ornament of ball-rooms and salons, now became the great man in a tavern parlour. He there found people who were ready to treat him with the utmost deference and respect, because he treated them to liquor; and he soon began to think that he had discovered a very pleasant means, not only of passing away his time, but also of drowning his cares. Louise ventured again to remonstrate with him upon his recurrence to the fatal habit of intemperance; but he heeded not her earnest prayers—he preferred the society of the tavern to the domestic peace of his own house,—and he thus plunged a step lower in the downward path he was taking towards the realms of irretrievable ruin.

One evening he was sitting in his accustomed corner in the tavern parlour, smoking a long clay pipe, and drinking hot brandy-and-water, with about a dozen other individuals of all appearances and avocations; and the discussion upon politics was on that occasion somewhat warm.

"Well," exclaimed a man, who was out at the elbows, and who spoke very much as if he were also out of his senses, "all I can say is, that England is the freest country in the world; and so here goes for old England!"

And as he uttered these words, he flourished a quart-pot in his hand, and then imbibed a considerable portion of its contents by way of drinking the health of the "freest nation of the world."

"Well, you know nothing at all about it now, Ben," cried another gentleman without a coat, and who wore an old straw hat upon his head: "we're all a parcel o' slaves—o' savidges, if you like it better.—and there ain't no more liberty in this here country than there is among the Vest Indee niggers."

"Yes, there be, though," cried the first speaker: "wot can't you do in this here blessed country? Can't you get as drunk as an owl for about a shilling or eighteen pence? and ain't that liberty?"

"An' the beak fines you five bob for it on the following mornin'," said the other: "that's your liberty, is it?"

"Ax that there gentleman there," said Ben, "what he thinks on it?"

"Who—I?" exclaimed Melville: "why—my opinion is that England is the land of liberty."

He could not proceed any further at that moment, for a violent clapping of hands, shouting, and hurraing, welcomed this observation, to the entire discomfiture of the man in the straw hat who, by the way, was the only person that entertained a correct opinion upon the subject amongst the whole company.

"Yes," said Melville, rising with all the grandeur of the parlour-orator of a public-house,—"Yes, gentlemen, I think that I may safely congratulate you upon being inhabitants of the freest country in the world. Here, gentlemen, the laws are equally distributed—here property is respected—here personal freedom is safe,—and here no one can be arrested without the judgment of his peers, according to the glorious provisions of that bulwark of English liberty, the Magna Charta."

A tremendous shout of applause welcomed this speech; and Melville was enjoying the welcome odour of flattery, when the door was gently opened, and in walked a very singular-looking person, with a long green coat on his back, an immense stick in his hand, a pair of dirty-white pantaloons, a broad-brimmed hat, and a flashing silk waistcoat.

He was followed at a little distance by a man who carried a larger club-stick still, who wore a dirtier pair of trousers still, who looked more singular still, and who had the most hang-dog countenance that ever was seen.

"Is Mr. Melville here?" inquired the first man, looking inquiringly round the room.

"That is my name," said our hero.

"Oh! it be—eh?" cried the other. "Oh! wery well:—Bill, keep the door, will 'ee?"

This observation was addressed to the second stranger, who immediately closed the door, and planted his back against it.

"The fact o' the matter is," said the first of these queer-looking people, "I've got a writ agin you. My name is Nabem—that there is my man Bill Holdemorl—this here is the copy o' the writ—and that there is the 'riginal."

"A writ!" cried Melville: "what do you mean? Impossible."

"Oh! yes—I des say it be impossible," ejaculated Mr. Nabem;—"don't you think it be, Bill?"

"Not knowing, can't say," answered Mr. William Holdemorl, with a facetious wink at the company, by whom this scene was surveyed with the deepest interest.

"Yes—it's all black and white, howsomever," said Mr. Nabem. "Here you air, you see—fifteen hundred pounds. I'll tell 'ee wot it's for too. Do you know a feller o' the name o' Tibbatts?"

"Tibbatts! Tibbatts!" ejaculated Melville. "That man is destined to be my ruin."

"Well, then, it's for a bill o' his'n," said the sheriff's officer; "isn't it, Bill?"

"Wouldn't take a davy on it," was the jocular reply, "cos it may be forged."

"Now, then, look sharp," said Mr. Nabem: "Wery sorry, sir, to take you away from sich excellent company,"—and here Mr. Nabem bowed to a coal-heaver, seated in one corner—"but can't be helped,—can it, Bill?"

"Can't, indeed," returned the man, shaking his head with a grim smile, as he responded to this fresh apostrophe on the part of his master.

"How shall we go to town—jarvey, or tramp it?" cried Mr. Nabem.

"What! must I accompany you then?" demanded Melville, totally unaware of what line of conduct to pursue.

"Must you?" shouted Mr. Nabem, surveying our hero with an air of the most ineffable contempt; "must you? In course you must,—musn't he, Bill?"

"In course," was the reply.

"We've got a long way to go—an' so we'll have somert short fust," observed Mr. Nabem. "Won't we Bill?"

"Don't care if I do," returned Mr. Holdemori.

Two drams were brought according to order, and the sheriff's officer pretended to be looking at a picture while the landlord waited to be paid for them. Melville accordingly took the hint, and liquidated the amount.

"I say," said the man with the straw hat on, "this is reither a queer specimen o' your blessed liberty in this here country, according to the Great Charta. The Great Humbug I calls it; eos here you air arrêsted on a man's mouth, an' without any judgment o' your peers."

"I am ready to follow you," said Melville impatiently. "I see that pot-house oratory is not always truth. Good evening, gentlemen: you will often meet here, and amuse yourselves, while I am languishing in a debtor's prison! But how," he added, forgetting that he was speaking before strangers, and in a tone of the deepest agony,—"oh! how can I break this to poor Louise?"

And as he uttered these words, Melville followed Mr. Nabem out of the tavern-parlour, while Holdemori brought up the rear.

(To be continued in our next.)

SKETCHES OF OUR ADVOCATES.

NUMBER 1.—MR. CRUMP.

THIS able Advocate of the cause of Teetotalism was born at Portsea. His father held an important situation in Portsmouth Dock-yard: but when the subject of this memoir was only seven years of age, Mr. Crump, senior, gave up his occupation in that establishment, and proceeded with his son to London. He did not however find any immediate employment in the English metropolis; and, after a lapse of ten years, was compelled to accept of a place in the London-docks. During all this period, the subject of the present biography was suffered to dispose of his time according to his own choice; and the only means of education which were open to him, was the Pell-street Sunday-School.

Wearied of an idle life, and being naturally inclined to industry, the hero of this sketch obtained employment, when ten years of age, at a Gun-Maker's factory in the Tower, with a salary of three shillings and sixpence per week. When he informed his father of the step he had taken, he was only laughed at; but at the expiration of a few weeks his wages were doubled, and this circumstance induced his father to form a better opinion of his son than he previously had done. At the age of fourteen young Crump left his employer through the following circumstance: There were upwards of fifty boys in the factory; and on the fifth of November they were in the habit of indulging in the annual sport of making a Guy Fawkes for public exhibition. They used to procure a quantity of the burnt wick of candles, and place them in a large handful of hemp or tow. The pieces of wick, when on fire, were concealed in the boys' pockets, in the midst of the tow, until they accomplished the short distance between the factory and Tower-hill, where they made their bon-fire, and let off their rockets, squibs, &c. It appears that it was young Crump's turn to take out the light, and that he had put the burning wick and hemp in the drawer, just before the bell rang as a signal for leaving work, in order that it might be ready to carry out to Tower-hill. He was however called away for a few moments; and, as he had neglected to close the drawer, the draught fanned the fire in the midst of the hemp into a flame. The Superintendent, to whom the circumstance was reported, instantly discharged the youth, under the supposition that he had absolutely "endeavoured to set fire to the Tower of London!"

Young Crump however soon obtained another situation; and so well did he acquit himself in this new place, that an eminent manufacturer in the same line of business offered to take him as an apprentice without a premium. This patron of our hero was dreadfully addicted to drinking—a custom in which he was ably seconded by his wife; and there was it that young Crump was initiated into, and imbibed, the fatal predilection to dram-drinking. This circumstance led to a quarrel between him and his master, and he resolved to proceed to sea. It was then in the heat of the war; and he had no difficulty in being admitted on board of a fine government troop-ship, then lying at Portsmouth.

For a period of two years he remained on board of this ship; but, at the expiration of that time, he was induced to engage in the Pontoon Brigade in the Portuguese Legion, which he joined at Albrantes. He remained for some time in this corps, and saw plenty of skirmishing, in which severe blows were exchanged. He was however in his element, being naturally of a bold and daring disposition. There was shortly after his enlistment in the Brigade, a considerable number of prisoners to be removed to Lisbon, for the purpose of embarkation for England. Crump was sent with the detachment of escort to the Portuguese capital. He there fell in with some of his old ship-mates, who induced him to proceed on board of ship with them,—and there he became so reckless of all consequences, through the effects of ardent spirits, that he resolved to return with his old companions to England. On his arrival in this country once more, after a most perilous passage, he soon found himself absolutely penniless, and compelled to enlist as a soldier. He was shortly after sent out with a detachment to join the English army in Spain, where he remained for upwards of two years. In an action in the Pyrenees, near Saint Sebastian, he had the misfortune to lose his right leg; and was then sent home in a hospital-ship to pass the board at Chelsea. He arrived in England in the beginning of May, 1813, and was allowed a premium of nine-pence per diem.

He hastened to London, proceeded to Tower-hill, and took his seat on the wooden railing that then surrounded Tower-ditch, in order to survey the scenes endeared to him by the reminiscences of childhood. The wounded soldier had returned to the land of his forefathers, and, as he contemplated the factory in which he had served his noviciate, he could not help comparing his present situation with that of former years. He was poor, with his constitution shattered, one leg literally in the grave! He hastened to call upon his father, whom he also found very poor, but whom he was enabled to assist with a few pounds. He shortly afterwards married a very worthy woman, who has borne him thirteen children, of which large family eight are now alive.

Mr. Crump has lately signed the pledge-book of Teetotalism, and is now one of the most enthusiastic advocates in its cause. He belongs to the United Temperance Association, of the Executive and General Committee of which he is a member. Thanks to the habits of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and to the consequent sedulous attention to his business as a scale-beam maker, he is now well off in a pecuniary point of view, and does not hesitate to declare that his present prosperity has arisen from the circumstance of his reclamation from the most deplorable habits of intemperance. His wife and children are all staunch Teetotalers; and the subject of this concise Memoir never hesitates to travel any distance to attend a meeting at which his services are calculated to be beneficial. As a speaker, he is characterized by a degree of simplicity and candour, which are eminently calculated to interest the working classes in what he says; and while he does not aim at any flowers of rhetoric or studied phraseology, he appeals directly to the common sense and the feelings of an audience with considerable effect. His services in the good cause have been recognised by his fellow-members of the United Temperance Association, of which society he holds the post of Registrar.

RAILROADS.

It is not easy to define the precise time when railroads were first introduced into Great Britain. It is, however, probable that the adoption of these artificial ways originally took place when goods of a certain description had always to be conveyed from one point to another, and when the quantity was also large. For instance, at the coal-pits in the vicinity of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the expense incurred by the conveyance of coals from the mines to the places where the colliers lie would be very great. Down to the year 1600, the only mode of conveyance appears to have been by carts on the ordinary roads, or else by means of panniers carried by beasts of burthen; and it was about that period that railways were introduced as a substitute for the ordinary roads. The manner of conveyance was then continued by laying rails of timber, from the coal-pits to the banks of the river, exactly straight and parallel; and immense carts were made with four rollers which fitted the rails. The vehicles were thereby rendered so easy to draw, that one horse would drag four or five chaldron of coals at a time.

It was about the year 1738 that cast-iron rails were first substituted for wooden ones; but owing to the old heavy waggons continuing to be employed, they did not succeed at the first attempt. In 1768 a simple contrivance was suggested and put into practice. This was to make a number of smaller waggons, and link them together; so that, by diffusing the weight of one waggon amongst a large number of waggons, the principal cause of failure in the first instance was removed, the weight being more divided upon the iron. In 1797, a Mr. Carr introduced considerable improvements into the system of iron railways, and very modestly claimed the merit of the first invention!

In the year 1800, an engineer, of the name of Benjamin Outram, introduced stone props instead of timber, for supporting the ends and joinings of the rails. In 1789 a form of rail, called the edge-rail, was brought into use by a Mr. Jessop. The upper surface was of an elliptical figure: the wheels had flanges to guide them upon the tracks of the road.

Malleable iron-rails were first introduced, in the year 1815, at the coal-pits belonging to Lord Carlisle in Cumberland, on Tindale Fell. In 1828, Mr. Birkinshaw improved upon these new rails, and obtained a patent for his discoveries. His rails were made in the form of prisms, and were fabricated by passing bar-iron, when red-hot, through rollers with indentations or grooves in their peripheries, corresponding to the intended shape of the rails. The rails, thus formed, present the same surface to the bearing of the wheels, and, their depths being regulated according to the distance from the points of bearing, they also present the strongest form of section with the least material. The mode of rolling these bars or rails, and giving them the gradual swell towards the middle, not only in the horizontal section, but also a lateral swell commencing at each support, gradually increasing to the centre, and then again tapering away towards the point of support, are very judicious. They are generally formed in lengths of twelve or fifteen feet, and subdivided into bearing lengths of three feet each; but the patentee (Mr. Birkinshaw) declares that the respective rails may be made of considerable length (perhaps eighteen feet), a measure which will reduce the inconvenience of numerous joints: and consequently the shocks or jolts, to which carriages are subject from passing over the joints (very much to the injury of the machinery) are diminished. In order still farther to remedy the evil arising from the joints of the rail-road, Mr. Birkinshaw proposed to weld the ends of the bars together as they were laid down, so as to form a considerable length of rail in one piece.

The wheels of the vehicles used upon railways were for a considerable length of time formed of wood, composed either of one entire piece, or of two or three pieces fastened together. The axles were made of wrought iron, and were fastened firmly into the wheels; so that the axles themselves turned upon the bearing along with the wheels. It was about the year 1754 that iron wheels were first introduced; but a prejudice existed against them for a considerable length of time.

and they did not very readily supersede the clumsy wooden ones, which were considered less liable to break. The cast-iron wheels now used, are of one entire piece. They are thicker in the middle, in order to retain the axle with the greater security, and about two or three inches broad on the rim, around the outside of which there is a projecting ledge to retain the wheel upon the rail.

Gravity, horse-power, and steam-power have been used on railroads. Where the road is sufficiently and uniformly descending in one direction, gravity may be relied upon as a motive power in that direction; but, on rail-roads generally, some other power must be resorted to in each direction. At the time of the construction of the Liverpool and Manchester railway, much discussion took place as to the expediency of using stationary or locomotive steam-engines. The result of the deliberations was that if locomotives could be constructed within certain conditions as to weight and speed they would be preferable. The directors accordingly offered a premium for the construction of such a locomotive as should perform according to the conditions prescribed. At the celebrated trial on that road, in October, 1829, a steam-engine of which the general form resembles that of the engine now in use on rail-roads, was found well-fitted for the use of the road; and the directors accordingly determined that that species of prime mover should be employed.

The Chevalier Brades has proposed to unite the Danube and the Rhine by a rail-road: the project of uniting these two rivers by a canal, was first proposed by Charlemagne; and the scheme has lately been revived in Germany.

The distance from Greenwich to London is reduced, by the railway, from five miles and a half to three miles and three quarters.

The fatal accident, on the Manchester and Liverpool railway, which robbed England of a great statesman, is well-known. On the 15th of September, 1830, the works being completed, the railway was opened. The Duke of Wellington and other distinguished guests were present. There was a train of twenty-eight carriages, which could have contained eight hundred persons; and these were drawn by eight locomotive engines. The engines proceeded at a moderate rate towards Wavertree-lane, when increased power having been added, they went forward with extraordinary swiftness. At Parkfield, seventeen miles from Liverpool, they stopped to take in a fresh supply of fuel. Here several gentlemen descended from the different carriages; and Mr. Huskisson unfortunately fell a victim to the new experiment, by being run over by the train.

Railways may be justly considered a triumph of art leading to the most important commercial results.

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. V.

THERE is still unfortunately a numerous class of men, women, and children, who will not be stopped from the enjoyment of their beloved beverage by any means whatever, except by force, or absolute deprivation of the article: no moral influence is likely to weigh with them.

In one dram-shop in a large town in England, the proprietor carefully counted his customers for several days consecutively, and found that the relative proportion of the two sexes to be five women to two men.

In London public-houses of the lower kind, gambling, music, and pugilism, are severally used as the enticements to these abodes of vice.

Louis XIV. of France had the sagacity to perceive the link between the complimentary use of strong drink, and national inclination; for he banished health drinking from his court. The present temperate state of France is probably the reward of his foresight.

It is notorious that the drinking habits and customs, and the general manners of nations, have an intimate connexion.

Twenty years ago few women were so barefaced as to admit having been drunk on any occasion; at present it is quite common for respectably dressed females to excuse their conduct on trial, by pleading that they happened to be rather in liquor at the time the delinquency took place.

A lady declared some time since that, in dining out, although she scarcely touched the glass with her lips, yet the lifting of it up to her mouth invariably flushed her face a great deal before dinner was ended; and another has mentioned that she was asked, at one dinner-party, to take wine by gentlemen no less than twelve times.

The body or mere organization of man, independently of the necessary adjuncts, is a triple system: it consists of an absorbent, a cardiac, and a cerebral system. Now, if the organs of supply be untouched by the alcohol—if he be a man of that vigorous cardiac system that he secretes abundantly, then the lining membrane of the intestine is so sheathed by mucus while he pours in this liquid fire, that its fine, villous surface is protected, and the absorption is more rapid.

A man lives by this law—he must live on other substances, or else live upon his own body.

Spirits are called a poison because they destroy life; but if they be spoken of in the medical sense of poisoning, they kill, not by a poisonous property, but by the destruction of the balance of circulation, by excitement or subsequent collapse, or the disorganization resulting on the reaction therefrom.

THE PUBLICAN.

WITHOUT any figure of speech, this character may well be denominated "a sinner." He is not only a sinner himself, but he also teaches others to be sinners. He is of necessity a hypocrite, a flatterer, a liar, and a cheat. He affects to be friendly in the morning with those whom he expels from his house, when drunk and penniless, in the evening: he preaches in favour of the liberality and generosity of the person who can drink most, or who will treat the rest;—he declares that he sells nothing but genuine articles, and would scorn the "low practice of adulteration;" and yet he is well-versed in the art of converting two butts of beer into three, and of making a profit upon gin sold at a rate below even the amount of the duty paid by the distiller.

Thus is the publican necessarily a compound of all evil characteristics. He is inhospitable, uncharitable, morose to the needy, and brutal towards his family and servants. This comes from the fact, that habitual intemperance deadens all the fine feelings of the soul, and extinguishes all kind sympathies. And the publican is compelled to taste his liquors with his customers; and this habit of compulsion produces a natural predilection in their favour. Thus is it that the publican is himself an exceedingly intemperate man; and his example is equally as bad as his conduct.

No one ever saw a publican give a poor man a farthing. Even those, who have ruined themselves at his house, are ordered to quit the premises when they enter them to begin instead of to buy. The publican subscribes to charities from motives of ostentation, and places his name upon lists of subscriptions for certain poor individuals to oblige a customer; but he never gives without a motive. He is always friendly, cringing, and flattering to the working man, whom he teaches to believe that he is "a free Briton," and "a pillar of the state," and "a liberal fellow;"—but all this engaging behaviour and exciting talk are coeval only with the duration of the working man's money: as soon as that is gone, the publican orders him in a surly and insolent tone "to get out of his house, and not stay making a noise there, annoying the customers;" and then the man, who in the morning was "a pillar of the state," is scarcely considered worthy of being kicked into a gutter.

The publican always affects to sympathize with the wives of his male customers, when the former fetch their beer for dinner, and complain of the late hours kept by their husbands. The publican declares "that he is very sorry for it—that he does all he can to persuade them that they should stay more at home—but, then, that the liquor is good, and won't hurt them; and that his is a very respectable house, and so on." The publican always gives the child of the deceived wife a cake, and declares that the infant which she carries on her arms is "the handsomest baby he ever saw." Thus is it that the wife, who went to the house to complain, goes home to her husband, and says, "What a nice man Mr. So-and-so, the landlord, is!"

Many of the publicans are in league with the police-officers, and report all that they can over-hear in their parlours and tap-rooms. Thus is it that thieves are detected; and the publican receives his reward in private. Or else, the publican himself is in connexion with the thieves; and then he looks to them for his "regulars." It not infrequently happens, that he maintains a correspondence with both; and that when he has received his "regulars" from the thieves, he betrays them into the hands of the police-officers; from whom he extracts a further remuneration.

The publican universally foment a quarrel between a workman and his master. If a labouring man, a mechanic, or an artisan, enter a public-house, and begin complaining of his employer, the publican will instantly take his part, and induce him to drink deeply to drown his care.

The publicans are very clever transmuters of liquors, and equally skilful hands at adulterating the same. They can even fabricate them at a pinch. They can make "excellent Cape-wine" out of the drainings of the cocks of all the wine-casks in their cellars; they change Sherry into Madeira, and Gooseberry wine into Champagne, with facility; and they restore bad wines to an "excellent flavour" in a few hours. They can give Port wine (which they make in their own cellars, and which is only a few weeks old) the appearance of great age; and they can compound the "superior cordial gin" with a very little of the genuine spirit, and a very great deal of oil of vitriol and juniper berries. They make Port wine in this way.—They take four gallons of water, two quarts of juice of the red beet-root, two quarts of brandy, four ounces of logwood, and half a pound of rhatany-root: they first infuse the logwood and rhatany-root in brandy and a gallon of water for one week, they then strain off the liquor, and mix the other ingredients; they keep the whole in a cask for a month, and then it is considered fit to bottle. Saturated solution of cream of tartar, coloured with cochineal, produces the crust, and the lower part of the cork is then stained with the same mixture. You therefore see, reader, that the proprietors of Wine-Vaults possess the faculty of making "fine old crusted Port" in the space of six weeks! If their Sherry be of too high a colour, they rectify the fault with lamb's blood; and to colour their Port-wine, they use syrup made with sloes. Sugar of lead is mixed with sharp-tasted wines in order to connect the acidity; and sugar of lead is a rank poison. Arsenic is also frequently used in compounding wines.

The publicans apply the same skilful principles of adulteration to their beer, which they elaborately deluge with water first, and to which they afterwards restore some species of the appearance of malt liquor by means of narcotic poisons, mineral substances, and all kinds of deleterious drugs,—such as colchicum-indicum, Bohemian rosemary, henbane, opium, mucilage of flax, tobacco-juice, oil of vitriol, copperas, alum, &c. Indeed, there are about thirty ingredients used in the publican's cellar to make a liquor usually supposed to consist of merely malt, hops, and water!

The oil of vitriol is the cause of the publicans' gin making the eyes water, an effect never produced by the pure spirit even at its highest strength. An eighth of a pint of oil of turpentine is used in the adulteration of one hundred gallons of gin; besides half a pint of sulphuric ether, which is used to conceal the oil of vitriol.

The publican is, then, a very clever fellow; but, at the same time, we prove him to be a very great rogue. He is one of the moral murderers licensed by an unprincipled government to prey upon the vitals of the working classes. And yet all the infamy and villany of the publican seldom avail him or his family. No people are more frequently bankrupts than publicans; and the fortunes of no fathers are more generally dissipated by prodigal sons, than those of the publicans. This latter effect springs from an immoral example. The sons of publicans frequently become waiters or tapsters, or hangers-on, at the very places formerly tenanted by their sires; and the daughters of publicans equally often walk the very streets in which the abodes of their parents once were. If a publican have a pretty wife or daughter, she is almost certain to be seduced away from the paths of virtue by some frequenter of the house; and, if he have a good-looking young man as his son, this youth will most probably yield to the effects of the adulation of boon-companions, and be eventually transported for forgery, housebreaking, or robbing on the highway. Nearly all crimes, directly or indirectly, emanate from the public-house; and for all these has the publican to answer!

FRENCH POPULAR AIRS.

No. III.

[This "National Song" has lately been sung at all the theatres in Paris, and in many of the provincial ones; such a circumstance portends both war abroad and revolution at home.]

LA MARSEILLAISE.

Sons of heroes, fam'd in story,
Onward march to death or glory:
For see, the formen's standard waves
O'er fields that soon must be their graves!
Hear ye the clatter of their arms,
Their shouts portending dire alarms?
Faster for slaughter, on they press
To make your children fatherless!
Then let each warrior grasp his vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

Wherefore to our peaceful coasts
Rush those sanguinary hosts?
For whom have they prepar'd the chains
That now they drag o'er verdant plains—
Children of France! to us they come—
Those chains are tor'd to fix our doom!
Just hear! that such disgrace should fall
Upon the free born sons of Gaul!
Then let each warrior grasp his vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

What! shall we, afraid of war,
Take from tyrant hands the law?
What! shall a foreign cohort's pride
Intimidate our warriors' tried?
Great God! our necks can never be Subject to despots' tyranny;
Nor shall th' invaders of the state
Decide upon its people's fate!
Then let each warrior grasp his vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

Tremble, chiefs perfidious all—
On your heads our curses fall!
Tremble! your projects, soon made vain,
Their merited return will gain;
For France has arm'd her serr'd bands,
And plac'd her safety in their hands;
So that if hundreds fall to-day,
To-morrow thousands join th' array.
Then let each warrior grasp his vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

In the darkling battle's strife,
Soldier! spare your victim's life,
When, arm'd against you in the field,
Feeble and weak, he cries—"I yield!"
Hun may'st thou spare! But, in the grave Shall thou pursue the chief who gave Such dire example to the rest
That tear for food their mother's breast!
Then let each warrior grasp his vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

Sacred fervour—patriot flame,
Urge us on to deeds of fame!
Freedom! assist the deadly blow
That we direct against the foe!
Conquest! may we to war be led,
Thy banners amply o'er us spread;
And may the tyrant host retreat,
Or beg for mercy at our feet!
Then let each hero grasp the vengeful brand,
And shed th' invader's blood to fertilize the land!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be delighted to receive communications from Mr. JOHN WHIBLEY, the Honorary Secretary to the Wakefield Youth's Society.

The "SERMON ON MALT" has already been published.

A LAYMAN AND TEETOTALER is thanked for his communication: at the same time, we do not see anything in its contents to induce us to change our opinion relative to the subject in question.

"THE IMPORTANCE OF KNOWLEDGE" is declined, with thanks.

Private answers have been returned to H. K. D., M., F.—S., and WALTER.

A Correspondent informs us that there is a public-house near the London Hospital, denominated the "BLIND PRODIGE," and comments upon the fitness of the appellation.

WILLIAM G.— is again informed that the EDITOR of this Journal feels himself insulted by the idea that the "DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS," or any part of that tale forms a portion of his own biography.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the first Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Six Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1840.

WE cannot too often impress upon the minds of our readers the danger of listening to the arguments of those who advocate the moderate use of intoxicating liquors. At the age of thirteen or fourteen, the youth, who may then be said to be entering upon life, would scorn the idea of becoming a drunkard, and would be one of the first to vituperate the conduct of him who indulged in strong drinks to excess. But this same youth does not refuse to partake of that quantity which habitual error has induced him to consider "good for him," or perhaps "necessary;" and thus is an appetite, over which he has but little controul, daily tempted with a fascinating beverage. As he grows older, he increases the quantity of his potations; and in process of time, he passes from the moderate drinker to the habitual drunkard.

There is every danger in the doctrine that the moderate use of beer, wine, or spirituous liquors may be reasonably defended. We may test the frailty of our capacities of volition in respect to our appetites, by remembering that we invariably partake more heartily of a favourite dish than of one to which we are indifferent. We should probably feast to excess off a fine haunch of venison, or a fragrant tureen of turtle, did not Nature itself supply a check to our greedy tastes in respect to eating; but were not such check supplied, and were we not compelled to abstain from perseverance in the glutony of one meal, by the remonstrance of a surfeit, we should doubtless frequently carry our indulgence in highly seasoned meats to a fearful excess. Unfortunately, Nature does not exercise a similar power in respect to drinking, and compel us to abstain at a certain point. It is true she prompts us by a variety of signs which are not to be mistaken, when we are pouring out deep libations at the shrine of Bacchus; but she does not force us to desist from further indulgence, as in the former case. Man must therefore devise a plan to correct this deficiency in Nature; and Teetotalism seems to have offered its opportune intervention, by recommending a total abstinence from the source of temptation.

We have before shown, in the columns of this journal, that strong drinks are not only unnecessary, but also essentially hurtful to the human frame. Any person, who is accustomed to travelling at night, will admit that, in the depths of winter, the most effectual means of producing warmth, is a glass of cold water, which diffuses a genial glow throughout the whole body. In very warm weather, it is clear that alcoholic liquors, even if well diluted with water, must add to the heat of the body, by causing an internal heat in addition to the external one produced by the temperature; and as stimulants to labour hard, or endure fatigue, all malt and spirituous liquors, or wines, must evidently fail, because they produce an excitement which, when it has passed away, leaves a certain lassitude, weakness, and depression of spirits behind it, as the unavoidable consequence of a reaction.

It is really distressing to think that any person in his sound senses can pretend to oppose truths like these. The arguments of the Teetotalers annihilate all the apologies for the use of alcoholic liquors, and teach the true object of stimulants, at the same time that they point out in what such stimulants should consist; and thus are the opponents to this system of morality and philanthropy reduced to the necessity of defending an evil indulgence only. If dancing produced a certain dislocation of a limb, would any one be found foolish enough to advocate the art of Terpsichore? if cricket were sure to be accompanied with the loss of an eye or a tooth, would the game continue in vogue? and, in a word, if any of the really harmless recreations of life were replete with danger, would rational individuals persist in their indulgence? We do not hesitate to assert that all those diversions would be at once abandoned; and yet the same persons who would be the first to abstain from pursuits which would menace their limbs or their features with injury, wantonly and wilfully persist in an indulgence which ruins their powers of digestion—disposes them to various maladies and physical evils—impairs their intellects—brutalizes their passions—destroys their fine sympathies—degrades their characters—demoralizes their minds—and unfits them for the duties and occupations of life. How strange is this inconsistency! Does man require to see the workings of some direful cause of injury in order to be convinced of its malignity? does he only shun those perils which are immediate in their effects? and does he imagine his life to be so long, that he can well suffer a few years of it to be curtailed through the medium of intemperance? Let the rational individual ask himself this question—"Is it better to live, healthy and strong, to a good old age,—or to rush to a premature grave, after a life of malady and disease?"

SOME time has now elapsed since we noticed the case of the Coal-Whippers of Wapping. We have not however been idle. The UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION has pledged itself to agitate in favour of those poor degraded beings, who are compelled to pursue the paths of intemperance in consequence of the infernal and inhuman monopoly of the right of employing labourers at the colliers, now vested in the hands of the ruffianly publicans of Wapping; and a Committee has been appointed to adopt measures for the release of the Coal-Whippers from such a dreadful state of bondage. The Coal-Whipper, who would wish to embrace the doctrines of Teetotalism, cannot do so with justice to his family, because he can only obtain work upon the terrible condition of expending at least one-third of his hard earnings at the house of that publican in whom is vested the power of supplying the labourers for any particular ship. The publicans of the district of Wapping deserve the execrations and reproach of all upright men: they are a set of extortioners of the worst kind—because they feed upon the life-blood of the poor! They are the foes to good morals, and the patrons of prostitutes, crimps, and thieves. They add every fresh horror to their already degrading condition of public-house keepers; and, without any figure of speech, are they indeed a disgrace to humanity.

We have however the pleasure of announcing that SIR CULLING EARMLEY SMITH, Bart., has kindly promised to take the chair at an early meeting of the Members of the United Temperance Association at Exeter Hall, for the purpose of bringing the case of the unfortunate Coal-Whippers still more effectually before the public. Does SIR THOMAS FOWELL BUXTON, the great brewer, know, while he is agitating the cause of negro slavery with such zeal and enthusiasm,—does he know how many myriads of slaves, of an equally degraded species, he himself has made by means of the infernal poisons which he denominates ale, stout, and porter? This wealthy brewer does not hesitate to blame those who hold their hereditary estates in the West Indies, and who have not entirely emancipated their negroes; but does he think of blaming himself for keeping open the establishment which is the cause of misery, crime, penury, and disease?

THE BLEEDING HAND.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL,

AUTHOR OF "THE PALMER'S LAST LESSON," &c.

MANY years ago, there was a young student in the college of Anatomy, at Leipsic, Ulric Gellert, for such was his name, who was the inheritor of an ardour in the pursuit of professional knowledge, so enthusiastic, as to enable him to surmount dangers and difficulties that would have disheartened a less resolute spirit. He was not a native of the city, and little more was known of him than that he was reputed to be of ignoble parentage, and that his pecuniary circumstances were so closely allied to poverty as to render the practice of that profession, which was to him a passion, an absolute essential. That he was a gentleman by education, his highly accomplished mind and polished bearing amply testified: though precluded by necessity from acquiring a footing in that society whence his supposed low birth excluded him, but to which, nevertheless, he would have been an ornament.

In his slight intercourse with his brother students, and with the few patients in the higher circles, to whom his skill had been the means of introducing him, he had the good fortune and merit of rendering himself esteemed and beloved.

He had been several years at Leipsic, when his recognised ability gained him the situation of assistant-practitioner in that college, where he had so long been a student; and it was shortly after the assumption of his new office, that accident made him acquainted with one of the richest, the proudest, and the most disagreeable men in the city. The Baron de Rosenthal was disliked by all who knew him; he had, indeed, but one merit, and that was his wealth, which was unbounded, and gold, the old man's sword was to him the watch-word, that rallied around him a crowd of factitious friends, for but one real friend possessed he in all the world, and of that one he was unworthy, for to her, to Alethea, his only child, he was a harsh and cruel parent.

Alethea de Rosenthal was one of nature's fairest creations, not less amiable in disposition than talented in intellect, and beautiful in person. Her susceptible heart, so long a stranger to the enchantment of a courteous and gentle manner, soon learnt to prize, too tenderly for its own peace, the man whose scientific skill had rescued her father from a painful death. Ulric Gellert's heart might have been compared to a fountain, whose source had been choked up by neglect and disuse, but which cleared of the rubbish that checked its current, resumes its original flow of strength and freshness. Circumstances of a singularly somber complexion had arisen to check and to quell the natural tenderness and sensibility of his spirit, but the time was come when their course was no longer to be arrested, and the long-suppressed feelings of his soul now gushed forth, in all the beautiful vigour of their original freshness, to do homage to one object, and that object was the daughter of De Rosenthal.

They loved! This pair, between whom rank and custom had planted such barriers, loved, as if to love was all that the world had for them to do, and their brief dream of delight was only terminated by the discovery that each was dearer to other than life itself; nor was the discovery fated to rest with them. We have described De Rosenthal as unamiable, proud, avaricious; the selfishness of his nature had caused him for a time to forget that his able medical attendant was the almost constant companion of his child; he felt a sort of liking for him, as his preserver from a lingering and painful disorder, and as his professional skill was still necessary, he treated him with unwonted courtesy; but had the idea crossed him of the probable existence of an attachment between his child and Ulric Gellert, he would, with his own hand, have slain them at once, rather than that the high rank of De Rosenthal should suffer contamination from a connexion so ignoble. His rage therefore was the more violent, since he perceived that it came too late.

Alethea was resting on the bosom of her lover, and listening with an entranced spirit to such words as but too often pave the way to a world of wretchedness, when the Baron burst in upon them like a raving lunatic. Ulric received a blow! He was a tall muscular youth, who could have easily whirled to the other end of the apartment the feeble, abusive, old man, who had assailed him; but that abusive old man was the father of her whom he loved. He did nothing, then, but defend himself from farther manual assault by wresting from the enraged Baron the instrument with which he repeatedly attacked him. He could not, however, protect his ears from being wounded by the volley of coarse opprobrium, which was levelled against him: he heard himself stigmatised as ungrateful, a villain, a bastard, till these words tingled through his brain like a flood of poison, and it was then, for the first time, that the relative positions in which he and the being whom he adored stood, rushed in upon his mind with a violence that rooted him in almost guilt-like consciousness to the ground; a pang of the bitterest self-accusation darted through his breast, as, casting one impassioned look of love and agony on the insensible form of Alethea, he fled from the house.

For a week Ulric Gellert lay upon his bed in a strong fever. His senses had wandered, and it was not until the tenth day after the scene, which has just been detailed, took place, that he recovered to a recollection of the past. He found himself attended by two friends, who, to his queries regarding himself, merely replied that he had been under strong delirium for a week, and his life despaired of. He dared not ask for the Rosenthals,—they were indeed unknown to his friends, and his mental misery was augmented by this utter ignorance of what had befallen her whom he loved so madly, so hopelessly! A few days saw him up again, but Gellert was an altered man; a deep gloom was spread over his fine features: his avocations, his studies, his apparel, were neglected, and the sudden change in his conduct and appearance inspired his comrades and acquaintances with astonishment and curiosity. Daily, however, he regained his strength, and he began once more to enter upon his duties, and to revisit the Anatomical Hall; but the life, the ardour, with which he had been wont to pursue his tasks, were no longer observable, and more than once, when appealed to on professional topics, his answers were remarked as vague, and singularly at variance with his usual clear and shrewd mode of argument.

He was one evening sitting in his little apartment, consulting a new work on surgery, and, as he listlessly turned over the pages, a casual observer might have deemed from the slowness with which he lingered over each little leaf, that his whole thoughts were employed upon it. There was a flush upon his cheek, and, occasionally, his eyes were lit up with some what of their former fire; but his lately-favourite study soon ceased to interest him, and closing the tome, he turned once more to the gloomy volume within his mind, and occupied his thoughts in maturing a scheme by which he might gain intelligence of Alethea: at that moment the door was opened, and the lecturer of the week entered.

"Up, Gellert," he cried, "do not give way to these melancholy humours, which are either the result of your sudden illness, or of some private sorrow, the nature of which you have not chosen to impart to your friends, but which, as your own good sense will tell you, is not to be removed by pondering over it. What, Ulric, would become of the cockatrice's egg, if the sullen toad refused to brood over it? why, it would addle harmlessly, nor hatch fresh mischief. You shall spend the evening with me; there will be none of the convivia—there will be only Kramen, with his face full of glee, and his heart full of good-fellowship; and Werner, with his quiet, kind philosophy. Besides, we are promised a—now listen, Ulric!—a most interesting structure!" balancing his words as he saw he began to arrest the attention of his auditor. "Ah! now you prick up your ears with some of your old enthusiasm: tomorrow by break of day, you must be in my private dissection room, under your dormitory, you know. The subject is the body of a young damsel—sudden death—strange case,—and all that! Probably one of Jan Speer's sweethearts, for that man would sell his mother's carcass; after all, Jan Speer, with one eye, one leg, and no heart, is the only man in Leipzig who can nab the dead with any spirit. Come along!"

And Ulric accompanied the lecturer to his apartment. The party only consisted of those he had named; they were Gellert's favourite associates, and he was welcomed by them with a cordiality that made his heart thrill, while the delicacy which refrained from all allusion to his latest transgression was a kindness the most touching and soothing to a mind like his. Noisy merriment, frivolous talk, and ribald carousal would have startled and disgusted him, but here there was none of these. The night waned, but it still found them over the wine flask; Ulric's despondency had long given place to tranquil enjoyment,—tranquillity became cheerfulness, and cheerfulness waxed anon into mirth. When the party broke up it was with the determination of meeting in a few hours, at day-break, in the dissection room. Ulric's head throbed feverishly,—his steps were unsteady, and, for the first time in his life, his intellects were under the influence of the rosy god!

Ulric fell asleep the instant he got into bed; but an incubus sat upon his breast, and wild, terrific dreams distracted his slumbers; suddenly he thought that he found himself in the private dissection room of the lecturer, beside the "interesting subject," which had been the last topic of discourse, ere he parted with Kramen, Werner, and their entertainer, a few hours before. He thought that he was quite alone, and inspired by a desire to commence the anatomy of the body before the arrival of his friends, he collected the necessary apparatus, and advanced to the table on which it lay prepared for dissection.

Withdrawing the sheet that covered it, he was astonished to perceive the emaciated body of an old man, instead of that which he had been led to expect; there was no other subject in the chamber, and, advancing closely to the body, he started to behold that it was the Baron de Rosenthal that lay, dead and ghastly, before him! As he gazed upon it, he imagined that he perceived a demoniac and contemptuous sneer distort the countenance of the deceased. The recollection of the bitter taunts which had been levelled at him by the Baron, inspired him with a momentary feeling of hatred, and he plunged the amputating knife into the side of the body. Suddenly, he thought, a shriek rang through the apartments,—the livid corpse heaved convulsively, and, stretching forth its withered hand, it clutched him by the hair as he bent his head over it! With the wrench of maddened terror, the dreamer imagined that he released himself from the grasp of the dead, and seizing the hand which had held him, with one blow of his knife, he severed it from the wrist of the corpse, and rushed with it from the chamber. Stumbling over gravestones and coffins, each of which held a grinning resemblance of the Baron. He thought that he at length reached his own room; and, panting with his exertions, his body still bedewed with the sweat of terror, Ulric awoke!

The lamp was still flickering beside his couch, and the grey dawn, that began to break through his casement, shed a ghastly light over the room. He started up, and blushing deeply with a feeling of shame, to which he had been hitherto a stranger, at finding that he had retired to his couch without having divested himself of any other part of his dress than his watch, he put his hand under the pillow where he usually placed it, in search of it. A cold and clammy substance met his grasp; his heart, he knew not why, thrilled as he drew back his arm! Good God! his fingers were covered with blood!

With a singular sensation of horror, apprehension, and disgust, he flung aside the pillow, and beheld—a HUMAN HAND! the small delicate, exquisitely beautiful hand of a woman, severed at the wrist, and dripping with gore!

He screamed aloud such a scream as man seldom utters, unless he be a maniac, but he was no maniac; there was but one hand on earth like that,—he knew it instantly! he sprang from the spot,—he flew to the dissection room; the pass-key which he had consigned to his pocket the preceding night was in the lock—had he been there? He entered the apartment—it was tenantless of the living, but there was an uncovered body on the table. It was the corpse of Alethea de Rosenthal!

Pure, white, beautiful, cold as marble, she lay like a sleeping saint whom sin had never tainted,—sorrow never more could pain. Beside her was an amputating knife, and one of her small, delicate hands was missing!

Ulric Gellert was found lying senseless on the floor of his own bed-room, with the BLEEDING HAND beside him. On his recovery from an illness of many months, he left Leipzig, where he was never again heard of. There is no doubt of his having proceeded in his sleep to the dissection room, where he must have severed from the body of her whom he loved, that hand which had so recently been clasped in his own, living, warm, and caressing! Of Alethea's death little need be said; an illness, chiefly occasioned by the severe treatment of her father, and neglected until too late, released her pure spirit from the endurance of earthly sorrows, and the sorrows of earthly love.

LETTERS TO THE WORKING CLASSES. No. I.

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN.—It has so long been the custom of your rulers to deceive you with the most gross misrepresentations of your real political condition, and to delude you with the idea that you possess political rights to an extent enjoyed by the working classes of no other nation, that these misrepresentations have absolutely become identified with your own opinions, and you have learnt to echo the wilful falsehoods originally propagated amongst you by designing men. These same rulers, in order to support the tyrannical institutions which surround the throne, have long used their most strenuous exertions to keep you in a state of moral degradation and abasement, through the medium of your predilection in favour of alcoholic liquors; and every facility to obtain those poisons at a cheap rate has been afforded you by the government, for the purpose of destroying your intellectual powers by means of intemperance. This infamous and inhuman calculation on the part of the government has been more terrible in its effects upon you, than was the infernal policy of the Turkish councillor, Khabul Tschendrell, who first proposed the organisation of the Janizaries. The result of that calculation has been to concentrate all your thoughts in the one fatal indulgence so easily and carefully provided for you, and thus to avert your attention from the misdeeds of your rulers. So long as you pass your time in public-houses, and there partake of those deleterious drinks which impair, and ultimately ruin the intellect, the iniquities of your sovereigns and their ministers or creatures remain unnoticed.

The government, while it has thus supplied you so plentifully with the intoxicating liquors which prevent you from entertaining a just sense of your own long-abused rights and privileges, has also taken care to inculcate a belief amongst you that you are "the freest people upon the face of the earth." Fellow-countrymen,—this is a wicked, an infamous, a shameful falsehood! In what are you free? Are those laws based upon political freedom, which provide one sense of their application to the rich, and another to the poor? are those statutes free which afford every facility to the rich man to escape or procrastinate punishment, when a desperate assault is committed, as in the case of the aristocratic miscreant Lord Waldegrave,—and which would visit upon you, working men, a similar offence with terrible rigour? Are you free, so long as you are compelled to tolerate the hereditary succession of a parcel of aristocratic despots like the generality of the members of the House of Lords,—so long as you are compelled to pay enormous sums for the support of pompous and illiberal priests, by whom you are despised and trampled upon—and so long as your sovereigns have the power to confer the highest titles of the land upon any German paupers whom they may select as their matrimonial partners? Oh! no, you are not free, fellow-countrymen, while you tolerate these abuses! The Belgian, in a country where agriculture is not taxed,—the Frenchman, in a land where monarchical power is but a name, and where the authority of the middle classes is well understood and recognised,—the inhabitant of the United States of America, where that republican system, which your rulers pronounce to be an impossibility, exists in all its purity and efficiency,—all these are more free than you!

And why are you more enslaved, then, than the working classes of those nations which are upon an equal footing of civilization with yourselves? The answer is ready,—because you have sold yourselves to the demon of intemperance; because you have made a compact, far more terrible than the fabled bond entered into by Faust of Germany with the enemy of mankind, to sell your souls to the Satan of alcoholic hell; because you give way to a degrading habit, instead of keeping your intellects free and unimpaired to watch over your political interests with vigilance and effect; because you pass your time in the public-house instead of improving your minds and adapting them to the rational enjoyment of that liberty which you have a right to demand; because you encourage your rulers in all their iniquities, by the immoral example which you yourselves set the world; and because you would not dare take upon your shoulders the government of an empire before you have properly understood how to govern your own passions!

An opportunity is now offered you, working-men, to throw off the yoke of intemperance, and enter upon a new life. Thousands, nay, millions of your fellow-countrymen have already set you the grand example; and I feel sure that you will not manifest less powers of self-denial than they! So long as you remain intemperate, you will be slaves; the government does not dread you, so long as your intellectual eyes are blinded by strong drinks. As rational men, then,—as patriots,—as fathers of families, come forward, resign the intoxicating draught, remove the source of temptation altogether, suffer not the light of your intelligences to be concealed beneath the bushel of the public-house, throw off the shackles of an evil genius, and assert your right to be heard, through the means of universal suffrage, with the confidence of men who know that, in demanding that privilege, they do not require the enjoyment of a liberty of which they would not know how to make use! Awake from the long night of mental darkness in which ye have been plunged, buckle on the armour of temperance, reform yourselves first, and the reformation of the state will soon follow, and render tyrannical institutions unnecessary, by showing your legislators that they have no longer to deal with savage brutes, but with rational and thinking men. Let the Genius of Britain, seated on her island throne, extend her hand to welcome the arrival of the Goddess of Temperance,—that goddess who, far less fabulous than the ancient deities of the heathen mythology, may indeed be said to have descended from the empyrean heights of a better world!

GRACCHUS.

POTATOES IN PRUSSIA.—The Prussians appear to excel even the Irish in their fondness for potatoes, as well as in the various modes of preparing them for use. A recent traveller states that he has frequently on one occasion seen them served up in six different forms,—the bread made from them, the soup thickened with them, fried potatoes, potatoe salad, and potatoe dumplings; and, lastly, potatoe cheese, which besides being extremely palatable, will keep some years.

REVIEWS.

The Entomological Cabinet: being a Natural History of British Insects. Nos. 1. and 2. Illustrated with Plates. By GEORGE SAMOYLIK, A. L. S., Author of the "Entomologist's Useful Compendium." London: George Henderson. 1840.

With the work before us as a companion, we could stray with delight in the pathless forest, the mountain glen, or the more homely fields and meadows, yea, even along the hedges and ditches of our native land, and find "society where none intrudes" in the sweet companionship of the most lovely, beautiful, and instructive creations that are to be found in animated nature:—we mean Insects.

It has been objected to the systematic study of natural history, and particularly to the study of insects, that it tends to withdraw the mind from subjects of higher moment; that it cramps and narrows the range of thought; and that it destroys, or at least weakens, the finer creations of imagination and fancy. Now, we should allow this objection in its fullest extent, and would even be disposed to carry it farther than is usually done, if the mere collecting of specimens, or, as the French expressively call them, chips (échantillons), be denominated study. But the mere collector is not, and cannot be justly considered as a naturalist; and in the enlarged sense of this term we can adduce some distinguished instances in opposition to the objection. Rousseau, for example, was passionately fond of the Linnean Botany, even to the driest minutiae of its technicalities, and yet it does not appear to have cramped his mind nor impoverished his imagination. If Rousseau, however, be objected to as an eccentric character, from whose pursuits no fair inference can be drawn, we give the examples of Charles James Fox, and our distinguished poets, Goldsmith, Thomson, Gray, and Darwin, who were all enthusiastic naturalists; and yet the study appears not, as the objection would imply, to have fettered, but rather to have enlarged, their fancy. We may, perhaps, be permitted to allude to King Solomon, who is recorded to have studied the most minute as well as the largest of nature's productions, and the richness of his imagery in his song, is sufficient evidence of his powers of fancy; but we wish particularly to insist upon the example of Gray, because he was very partial to entomology, the subject more immediately before us. It may be new to most of our readers, who are familiar with the Elegy in a Country Church Yard, and the Odes of Gray, to be told that he was at the pains to turn the characteristics of the Linnean orders of insects into Latin hexameters, the MS. of which is still preserved in his interleaved copy of the "Systema Naturæ," from which we shall give, as a literary curiosity, the following specimen.—

HYMENOPTERA.

*At citreus alas, juncunque, Hymenoptera caule
Furcata data tela grægi mirabique negata.
Telum abdit spirale Cygnus,* morsuque minatur.
Maxillas Trutheio† movet, serramque bivalvem.
Juncunem‡, gracili triplex abdomine telum:
Et valde aurato resplendet corpore Chrysus§.
Haurit Apis lingua incurva, quod vindicat ense.
Sphæx¶ alam expandit lævem, gladiumque recondit.
Aix ruga uolat Vespa, caudaque venenum.
Squamula Formica¶¶ tergi, telumque pedestrem,
Dum minor alata volitat cum conjuge conjux,
Mascula impennis, sed canda spicula vicat.*

It would, indeed, be vain to expect in these hexameters any of Gray's finer poetic touches, such as he has so richly sprinkled over his other Latin verses, and which are so universally known in his exquisite English pieces; but these very lines serve to show most the fallacy of the objection which we are combating.

With respect to insects, it has been well said by our most eminent entomologists, that they appear to have been nature's favorite productions, in which, to manifest her power and skill, she had combined and concentrated almost all that is either beautiful and graceful, interesting and alluring, or curious and singular, in every other class and order of her children, and even to the minutest has given the most delicate touch and highest finish of her pencil. Some she has armed with glittering mail, possessing all the lustre of burnished metals: in others she lights up the luminous radiance of polished gems. She has bedecked a few with what looks like liquid drops or plates of gold and silver, or with scales which mimic the colour and emit the ray of the same precious metals. Like stones in their native state, some insects exhibit a rough unpolished exterior, whilst others represent their smooth and shining face after they have been submitted to the tool of the polisher. Others again, by the rugged and various elevations and depressions of their tuberculated crust, present to the eye of the beholder no unapt imitation of the unequal surface of the earth—now studded with mis-shapen rocks, ridges, and precipices, at one time swelling into hills and mountains, and at another sinking into valleys, glens, and caves, while not a few are covered with branching spines, which, with a little stretch of fancy, as M. Reaumur observes, may represent a forest of trees.

If we extend the comparison to the vegetable kingdom, we shall find that insects vie with its finest productions; some in the delicacy and variety of their colours—colours, however, not like those of flowers, evanescent and fugitive, but fixed and durable, outliving the insect which they adorn, and appearing as fresh and brilliant as when it was alive. Others are no less remarkable in the texture and veining of their wings, or in the rich cottony down, or rather feathers, that clothe them. Nature, indeed, has in many insects carried her mimetic art to so great a degree of nicety, that some of them appear to have robbed the trees of their leaves to form for themselves artificial wings, so exactly do they resemble them in form, substance, and vascular structure—some representing green and others dry withered leaves. Sometimes this mimicry, if we may call it so, is so exquisite, that a whole insect might be mistaken for a portion of the branching spray of a tree, or for a dead lifeless twig—appearances which seem to be intended to deceive their natural enemies. The rich and velvet tints of the plumage of birds are not superior to what the curious observer may discover in a variety of moths and those iridescent eyes which deck so gloriously the peacock's tail, are successfully imitated in the wings of one of our most common butterflies, Vanessa Io.

In variety, indeed, insects certainly exceed every other class of animals. Nature, in her sportive mood, when painting them, sometimes imitates the clouds of heaven, at others the meandering course of the rivers of the earth, or the undulation of their waters. Many are veined like beautiful marbles; and others have the semblance of a robe of the finest net-work thrown over them; and whether we contemplate their wonderful metamorphoses—their ever varying economy—their extraordinary and frequently grotesque structure—their prodigious numbers—or the anatomical dimensions of some of them, the mind is equally lost in admiration of the infinite power displayed by the CREATOR, and gratified by the reflection, that His supreme beneficence has willed to call them into existence for the use and advantage of mankind.

Who, therefore, that meditates upon these things, and upon the parental kindness of the "FIRST GREAT CAUSE" towards these and all His other creatures, is not urged frequently to exclaim with Stillingfleet:—

"—ALMIGHTY BEING,

Cause and support of all things, can I view
These objects of my wonder: can I feel
These fine sensations, and not think of thee."

Such of our readers as have taken little notice of our native insects, may look upon some of our expressions as exaggerated, hyperbolic, and altogether unsupported by fact; but though we cannot boast of British examples to bear us out in all that we have just said, we are, notwithstanding, profusely rich in many of the tribes—to an extent, indeed, which the uninitiated might, with some colour of justice, refuse to credit. Since we began the study, indeed, several years ago, we have been utterly astonished that we had before so long overlooked the countless variety and beauty of our native insects. What art can equal the brilliant silvery blue of the beautiful and lovely Polyommatus Adonis (the Clifden blue butterfly); the iridescent purple splendour of the Lycæna Chryseis (the Purple-edged copper butterfly); the fiery and almost dazzling cupreous wings of Lycæna dispar and virgaurea (the Large and the Scarce copper butterflies); the gorgeous silver spots, streaks, and fasciae of the Argynni (the Fritillary butterflies); or the elegant metallic cilia and markings of various groups of Tineidæ? whose wings may be truly said to be

"With silver fringed, and freckled o'er with gold."

—Again, the fine and gaudy colouring of the tiger moths as they are commonly called, and the singularly delicate pencilling on the under surface of the wings of Cynthia cardui (the Painted lady butterfly), and Vanessa Atalanta (the Admirable butterfly); and on the upper surface of those of many Geometridæ, are, equally with the more glittering colours, beyond the utmost reach of the pictorial art.

To come to minute description, we may mention, that among the Beetles, the Genus Brachinus are endowed with a remarkable and singular property as a defence against the attacks of their enemies. At the posterior extremity of the abdomen a little sack or bladder is placed, which is furnished with the means of producing a highly volatile fluid, which the animal has the power of suddenly ejecting: this fluid is apparently of an acid nature, and is of so pungent a quality as to irritate considerably any part of the body on which it falls; and if any should get into the eyes, the pain for a time is excessive, and if permitted to be discharged upon the skin, it becomes coated with a kind of dusky tinge. Now, from the very rapid volatilization of this fluid when emitted from the body of the animal, a curious effect is produced, accompanied with a considerable explosion, especially in the larger continental species, as related by foreigners, and a bluish kind of vapour ascends, which is found to be most beneficially employed by the animal for its own preservation. In common with the other Geodephaga (ground beetles), this insect is obnoxious to the attacks of the larger species; and it has been observed that when one of the latter makes an assault upon it, that it lies down in the path of its adversary, who advances with expanded jaws, ready to devour it, and immediately discharges its artillery, as it has not unaptly been termed, which causes the enemy to draw back in confusion, when the Brachinus conceals itself in some neighbouring crevice, or flies off: the latter method is seldom resorted to. From this military kind of procedure, the Brachini have been called bombardiers; and it is stated by Rowlander, that they are capable of effecting eighteen or twenty discharges at a time, though, notorious as this fact is, a practical English collector asserts that the account is little better than a fable, and an amusing tale; but we presume that this author must have laboured under some delusion, or has not paid that attention to the subject which appears requisite, before attempting to controvert a well-established fact. So far as our experience leads me, we have invariably found that the insects are ready to discharge their ammunition at all times, especially if roughly handled; and we have ourselves seen one at Cobham, in the beginning of last spring, perform the operation no less than thirteen times in rapid succession.

One of the largest of our British insects, the death's-head hawk-moth, (Acherontia atropas), has several points of interest in its history. It commits such extensive depredations on the honey of bee-hives, that it has been by some denominated the bee-tiger. The marking on the back of its thorax, which has considerable resemblance to a cranium or death's-head, combined with the feeble cry of the insect, which closely resembles the noise caused by the creaking of a cork when pierced with a cork-screw, more than the plaintive squeaking of a mouse, to which it has been compared, has caused the insect to be looked upon by superstitious persons as the "harbinger of death, disease, and famine;" and the sudden appearance of a brood of this insect in Bretagne, as M. Latreille tells us, during the prevalence of an epidemic disease, tended to give "confirmation strong" of the notions of the superstitious, the disease being universally attributed to the insects.

Considerable diversity of opinion prevails amongst naturalists respecting the organ which enables the insect to make the noise above alluded to; and common as the insect is, the point remains undecided. Reaumur and Roësel attribute it to the friction of its maxillæ (jaws) against its palpi (feelers), an opinion which has been followed by many, and apparently with justice, as the structure of the latter organ seems calculated for the purpose; but Engrameille informs us that M. de Jobet plucked out the maxillæ, and cut off the palpi, of one of these insects, and yet the noise was produced when the wings were agitated; he, consequently, imagined that the instrument causing the noise was connected with these latter appendages; and, upon an examination of them, he detected two concave scales (the netagium, common to all Lepidoptera) at their base, which he infers were the objects in question; for by depriving a second specimen thereof the insect became mute; according to M. de Jobet, therefore, the noise is occasioned by the air being suddenly propelled against these scales by the action of the wings. Again, M. Lorrey states that it arises from the air escaping rapidly from peculiar cavities communicating with the spiracles, and furnished with a fine tuft of hairs, on the sides of the abdomen. In the Annales des Sciences Naturelles, &c., is a note by M. Dupouchet, relative to the observations of M. Passerini on this subject. After alluding to the opinions of Messrs. Reaumur, Roësel, and Lorrey, M. Dupouchet tells us, that he (M. D.) controverts them, by stating that the noise is produced from the interior of the head, in which is a cavity in communication with the trunk or maxillæ, and between which are placed the requisite muscles for its elevation and depression: he also notes, that having cut off the abdomen, the noise continued, as was also the case when the tongue was extirpated; and although it ceased when the muscle or bone mentioned was paralyzed, it was reproduced upon passing a strong pin, sharply and vertically, into the head. He further remarks, with reference to the opinion of M. Lorrey, that although both sexes utter the cry in question, one of them alone is furnished with the apparatus mentioned by him—an apparatus likewise found in other crepuscularia, especially MacroGLOSSA, which are mute.

Should our readers be disposed to charge M. Passerini with cruelty, in piercing with pins the head of the poor insect, we refer them to the ingenious arguments adduced to prove that insects feel little or no pain, in "Kirby and Spence's Introduction to Entomology."

In conclusion, we cannot speak in too high terms of the execution of this work, which we observe is to be completed in twenty numbers at one shilling each. The coloured figures are in the highest style of the art, both exquisitely finished and accurately coloured; and the descriptions are very full and minute, a large portion of them having been described from specimens under the author's eye, in his own rich, and in many respects, unique cabinet.

* Gall-fly. † Saw-fly. ‡ Cuckoo-fly. § Golden-wasp.
¶ Sand-wasp.

The Monthly Magazine. Number for October. Edited by J. A. HERAUD, Esq. London: Sherwood and Co. 1840.

This veteran in periodical literature has just followed the example of its senior, The Monthly Review, and has devoted upwards of a dozen closely printed pages to the discussion of the grand question of Teetotalism. An article by Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds, upon this subject, gives an account of the rise and progress of the cause, and affords to the uninitiated reader a correct idea of the present condition of the three great London Societies; viz.—The British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance,—The United Temperance Association,—and the New British and Foreign Temperance Society. The other contents of this number of the Monthly Magazine are varied and interesting. "The Paris Reminiscences" are replete with the deepest attractive powers.

The Temperance Messenger and Tract Magazine. Number for October. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

This valuable organ of the South Midland Temperance Association contains several articles of great utility to the cause of Teetotalism. "The Reply to Beta" is clever; and "Sam Sly's Second Epistle" is shrewd and caustic. The department of this periodical which is devoted to information, contains some cheering intelligence relative to the progress of the cause in Warwick, Wellinborough, Coventry, Hinckley, Barrowden, Leicester, &c.

Short Hand made Shorter. By J. C. CURTIS. New Edition. London: Cleave.

This very useful work may well aspire to the title of Stenography Simplified. The author has been for twenty-four years Reporter and Short-Hand Writer at the Old Bailey and other Metropolitan Sessions, and is therefore well adapted for the task he has undertaken. He has produced a very valuable system of Stenography, and one which is peculiarly commendable in consequence of its simplicity.

STIMULANTS.

We extract the following from Mr. EDWARD JOHNSON'S excellent work entitled "LIFE, HEALTH, AND DISEASE":—

A great deal of mischief has arisen from the misapplication of the term "strength" to the intoxicating power of "strong drinks," as they are called. Potions are said to be "strong;" and thence, I have no doubt, first arose the silly notion that they possess the power of strengthening the body—of communicating some portion of their own strength, I suppose, to the body of the drinker. People seem to suppose that by swallowing strong drink they actually swallow strength: as though strength were some tangible substance, which can be chewed, swallowed, and assimilated, like a potatoe. We say that onions have a "strong smell;" and we might as well expect to derive strength from smelling onions, as to do so by drinking fluids which have a strong flavour. We call them strong, because they affect us strongly, and this, of itself, is another proof of their mischievous tendency;—for whatever affects us strongly, cannot be "chip-in-porridge;" and if it be not good and necessary, it must, of necessity, be not only simply injurious, but very highly so.

But, after all, mankind in general know how to live, as well as I can tell them. They do not err from ignorance. They are spell-bound by passion—seduced by pleasure, and hood-winked;—but they are hood-winked willingly. They know that spirit, wine, ale, &c., are unnecessary, and even hurtful. All writers, in every age, have written in favour and praise of temperance, both in eating and drinking. Universal experience proves its necessity, if we would possess the "mens sana in corpore sano." Individual experience proves it equally:—the horrible sensations felt in the morning after a debauch—the frequent necessity which most men have been under of desisting wholly from intoxicating drinks in order to recover their lost health—the utter loathing with which he who is not habitually a toper regards, next day, the beverage which intoxicated him—and fifty thousand other tokens, too clearly evident to be mistaken. The very word "intoxicated" signifies "to shoot with poisoned arrows." If men really thought that daily doses of wine, and spirit, and ale, were necessary to improve their health and strength, those who could afford it would give them to their favourite hunting horses and their pet dogs. Yet they do not this. The training jockey does not mix wine or brandy with the daily allowance of water to the horses he has under training for the course. All men know that luxurious feeding is injurious to health, and rigid temperance beneficial. But the fact is, the rogues like it, and will have it, right or wrong; or, if they be blind, they are, at all events, determined not to be cured of their blindness. They had rather not see the evils they incur, than sacrifice the pleasure of incurring them. What they really want, is some rule which shall enable them to continue to enjoy the table and the bottle, and yet escape the consequent evils. They want a sort of impenetrable armour—a kind of philosopher's stone—some magic elixir, which shall confer on them a talismanic immunity from the evils of intemperance. They would fain discover some Styx, wherein to baptize themselves, and become invulnerable to disease. If a thousand men were to read this Letter, there probably would not be one but would see, and feel, and acknowledge, that its doctrines are true; but it is no less probable that every man of them would close it when he had done, and call for his brandy-and-water with as much composure as though he were doing the most sensible thing in the world. Or perhaps they would each remark: "Well! I have drunk brandy-and-water for these twenty years, and I do not see that it has done me any harm; so I shall e'en go on as heretofore."

"I have drunk a gallon of beer every day," once boasted a certain hostler, "for the last thirty years, and I was never in better health than I am at this moment." The next day, a fit of apoplexy laid him dead in a ditch.

It is the SENSIBILITY of our organs which establishes the necessary relations between ourselves and the objects which surround us. From this it follows directly, that it is upon SENSIBILITY that all our pleasures and all our pains depend; for there is no pleasure and no pain which is not derived to us from impressions made by external objects upon our feeling—of which feeling, SENSIBILITY is the soul. I mean, the feeling as well of the mind as the body.

Now, the SENSIBILITY of a perfectly healthy man is so regulated, as to afford him the greatest possible degree of pleasure with the least possible degree of pain; that is, consistently with his terrestrial existence. Indeed, our pleasures are the voluntary and bountiful gift of nature. For our pains, we have nobody to thank but our foolish selves. So good has the great Governor of the Universe been to us, that we could not, if we would, escape the pleasure; but, in almost every instance, we can avoid pain, if we will: for pain is only a warning voice, intimating to us that we have got into a false position—that we are doing something which we ought not to do, or leaving something undone which we ought to do;—in a word, that the proper relation between ourselves and surrounding objects has been, for the time, destroyed. Man, if he would but be content to be what nature made him, need scarcely know what pain is.

HUNGER AND THIRST.

HUNGER may be defined to be the want of solid aliment, characterized by a peculiar uneasy sensation in the region of the stomach, and by a general feebleness more or less marked. This feeling is generally renewed after the stomach has been for some time empty; it is variable in its intensity and in its nature in different individuals, and even in the same person. Its violence in some is excessive;—others scarcely feel it, and eat only because the hour of repast has arrived. Many individuals suffer from a drawing pain—a pressure more or less uncomfortable in the epigastric region, accompanied by yawnings, and a particular rumbling noise created by the gases contained in the stomach, which becomes contracted. When this want is not immediately satisfied it increases, and sometimes becomes a severe pain;—the same occurs with the sensation of weakness and general fatigue which is felt, and may even increase to a most dangerous extent. To the general phenomena of hunger is ascribed a weakness and diminution of the action of all the vital organs; the circulation and respiration become slow—the bodily heat decreases—the secretions diminish—the whole of the functions are exerted with more difficulty. Absorption only is said to become more active, but nothing is strictly demonstrated in this respect.

The desire for drinking is called thirst. It varies in different individuals, and is but seldom uniform in the same person. The symptoms of thirst consist of a dryness, heat, and constriction, which reigns in the posterior part of the mouth, the pharynx, oesophagus, and occasionally the stomach. Although thirst continues but for a short period, these parts swell, become red, and the mucous secretions cease almost entirely; that of the follicles changes, becoming thick and tenacious; the flowing of the saliva diminishes, and its viscosity is sensibly augmented. These phenomena are accompanied by a vague inquietude, and by a general heat; the eyes become red; the mind is troubled; the circulation of the blood is accelerated; the respiration becomes laborious; the mouth is frequently opened wide, in order to bring the external air into contact with the irritated parts, and thus afford a transient alleviation. For the most part, the inclination to drink is developed, when by some cause (as for example, heat and dryness of the atmosphere,) the body has lost a great deal of fluid; but it appears under a great many different circumstances, such as having spoken long, having eaten certain sorts of food, or swallowed a substance which remains in the oesophagus, &c. The vicious habit of frequently drinking, and the desire of tasting some liquids, such as brandy, wine, &c., create a development of a feeling bearing a great analogy to thirst. There are many persons who state that they never felt thirst, and who drink from a species of sympathy, but who could live for a long time without thinking of it, or without suffering from want of it; there are others in whom thirst is frequently renewed that it becomes so powerful as to cause them to drink, according to the statement of Magendie, from forty to sixty pints of liquid in the twenty-four hours; in this respect great individual differences are remarked. In concluding these remarks, we may observe that thirst is an internal sensation, an instinctive feeling; it appertains essentially to the organization, habits, &c., of the individual, and admits of no other explanations; at least physiologists are unable to assign any other.

VARIETIES.

GIBBON.—Whenever Gibbon was going to say a good thing, it was observed he announced it by a complacent tap on his snuff-box. Life might have been a gloomier thing even than it was to Dr. Johnson, if he had not enlivened his views of it with the occasional stimulus of a pinch. Napoleon, in his flight from Moscow, was observed one day, after putting a log on to a fire, impatiently seeking for a last chance of a consoling thought, and he found it in the corner of his snuff-box. It was his last pinch; and most imperatively he pinched it, digging it, and fetching it out from its entrenchment.

BOURDEAUX.—The vineyards near Bordeaux yield annually a million of hogheads of wine, of which 100,000 are converted into Brandy. The red sorts sell on the spot from 3000 to 300 francs per ton of four hogheads; the white sorts sell from 1200 to 1500 francs per ton of four hogheads. 80,000 tierces of brandy and spirits of wine are exported from Bordeaux. Cognac is on the Charente, and exports largely.

THE SAGACITY OF A DOG.—In 1778 died at Aberdeen a gentleman of the name of Irving, whose life had, a few years before, been saved by the sagacity of a dog. This gentleman was passing across on the ice, when the river was frozen over; the ice giving way in the middle, he fell in, but saved himself from sinking by grasping his gun, which had fallen across the opening. The dog, after many fruitless attempts to save his master, ran to a neighbouring house, and laid hold of the coat of the first man he met with. The man was alarmed, and would have disengaged himself, but the dog regarded him with a look so kind and so significant, and endeavoured to pull him along with so gentle a violence, that he began to think there might be something extraordinary in the case, and suffered himself to be conducted by the animal, who led him to his master in time to save him. This anecdote is noticed by Dr. Beattie in his philosophical writings.

PUBLIC HOUSE IN THE MOON.—A rustic having gone to the Calton Hill Observatory to get a sight of the Moon, and, after having got a glance of it, drew away his head to wipe his eyes, and in the interval the end of the telescope noiselessly fell down, so as, instead of pointing to the heavens, to point down to the earth. The rustic's surprise was unutterable when he again looked through, and beheld the sign of a public-house at a short distance, with the customary declarations,—"Edinburgh Ale," &c. With a look more easily conceived than described, he started back and exclaimed, "Edinburgh ale in the moon! Gude preserve us! that beats a'!"

EUSTACHE DE NOBLE.—The following brief sketch of a late popular French author may not prove uninteresting to the reader. Eustache de Noble was the scion of a rich and eminent family, which he however did not hesitate to disgrace in the most flagrant manner. How a gentleman well-born—holding the rank of attorney-general to the parliament at Metz—and highly connected, could have degraded himself to such an extent as to forge legal documents, we cannot imagine. But such was the consequence of his misconduct! Dragged to the prisons of the Chatelet in Paris, and condemned to a heavy fine and banishment, Le Noble appealed against his sentence. He was then transferred to the Conciergerie, and there became acquainted with a female of the name of Gabrielle Perrau, who was incarcerated for licentious conduct. This woman, who was known as the "Beautiful Grocer," induced him to make his escape with her—a feat which he accomplished with a little trouble. This worthy couple then proceeded to an obscure part of the city, where they resided together under a fictitious name. Le Noble was however re-captured, tried once more, and banished! He subsequently obtained permission to return to France, on condition that he should not exercise any judicial or official functions in the country. He continued his disorderly style of life, died in rags, and was buried through public charity. During the perusal of his numerous works, it is impossible not to be struck with the vividness of the imagination, and the extent of the talents possessed by this rotary of crime and dissipation. He was profoundly acquainted with every branch of les belles lettres;—history, politics, ethics, theology, the art of translation into prose or verse, romance, comedy, tragedy, poetry,—in a word, all kinds of literary studies furnished food for his prolific pen. Novels were the least portion of his writings. His publisher obtained a profit of not less than twelve thousand pounds through his various publications; and he himself nevertheless died in the most abject misery.

THE USE AND EXCELLENCE OF REASON.—Although reason since the fall is greatly depraved, and therefore insufficient of itself to guide us to God, and although it is often erroneous in temporal affairs yet it is still a noble faculty, and very useful in the following particulars:—first, to judge of the general principles of natural religion, as the being and natural perfections of God, his providence, and the necessity of worshipping him, together with the propriety of virtue, and the probability of a future state of rewards and punishments. Secondly, to judge of the evidences of revealed religion and the contents of it, so far as within its reach; thus, for instance, reason not only points out the expediency of a revelation, but can examine that which professes to come from God, whether it bears the marks of credibility or not, and if it should find it true, so far then reason can determine whether the general contents of it are agreeable to natural religion, and how far it is superior, with respect to promoting the piety and happiness of mankind. Thirdly, it is of great use in all the arts and sciences, and mental improvements in general. Lastly, it is of manifest advantage in all the common concerns of life, to guard us against injuries, errors, and prejudices, and to direct us (in subservience to revelation) in all our conduct, both private and public. In all these respects, and perhaps in many more, reason is highly beneficial, and especially so when accompanied with grace.—Wilmot.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.—A Bavarian scientific and experimental chemist has invented a system by means of which telegraphic despatches can be forwarded both during the day and during the night, whether the atmosphere be serene or cloudy, whether the weather be clear or rainy. He has employed the electric fluid, and it appears that the experiments which have been made of his plan have met with success in his country. An English gentleman has proposed to government to establish such a system in England, but as he had not yet formed a system of signs by which the despatches could be both transmitted and interpreted, nothing yet had been decided.

ESSAY ON DANCING.—A party of ladies and gentlemen (who elsewhere pass for intelligent beings) assemble in a ball-room. Soon they array themselves in opposing lines; presently a young lady jumps up from the floor, shakes one foot, and comes down again,—again she springs up, and the other foot quivers,—then she turns round in her place, springs up, and shakes both feet. Her intelligent partner opposite performs the same operation. Then both rush forward, and seize each other's hands, and jump up again, shake their feet, turn round, return to their places, jump up again, then shake their feet, and stand still.

The next lady and gentleman, very rationally and soberly, follow the example just set them, by jumping, shaking, and turning, and so on to the end; and all for no other purpose that I can perceive, than because black Cuffie sits in the corner yonder, drawing a horse-hair across a cat-gut.—American Paper.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

The Teetotallers of this town have established an Anti-Tobacco Society with very considerable success. The members pledge themselves to abstain from tobacco, snuff, cigars, and opium, and to discountenance the use of them in every way. The correspondent, who favours us with this information, expresses his surprise that the pages of The Teetotaler are silent relative to so crying an evil as the use of tobacco, the attempt to discountenance which is of paramount importance to the cause of Teetotalism. In many cases drunkenness is only one of the effects arising from the consumption of the above-mentioned weed. While so filthy a practice is allowed to rage undisturbed, the adherence of many individuals to the Teetotal pledge is materially threatened.

WATFORD.

About two months since Mr. WALKDEN, of Pinner Park, visited Watford for the purpose of hiring a place where the cause of total-abstinence might be advocated on the Sabbath-day. He has since frequently attended that place of meeting. The efforts of this gentleman and his supporters have been attended with the utmost success. We cannot bestow too much praise upon such laudable exertions to turn the leisure of the working classes on the Sabbath-day to so excellent an account.

BATH.

The Bath Juvenile Temperance Society was established on the 30th of April, 1838, and now numbers upwards of six hundred youths, from the age of eight to that of twenty-one. It is a source of infinite pleasure to all interested in the progress of Teetotalism, to understand, that, in spite of frequent and urgent temptation, these youths have all remained faithful to the pledge of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. This society held a tea-meeting on Monday, September 10th, and a large public assembly on October 5th. The weekly meeting is held every Friday evening. Great praise is due to the exertions of the Committee in printing and circulating tracts, and to the strenuous efforts of the Secretary, Mr. J. B. COAR, to promote the welfare of the association. The "Second Annual Report of the Bath Juvenile Temperance Society" has just been published. From it we gather the following information:—"Your Committee have much pleasure in stating, that a Branch Juvenile Society has been formed in the Village of Twerton, to which there are attached about 40 members, most of whom are engaged in the Cloth Manufactory, and who have, by their example and consistency, produced good impressions on the minds not only of their fellow-youths, but of those who have attained to maturer years."

—o—

TOWN NEWS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTemperance.

LECTURES are delivered every Friday evening, by Mr. WARDEN, at the Hall of Science, City Road, Finsbury. The subject is the all-absorbing one of Teetotalism; and the basis of the Lectures is MR. GRINDROB's excellent work, "Bacchus." MR. WARDEN sent a challenge to the Anti-Teetotal Lecturer, MR. T. MACCONNELL; and the discussion took place on Wednesday evening, October 21st. We shall report its issue in our next. The Teetotal world need not however remain in suspense relative to that issue; truth must prevail; and the defeat of MR. MACCONNELL is as certain as has been that of every opponent to Teetotalism.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE Meeting at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, on Wednesday evening, October 14th, was well attended.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, upon taking the chair, called the attention of the audience to the fact that several noblemen had lately manifested decided favour towards the progress of Teetotalism, and observed that, if the principles progressed for the next seven years, as they had done during the first seven years of their existence, the greater portion of the population of the United Kingdom would be total abstainers. The opponents to Teetotalism were daily becoming less numerous in strength, and more feeble in argument; and every symptom of success seemed to welcome the exertions of Temperance Associations.

MR. BUNSTED observed that there were several reasons purely of a selfish nature, wherefore the working classes should embrace the doctrines of total abstinence. The first was the saving of money which followed the relinquishing the evil and expensive habit of drinking; and the second was the improved state of health enjoyed by those who resigned that same fascinating habit.

MR. BOWLER (of Chelsea) spoke generally upon the good effects of Teetotalism.

MR. GREEN (of Westminster) addressed the audience in a most eloquent speech upon the effects of alcoholic liquors on the human frame. He demonstrated the pernicious consequences arising from the use of wine, and malt or spirituous liquors, and produced some valuable statistical information tending to show the decrease of crime attendant upon the circulation of the doctrines of total abstinence.

MR. CRUMP (the Registrar of the United Temperance Association) addressed the audience in a speech calculated to make a deep impression upon the working classes. He called attention to himself as one of the individuals who had been so largely benefitted by the principles of total abstinence.

The meeting at Aldersgate Street Chapel on Saturday evening, Oct. 17th, was also well attended.

MR. MEE gave his first astronomical lecture at this Chapel on Friday, Oct. 16th. The lecture was well attended, and the subject ably dealt with by Mr. Mee.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

MR. JEREMY, one of the Solons at the Union Hall police office, the business of which has long been conducted in a manner highly discreditable to the magistrates of the district, discharged, without punishment, a few days ago, three ruffians who were brought before him, charged with a most infamous assault upon a Mr. Matthews, who resided with his family in a cottage in rather an unfrequented part of the Lower Road, Deptford. The three assailants, whose names were Charles Evans, James Baker, and James Webb, had been drinking, and, under the influence of liquor, proceeded to attack the residence of Mr. Matthews "by way of a lark." Thus the peace of individuals is to be violated, a whole family placed in jeopardy, and the wilful violators of order and tranquillity are permitted, by an ignorant and weak magistrate, to escape all punishment, upon "making compensation to the complainant for the damage they had done to his property!"

THE WEEKLY DISPATCH of last Sunday contains a notice to correspondents, from which we extract the following paragraphs:—"Agricultural Labourers:—A poor fellow called on us last week, and begged that we would put him in the way of obtaining a gratuitous passage to New Zealand. He was a fine hearty man, apparently capable of enduring great fatigue. He assured us that he understood the management of sheep, and could, besides, perform all manner of agricultural labour, and that he never 'finched from work,' nor got drunk." There are thousands and thousands of such labourers now out of work; and their dreadful penury is to be traced to the evil state of the laws and the present badly-constituted condition of society. While a queen receives nearly six hundred thousand a year, for doing nothing, and a German pauper thirty thousand a year for helping her, the lower classes are in a state of the most awful destitution.

"MAIDSTONE.—A subscriber informs that a regular crusade against the licensed victuallers is going on at Maidstone. A little knot of persons busy themselves on the sabbath, going round the town: and woe be to him who is detected in selling a drop of beer, except in lawful hours, for he is sure of being lugged before the magistrates." We are glad to hear of this praise-worthy conduct of the Maidstone people, and sincerely hope that the persons alluded to are disciples of the pledge of total abstinence. It is disgraceful that public-houses should be allowed to remain open during any part of Sunday, while those shops which sell wholesome or necessary provisions are closed.

THE AUTHORITIES of all classes and ranks, in this country, invariably give every possible encouragement to publicans. We are grieved to learn that the magistrates of the Dunmow Sessions have decided that persons coming from a distance for the purpose of attending divine service at a place of worship of which they are regular members, are "travellers" within the meaning of the Act, and may be accommodated with refreshment at a beer-shop or public-house during the hours of divine service in a parish church.

ORTHODOX ALE.—A few weeks ago, a circumstance occurred on a sabbath-day in a congregation a few miles from Crieff which has since caused great amusement in this country side. It would appear that a country woman was in the habit of calling, during the interval of public worship on Sundays, at a certain public-house, for what she termed a bottle of orthodox ale, which she always drank during the interval of worship, accompanied by a good piece of bread and cheese. She called one sabbath-day lately for her bottle of ale before the forenoon worship, and having put it into her pocket, she went off direct to church. She had not remained above three-quarters of an hour there when the orthodox ale began whizzing in her pocket, to the no small annoyance of all around her. In a few minutes the bottle burst with a report like a musket-shot, the woman bawling out, "Oh me! I suppose my side's riven!" She was immediately taken to the door, when she was found to have sustained no injury excepting the loss of her bottle and its orthodox contents.—Perth Courier.

DETERMINED SUICIDE IN THE CITY ROAD.—A few days since a man named John Lupton, the keeper of a shop in the general line, in Cross street, City-road, resolved upon self-destruction, in order to effect which he swallowed an ounce of arsenic! after which he went to the Brown and Sceptre, in the neighbourhood, where he drank half a pint of beer, and then returned home. The stomach-pump was then suggested by his friends and neighbours, at which he evinced most outrageous conduct, declaring positively that he would shoot the first person who should dare to bring relief to his assistance, and he, therefore, (agreeably, it would seem, to his wish), expired on Sunday evening, without evincing so much pain as might have been expected, in a case which threw him into convulsive fits the day after his bodily receipt of the arsenic and beer. An inquest was held on Wednesday, on the body, at the Westmoreland Arms, when a verdict of "Temporary Insanity," through failure in business, was returned. The deceased had recently been addicted to hard drinking.

MR. HENDERSON, the publisher of No. 2, Old Bailey, has just issued a new and cheap edition of Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds's "Modern Literature of France." This work, complete, in two octavo volumes, may now be procured for the small sum of five shillings. Any one who is anxious to obtain an insight into French literature, will be able to gratify his wishes by a perusal of these volumes, which contain critical notices upon the writings of the most celebrated French poets and novelists of the present day, with elaborate extracts from their best works. These volumes are therefore calculated to amuse while they instruct.

WE are delighted to perceive that MR. DARWIN, an author whose case at the Mansion-House some weeks ago excited universal compassion, has at length some prospect of benefitting himself. He has a work to be shortly published, entitled "The Lion's Den." It is advertised by B. Steil, Paternoster Row, and is to be issued in monthly parts, price 2d. The first part is ready this day.

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell, Glasgow; Macdon & Co., Dublin; and all Booksellers in Town and Country.

London:—J. C. HENDERSON, Printer, 18, Banner Square.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 19.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER VI.

THE LOCK-UP HOUSE.

It seems to be a strange method of making a man pay his debts, by shutting him up in prison; or rather, it is a cruel and unnecessary punishment of an individual, for no possible good. There is not one man out of a hundred who is forced by incarceration to liquidate his debts; and laws should not be made for the minority, but for the mass. Where this system compels one to disgorge the money which he may have secreted by years of iniquity, it reduces thousands to beggary. Most people are under the necessity of obtaining their livelihood by their trade or profession; and imprisonment curtails all the resources of those occupations. The author alone can exercise his calling in a prison; but his spirit is generally broken by the iniquity of the treatment permitted by the system. But to our tale.

Melville implored Messrs. Nabem and Holdemori to allow him to proceed first to his little cottage and break the dread news to his wife, before he accompanied them to the lock-up house in London. This request was backed by the donation of a few shillings; and a reluctant consent was at length accorded. We shall not attempt to describe the grief of the young lady at the terrible announcement. She clasped her little boy to her arms, and already seemed to look upon him as if he were an orphan. She then clung wildly to her husband, and declared that nothing should separate her from him, or prevent her from following him to jail!

Suddenly a thought struck her.

"For how much is the debt?" she demanded, a ray of hope animating her beautiful countenance.

"Oh! it is for Tibbatts' bill—only a hundred and fifty pounds," he replied.

"A hundred and fifty pounds!" ejaculated the young wife, with an exclamation of joy; "my mother's ornaments will produce nearly that sum; and those jewels—the only ones which I have left—together with the money now in the house, will make up the amount required."

This dialogue took place in the French language; and Louise was about to put her plan into execution, when Melville said to the officer, "If you wait for an hour or so, the hundred and fifty pounds shall be paid to you. I shall not sleep in a goal to-night!"

"Hundred and fifty pounds!" cried Mr. Nabem, with a look of the most sovereign contempt at our hero: "what gentleman ever thought of going to quod for such a sum as that there? But this one, for vich you are to be laid up in lavender, is fifteen hundred pounds. Ain't it, Bill?"

Mr. Holdemori nodded an affirmative, as he twisted a battered gossamer about in his hands; and Louise fell almost senseless upon a chair as these words fell upon her ears. A flood of tears at length relieved her; and, with a sorrowful heart, she put on her bonnet and shawl, for the purpose of accompanying her husband to his sad destination. Mr. Holdemori was now despatched to fetch a hackney-coach; and in a short time the whole party was on the way towards the residence of Mr. Nabem, Chancery-lane.

During the ride, Melville observed a sullen silence. When the officer had intimated the amount for which he was arrested, he made no comment,—not a word escaped his lips, because he instantly comprehended the cheat that had been practised on him by Tibbatts. He saw that he was trampled under foot—ruined—undone;—he knew that he had a young and lovely wife, and a little child whom he had brought to distress;—and he felt that his own dissolute and degraded habits were the cause of all that misery. His spirit was almost broken within him; and he did not even feel a sufficiency of courage in his soul to thank the affectionate wife who would not desert him in the hour of his tribulation and despair!

At the expiration of about an hour and a half, the vehicle stopped at the door of the lock-up house in Chancery-lane. Mr. Nabem alighted first, and Melville was desired to follow him. Holdemori descended next; and Louise was left to follow as she could, with the boy in her arms. As the clock of Saint Dunstan's in Fleet-street struck the hour of midnight, the unfortunate young man ascended the flight of narrow stone steps leading to the door of Mr. Nabem's establishment, which stands at the corner of a carriage gate-way, and commands a pleasing view of a butcher's shop on the other side of the street.

Melville was conducted to a bed-room on the second floor, and his family were allowed to remain with him, at the express solicitation of Mr. Holdemori, who appealed to his superior to grant that favour upon payment of two sovereigns on the spot. The same laws that provide prisons and temporary places of incarceration for debtors, have forgotten to legislate against the extortions and preposterous amounts of fees which make the debtor poorer than he was before, and place the chance of payment at a greater distance than ever: the process of arrest frequently costs an unfortunate man, in the long run, much more than the sum for which his body was captured!

The room, to which Melville and his wife, with their little boy, were shown, was tolerably well furnished, but excessively dirty. The dust was an inch thick upon the massive gilt frames of some pictures representing naval engagements; and the mantel-ornaments were enveloped in a similar hazy cloud. The carpet was stained and soiled with grease; and the table-cloth was singed in various parts. The wood-work round the fire-place was perforated with a hot poker every here and there; and the poker itself was worn away at the end by the repetition of times it had been heated in the fire. These trivial circumstances spoke volumes concerning those who had inhabited that room in that spunging-house. The mind, harassed by a thousand evils, and tormented by the anticipation of more, finds no amusement in books, and wastes away the time in the most childish pursuits. Hearts are broken in those walls—ay, irrecoverably robbed of peace, of happiness, and even of hope! The handsome furniture of the rooms enveloped in dust, are emblems of the noble heart surrounded by the cob-webs of despair. Some may imagine, but none can describe, the acuteness—the bitterness—the agony of woe that has often been experienced in that chamber!

The bed in that room was pressed only by the form of the little child on the night of Melville's arrest. The unhappy father paced the room, bemoaning his fate; and the heart-broken wife remained seated upon a chair at the barred window, gazing listlessly upon the lamp opposite. The morning dawned—cold—cheerless—and raining; and, although many hours had passed away since his arrival at the lock-up house, Melville was as yet undecided how to act.

"A prison!" he exclaimed, as he walked up and down the room; "a prison! and to take my wife, and my child to a prison!"

And this was all that he said to himself; but he repeated these words very—very often. They seemed to express the only idea that retained any degree of consistency in his mind.

Wearily passed away the time; and at length a dirty servant-girl entered the room to light the fire. She seemed astonished at finding the occupants of the room already dressed; and then her surprise was increased, when she perceived, by a glance towards the couch, that they had not retired to rest at all. She did not however make any observation, but proceeded to light the fire.

At eight o'clock this same dirty servant girl brought up a breakfast-tray, and spread the table for the morning's meal. The little boy ate heartily, and laughed, and prattled and expressed his surprise that "papa had changed his house;"—for, alas! the poor little fellow knew not that the parents, who were kind to him, were the victims of an accursed law! He knew not that the thrones of all monarchs are raised upon the miseries of the people; and that the imprisonment of his father had its origin in that evil state of society which has been formed by monarchical government and aristocratic institutions!

But the morning's meal was untasted by either Melville or his wife; and from time to time those two disconsolate beings exchanged looks of sorrow, and a few words of a vain consolation.

Suddenly the door opened, and Mr. Tibbatts entered the room.

"Ah! booked at last!" cried that gentleman, who was attired in the very height of fashion, and about whose person there was enough jewellery to have paid a fifth of Melville's debt.

"Through you I am imprisoned, villain!" ejaculated Melville, eyeing with furious indignation the man who so coolly seated himself in that abode of sorrow.

"Through me—how?" demanded Mr. Tibbatts, affecting a tone of astonishment. "It is your acceptance to the bill, is it not?"

"Alas! too well have I reason to curse the hour of my acquaintance with you!" cried Melville. "Wretch—you cheated me out of that bill—you falsified the amount—you have betrayed my confidence in you, like a villain, as you are!"

"Calm yourself, my dear Melville," said Tibbatts, very coolly: "I can pardon a little excitement, under the circumstances. Marius might have felt himself annoyed, when sitting amidst the ruins of Carthage; and Victor Melville may certainly entertain the same feeling in a spunging-house. But—after all—it is your own fault; you should have paid the bill."

"I never received the value for it," cried Melville.

"Oh! I forget all about the transaction," said Mr. Tibbatts, playing with a beautiful watch-chain; "but my object in calling upon you is to see what you intend to do. You know my name is at the back of the bill; and I shall be sued unless something be done. Now, I tell you what I can do——"

"What—what?" ejaculated Louise: "speak—sir,—can you liberate my husband? Oh! if you can—I will forget all the past—I will call you our friend, our benefactor——"

"Silence, Louise!" cried Melville. "The miscreant cannot liberate me! He has encompassed me round about with his infernal machinations—he has ensnared me in his toils—and I have no hope but a debtor's gaol, and a debtor's straw!"

"Nonsense!" cried Tibbatts, affecting a laugh; "come—pay a thousand pounds, and you shall have your discharge."

"A thousand pounds!" exclaimed Melville, contemptuously: "all my fortune is swallowed up!"

"Well—seven hundred and fifty then?"

"No—no—I cannot!"

"Say five hundred, and there's an end of the whole affair. We will dine together at the Piazza in the evening, and forget all these little unpleasant matters," said Tibbatts coaxingly.

"Not one shilling will I pay, were I worth millions!" ejaculated Melville, dashing his clenched fist violently upon the table. "I have been ruined as much by you as by my own vices—I have been deceived, cheated, swindled by you,—and I will not enrich you more at my expense! No—I will go to the prison that awaits me, and relieve myself from this debt by the law that frees the honest debtor from imprisonment, after a few weeks' delay."

"Such is your intention?" cried Tibbatts.

"Neither hell nor heaven shall induce me to change my mind!" said Melville. "And now, villain—depart—leave this room,—irritate me no longer with your presence! If you stay, I am capable of doing you an injury, for I feel that I am not the master of my own passions!"

"Very well," cried Tibbatts, somewhat alarmed by the frantic manner of the young man; "you will soon grow tired of your sojourn in the King's Bench—Spike Island, we call it! Good bye, my dear fellow: when you want to get out, just write me a line—Captain Tibbatts, Stephen's Hotel, Bond-street—and I'll still do all I can to serve you. Mind you don't forget the Captain—that is my rank for the moment!"

And having delivered himself of this speech, Mr. Tibbatts turned upon his heel, and walked gently out of the room. Louise was about to hasten after him, to implore him to assist her husband in his present embarrassment; but Melville, who divined her intentions, held her back, saying, "Say not a word in my behalf, Louise—I conjure, I command you! I would sooner die in a gaol than lay myself under the slightest obligation to that miscreant!"

(To be continued.)

TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

LONDON is one of the largest cities in the world; it is also one of the most important; and recently it has aspired to be one among the magnificent. And there is a real magnificence in its profusion of splendid lamps, its convenient foot-pavements, the wealth displayed in its shop-windows, its carriages, and its well-ordered public servants,—in its vast extent, its vast resources, and its still vaster commerce. But in architecture—the tangible and apparent beauty and grandeur of great cities—it is grievously deficient, and it does not make the most of what it has. St. Paul's, for instance, though not so fine a building as the occasion demanded, is a fine building. But its dignity is rather to be guessed at, or deduced by logic, than seen by the eyes. Its dome may be seen in the distance, forming a half-length view of the building—its foot may be seen in the church-yard, an imperfect glimpse of the full length, with the wing's hidden, may be caught on Ludgate-Hill; but a fair view of the whole mass is only to be obtained by means of pictures in little, drawn by the rules of perspective from some station inaccessible to the actual spectator.

The Abbey is rather more exposed; but it stands leering down Tothill-street, while one may whiten one's shoulders in vain against the courts of law, in coquetting for a look at the venerable beauties of Henry VII.'s chapel; and St. Margaret's comes to help it still better to conceal itself from the lawyers as they pass into the Hall. St. Margaret's looks like a stunted and useless campanile, for the Minster has two towers already!

The New Post Office is in a wide street, but still it is a street; and the angle, at which it must be viewed, is consequently, one of the most obtuse. Hoare's Bank, the handsomest house in London, is in a narrow street. On the other hand, one gets a tolerable view of Nash's Needle, and the circumjacent beauties of Regent-street.

It is obvious, however, that a really fine building can rarely be placed in view just at the end of a street, even if that site would suffice to display it. It must stand in an open space, like Buckingham Palace—only that is not a fine building. The College of Surgeons, which has a handsome front, is half hidden by the shrubs before it. Besides, though that building does stand in a square, there is no choice in the point of view; it must either be close or distant. Now, such an open space as we require, we do not possess in all London.

London has squares, or "shrubberies" rather; but it has not got a piazza or place, such as the cities of the continent can boast. Lacking this, it lacks one of the finest features of a great city.

And it is not merely as an area for the display of architecture that such a place is wanted;—it is a noble sight in itself. The traveller from the open squares of Madrid or Paris—from the classic mouldering Eternal City, shrunken within its walls, with the majestic ruins standing in the gap—from the cheerful breadth of Santa Maria Maggiore, with its yellow gravel, in Florence the Fair, finds himself in London perpetually moving straight forward in a bounded line, and longs in vain for some open space to rest his eyes on. The nearest approach we have to such a place is in Gray's Inn New Square; but there is a moral monotony of the driest kind in knowing that it is surrounded by nothing but lawyers, and the unornate uniformity of their dwellings. The same remarks refer to the open space in the Temple. The space in front of Westminster Hall is uneven, neglected, and choked up with cabs and coaches, and more like a bit of waste ground.

Now there is Trafalgar-Square, not yet enclosed. It is in a central part, and communicates with many streets; and what could be better than to make it supply the chief defect remaining in the elements of a great city? There is to be a fountain. Good: a fountain is a handsome object. But let it be a good design, and copious in its streams,—not like the miserable little squirting things occasionally found in the obscure recesses of London. Let it be a noble building of moving waters, fit to stand in such a place, and subserve to the commemoration of one of Britain's greatest heroes. But above all, let the place be kept open: a shrubbery in front would kill the miserable National Gallery outright and would injure the church, the best part of which is its portico. The buildings round about are not of the finest; but they are not the worst, and altogether form a more tolerable collection than any other open space in London.

Two objections have been urged:—one that nursery-maids would be apt to perambulate the space, unrestricted by square-keys; and little boys would play at marbles and hoop. We can perceive nothing very frightful to the paternal authorities in this result. The other is that it would afford a ready area for public riots. The French revolution of 1830 however proved that narrow streets are the best fortresses for unorganized crowds.

Thus we might have a proper piazza in London, and learn to call the arcades in Covent Garden by their proper name. The Londoner would then become familiar with one of the finest and most cheerful sights in the world—a large open space set round with fine houses, and traversed by human beings, singly and in groups, lounging, walking, running, crossing each other's paths, in all different dresses,—seen too at different distances, on horseback, in carriages, or on foot.

But in the immediate vicinity of Trafalgar-Square, what a mockery is there,—the equestrian statue of George the Third! The unhappy spiller of the blood of nations, whose infirmities alone claimed a reverence due to human nature, and not to the post from which he was properly though tardily withdrawn, and who, on that very account, can hardly be held responsible for the results of his actions, seems put to do penance in the rain, with his hat in his hand, "a perpetual bore," on a horse anxious to make a bolt for the stable. The exhibition of the effigy of that bad and blood-thirsty old King is an exposure, not a triumph; and the more considerate will be pleased when it is discontinued; for it is a melancholy sight!

In a space like Trafalgar-Square, ornaments may be multiplied without confusion, and it will be found that the old destructive tendency of the London population is only to be entirely subdued by making them familiar with works of art. There is a glorious opportunity in Trafalgar-Square to improve the appearance of London and the taste of its inhabitants.

NATIONAL EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE.

MRS. JAMESON has written a very clever work denominated "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada;" and in some portions of these volumes we find a striking illustration of the great national effects of Intemperance. Drunkenness is the prevailing vice of Upper Canada: there seems to be no check there upon the open or future sale of spirits; and the hapless Indians, though dreadful sufferers from European "fire-water," are not more wretched and degraded, by habitual intoxication, than the greater portion of the white population. The results of such a dreadful habit are a poverty and deficiency of education which produce a universal moral depression throughout Canada. In a country where, as Mrs. Jameson says "a small population is spread over a wide extent of fruitful land, where there is not a village, or a hamlet, for twenty, or thirty, or forty miles together—where there are no manufactories—where there is almost entire equality of condition—where the means of subsistence are abundant—where there is no landed aristocracy, no poor-laws, nor poor-rates, to grind the souls and the substance of the people between them, till nothing remains but chaff—to what shall we attribute the gross vices, the profligacy, the stupidity, and basely vulgar habits of a great part of the people, who know not even how to enjoy, or to turn to profit, the inestimable advantages around them?" Alas! the reply is easy;—for all these miseries can be readily traced to the prevailing habit of intemperance.

MR. GRINDRON, in his excellent work entitled "Bacchus," informs us that "Louis XII of France was the monarch who first allowed spirits to be manufactured in that Kingdom on a large scale. The consequences to the nation were so terrible that, in twenty-two years afterwards, Francis, his successor, was necessitated, for the safety of his subjects, to enact severe laws for the suppression of drunkenness. Sweden presents another instance of this kind. Previously to the year 1783, that nation had been comparatively free from the evils arising from the use of strong drink. In that year, however, their King Gustavus, to increase the revenue, not only permitted the manufacture of ardent spirits, but actively encouraged the establishment of houses for its sale, in all the villages and towns of his kingdom. The object he had in view was attained; but the consequences soon became frightful in the extreme. Crime, poverty, disease, and mortality, so fearfully increased, that the same king was obliged to pass severe enactments to restrain the use of what previously he had been so active in promoting. Had these measures not been put into operation, the Kingdom of Sweden was in imminent danger not only of universal demoralization, but actually of becoming extinct from among the nations of the earth."

The editor of The Teetotaler, in his new work, denominated "The Anatomy of Intemperance," has shown that the effects of intemperance were equally visible in the ruin of the Moorish empire in Spain, and the decline of the Ottoman power. So long as the Moors and the Ottomans adhered to the doctrine of the Koran, which forbids the use of intoxicating liquor, they were a great, a moral, and a successful people; but, the moment the dangerous innovation took place, the instant the indulgence in wine became habitual, then did the Moors rapidly lose kingdom and province; and, in the east, the Ottomans as speedily degenerated from the glories of their early being as a nation, to the most abject state of impotence, in which that power is now languishing!

Is it necessary to direct the attention of the reader to Ireland? The Irish, that lately were the most degraded nation upon the face of the earth, are now rapidly assuming that aspect of civilisation and that moral rectitude which result from the introduction of the doctrines of Teetotalism into that country. As yet but little improvement has been effected by the same beneficent principle in Scotland, where the vice of intemperance still prevails to an appalling extent. "The second rate proprietors and merchants, and the clergy in Scotland," said Mr. DUNLOP, in his examination before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1834, "are slaves to drinking, including the females of this as well as all the classes below it." Masters encourage drinking amongst their men to a great degree in Scotland; and apprentices are initiated in the baneful habit at an early age. "Although it was understood," said Mr. Dunlop, "that drinking led to predisposition to cholera, amongst all ranks in Scotland, and also that contact with the disease was highly dangerous,—yet instances might be advanced of men, women, and children sitting upon a cholera-coffin, with a corpse inside, in a small close room, drinking themselves speechless." Dr. GRAY, of Edinburgh, in a pamphlet published some time ago, says that "from eighty-four to ninety-one persons are brought weekly to the City police Office in a beastly state of intoxication, for mere protection, making an annual total of such cases of about four thousand five hundred and fifty! The cases brought up for punishment are nearly equally numerous." Who will not, then, admit that Scotland is in great want of Teetotalism?

The effects of intemperance upon our soldiers in the East and West Indies have been shown to be dreadful in the extreme. The heat of the climate, to which they are not habituated, instead of being modified by abstemiousness, is materially assisted in its deadly ravages by the additional heat produced by strong drinks.

Pinkerton's "Collection of Voyages and Travels" informs us that the natives of Sierra Leone, which is the worst climate upon earth, live as long as men in climates of an opposite description, merely by means of their temperate habits. The same work says that "at the first arrival of the Europeans in America, it was not uncommon to find Indians who were above a hundred years old. They lived frugally and drank pure water. But since the Christians have taught them to drink these liquors, and the Indians have found them but too palatable—those who cannot resist their appetites hardly reach half the age of their parents."

It is almost unnecessary to remind the reader that dissipation, of which the use of strong drinks forms the principal ingredient, destroyed the greatest empires of antiquity, amongst which may be enumerated Greece and Rome. Dissipation has in the same way undermined the prosperity and glory of modern kingdoms; and terrible would have been the ultimate havoc, had not the progressive march of Intemperance suddenly found a barrier raised against its inroads by the disciples of Teetotalism.

THE THREE CRIMES;

AN EASTERN TALE.

HAMET ABDALLAH was an inhabitant of a grotto on one of the slopes of Mount Olympus. When he stood at the entrance of his humble dwelling, he could embrace with one glance all the territory originally possessed by Osman, the founder of the Ottoman empire; and, as he five times a day offered up his prayers to Alla, he invoked blessings upon the head of Solymán the Magnificent, the reigning Sultan in whose time he lived. Indeed, Abdallah was renowned for his sanctity; and the inhabitants of the vicinity of his dwelling treated him with the most marked respect. He was not however entitled to this excessive veneration by his age; for he had scarcely attained his fortieth year when the incident of this tale took place. His venerable father, who was himself a dervise of great sanctity, and whose years amounted to four-score, resided with him in the same grotto; and fortunate was deemed the individual who, on his way along the slopes of Olympus, was allowed to join in the prayers of the two dervises, kneeling upon the ground at the entrance of the cave, and turning their countenances towards the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

Hamet Abdallah was one morning roving amidst the groves and woods which extended up the mountain, far above his grotto, and pondering upon the passage in the Koran which he had been perusing but a short time previously, when his foot suddenly struck against something hard upon the ground. He looked downward, and saw an iron ring fastened to a small brass plate, which was let into a square of stone-work, and seemed to cover a hollow place or well. Obeying a sudden impulse of curiosity, Hamet applied his hand to the ring, and pulled it with all his force. After many vain exertions, the brass plate yielded to his strength, and he fell backwards with the sudden shock. Before he had time to rise and examine the aperture thus laid bare, a dense volume of smoke issued from the hole, and ascended in the air to the height of several thousand feet. Hamet gazed with astonishment upon this strange apparition; but how much more was his wonder excited when he saw the smoke gradually become more and more palpable and shapely, and at length assume the form of an immense giant, with a long flowing white beard, and a tremendous pine-tree in his right hand. Hamet fell upon his knees, and was about to put up a prayer to heaven, when the terrible apparition addressed him in a voice of thunder. "Nay—mention not the name of the deity, or I will cut thee into ten thousand pieces."—"Who art thou?" demanded Hamet, rising from his suppliant posture.—"I am Kara, an evil Genie, whom a victorious power shut up in that cursed hole, where I have languished for two thousand years. It is an evil day for thee that brought thee hither."—"And wherefore, proud Genie?" demanded Hamet.—"Because I am about to kill thee, in order to avenge myself upon some one for this long captivity," replied the giant.

At these words Hamet trembled very much, and besought the Genie to spare his life. For a long time the Genie was inexorable, and ordered him to prepare for immediate death; but at length he suffered himself to be moved by the prayers and entreaties of the virtuous dervise. "Hark ye," said the Genie. "I am willing to spare your life upon one condition."—"Name it," cried Hamet, his heart leaping with joy.—"I will grant your request, I say," proceeded the Genie, "on condition that you perpetrate some crime which may diminish your overweening pride of conscious virtue. Do not interrupt me, or I will kill you upon the spot; but listen. I give you your choice of the three most heinous crimes which I can imagine. You shall either violate the law of the Prophet and drink your fill of good wine;—or you shall murder your venerable old father;—or you shall curse the name of that deity whom you worship. Choose between these three crimes."

Then Hamet was very sorrowful, and he endeavoured to melt the heart of the evil Genie; but all his prayers and entreaties were unavailing. He accordingly began to reason within himself:—"If," said he, "I assassinate my father, no contrition can wipe away my crime, and moreover the law will overtake me with its vengeance. If I curse the name of the great Alla, I may sigh in vain for future happiness in the gardens of Paradise. But if I become inebriated with the juice of the grape, I can expiate that fault by severe mortification, penitence, and renewed prayer." Then, turning his countenance upwards towards the Genie, he said, "O fountain of all evil! I have made my choice, since thou art determined upon this injury."—"Name the object of that choice," said the Genie.—"I will get drunken with wine, as the least of the crimes which you propose," answered the dervise.—"Be it so," cried the Genie; "this evening, after the hour of prayer, thou wilt find a jar of Cyprus-wine upon thy table, when thy father has retired to rest in his own cell. Then mayest thou fulfil thy promise then: but, woe unto thee if thou deceivest me!"

The Genie gradually became less palpable as he spoke these words; and, by the time the concluding menace issued from his lips, he had vanished altogether. Hamet retraced his steps towards the grotto with a sorrowful heart; but he would not confide his anticipated disgrace to the affectionate parent who welcomed his return.

The day passed rapidly away; and in the evening, Hamet and his sire knelt down as usual at the door of the grotto, with their faces towards the south, to raise their voices in prayer. When their respers were concluded, the old man embraced his son tenderly, and retired to the inner part of the grotto. As soon as Hamet knew that his father slept, he lighted a lamp; and, as the Genie had told him, he saw a large measure of wine standing upon the table. The unhappy dervise raised it to his lips, and drank deeply of the intoxicating draught. A glow of fire seemed to electrify his frame, and he laughed as he set the vessel down upon the table. Again he drank; and he felt reckless and careless of the consequences. He drank a third time; and, when he had emptied the measure, he ran out to the door of the grotto, and threw it down the slope of the mountain; then, as he heard it bounding along, he laughed with indescribable mirth. As he turned to enter the grotto, he saw his father standing behind him.

"Son," said the old man, "the noise of revelry awoke me from my slumbers, and I rise to find my well-beloved Hamet drunken with wine! Alas—is this merely one of many nights' orgies; and have I now awakened to the dread truth of thine impiety, for the first time? Alas! thou hast cast ashes upon the grey head of thy father!"

Hamet could not brook this accusation, and the implied suspicion that he was accustomed to indulge in wine whilst his father slept. He felt suddenly indignant at the language of his sire, and cried, "Return to your couch, old dotard! Thou knowest not what thou sayest!" And, as he uttered these words, he pushed his father violently into the grotto. The old man resisted, and again remonstrated with Hamet. The brain of the son was confused with liquor; and a sudden dread of exposure to the world entered his mind. With the rage of a demon he rushed upon his hoary-headed sire, and dashed him furiously against the stone walls of the grotto. The old man fell with his temple against a sharp flint—one groan emanated from his bosom—and his spirit fled for ever.

Suddenly conscious of the horrid crime of which he had been guilty, Hamet tore his hair, beat his breast, and raved like a maniac. And, in the midst of his ravings, he lifted up his voice against the majesty of heaven, and cursed the deity whom he had so long and fervently worshipped!

At that instant a terrible din echoed round about—the thunder rolled—the tall trees shook with an earthquake—and, amidst the roar of the conflicting elements, were heard shouts of infernal laughter. All hell seemed to rejoice at the fall of a good man, whom no other vice had ever tempted away from the paths of virtue, until drunkenness presented itself. The rage of the storm increased—the trees were torn up by their roots—and fragments of the rocky parts of Olympus rolled down the hill with the fury of an Alpine avalanche. The wretched Hamet, whom the war of nature recalled to his senses, crouched up in one corner of the grotto, and deplored his hard fate in bitter, bitter sorrow. But the storm broke above his head—the walls of his frail dwelling crumbled around him—the roof gave way—and he was horribly mangled in the ruins. Amidst the tortures of mind and body, did he surrender up his breath; and, as his lips quivered in death, the terrible and well-known voice of the Genie fell upon his ears, crying, "You chose that which you deemed to be the lightest crime; but, through it, you committed the other two!"

FRENCH POPULAR SONGS.

No. 4 LA PARISIENNE.

Translated from the French of Cassimer Delavigne.

Gallant nation! now before you
Freedom, beck'ning onward, stands;
Let no tyrant's sway be o'er you—
Wrest the sceptre from his hands!
Paris gave the general cry,
Glory, Fame, and Liberty!

Speed, warriors, speed,
Tho' thousands bleed,
Pierc'd by the leaden ball, or crush'd by thundering steed;
Conquest waits—your foemen die!

Keep your serried ranks in order;
Sons of France, your country calls!
Gory battle-grounds accord her—
Well she merits each who falls!

Happy day! the general cry
Echoed nought but liberty
Speed, warriors, speed,
Tho' thousands bleed.

Pierc'd by the leaden ball, or crush'd by thundering steed;
Conquest waits—your foemen die!

Vain the shot may sweep along you,
Ranks of warriors now display'd!
Youthful generals are among you,
By the great occasion made!

Happy day! &c. &c.
Foremost who the Carlist lances
With the banner-staff has met!
Freedom's votary advances,
Venerable Lafayette!

Happy day! &c. &c.
Triple dres again combine,
See the squadrons onward go.
In the country's heaven shining,
Mark the various coloured bow!

Happy day! &c. &c.
Heroes of that banner gleaming,
Ye, who bore it in the fray!
Orleans' troops' your blood was streaming
Freely on that fatal day!

From the page of history
We have learnt the general cry:
Speed, warriors, speed, &c. &c.
Muffled drum! thy music lonely
Answers to the mourner's sighs;

Laurels, for the valiant only,
Ornament their obsequies!
Sacred fane of Liberty,
Let their memories never die!

Hear to his grave
Each warrior brave,
Who fell in Freedom's cause, his country's rights to save,
Crown'd with fame and victory!

ALCHEMY.

THIS ancient and highly poetical forerunner of chemistry has much that is interesting in its early history and progress. The golden age of alchemy most ominously commenced with the conquests of Arabian fanaticism in Asia and Africa, the destruction of the Alexandrian library, and the subjection of Europe to the basest superstition and the most profound ignorance. The rage for making gold spread through the whole Mussulman world; and in the splendid courts of Almanzor, Hamoun Al Raschid, and Abdallah Abammon, the professors of the Hermetic art found patronage, disciples, and emolument. From the tenth to the thirteenth century little is known concerning the state of Alchemical studies: the descendants of the Arabian warriors had begun to acquire a taste for science when their thrones were shaken by the crusades, and finally destroyed by the desolating deluge of the Turkish barbarians. The arts, again retiring from Egypt and Syria, rested for a moment at Constantinople, and then withdrew to the western provinces of Europe. In the thirteenth century, Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, and Raymond Lully appeared as the great revivers of alchemy and chemistry.

The most celebrated history of the transmutation of metals is given by Helvetius, in his paper entitled "The Golden Calf." The following is the epitomized version of this tale:—"On the 27th day of December, 1666, in the afternoon came a stranger to my house at the Hague, in a plebeian habit, of honest gravity and serious authority, of a mean stature, and a little long face, black hair, not at all curled, a beardless chin, and about forty-four years (as I guess) of age, and born in North Holland. After salutation he besought me, with great reverence, to pardon his rude access, for he was a lover of the pyrotechnical art, and having read my treatise against the sympathetic powder of Sir Kenelm Digby, and observed my doubt about the philosophic mystery, induced him to ask me if I really was a disbeliever as to the existence of an universal medicine which would cure all diseases, unless the principal parts were perished, or the predestined time of death come. I replied, 'I never met with an adept, or saw such a medicine, though I had fervently prayed for it.' Then I said, 'Surely you are a brass founder, and a lover of chemistry.' He then took from his bosom-pouch a very neat ivory box, and out of it three ponderous lumps of stone, each about the bigness of a walnut. I greedily saw and handled for a quarter of an hour this most noble substance, the value of which might be somewhere about twenty tons of gold; and having drawn from the owner many rare secrets of its admirable effects, I returned him this treasure of treasures with a sorrowful mind, humbly beseeching him to bestow a fragment upon me in perpetual memory of him, though but the size of a conard-seed. He refused very positively, and asked me to show him a piece of my gold. I did so; and he then opened his doublet, and showed me five pieces of that precious metal which he wore upon a green riband, and which very much excelled mine in flexibility and colour, each being the size of a small trencher. I now earnestly again craved a crumb of the stone; and, at last, out of his philosophical commiseration, he gave me a morsel as large as a rape-seed. But I remonstrated with him that this scanty portion would scarcely transmute four grains of lead. He accordingly asked me to give it him back, which I did, in hopes of a greater parcel; but he, cutting off half with his nail, said, 'Even this is sufficient for thee.' So I gave him great thanks, and said I would try it, and reveal the secret to no one. He then took his leave, and said he would call again upon me on the ensuing morning. On his return, I confessed to him that while the mass of his medicine was in my hands, the day before, I had scraped off a bit with my nail, which I projected on lead, but that it caused no transmutation, as the whole flew away in fumes. 'Friend,' said he, 'thou art more dexterous in committing theft than in applying medicine: hadst thou wrapt up thy stolen prey in yellow wax, it would have penetrated and transmuted the lead into gold.' I then asked if the philosophic work cost much, or required long time; for philosophers say, that nine or ten months are required for it? He answered, 'Their writings are only to be understood by the adepts, without whom no student can prepare this mastery. Fling not away, therefore, thy money and goods in hunting out this art, for thou shalt never find it.' To this I replied, 'As thy master showed thee, so mayest thou perchance discover something thereof to me who know the rudiments; and therefore it may be better to add to a foundation than begin anew.'—'In this art,' said he, 'it is quite otherwise; for, unless thou knowest the thing from head to heel, thou canst not break open the glassy seal of Hermes. But enough: to-morrow, at the ninth hour, I will tell you the manner of preparation.' But Elias never came back; so my wife, who was curious in the art whereof the worthy man had discoursed, teased me to make the experiment with the little spark of bounty the artist had left me. So I melted down half an ounce of lead, upon which my wife put in the said medicine: it hissed and bubbled, and in a quarter of an hour the mass of lead was transmuted into fine gold, at which we were exceedingly amazed. I took it to the goldsmith, who judged it most excellent, and willingly offered fifty florins for each ounce."

A hundred and forty years before Christ, in the reign of the Emperor Wootie, the Chinese were engaged in pursuing the same object. During the twelfth year of this monarch's reign, Lanta, the priest, declared that, "having frequently put to sea, he had seen the spirit Ganta, who had instructed him how to make gold, and how to obtain the elixir which tends to immortality." Lanta in consequence received an important appointment, and a princess was given him in marriage. His deceptive arts were however discovered, and he was beheaded.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"SKETCHES OF OUR ADVOCATES," No. 11, is our best.

Private answers have been returned to all letters received between the 20th and 26th of October, and which required such replies.

To E. D. we reply in the affirmative.

Will SENEZ favour us with an interview?

To our Southampton Correspondent, we beg to remark that the member of any Order of total abstinence can belong to the United Temperance Association.

We request the secretaries of provincial societies to forward us the reports of their meetings.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the second Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Six Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1840.

MR. ROWBOTHAM REFUTED.

THE line of argument adopted by this gentleman, in his Anti-Teetotal Lectures is decidedly ingenious, and calculated to mislead those who are not well versed in the details of vegetable and physiological chemistry. We shall however proceed to show our readers that the whole system of MR. ROWBOTHAM'S theory, although based upon chemical truths, does not enable him to arrive at the wished-for demonstration, namely—"that water is not the natural drink of man, and that such artificial liquors, as wine, beer, and ale, contain elements which are calculated to prolong life."

MR. ROWBOTHAM starts with one proposition, which may be thus described. He says that "death is, in animals, the hardening, or ossification, of the whole system, by which the functions of life are terminated. Every animal and man commences life in a fluid state, the bones in infancy having little solidity; and, as age advances, so does the substance of the bone become more compact. The whole system of muscle and fibre progressively assumes a more osseous character. This general ossification leads to the natural death, called death from old age. Hence arises the question, What is the cause of this ossification? The introduction of earthy particles, or matters—such as carbonates, phosphates, and finates—into the blood, is the cause. Hence it follows that the food which contains the greatest quantity of the earthy matters will promote ossification, and thereby shorten life the more rapidly; and those foods, that contain the least amount of earthy particles, are therefore the most wholesome, and the best calculated to extend life."

Now, so far, MR. ROWBOTHAM is quite right, and the truth of his system is admitted. But how does he work out his argument that "temperance is better than teetotalism?" He says that "wheat and water contain much of the ossifying principle (earthy matter); and that a man drinking only spring water for forty years, would in that time take into his system enough of earthy matter to form a marble statue as large as himself."

Let us answer this argument before we proceed one step farther. MR. ROWBOTHAM argues against the use of bread and water because they contain earthy matter. Now, both Teetotalers and Anti-Teetotalers eat bread, and therefore the mere fact of eating bread cannot be used as an argument against Teetotalism. But, even if bread were poison, this could be no argument against Teetotalism, because the advocates of this principle did not invent bread as a substitute for alcoholic liquors. Whether all the world continue to eat bread, or abandon its use entirely, is a subject totally irrelevant to the doctrines of Teetotalism. MR. ROWBOTHAM might as well say that Teetotalism is a wrong principle, because high-seasoned dishes, or cocoanuts, or chestnuts, or cucumbers are unwholesome.

Now, with respect to water. The Teetotalers do recommend water as an universal beverage, and do assert that it is our natural drink. If there be certain unwholesome principles in water—such as earthy, neutral, or metallic salts,—the question is, Can you produce any liquid without these earthy particles? We boldly answer, No; because, if MR. ROWBOTHAM would substitute his ale, porter, and wine instead of spring water, we will tell him that they are made of water with earthy particles in it; and that the malt of which beer is made, and the fruit of which wine is made, also contain earthy particles. Thus, it is evident, that earthy particles must be taken into the human frame in one way or another; and it now only remains for the rational man to decide whether he will drink an intoxicating beverage with earthy particles in it, or an unintoxicating beverage with earthy particles in it? Since earthy particles must be drunk in either case, shall we prefer the beverage that refreshes us and produces no thirst—or the one that refreshes only for an instant, and produces renewed thirst almost immediately? Shall we choose water, which does not lead on to intoxicating habits, with all their dread escort of crime, disease, poverty, and accident?—or shall we choose alcoholic drink which does lead to all those horrors? If, as before urged, it be proved that ale, porter, and wine contain earthy particles as well as water, because they are only water disguised, adulterated, and mixed with narcotic drugs or mineral substances,—shall we choose that beverage which contains only one unwholesome ingredient—namely, earthy matter,—or that beverage which contains the same unwholesome ingredient, and hundreds of others superadded thereto?

Let us now go a step farther. We have shown that beer contains earthy particles, both in consequence of the water with which it is mixed, and on account of the vegetables of which it is made. Barley, wheat, rye, and oats, when incinerated, are found to yield much earthy matter. Now, the brewers, not content with the quantity of earthy matter which their beer thus necessarily acquires from the water, the malt, and hops of which it is made, actually add earthy matters to their liquid during the process of brewing. Lime, potash, salt, alum, copperas, and the alkalies of oyster-shells, are all used in the manufacture of beer. What, in the name of common sense, then, can induce a man to uphold a drink, in which earthy matters are superadded to those which pre-existed in it? Take two pints of water:—each contains an equal quantity of earthy matter, at first: to one you add a great deal more earthy matter; and then which do you prefer? MR. ROWBOTHAM helps the cause of Teetotalism by proving that drinks containing earthy matters are unwholesome; and yet he advocates the use of a drink which absolutely contains much more earthy matter than water.

Everything in nature contains earthy matter; and all fruits, plants, and vegetables derive their earthy matter from the sulphur, air, and water with which the plants are supplied. Either the vital principle, which controls chemical affinity, and directs this power in the production of new compounds from elementary bodies, may likewise convert one element into another; or else some of the substances supposed by chemists to be simple, such as oxygen and hydrogen, are compounds, not of two, but of a variety, of different principles. Whatever be the cause, there is no doubt but that earthy matter is found in all substances; and, with this conviction in view, let us choose that drink where man has not increased the quantity of earthy matter formed in it by nature.

MR. ROWBOTHAM'S argument is thus disposed of, in respect to water; and we have now shown that, upon a correct basis, he has raised a most faulty fabric. He set out with a chemical truth, and then absolutely converted his own reasoning into a weapon against himself. "Do not drink liquids with earthy matter in them," says MR. ROWBOTHAM; and he immediately recommends liquors which contain the greatest quantity of that earthy matter, and which quantity has also been increased by the hand of man!

We shall now proceed to refute a few of the assertions which occur in MR. ROWBOTHAM'S usual lectures. In order to find an apology for the use of beer, he recommends it on the score that beer is made of soft water, which contains much less earthy matter than the spring water drunk as a beverage by itself. To this assertion we have two answers ready. The first is that, if beer be made of soft water, the earthy particles derived from the malt and hops, and from the alkalies, &c., used by the brewers, increase the quantity of earthy matter far beyond the amount which naturally exists in an equal quantity of spring water. In the second place, we deny that beer is generally made with soft water. Hard water is in most cases found favourable to the manufacture of beer. The Barnstaple and Liverpool ales, which are considered amongst the best in quality, are brewed with hard water. The Derby malt, which is much used in Lancashire, is found to make better beer in that county than in Derbyshire; and the reason is, that the Lancashire hard water occasions the difference. Hard water contains much carbonate and sulphate of lime; and that is the cause of its value to the brewers. The river Trent produces the water that makes the Burton and Nottingham ales; and these liquors are celebrated all over England, because the water of the Trent is peculiarly hard from running over calcareous strata in its course. The same brewer cannot, with the same malt, produce an equal beer in any other part of the kingdom. The carbonates of lime, magnesia, and potash are used in beer as correctives of acidity; and these are found in hard waters much more than in soft. The water with which the Burton ale is made flows from a rock of gypsum, and is almost saturated with the salt. Thus have we proved that brewers prefer hard water for their beer, and that the water containing the most earthy particles is deemed the best for the manufacture of malt liquor.

We have now refuted Mr. ROWBOTHAM'S principal arguments in favour of his theory. Let us proceed a step farther still, and show that water is a "natural beverage." It is an essential constituent in the organization of all living bodies; and, as it is continually expended during the process of life, that waste must be also continually supplied; and this supply is of such importance that it is not left to reason or to chance, but forms the object of an imperious appetite. When taken into the stomach, water acts by its temperature, its bulk, and the quantity absorbed by the lacteals. It dilutes the contents of the stomach and intestines, and thus diminishes their acrimony. It also dilutes the chyle and the blood, and gives a healthy increase of fluidity to those liquids.

And now let us show that the earthy particles in water are not so unwholesome as asserted by Mr. ROWBOTHAM, but are, on the contrary, mixed with that fluid, in various proportions, for a wise and good purpose. Alkali in water produces a wholesome tonic effect on the stomach, particularly in cases of morbid acidity. Sulphur in water is good for cutaneous and glandular diseases. Neutral salts in water give a healthy impulse to the circulation, act as gentle laxatives, and are excellent in cases of debility, cachexia, chlorosis, fluor albus, amenorrhoea, and all nervous diseases. Thus, although we admit that in one sense these earthy particles existing in water are somewhat calculated to diminish life by the process of ossification, we also prove that they are far more eminently calculated to preserve it by their peculiar properties; and it should be the most exalted pleasure of the chemist, as well as the naturalist, to trace and admire those endless proofs of design and omniscience in the frame of the creation which the general laws of nature so universally demonstrate.

There is another assertion made by Mr. ROWBOTHAM, on the occasions of his public lectures, which we must here notice. He quotes many instances of long life on the part of hard-drinkers, and says that the ancient Britons, who lived upon fruits, and not on bread, were also remarkable for longevity. Now, was not the general drink of the aboriginal Britons, who dwelt in trees and caves, water—the spring water of nature's fountains? And do not medical testimony and the observations of travellers to distant islands, prove that the use of alcoholic drinks shortens life? The American Indians, the natives of Sierra Leone, the inhabitants of Shetland, the Kaffres, and numerous tribes of savages, have demonstrated the appalling fact that the introduction of strong drinks amongst them abbreviated their lives to a fearful extent. The Teetotalers can quote hundreds of instances of longevity in the cases of water-drinkers, and can adduce a host of medical authorities to record their testimony in favour of water. The appetite which is not vitiated by the use of strong drinks, also delights in fruits; and this taste is not, as Mr. ROWBOTHAM imagines, confined to children. From the age of sixteen until a few months ago (an interval of ten years) the Editor of this journal never ate fruit tarts nor sweets of any kind, because his taste was vitiated by wine and strong drink; but since he has been a total abstainer therefrom, he has enjoyed those comestibles with the same relish as in his boyhood. The same fact has been recorded by hundreds of Teetotalers.

THE ADVENTURES OF A FOUNT OF TYPE.

BY CHARLES WHITEHEAD.

URBANE READER!

Be not unnecessarily alarmed if I commence this most true narrative, by assuring you that I am the devil. But I am not what, perhaps, you may suppose me to be—the King of the Nether-lands; I am a mere mortal like yourself. Let me say with Bottom, the weaver, "If you think I were here as a lion (devil) it were pity of my life;—no, I am no such thing; I am a man as other men are."

To elucidate this mystery, I am the sole devil appetizing and belonging to a small printing establishment in the Seven Dials, and I have about as extraordinary an occurrence to make known to you as was ever offered to public notice. I must take leave, however, to deprecate any suspicion of its truth. It is genuine, authentic, veritable, and I hope, when I shall have made a few further remarks, it will be held to be credible also. "The Adventures of a Guinea," are undoubtedly no fiction; "The Adventures of an Atom," have been immortalized long ago; "Pompey the Little," has found a historian who may be relied upon for his exact regard to truth; and the moral Hawkerworth has condescended to present us with the vicissitudes of a small verminous being, whose name is not to be mentioned in these fastidious days to ears polite; but whose identity may be indicated by stating that three skips of it are equivalent to the regard which one man sometimes expresses for another; and that it is what you may expect to catch if you see a beggar.

I have tendered these examples, furnishing, as they do, a strong claim upon the confidence which it is my desire that you should place in my narrative, and which I now proceed, without further preface, to set before you.

One evening I was about to leave the printing office, after a hard day's work, when a somewhat unusual noise attracted my attention. It appeared to proceed from the cast before me; and on a more minute scrutiny, I perceived an agitation amongst the type, which was to me, and would have been to any one else, perfectly unaccountable. I was alone—the day was drawing in—a twilight gloom overspread the office, and an unearthly sensation of fear began to come over me. Suddenly, six letters erected themselves out of the case, before me in a line thus: A. E. I. O. U. Y.

"Mr. Devil," said the first of these locomotive letters, "we have been deputed by our brethren to wait upon you, and we request your attention for a few minutes. You will excuse so small a deputation, but we feared that if we came en masse we might disarrange your nervous system. We did ask two notes of admiration to accompany us, but the notes of interrogation inquired whether that would not look awful? It was no use the notes coming, since they can't join in conversation, and you are accustomed to better liquids than we can supply."

Here the six little literal rogues burst into a shrill fit of laughter, and began to reel about at the imminent hazard of losing their equilibrium.

"Bring," cried O, "a brace of parentheses to keep us together."

"No occasion for them, at all," resumed A, who had by this time recovered his gravity; "be a little more orderly, and I dare say Mr. Devil will listen to us patiently."

"You must know, Sir," he continued, turning to me, "jocose as we appear just now we are come to you on no laughing errand. You see that we are all of us the worse for wear, and that we cannot possibly hold out much longer. Now our business with you is to request you to hear the vicissitudes of our career, and to ask you to communicate, through the medium of some of our own species, our history to the world. This you will probably find no difficult task; for a sort of type-us fever has been raging for a long time past, and every thing, worse luck for us, finds its way into print now-a-days."

I granted a courteous assent to this application, and the loquacious A began, after a short pause, as follows:—

We first became conscious of our existence in the office of Mr. B.—of Fleet street, whither, as we afterwards understood, we had been taken a few days previously. Mr. B.—took up several of us at once, and after minutely inspecting us, bestowed high praise upon the thin gracefulness of our figures, and remarked that we should just do for Mr. Winesacre's projected work. A month elapsed, when, one morning, Mr. B.—accompanied by a tall, stout gentleman, redolent of Virginia and breathing Barclay and Perkins, entered the office: the stout gentleman was Mr. Sampson Winesacre.

"Take my word for it," said he, "my new edition of Shakespeare must inevitably supersede all others now extant. Why, Sir, they none of them know any thing about him. They didn't understand him—couldn't fathom him B.—couldn't fathom him."

"Well but, my dear Sir," suggested Mr. B.—, "there are so many editions of our immortal bard."

"So many!" cried Winesacre, "yes, as Byron says, 'too many, yet how few,'—that are worth a doit, I mean."

"That may be very true," returned the printer, "but every broken-down author writes about Shakespeare now-a-days. They turn to him as naturally as a bankrupt to the coal and wine trade."

"Come, come, that won't do, you're too hard upon the poor devil," said Winesacre, with a spurious laugh, reddening at the same time. "I'll tell you this much, Mr. B.—, Addison and Pope were a pair of asses—at Shakespeare, I mean: Rowe was a very poor creature—Warburton was wide of the mark—Sir Thomas Harmer a blockhead—Dr. Farmer, O Lord!—Malone and Stevens pert dunces, and as for Dr. Johnson—"

"You're not going to say a word, I hope," exclaimed B.—, "against Dr. Johnson, the leviathan of literature."

"Leviathan of literature!" echoed Winesacre, with much protrusion of the nether lip, as he tumbled his head contemptuously; "mark me B.—, I am not going to say a word against Sam Johnson, early Sam; he was a leviathan of literature—a mammoth of morals, no question about that; but (between us) an insect, a very insect as a commentator."

"Well, then, you are going to do something better, I suppose," said B.—

"Aye, to be sure I am," answered the other: "here, just read this," and he produced a letter from his pocket, "so, I'll read it to you myself—his lordship writes such a d— queer hand. From Lord Noddleton," he added with emphasis as he fixed his eyes upon B.—, and read slowly and significantly, "Here it is."

Ninnville, Tuesday Morning.

My dear Winesacre,

I return you the specimens you have been so kind as to submit to me, of your projected edition of Shakespeare, which I have perused with much pleasure, and I must add with great profit. I quite agree with you that the world has been hitherto altogether mistaken respecting the character of Iago. When I reflect upon the general frailty of human nature, I should say he was not a bad man. Macbeth was weak, no more. How strong a passion is ambition, and the supernatural machinery that brought about his destruction; poetical justice should have been dealt out upon the witches. They were really the delinquents. I go with you in your strictures upon Hamlet: his conduct to Ophelia cannot be justified, nor his cold-blooded murder of her aged and unoffending father, Polonius. But here again supernatural influence is introduced. Was not the ghost culpable? You are quite right; Prospero was a quipper. Caliban had clearly a priority of claim to the Island. With best wishes for your success, believe me, &c.

NOODLETON."

This letter evidently made a deep impression upon B.—

"His lordship," he remarked, "is an excellent judge of dramatic literature, I believe."

"First-rate," said Winesacre with solemn earnestness.

The two walked to the other end of the shop, and conferred together for several minutes.

"Well, I'll send some of the copy tomorrow morning the first thing," exclaimed the commentator, shaking B.— heartily by the hand.

"Do so, we shall get on with it at once," said the other, turning to his foreman, to whom he gave several minute directions, whilst Winesacre descended the stairs in a high state of exhilaration.

In a few weeks we were all set up, not a little delighted at the kindness of fortune in prescribing for us so exalted a destiny. Two thousand copies of us were struck off, and were carried away to the publishers. There was a talk of stereotyping us, but that plan was dropped, and I'll tell you why.

We had remained in our sedentary and passive state about six months, when Mr. B.— one day rushed into the office, in a ferment of violent agitation, and requested that his foreman, Markham, should be summoned to him. "Here's a precious business, Markham," said he as the man approached.

"What's the matter, Sir?" said Markham.

"Have you seen the papers and magazines lately?"

"No, Sir, I have no time to read them."

"Why, they're unanimous in their opinion," cried

B—, "that Wiseacre's the most infernal fool that ever disgraced literature, and that his notes to Shakspeare are the veriest rubbish that was ever spun out of the brain of an idiot."

Here was an announcement for us, Mr. Devil! who knew nothing of the matter, the notes having been committed to a smaller type, with which, of course, we had no connexion or acquaintance whatever.

"I went to the publisher," continued B—; "the book will never sell, he told me, and referred me to Wiseacre, who is now in the Fleet."

"God bless my soul!" cried Markham.

"And God bless my soul!" said B—, "I visited him there—No. 11, on the third gallery. The fellow received me with open arms, as drunk as an owl, you may be sure—compelled me to be seated—told me he had filed his petition—expected to be at large again in a few weeks, and wanted to know whether I would undertake to print, when he came out, a new edition of Fox's Martyr's with Notes."

Here the printer's face underwent much metamorphosis, whilst Markham held up his hand and groaned.

"What's to be done?" said B—, after a pause.

"Can't say, Sir, possibly."

"We must distribute the type, Markham," cried the printer, scratching his ear. "I've kept the press standing for the fellow these three months, under the assurance that Lord Noddleton was going to write a review in one of the magazines, which would compel all the world to buy the book. D— that Wiseacre, I always thought he intended to take me in."

With these words he withdrew; and in the afternoon of the following day we were disbanded.

We now lay dormant for a considerable time, and had almost discarded all hopes of further employment, when Dr. Wigsby Twaddle was pleased to select us as a type best calculated for his elaborate lucubrations. "You have been recommended to me," said the doctor, addressing B— with ponderous emphasis, "by my excellent and worthy friend Mr. Barnaby Burge, who tells me that you are an individual whose civility, despatch, and judgment may be equally relied on."

The printer bowed.

"The volumes I am now about to commit to print," pursued the doctor, as he lifted from his immense rearward pouch a vast quantity of manuscript, "consist of sermons—not evangelical, for they perhaps might meet with a restricted sale, but moral sermons calculated for universal perusal—for the public at large."

The eyes of Dr. Wigsby Twaddle rested with amiable fondness upon the precious deposit for some moments. "Here, for instance," he resumed, drawing one from amongst its fellows, "here is a sermon against drunkenness. No common sensation did this discourse produce. Mr. Soaker a most excellent and respected gentleman with whom I dined on the very day that discourse was delivered, was so affected on referring to it, as he took leave of me in the passage, that he absolutely fell to the ground, and was carried to his own apartment by the servants."

"Bless me," said Mr. B—, "it must be a most powerful discourse."

"You see, Sir," cried the doctor, casting a sidelong glance at the other, "these are no common performances that are entrusted to you. Here is another," and he unfolded it with grateful triumph—"my sermon on suicide. It is a very extraordinary circumstance—inconceivable, really, that Moody the vestry clerk should have made away with himself so soon after listening to this terrible, this harrowing composition."

"He destroyed himself after hearing the sermon?" said B—, with much interest.

"He did so—was found suspended in the kitchen on the next morning by the servant of all work, who has been able to do nothing since. The widow was consequently compelled to give the girl warning."

So saying, the doctor placed his manuscript in the hands of the printer.

"I perceive you are an intelligent man Mr. B—," said he, as he put on his hat; "I need hardly therefore recommend you to read the sermons, as they pass through the press, and to read them with attention, not once, but many times. They are occasionally so profound—the argument is so elaborately worked out—the moral so ingeniously arrived at—that people have sometimes misunderstood, nay, mistaken, do you understand? For instance, lend me the papers again for a moment, will you? Here is a charity sermon I delivered a few months since. The latter portion of this appeal inculcates that more refined, that more sublime charity which is done in secret—that does not lay itself out for the applause of men—that is unostentatious—that is strictly private. Would you believe it, Sir? the congregation so utterly misunderstood or forgot the tenor of the former part of the sermon, that they walked out of the church entirely unconscious of, or indifferent to, the appealing churchwardens at the entrance, who pushed their pewter plates into their respective ribs without avail. So cautious ought we to be, Sir, of letting our feelings get the better of our judgment. Good morning!" And the doctor departed with dignity.

Perhaps a more dreary typical existence cannot be imagined than that of being locked up in the sermons of so profound a divine as Dr. Wigsby Twaddle. But our deliverance came at last. The doctor called upon Mr. B— about eight months after the completion of his volumes, and paid his bill, with many solemn and mournful comments on the blindness and indifference of the world, and gave directions that the remaining six hundred and eighty copies of the sermons should be sent to his house, remarking that one day or the other their value would be discovered, and that when that event did take place, he should take care to supply the public with them at an advanced price.

We were next engaged upon a choice selection from the most celebrated French authors, made by a gentleman of that nation, whose name I cannot now recollect. If our former existence in the sermons was dreary, this, in the selection, was inexplicable. There we stood, side by side, perfectly unable to ascertain our own meaning, and in the course of a short time, hardly conscious of our own identity. Many of us became delirious in consequence, and in future works, would stand upon our heads in spite of the compositor. The W's had an easy life of it during this cruel business, and when we were once more released, bantered us without mercy on our recent mysterious labours.

We were some time after this called upon to be the medium of conveying to the world the productions of a young man of genius, whose effusions, it was his individual belief, would go far to restore a taste for poetry, which has been for many years on the decline. We were rejoiced at the destination provided for us; for a magnificent forehead, a sallow complexion, and no neckcloth, contribute towards encouraging a belief in the poetical powers of the owner. But the hopes we had begun to entertain were speedily dissipated by the first few pages of "Dandolo, or the Venetian Bride," the title of the principal poem, which we overheard one of the compositors reciting ore retando to the infinite entertainment of his companions. To describe the confusion into which this specimen of Parnassian inspiration threw us, would be impossible. Suffice it to say, the O's endeavoured to abscond with all expedition, and nearly all the notes of admiration—the S's, except a few that had grown callous in the sermons, were discovered to be missing. We were, however, ruthlessly brought into subjection; but we had afterwards the satisfaction of learning that, in spite of the "splendid," "brilliant," and "sparkling," which the reviewers liberally bestowed upon the performance, in imitation of the publicans who put off their real small beer with the same phrases, the poem fell still-born from the press, and was buried in the butter-shops.

Shortly subsequent to this, Mr. B— furnished another instance of alliteration and became a bankrupt. We were purchased at the sale of that gentleman's effects by three gentlemen, co-proprietors of a daily newspaper which was about to start in the radical interest, and were forthwith transferred to the office of "The Universal Suffrage." During the space of fifteen months we enjoyed a life of infinite and pleasing variety. For instance, one day we were eloquent in Mr. Humd's speech on the budget, and in the next were particularly minute in the admeasured circumference of an enormous cabbage, which had quite astonished by its size the oldest inhabitant. Some of us, on one side of the paper, were deeply concerned to hear that the Honourable Mr. Reckless had broken his neck in a steeple-chase; whilst others over leaf were delighted at the installation of Dr. Borem to a bishoprick. One morning we wanted to sell a large stock of wine, and tomorrow we wanted a butler to take care of it.

This you must acknowledge was a sufficiently animated existence, but, alas! it was not destined to last. The sale of "The Universal Suffrage" did not fall off; it could hardly do that; but it did not rise—it remained in a state of provoking status-quoism. The truth is, that portion of the public possessing the franchise did not care to read it, and those who had it not either could not or would not. A cabinet council was accordingly held.

"I'll tell you what," said one of the proprietors to the other, "that Whiffle has been our ruin. He has been the death of two newspapers already, and now he's doing for us. Doing for us? why, he has done for us."

Whiffle sipped his brandy and water, and turned off his leaders for about a fortnight after this conversation, when some strangers entered the premises with shocking abruptness, and swept us clean off without asking with your leave or by your leave. They came from the Stamp Office, the landlord, and the stationer, individually, collectively, and simultaneously!

The communicative A having made an end of his story, motioned to his five companions, and turned away, as though about to be gone. He however recollected himself.

"By the bye," said he, "Mr. Devil, you may as well mention what we are about now. Do tell the curious reader, that we are now the property of Mr. Catnach, the seller of ballads, and that he may see a faint likeness of us any day, by purchasing sixteen yards of songs, which may be had at the reasonable price of one penny. As a last favour, we have to beg of you that you will put us six into 'The Light of other Days.' 'Rory O'More' is too lively for our present state of spirits, and we have been turned about and wheeled about too much already to endure 'Jim Crow.' Farewell!"

LETTERS TO THE WORKING CLASSES.

No. II.

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN.—The education which you received in your early youth, or the admonitory lessons you heard from the lips of your parents, most probably taught you to venerate the present systems of society, morals, and government, on the score of their antiquity. Thus an habitual veneration for those institutions which were conceived by your ancestors, has been generated in your minds; and this prejudice you often mistake for a species of innate conviction that those institutions are really good. The human mind is essentially biased by the lessons it receives in youth,—hence all national predilections and aversions. This scheme of adhering to generally admired ideas, as if those who originally propagated them could not have been in the wrong, has proved the most fatal obstacle to the progressive march of civilization and reform that man could possibly have raised up as an embankment against the flow of his own intellectual tide.

Teetotalism is a war against ancient opinions, in the same way as republicanism is a new principle opposed to the ancient one of monarchy. Teetotalism is rendered necessary by the alarming progress made by intemperate habits, in the same way as the liberal institutions of democratic government are alone suitable to the present wants and interests of the age. The demon of intemperance must be hurled from his throne in the same way as the tyrannical institutions of monarchical government must be annihilated; and the hearts and minds of men must be purged of all predilections in favour of demoralizing indulgences, in the same way as the country itself must be freed from the hereditary rulers who oppress its inhabitants.

You were taught in your youth to imitate the ways of your forefathers, and to persevere in the paths which they had chalked out for you. But, fellow-countrymen, this system of education was a defective one, and is evidently opposed to all measures of reformation and improvement. The laws of retaliation might have suited the ancient inhabitants of the world; but they could not be applied to the present state of morals. There were also times when nations were so deeply plunged in barbarism and ignorance that the despotic system of an oligarchy would alone have succeeded as a form of government. But those times are now past. Gradually has your right of franchise been extended,—gradually has the scope of your liberties increased,—gradually have the tyrannical privileges of the throne been curtailed, one by one,—and gradually has the voice of Freedom increased its tone, until, having commenced with the low murmur of a little stream, it now thunders its demands and reclamations with the din of a torrent. As your interests have assumed a more important aspect, as your minds have become more expansive, and as the map of your understanding has been enlarged with new discoveries, so has your freedom increased, and the despotism of the government been restrained. The codes of laws have become milder, the insolence of an overweening aristocracy has abated, and the policy of England's kings has lost much of its infernal tyranny. Hence it is plain that new interests require new social, moral, and political systems,—and that an increase of liberty must necessarily keep pace with an increasing civilization.

The present condition of society presents one of those phases which demand a vast and important change, that change admitting several varieties. You must not oppose yourselves to the new system of Teetotalism, because it militates against the customs of your forefathers, one atom more than you should arrest the progress of that moral movement which is now agitating society, and which tends to extend the circumference of your liberties. Your fathers were not right when they advocated drinking usages, any more than when they propagated the doctrine that the earth was flat and that the sun moved round it. Your ancestors were not right when they supposed that the earthquakes and the storms were omens of ill-fortune, expressive of the wrath of an offended deity, any more than when they attached implicit faith to the doctrine of the divine rights of kings. The good sense of the present age shows that those drinking customs have led to the most inveterate intemperance—one of the greatest scourges ever sent to afflict humanity; and that same improved state of intellect also convinces us that kings and queens are the most effectual sources of misery, in consequence of war—poverty, as the result of taxation—and injustice, which is the invariable emanation of the exclusive privileges of royalty.

I have therefore shown you, fellow-countrymen, that you must not attach any importance to the opinions of your ancestors in respect to social or political systems. You should learn to think and to act for yourselves. You should take every idea connected with systems of government or morals, and examine it separately for yourselves. You should take nothing for granted, where you see room for doubt. Few things are axioms; and you should question the truth of all you hear, in order to elicit demonstration, where such is possible. If you abstain from all intoxicating liquors, you will become ornaments to your country, and the artificers of your future good fortunes; but if you continue in the ways of intemperance, you will exist as a living monument of human degradation and shame. Reform your habits, and you will soon see with other eyes, hear with other ears, and speak with other voices: the tones of reason will not be drowned in the impetuous ebullition of your passions, nor will the whisperings of your conscience be lost amidst the din of drunken revelry; but you will think with coolness, plan with judgment, and execute with decision. The great Deity who rules us all, has given you talents the merits of which may be evoked as well as those of the educated and the rich; but you must not conceal them in the public-house, nor there learn to pervert them to an evil purpose. Fellow-countrymen, this is the age of intellectual, moral, and political improvement,—this is the epoch of vast change for the amelioration of man,—this is the period when vice and tyranny must be overthrown together,—and this is the era to which history shall learn to point with an eternal finger, and the annals of which shall proclaim the glorious dawn of brighter destinies upon the hitherto clouded existence of the working classes. This monument of pride shall be raised, fellow-countrymen, by yourselves, for by your exertions shall the enlightened and enlightening principles of Teetotalism henceforth progress, never to relapse.

GRACCHUS.

REVIEWS.

Anti-Bacchus: An Essay on the Crimes, Diseases, and other Evils connected with the Use of Intoxicating Drinks. By the Rev. B. PARSONS. 8vo. pp. 136. London: J. Snow.

WITHOUT troubling either ourselves or the reader relative to the cause of the publication of this work, and leaving others to determine whether its appearance in print at all, were proper in respect to the successful essay by the talented Mr. GRINDRON, we have placed "Anti-Bacchus" now before us, for the purpose of fulfilling our duty as impartial reviewers, and bestowing an opinion upon one of the leading works as yet published in the sphere of Teetotal literature. Mr. PARSONS has taken an elaborate and important view of the subject which forms the basis of his book, and has handled that subject with skill. The essay certainly produces startling facts to show that "in our day intemperance has assumed a most destructive character," and that "it has become the parent of most of the crimes which scourge the land." In fact we cannot entertain so dreadful an opinion of humanity as to suppose that such fearful crimes, as daily come within our cognisance, could be perpetrated, were not their authors labouring at the time under some unnatural excitement; and we find, by a reference to the annals of crime, that ninety-nine out of a hundred of those malefactors who have ever suffered death, transportation, or other punishment for outrages against society, have been guilty of their crimes when under the influence of the unnatural excitement produced by strong drink. Well may the Rev. Mr. PARSONS exclaim, "Savage as the barbarian may be, intoxicating drinks will increase his rage a thousand-fold, and on that account ought to be withheld." Even in the year 1764, the Irish House of Commons asserted that "many murders which of late have been committed, are to be attributed to the excessive consumption of spirits."

Let us cull a few very interesting statistical accounts from "Anti-Bacchus." The annual cost of malt and spirituous liquors in the United Kingdom is about one hundred millions of money. In the fermented liquors made during the course of one year in Great Britain and Ireland there are sixty-three million seven hundred and eighty thousand and ninety-five gallons of spirits; and in the distilled spirits there are twenty-nine million five hundred and twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine gallons of alcohol, "making a total of upwards of ninety-three millions of gallons of intoxicating spirit, and showing an excess of alcohol in fermented above distilled liquors to the amount of upwards of thirty-four millions of gallons." There are forty-eight thousand two hundred and eleven brewers in the country; and nearly one hundred thousand retailers of beer, or cider and perry. The number of manufacturers, dealers, and retailers in spirit, amounts to nearly fifty-five thousand, whose rent and taxes exceed two millions of money annually. "The justice department of government costs upwards of a million annually, and the preventive service half a million more; and yet these sums are not a quarter of what is paid for trials, police-fines, &c. by the country." How ridiculous is it, then, for the government to make crime for the mere purpose of having to pay for the punishment of it!

Mr. PARSONS, in a very entertaining chapter upon the nature of alcohol and alcoholic drinks, proves to demonstration that alcohol does not exist in nature, in a native state, but that it is the product of fermentation, which is itself a result of decomposition or decay in vegetable bodies. Fermentation amalgamates the different principles in fruits or vegetables, which principles were all separated and apart during the period of the vitality of those fruits or vegetables. Thus, alcohol never could be elicited from any productions of nature in their living state, but is merely obtained from their diseased or putrid condition. In a word, alcohol is the production of the rottenness of nature. The spirit is the same in principle, whether in wine, malt, or spirituous liquors. Gin, rum, brandy, whiskey, &c. are nothing but alcohol and water, coloured and modified with burnt sugar, or adulterated to suit certain purposes. There is no nourishment in these, because all the substance is distilled into spirit, and alcohol itself cannot be reduced to a substance by any process existing: therefore as substances alone are nourishing, or liquors in proportion to the substance to which they can be reduced, it is evident that there is not a particle of nutrition in spirituous liquors. Distillation succeeds fermentation, for the purpose of extracting the alcohol produced by the latter.

With regard to wines we may observe that bitter almonds are used to give them a nutty flavour,—sweet-brier and elder-flowers form the bouquet of high-flavoured wines,—alum renders meagre wine bright; and the crust of port wine is very easily made with cream of tartar. Many wine-sellers know that there is death in their wine; and many medical men have destroyed their patients by recommending them to drink spirits.

Mr. PARSONS labours hard to prove that the custom of drinking alcoholic wine was not known to the ancients. We think that the Massican and "mighty Falerian" will not be included in the category of non-alcoholic wines. With reference to the miracle of the transmutation of the water into wine, we think that both Mr. GRINDRON in his "Bacchus" and Mr. PARSONS in "Anti-Bacchus" satisfactorily set at rest any idea that the use of alcoholic liquor could ever have possibly obtained the divine sanction.

On the whole, "Anti-Bacchus" is a most valuable work, and reflects the greatest credit upon its author.

The Student: A French and English Periodical. Number I. 8vo. pp. 16. London: Sherwood, Gilbert, and Piper.

THE design of this publication is good; but we are afraid that the editor is not competent to work it out. He is not thoroughly acquainted with French idioms: the literal translation of the English presents itself frequently. For instance, in the opening tale, he has the following sentence:—"Le costume en lequel je vous vois," &c. Now no Frenchman would make use of such an expression. It is not absolutely wrong; but a native would not use it. He would say, "Le costume que vous portez." Again, we have this sentence, "L'heure venue, et vous serez servi;" the conjunction et should be here omitted. In his lesson of the pronunciation of the French language, the editor of The Student says that poudait must be pronounced as ponday: the g must not even be breathed; he should have written the English pronunciation poneday. Then, again, he writes the pronunciation of enf thus—oof, whereas it should be uf. Cessa should be sessah, instead of saisah; deur should be derz in that sentence; mais should there be maz instead of maz; and mieur should be pronounced as nearly mew as possible, instead of muyey. If a little more attention be devoted to this work, it will become an useful publication, and a favourite.

AN ALLEGORY.

A certain city became infested with a dangerous species of insect, numbers of which, mingling with particles of different kinds of nourishment, were thus by the inhabitants unconsciously swallowed. The first symptoms of its presence in the human system were giddiness, preternatural lustre of eye, torpidity of the muscles employed in articulation, a hicough, flushed countenance, temporary but general paralysis, lunacy of short duration, and sudden change in the disposition, continuing until the fit ceased, which change varied in the respective subjects of it. Some showed unusual mirth, others flew into the extreme of bad passions, and committed violence upon things animate and inanimate. Drowsiness ordinarily supervened, and frequently death-like stupefaction. The patient after a little while, slowly regained his faculties, although the convulsion left, as its successors, a trembling of the nerves shocked by the preceding paralysis, headache, excessive thirst, and dreadful sense of depression on the spirits. Repeated attacks caused more durable evidences of the fatal operations of the insidious venom, imbibed from this apparently trifling source. Preternatural lustre of eye yielded to fixed and lasting inflammation of its delicate blood-vessels, bloatedness of dropsy deforming every limb and feature, and the whole exterior assuming a diseased aspect. Fearful were its internal ravages—corroded liver, stomach weakened into irritability, rejecting wholesome food, or failing to perform with fidelity its digestive duties. Intervals between the paralytic shocks harassed the sufferer with mental horrors, which the afflicted have so feelingly compared to a realization of torments of the condemned in regions of eternal punishment. The moral state of the unhappy victim, during the paroxysm, was often debased, indeed. Affection, tendency to obey the laws, religion, humanity and all refinement, fled from the mind. Hate, rancour, discontent, cruelty and coarse sensuality usurped the throne of virtuous sentiment. The arm which should have shielded innocence, ensanguined its hue with the gore of a devoted heart. The alarming evil of this accession to the plagues of life, this baneful little creature awakened the attention and quickened the active hostility against its existence, of the most skilful physicians, and attracted to the cause the efforts of almost every citizen and resident of the neighbourhood. Specifics were resorted to in vain. The obstinate and penetrating assailant escaped every weapon, and triumphantly dealt its blow, in spite of medical science and ingenuity sharpened by the urgency of such an occasion. It insinuated itself into the purest beverage, lurked in the closet, crept into the drawer, found its way into cup and chink, and cursed almost every happy hearth with its obnoxious visitings. It qualified the jocund merry-making with its offensive intrusion, exalted obscenity as the odious substitute of sparkling wit, and foul fumes, whence only should emanate the pleasant odours of a feast. The unrelenting persecutor pursued the flying martyr, and overtook the object of its vengeance in the solitude of the desert. Its deadly shafts were levelled with unerring aim at the worshipper beside the altar; like a serpent, it darted its sting from among blossoms in the bowers of pleasure, cradled its brood within the sanctuary of the bridal chamber, stole into the guileless bosom of loveliness and unheeding youth, bowed with anguish the hoary head, and nestled amid scenes were music and beauty, fragrance and festivity, blessed mortality with foretaste of heaven. Oh! why this direful doom—what enormity is this awful judgment to expiate, requiring the sacrifice of the blooming charms of the sweetest damsel, the noblest powers of manly greatness? Canst thou prayer avert aught of the terrible denunciation? May not mercy withhold the bitterest of the loathsome draught? Must the goblet be drained to the very dregs? Will no favouring spirit, from on high, wing its way hither, to stay the sweeping desolation of this pestilence? Must the tear trickle for ever over blighted hopes? Is the futurity of fond desire in the mental prospect of mothers never again to smile in the verdure of a fertile vale, but ever to frown from the blasted soil of a burning waste? These were the cries of agony which ascended in every quarter, wrung from despairing wretches! Ah! the echoing groans are dying away in the distance, wailings of woe wax fainter and fainter, anon are scarcely heard, now cease. What means this quiet—is it a pausing of over wearied assiduity in complaint, to be succeeded by a renewal of sighs and entreaties, increased in fervour and loudness, or are the supplications granted and the danger removed? Alas! that venerable form, wallowing in the filthy pool, which stagnates amid confined vapours and tributary ooings of offal juices, witness for the lingering of the hated corruption which degraded excellence and wisdom into such a heart-rending spectacle. Proclamation of those bloody murders done upon sleeping confidence, writes in lurid characters, blinding and glaring with hellish hideousness upon the astounded vision, that the promoter of wolfish propensity is still pouring its polluting streams into the energies of intellect. Those bacchanalian shouts and tumultuous noises, which frighten away the stillness of hours hallowed to dreams, forgetfulness and refreshing slumber, harrow up the soul of virtue with gloomy forebodings of attendant wretchedness, the shadow of present delusive hilarity and unnatural excitement. Why, then, is the voice of lamentation no more wafted by sympathizing airs to celestial guardians of human weal? A surpassing wonder explains the enigma. Imagine the cunning witchery, the mighty magic of a spell which could infuse its illusions into a consuming frame to the conviction of its owner, that the vitals which crisp and curl among the flames, are glowing with renewed life and increasing vigour. Such is the potent enchantment, the complete hallucination which sways the understanding under the influence of this mysterious infection. The demon of mischief is not absent, but reason overwhelmed. The monster is courted, and periodical exacerbations of the disorder are eagerly sought as oblivion to care. The animal-culm do not sicken fast enough. Their bodies are crushed, the essence of pestiferous virulence extracted, and its malignant qualities concentrated into a sufficiently deleterious liquid which is quaffed, until fever rages in the pulse, and madness seizes the brain. The cherished bane is instilled into a thousand diabs, and honoured by the guest and host as the choicest offering of hospitality. Magistrates are infected with the mania, and license venders of this doubly-distilled noxiousness, shops are opened to retail rills of the crime-disposing fluid, and violence and racking pains, misery and ferocious wickedness, are made accessible to the humblest. The calamitous state of the inhabitants was known far and wide, and there came from a remote territory, a benevolent and learned leech, deeply affected by accounts he received of these deplorable events, and determined to apply his experience and research to the exigency. He had compassed the globe to examine the healing resources of every clime, ascended highest mountains to pluck from their pinna-cles contributions to the stores of his art, descended into deepest caves and mines for balmy treasures, hidden under glittering precious ore, and dived down to ocean recesses of pearly magnificence, to draw thence ingredients for invigorating restoratives. Laden with the gathered ministering to ailing, the visitor perambulated the streets and entered upon the task. Nameless were the expedients suggested, and numerous were the cures. Proselytes accelerated the coming, and disciples multiplied the means of good. Law-givers began to know returning glimmerings of sanity, and perceive advantage to disseminating the newly-found remedies. From partial relinquishment of the vitiating mixture, progress was made to total abstinence. By enactments, facilities for getting poisoned were abolished, manufactories of the potion broken up, and a chemical test, detecting the least taint of it in article of food or drink universally applied. Wherever it was discovered, the compound was destroyed, and uncontaminated viands furnished salutary aliment. Fragrant and exhilarating offerings of oriental shores and Arabian plains, unadulterated with the proscribed constituent, cheered melancholy, animated languor, and met the icy touch of winter along the purple current of the veins with counteracting glow of its benign impulse. No longer were summer heats, scorching the brow, rendered more intolerable by fiery drops which the lip eagerly caught in mistaken endeavour to moisten the parched tongue, but purity of succulent gratefulness quenched burning longings of the palate. Sound sleep was enjoyed in the noiseless night, and all the functions regularly performed their allotments. Bright glances beamed once more upon just proportions of figure, voices resumed distinctness and melody, steadiness of intended motion confirmed every sinew, the step fell firm and sprung elastic as before. Propriety in thought displayed itself in correct action, the graces invited back, re-illumed mutual intercourse, delightful anticipations dawned again, and satisfaction returned to the fireside. In the genial sunshine of kindness of temper basked the lamb-like qualities of gentleness and reciprocal good-will. Regenerated breathings of the social atmosphere revived the clinging tendrils of entwining courtesies. Encouraged to nobler flights, soared on eagle pinions kindred aspirations of exalted worth, beckoned by a smiling destiny to lovelier skies. The fortunate reformer of so many evils, gratified with praise and rejoicings which he heard everywhere, withdrew into his own country, and passed his declining years in peaceful retrospect of his useful course.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS. COUNTRY NEWS.

ROSCOMMON.

ON October 16th, this town presented a scene of bustle and excitement, as it was reported that the REV. THEOBALD MATHEW would arrive and make his appearance during the day. A beautiful triumphal arch, decorated with green, had been made across the street; and, at an early hour, large numbers of Teetotalers were upon the move, with their white rods; but a report was industriously circulated to the effect that a man of the name of PIRACK, an officious and meddling county inspector, would not allow them to walk in procession. A large flag, with various devices painted on it, was hung outside the Temperance Hotel. At six o'clock the apostle of Temperance arrived at Flynn's Hotel, and shortly afterwards proceeded on foot up the street, followed by an immense concourse of persons, and a band playing "St. Patrick's Day," "See the Conquering Hero comes," &c. FATHER MATHEW proceeded to the house of the REV. J. MADDEN; and a cry then ran through the town,—"Illuminate! illuminate!" In a short time, every house exhibited a glare of light,—barrels were lighted at each end of the town,—and the whole scene was one of the most lively appearance. On the morning of the 17th, the REV. MR. MATHEW left Roscommon, at about eight o'clock, and proceeded to Gort. An immense multitude attended him a considerable distance upon the road.

BIRMINGHAM.

THE publicans are like a phalanx closely united and are up at the least appearance of danger: hence the terrible agitation raised by these gentry in defence of one of their order whose licence was recently withheld. "The Licensed Victualler's Society" have a good supply of munition, and are not slack to employ it. A barrister was engaged to bring the case above adverted to before the magistrates, who so far listened to the appeal as to appoint a Special Session to re-hear the matter and consider their judgment. The result is, that the former decision has been confirmed. The legal advocate very pathetically alluded to the loss, nay, ruin that the publican could sustain by the suppression of his licence; but are there no other considerations to be regarded? Is the habit made yearly by the super-abundance of ale and spirit-shops a trifling affair? By no means. And since the publicans have their advocates, let the friends, the real friends of the working man throw their protecting shield around him.

TOWN NEWS.

ISLINGTON YOUTH'S SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTemperance.

A crowded meeting of this association was held at the Wesleyan Chapel, Adelaide-street, Shepperton-street, New North Road, Islington. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS had promised to take the chair upon the occasion; but as urgent business prevented this gentleman's attendance, and a suitable apology being sent by him to the Secretary, the chair was taken by MR. CRUMP, the Registrar of the United Temperance Association.

MR. CRUMP addressed some wholesome advice to the youths of the district, relative to the important doctrines and duties of Teetotalism.

MASTER BROOKS made a most interesting speech, evincing a profound acquaintance with the beneficial tendency of Teetotalism in abolishing the drinking usages of society.

MASTER BASTING addressed the audience in a somewhat humorous speech; but the peroration was of a peculiarly affecting nature, and consisted of a powerful appeal to those present in favour of the society to which he belonged.

MASTER CHALMERS spoke for the first time, and acquitted himself to the satisfaction of all present.

MR. BAYLIS made one of his powerful appeals to parents, to implore them to rear their children in the doctrine of total abstinence, as the only condition of their future happiness.

MASTER TOWERS illustrated the evil effects of intemperance by referring to the biographies of many eminent men, who were the victims of that vice.

MR. BIDDLE produced a powerful effect upon the audience by means of an eloquent oration in favour of the great moral cause of total abstinence.

MR. MALLARD closed the meeting with a good speech.

OPENING OF THE SAINT PANCRAS TEMPERANCE HALL.

ON Monday evening, October 19th, this Hall was publicly opened for the first time. A grand tea-meeting commenced the proceedings, and this was very numerous and respectfully attended. The Hall presented a very cheerful appearance, being tastefully decorated with evergreens and flowers. The standard of the society, with the grand Banner of the United Temperance Association, which had been lent for the occasion, were appended to the walls. During the evening several Temperance Hymns, written by MR. BELMER for the occasion, were sung by the company. At 7 o'clock precisely the public meeting commenced, the chair being taken and ably filled by MR. HEWITT, who made an able speech, in which he especially alluded to the necessity of applying the extreme measure of Teetotalism to the extremely depraved state of society.

MR. HIGGINS, Junior, the Secretary, read the Report of the Committee, and stated the reasons which had led to the erection of the hall. It appears that application for the use of a school-room attached to a neighbouring chapel, had been made in vain, on the ground (O monstrous assertion!) that "the cause of Teetotalism was unscriptural." Under these circumstances, the Committee resolved to exert itself to effect the desired aim of having, in the Saint Pancras district, a public hall for teetotal lectures, in spite of the opposition of the professors of the Christian Church (!!!) attached to the aforesaid chapel; and the erection of the hall was the result of those efforts.

The meeting was then addressed by MR. JACKSON, the REV. J. S. CUNNE, MR. DENTON, and MR. GAT, each of whom delivered a most effective address in favour of Teetotalism.

MR. H. W. WESTON, Secretary to the United Temperance Association, concluded the business of the evening with a most encouraging address to the audience. He expatiated upon the advantages of the doctrine of total abstinence, and exposed the infamous system of adulteration practised by wine-merchants, publicans, and distillers. He recommended the Saint Pancras Society to establish a library in connexion with the new Hall, and promised to make them a present of some books as a foundation.

The Secretary gave notice that the meetings of the Society would be held, every Tuesday evening, at Northampton-street Chapel, King's Cross; and at the new Temperance Hall, 39, Wilstead-street, Somers Town, every Thursday evening. The meeting then separated, a powerful effect having been produced upon all present by the proceedings and arrangements of the evening. The presence of the grand Banner of the United Temperance Association, in the new Hall, on this occasion, seems to intimate that the principles of union are duly appreciated in that district.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

THE meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel (the most important place of Teetotal-assemblage in London) was well attended on Wednesday evening, October 21st.

MR. CRUMP (the Registrar) took the chair, and commented upon the inconsistent conduct of clergymen who opposed the doctrines of Teetotalism. He observed that the clergy preached against crime, and yet they did not unite with those who were engaged in an active crusade against the cause of that crime.

MR. BENSTAN said that the advantages of Teetotalism are much less understood than they ought to be. He then particularly addressed himself to the female portion of the audience, and implored wives, and daughters, and mothers, to abandon the use of alcoholic drinks for the sake of their husbands, their fathers, and their sons. He said that the habit of intemperance never assumed so thoroughly degraded an aspect as in woman; and that alcohol converted all that nature had made chaste, fair, and comely, into the vilest of characters. He spoke of the influence exercised over the male by the female sex, and demonstrated the necessity of a good example being set by the latter to the former. He then apologised for this personal appeal to the ladies present, but felt convinced that his observations would be taken in good part.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS said he had that day read an account of MR. ROWBOTHAM's late anti-teetotal lecture, in the Morning Herald, and he should proceed to refute the arguments adduced by that gentleman. MR. REYNOLDS's speech forms the Leading Article of this number of The Teetotaler. (See Leading Article.)

MR. BIDDLE drew a comparison between the home of a drunkard and that of a Teetotaler. He then made some observations upon the necessity of union amongst the Teetotalers, and recommended those present, who were not total abstainers, to embrace the pledge.

MR. SHEPPARD gave his testimony in favour of the doctrine of total abstinence. He is a preacher in the neighbourhood in which he resides, and said that he had exercised the duties of his calling much better since he had abjured the use of intoxicating liquors.

Auxiliaries and Branches.

THE Bethnal-Green, Mary-le-bone, and Kensington and Bayswater Branches to the United Temperance Association, and the Chelsea Auxiliary to the same parent society, pursue their philanthropic labours with success. They daily receive fresh encouragement to persevere in their endeavours to propagate the doctrines of total abstinence; and their committees conduct the business of the respective associations with energy and zeal. Success must necessarily attend upon such exertions.

SAILOR'S READING ROOM AND PAINT LIBRARY.

WE are glad to be enabled to announce the foundation of an establishment, bearing the above title, at No 19, Wellclose-Square. The object of this establishment, as set out in the prospectus, "is to secure sailors from the demoralizing sensualities and intemperance of the Port of London, and to produce some moral and mental enjoyment in connexion with Temperance Reformation, for the benefit of themselves and families, and of merchants and ship-owners, &c." This Temperance Depository will contain "a great variety of weekly publications and all the important works upon the present extraordinary progress of the Temperance moral reform in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, with other interesting publications for the general improvement of sea-faring families." Each person will be allowed to read in the Depository during the day, by contributing one penny to the library-box, and will be permitted to take books and papers home with him upon leaving a deposit. This excellent establishment, which will be found productive of incalculable benefit, will be under the superintendence of directors, presided by MR. SMITH, the minister of the Mariner's Church, Wellclose-Square.

LECTURE-ROOM, THEOBALD'S ROAD.

THE readers of The Teetotaler will remember that we announced a short time back, that a challenge had been given by MR. WARDEN to MR. MACCONNELL, the anti-teetotal lecturer. The disputants met at the lecture room, Theobald's Road, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 21st. On the following morning, we received a letter from MR. MACCONNELL, complaining bitterly of the manner in which he was treated by the audience. We shall not, at present, make any comment upon the letter; we shall however be happy to receive an explanation of that which certainly as yet seems singular conduct, from other quarters. Will MR. WARDEN oblige us with his version of the story? We will then return to the subject next week.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT A MEMBER'S GENERAL MEETING FOR SPECIAL BUSINESS, WILL BE HELD AT THE CHAPEL, ALDERSGATE STREET, ON FRIDAY, NOVEMBER THE SIXTH INSTANT, AT HALF-PAST SEVEN O'CLOCK IN THE EVENING.

SIGNED.

H. W. WESTON, SECRETARY.

134, ALDERSGATE STREET.

LAMBETH-STREET POLICE-OFFICE.—Amongst the charges brought before MR. HARVEY yesterday, there were at least thirty persons who were found lying in the streets in so excessive a state of intoxication as to be scarcely able to move.

ROBERT MACAIRE.—A new novel, by G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Esq., entitled "Robert Macaire in England," has been received and most probably will be reviewed in our next number. The work is illustrated with eighteen admirable steel engravings by Phiz, and belongs to the Jack Sheppard class of tales. Robert Macaire is himself a species of superior Jack Sheppard, whom he certainly rivals in his numerous daring escapes from prison. Those who may feel curious to make themselves acquainted with the adventures of Robert Macaire and his friend Bertrand should apply to their circulating libraries for the hire of the work.

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell, Glasgow; Macdonald & Co., Dublin; and all Booksellers in Town and Country.

LONDON.—J. G. HENDERSON, Printer, 18, Budge Row.

THE TEETOTALER.

FOUNDED BY THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EDITED BY GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS, AUTHOR OF "PICKWICK ABROAD," "THE MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE," &c. &c.

VOL. I., No. 20.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1840.

PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER VIII.

THE FLEET.

It was about five o'clock in the evening that Melville arrived at the Fleet-prison, in the custody of the little white-headed tipstaff, in seedy black, who has so long fulfilled the pleasant office of escort to the Farringdon Hotel. Louise had returned to the cottage, to dispose of the property, and realize as much money as the wrecks of their former magnificence would produce; and, as Melville did not expect to "get settled" in his new abode that evening, it was arranged that his wife and child should remain at their own house for that last night of their possession of a home!

Melville was admitted into a species of lobby, between two doors; a part of which said lobby was enclosed by a wooden partition breast-high, and served as a kind of office. Two somewhat stout men were engaged in keeping the doors: one had very black hair, and the other gray hair; and both took a good long stare at Melville as he entered the place. They however surveyed him with a considerable more respect, when they espied the heavy portmanteau which a ticket-porter had brought from Chancery-lane, on his shoulder.

The turnkey with the gray hair abandoned his seat upon a stool behind the door communicating with one of the prison yards, which is denominated the "painted ground," and proceeded to register Melville's name in a large book, the leaves of which had been well-thumbed and dogs-eared. The entrance fees were then solicited; and a very shabby gentleman, with excessively porous shoes, a coat well ventilated at the elbows, no crown to his hat, and probably not half a one in his pocket, undertook to conduct Melville to the crier, who had "a splendid room to dispose of."

Melville followed his guide into the main-building of the prison, at the entrance to which two or three gentlemen were leaning against the arch, smoking cigars; and presently the crier was fished out of a baronet's chamber, where he was drinking half-and-half with the baronet himself, and some of the baronet's friends. It was some time before the crier could quite collect his ideas in such a way as to be able to transact any business at all; and, when he did, he accompanied all he said with so many rhetorical flourishes, that Melville could not help thinking that he was considerably addicted to "enormous lying."

A bargain was struck with a decayed linen-draper, who occupied a room in the uppermost gallery of all, and who consented to resign it upon payment of one guinea per week. The crier then exacted six shillings for the hebdomadal hire of furniture for the aforesaid room; and Melville was safely installed in his new abode by seven o'clock in the evening.

"Where can I get some dinner?" enquired Melville. "Is there any place——"

"Is there?" repeated the crier, in deep indignation that the accommodation of the prison should have been even suspected for a moment:

"in course there be! Come along, and I'll introduce you to the coffee-house."

Melville was about to follow the crier, when the latter turned abruptly round, and said, "But mind and always lock your door, and don't go leavin' the key in the lock, or droppin' it out o' your pocket, or no sich games as that there, cos there's a lord as lives in the next room to you, and, if he caught your room-door open, he'd prig every bit of coal in your cupboard."

"A lord!" ejaculated Melville.

"Yes—a lord, to be sure," returned the crier.

"A lord steal coals!" cried Melville, unable to divest himself of the surprise into which this communication plunged him.

"Steal coals!" said the crier; "why, in course he would—and anything else too as wos worth cribbing. 'Twas but the other day—this day week, I think—that he found a feller's door open, and walked off with a leg o' mutton, taters, and all! Yes—that I'm blowed if he didn't!"—and, having uttered these words, the crier led the way to the coffee-house, which was only two rooms turned into one, and fitted up with benches and tables. At the end of this apartment, there was a small enclosure, with a green-baize-covered table in it; and this was the wine-room.

"Ain't this a place?" continued the crier, as he surveyed the dark and dirty nook with infinite admiration: "blest, if I don't think that vith sich comforts as this here, a man's better off in quod than he is out."

Melville bestowed a remuneration upon the crier, and then ordered something to be got ready for his dinner. While this command was being complied with, he desired a bottle of wine to be brought; and then, as no one was there besides himself at that moment, he amused himself with the liquor, which enabled him to forget in an artificial and injurious excitement all the wretchedness of his real condition.

While he was sipping his wine with that taste and relish which unfortunately attend upon the use of the fascinating liquor, the door of the wine-room was suddenly opened, and, three individuals entered and seated themselves at the farther end of the table.

"Well—what shall we have?" said one, who was a young gentleman, with a white hat, fustian shooting-jacket, and corduroy unmentionables.

"I don't care what it is," said the second, who was a very stout man, of the middle age, and who was attired in a very shabby suit of black.

"Sherry, I say," cried the third; and this speaker was a tall, thin man, without a coat, but with a buff waistcoat and Oxford-mixed trousers.

"Well—let it be sherry," coincided the first speaker; and the landlord of the coffee-house executed the order as soon as he saw the amount thereof placed upon the table beforehand.

The three individuals drank each a glass of wine, saying, "Well, here's to us," as they did so; and then they all had a good stare at Melville; and as this stare was simultaneous on their part, and somewhat long—covering the space probably of three minutes—our hero felt somewhat abashed.

"New-comer, I presume, sir?" said the stout gentleman, in seedy black.

Melville replied in the affirmative.

"Ah! prison's a rum place," observed the stout man, shaking his head mysteriously, and casting an appealing glance towards his companions; "but it's a blessin' it's no wuss."

"So it is!" cried the gentleman without a coat. "Hope you won't be here for long, sir?"

"I hope not too," said Melville, with a sigh; "but no one can say."

"Nor more they can," coincided the stout gentleman, filling his own glass and that of his companions.

At this moment Melville's dinner made its appearance; and the conversation languished while he partook of it. As soon as the things were cleared away, the discourse was resumed.

"Pr'aps you'll jine us in a little negus, sir," said the gentleman in the fustian coat, as soon as all the wine was disposed of.

"I should prefer punch," returned Melville.

"Can't be had here—'gainst regulations," said the stout gentleman mysteriously; "but I can take you to a crib where we can get as decent a glass of lush as any where in the whole place."

These words were uttered in a low tone of voice; and Melville was about to refuse the invitation. But the first good impulse was superseded by the idea of the loneliness of his condition within those walls; and he accordingly accepted the proposal. The three friends, who were all prisoners as well as himself, then rose, and led the way to a room in the same gallery, and which was fitted up with some regard to comfort.

"Well, Bill," said the stout gentleman to a little, thin, shrivelled old man, who seemed to be the tenant of this chamber; "we've come to give your whistling-shop a turn to-night."

"Yes—but if you're come to give me such a turn as you did Tom Phillips the other night—drinking sixteen bob's worth o' grog, an' boltin' without payin' a brown,—I shan't thank 'ee," was the reply.

"You old fool," cried the stout gentleman, with a terrible imprecation against the "sanguinary eyes" of the old man,—"we know what we're about."

He then desired Melville to sit down, and make himself quite at home; and, by way of setting an example, he coolly knocked off the old man's hat, which this individual had kept on. The old man did not dare grumble aloud; he however muttered something between his teeth, at which the stout person seemed quite indifferent. Indeed, there was so much Newgate freedom and Billingsgate ease of manner with the three gentlemen, that Melville began to feel himself quite upon familiar terms with them.

The stout gentleman undertook to brew a mighty jorum of rum-punch in a hand-bason used in that room on such occasions; and, when the liquor was poured out and handed round, it was pronounced to be excellent. The old man was then sent for some cigars; and when he returned, his guests made themselves as comfortable as they chose.

When the first bason, or bowl of punch was discussed, a second was proposed; and, as Melville's brain now began to feel the effects of the liquor, his companions doubtless thought it a fine opportunity to suggest a game of cards. The stout gentleman, "by a very extraordinary coincidence," as he declared, happened to have a pack in his pocket; and the party commenced a rubber of whist. But although whist was the name of the game, noise was the order of the evening.

"How shall we play?" said the stout gentleman.

"Oh! half-crown points," said the fustian-coat-clad individual, in a careless kind of manner.

"Just as you like," said the gentleman without a coat; "I don't care a fig about money, for my part!"

It was very lucky that he did not, seeing that his empty pockets might have otherwise been inconvenient.

"I say crown points," observed the stout gentleman; and, as no one objected to this arrangement, the proposal was adopted. Melville's partner was the gentleman without a coat; and never was there a more unlucky partner in the world. He suffered every favourable opportunity to escape his notice; and was frequently seized with a fit of winking one eye, to the great delight of the adversaries of his own side, as—by another coincidence, we suppose—those telegraphic signs conveyed a pretty tolerable idea of the real state of the game.

"How very unlucky I am," said the gentleman without a coat.

"Never mind," cried Melville, emboldened by the punch, of which he partook most plentifully; "we will do better this time."

But that time, as well as every other time, our hero and his partner lost the rubber; and Melville's money passed rapidly over to his adversaries, to whom the gentleman without a coat as often exclaimed, "Well, that makes so much that I owe you!" It struck our hero that those gentlemen must be upon very intimate terms thus to play upon credit; but the punch prevented him from devoting much attention to those little pecuniary arrangements, which would have opened the eyes of a sober person. At length Melville lost all the money, which amounted to several pounds, that he had in his pocket; and, then, he throw down the cards, declaring that "he had had enough of it."

Amidst the vapours of the punch, there penetrated to the mind of the young man, at that moment, a ray of proper feeling, which awakened a remorse in his bosom for having thus dissipated the money he could so ill afford to lose. But he hastened to ply himself with more punch, in order to chase away the gloomy thought; and, in the course of the evening, he found himself slapping the stout gentleman on the back, and declaring that he would stick to the one without a coat to the end of his life.

"I tell you what," he said, "I'll introduce you all to my wife to-morrow: she's a very nice woman, and will be delighted to form your acquaintance. You shall all dine with me to-morrow—and not only to-morrow but every day in the week besides. I like good fellows, and none of your ceremonious, distant, reserved sort of chaps!"

Thus was the young man, who by birth, education, and position in society, had been fitted to move in a high sphere, and become the ornament of intellectual society and genteel company,—thus was he making the low dissipated swindlers of the Fleet-prison his associates, and stammering forth all the fulsome rubbish invariably uttered in those affectionate humours which seize upon men when under the influence of deep potations. Strong drink is the leveller of all noble sentiments—refined ideas—proper feelings—and social distinctions; it is an enemy to good fellowship, because it leads to that familiarity which breeds contempt; and it puts words into the mouths of its victims, at which they blush in their sober moments!

Melville could not recollect, when he awoke on the following morning, and found himself in bed, how he reached his room. He, however, had a faint idea of the termination of the orgies of the previous evening. Some more gentlemen had strolled into the whistling shop, and a row had ensued between them and the three persons with whom Melville had formed an acquaintance. The table was overturned—the candles put out—the remnants of the third bowl of punch were thrown over the old man—and the entertainment concluded with a general fight in the dark. Just as our hero turned all these incidents over in his mind, a slight inconvenience about the left cheek-bone caused a strange suspicion to enter his head. He accordingly jumped out of bed—hastened to a looking-glass, three-quarters of a foot high, and half a foot wide, which hung against the wall,—and he found, by the process of self-contemplation, that he had as pleasant a black eye as he could wish to gaze upon. Disgusted with himself, and feeling the most unmitigated abhorrence of his companions of the previous evening, and whom he now ceased to regard as "the best fellows in the world," he lamented in vain the excess of which he had been guilty, and the loss of money at gambling to which that excess had led. He could almost have wept for rage, as he anathematized his folly; and, with his black eye, and his denuded pocket, he was ashamed to meet that wife whom he was so rapidly reducing to ruin.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE WINES OF THE ANCIENTS.

THE custom of drinking the juice of the grape, or any other saccharine body, altered by fermentation, has led to the most extraordinary schemes, both in ancient and modern times, to suit the vitiated and depraved tastes of those who indulged in the inebriating liquor. Indeed, in the management of wines there are so many essential and curious points of opposition, that we can hardly conceive that the potations of antiquity could have been at all endurable to taste. Sea-water was considered to be a great improver of wine; and, whatever was the origin of the opinion, a proportion of salt-water was certainly employed. Columella praises the mixture when in the proportion of about one pint of salt-water, evaporated to a third part, for six gallons of wine, and adds that he should not hesitate to recommend the common practice of doubling, or even trebling, the saline prescription, if the wine should be strong enough to bear it without betraying a salt taste, of which there was no small risk. What course of feeding could have reconciled the human palate to such a compound, it would now be vain to enquire.

But we have practical evidence of another favourite quackery of the ancient Greeks. They were fond of largely impregnating their wines with resin, the preservation of which practice has had the effect of making many of the modern Greek wines absolutely undrinkable by any but the natives. It was not unusual to sprinkle a quantity of powdered resin or pitch in the wine during the first fermentation; and, after this was completed, to infuse the flowers of the vine, cypress-leaves, bruised myrtle-berries, the shavings of cedar and southern wood, bitter almonds, and numberless other articles of an aromatic nature. But a more common mode of proceeding seems to have been to mix all these ingredients in the first instance, to boil the whole to a thick consistence, and then to add the confection to the new wine. It is almost incredible in what quantities (according to Columella) this admixture of resin and pitch (or liquid tar) was used.

Many of the usages of the ancients in their drinking deserve notice. One of these would appear at first sight strange—the excessive dilution of their wines. To drink them unmixed was held to be disreputable, and those among the Greeks who were guilty of such excess were declared to act like Scythians. But, in truth, before we feel surprised at this prevailing taste for their potations, it should be recollected what their wines really were. Rendered thick by the continued action of heat and smoke from the drying-kiln, over which they were kept for years, sometimes even evaporated to a concrete mass, and often impregnated with foreign matter, they were in many cases reduced to a state of syrup or extract, and so strongly seasoned with harsh aromatic bitterness, or even less tolerable flavours, that it was perhaps scarcely possible to drink them without dilution. Thus the Maronean wine of the Homeric times was mixed with twenty measures of water; and when this wine, like man, had degenerated from the strength of the heroic age, Pliny declares that it still required eight portions of water. The common proportions in the more polished days of Greece were three or four parts of water to one of wine. These mixtures, one would imagine, could be only mild diluent drinks, with little properties of exhilaration, and with nothing but very indifferent flavours to recommend them.

There was an elegance in the Grecian mind which seldom sank into the grovelling dabbachery which sullied the grosser manners of Rome, especially under the Emperors. In Rome, as in modern capitals, it was the rage to place the highest value on whatever was rarest; and enormous sums were often given for wines which were literally not drinkable from age. Such seems to have been the case with the famous vintage of the year U. C. 633, when Opimius Nepos was consul, and in which, from the great warmth of the summer, all the productions of the earth attained an uncommon degree of perfection. The taste of the Romans for mixed potations, such as wine flavoured with honey or aromatic substances, was transmitted to the conquerors of their descendants. It became later a favourite practice also to correct the harshness and acidity common to the wines of the period by spicing them. When thus compounded, the liquor passed under the general name of piment, probably because compared by the pimentarii or apothecaries, or rather, we should opine, because the spices were sold by those persons; for it was customary to serve the wine and spices separately, that the guests might mix them at will.

Of the principal Roman wines, the names, at least, are familiar with every reader. The Campagna Felice boasted the most celebrated growths; and however minute questions of locality may be determined, the Falernian, Massican, Setine, and Surrentine wines were all the produce of that region. The three first of these have been immortalized by Horace, who has expatiated on their qualities with all the fervour of the mistle amateur. The Cerealian is described by Galen as a generous wine, ripening only after a long term of years. The Massican closely resembled the Falernian, if it indeed were not of the same stock. Of "mighty Falernian" itself, little more is known than that it was highly prized, was kept for thirty, forty, or even fifty years, and was naturally so strong and rough that it could only be drunk when mellowed by age. The Setine was a light delicate wine, the favourite, according to Pliny, of Augustus, who gave the preference to it as being of all kinds the least apt to injure the stomach. These are the only wines of ancient Italy which have attained any renown, unless the poetic eulogies of Horace and Juvenal be thought of weight enough to rescue the Albanian from the degradation which Pliny has assigned it amongst third-rate wines.

There was a peculiar system of refined luxury attendant upon the orgies of the Greeks; and their entertainments were certainly graced with many voluptuous appurtenances. When they adopted the enervating eastern custom of reclining at their meals, invention was racked to fashion the couches in the most convenient manner. Those, with their tables and side-boards, were inlaid with ivory, tortoise-shell, and the precious metals, and carved into all the fanciful varieties of decoration. Of their artists it may be with truth affirmed that they embellished every thing which they touched. To the commonest utensils they gave the stamp of beauty; and it is from their cups and vases that the moderns have borrowed the happiest models for the furniture of their dinner-tables. The same luxurious refinement of taste which formed their drinking vessels, crowned the intoxicating cup with wreaths of flowers; and it was the same sentiment which bound their brows with the myrtle, and mingled in that chaplet the gayer colours of the rose with the perfume of the violet. Some of these customs might have been derived from the Asiatics, and were communicated to the Romans; but their true accord was with the Grecian mind. The extravagancies of fashion are confined to no age nor clime.

The convivial ceremonies of the ancients were interesting, because many modern observances may be traced up to them. In the management of their banquets, and the composition of their courses, &c., this coincidence, especially with modern French manners, is very striking. The finer wines which were circulated between the removes, are now preserved in the ris d'extremets; and the coup de milieu—quod fluentem nasum coerceat—is but a substitution of liqueur for the sweet wine, which, for the same object, the female cupbearer of the Grecian banquet handed round in massive silver in the middle of the repast.

From the foregoing observations and concise explanatory remarks, the reader will perceive that in all ages, and in all countries, has the custom of drinking wine been attended with the most enervating and abasing habits. The fine disposition and noble temperament of man are rendered effeminate, weak, and voluptuous, by the fascinating habit of indulgence in wine. A certain languor constantly hangs about the frame; and the intellect doses while the body remains indolent and inactive. Many a mighty genius, many a powerful arm, and many a vivid imagination, have been gradually weakened, and eventually incapacitated altogether by the luxuries of wine.

JUPITER AND DANAE.

BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

ACRISIUS, King of Argos, having discussed his breakfast, and several topics of a judicial nature with his prime ministers, who stood uncovered during the repast, his august majesty, with that delicacy and precision for which he was so remarkable, thrust the naked soles of his royal feet into his embroidered slippers, and, enveloping himself in his morning gown of damask-silk, guarded with minivers, prepared for a ramble in the spacious gardens of the palace.

"I hope your majesty is perfectly satisfied with the provisions?" said the prime minister, pointing to the draft of a new act which he held in his hand.

"Perfectly," replied the king, as he regarded with a smile the egg-shells and other wrecks and fragments displayed upon his breakfast table. "And now I shall take a walk."

The garden was certainly what Sir John Moore thought of the preliminary to the battle of Corunna—a "delightful retreat." The feathered choir warbled in the trees, the funny tribe swam in the artificial streams of real water, the gentle breezes kissed the pearly tears of dew from the coy and fluttering leaves, and nature smiled, like a fond mother, on the sportive gambols of her children. The susceptible heart of the good king was moved by the beauties that surrounded him; and he exclaimed, "Such a scene as this is enough to make a fool poetical!" Then, by way of illustration, he commenced a song.

As the king turned into a shady avenue, he was startled by the appearance of a female. Now the king was a devoted admirer of the fair sex, but the specimen so unexpectedly presented to his eyes was by no means a favourable one. Her lank body was ragged as the stem of an old vine, and not less crooked; her visage was yellow and shrivelled as a stale pipkin; and her gray eyes, like the embers of a wood fire, only showed a spark when stirred.

The pleasant thoughts of Acrisius were scattered like a flight of sparrows at the appearance of a gun and cockney.

"Son of the great Abas," cried the sybil; "listen!"

"Well," said her startled auditor.

"Thou hast a daughter," continued the sybil.

"Pr'ythee tell me something I do not know," exclaimed Acrisius.

"That daughter will have a son," said the sybil.

"And that son will have a father, I suppose," observed Acrisius. "Go on."

"Yes—and that son will slay his grandfather!"

"Nonsense!" cried the king.

"Well, I have given you warning!" observed the sybil.

"And here are your wages," replied Acrisius, offering the old hag some money. "And so be off as quickly as you please."

Casting the proffered bounty on the ground, the sybil vanished from his sight, while Acrisius became melancholy and thoughtful. "I don't like that limb of the old one," said he. "Prevention, however, is better than cure: it may be true. Therefore, Miss Danae, I'll not wait till you have a son, but will have you confined immediately."

Although the exchequer of Acrisius was but indifferently stocked with the precious metals, he possessed an uncommon quantity of brass. He therefore ordered five hundred of his chief artificers to erect a tower of that bright material. The consequence was an awful dissolution of the warming pans and candlesticks of the kingdom. The spot chosen for this novel construction was the centre of a thick forest, where there were no rangers; and the prudent Acrisius took especial care there should be none; for he placed a strong guard over every penetrable avenue. The edifice was soon completed; and thither the king speedily conveyed his beautiful daughter in the very bloom of her life.

"What a magnificent tower!" exclaimed Danae.

"I thought I should surprise you," said the king: "and what do you think of the site?"

"Oh! it certainly is a sight worth seeing."

"I mean its situation, my love."

"As far as I can see there is no one to disturb its peacefulness," answered Danae.

"Nor will you, I trust; for I intend you to occupy it," returned Acrisius.

Danae remonstrated in vain. Acrisius delivered her into the custody of an old woman, the only companion of her solitary retreat; and left the sprightly maiden to bewail her melancholy destiny.

Pleasantly situate in the suburbs of the city, and not above ten minutes' walk from the palace of the renowned Acrisius, stood a small tenement, in the occupation of the learned Chiron. From his earliest infancy, he had indicated a thirst for learning, and he had drunk deeply, but without intoxication, at all the little fountains that then threw up their small but sparkling streams for the entertainment of the toil-worn seekers after knowledge; and although they only resembled so many silvery threads, his industry soon made them into a skein, which he found of sufficient strength to depend on for the rest of his days. The worthy pedagogue has been represented, or rather misrepresented, by the poets, as a Centaur; but the fact is that Chiron was of a sedentary habit, which superinduced an attack of the gout, his legs were generally swathed in flannel, and this gave each the appearance of two; so it was fancifully described that the lower half of the Professor was quadrupedal.

Apollo, who was one of his most forward scholars, and an early riser, peeped in at his window, and aroused the old man from his slumbers.

"Let me in," said Apollo.

"I'll undo the door," cried Chiron.

"Why, I see you serve your door as I do my breakfast," said Apollo.

"How is that?" enquired Chiron.

"Why, bolt it," was the answer.

Scarcely had Apollo uttered these words, when about a dozen of Chiron's grown-up pupils, from the age of eighteen to forty, began to assemble. Among those who afterwards made a figure in the world (though neither studied arithmetic) were the celebrated Dr. Æsculapius, to whom he taught physic, and the lively Mr. Mercury, whom he instructed in astronomy.

"Did you deliver my message?" demanded Æsculapius of Mercury.

"I did," was the ready answer.

This question and answer are merely recorded to prove the curious fact that Æsculapius, the physician, employed Mercury three thousand six hundred years ago.

The pupils were soon all engaged in their respective tasks; and Chiron was learnedly describing to Mercury the revolution of the sun round the earth, in accordance with his system of astronomy, when Jupiter entered the school-room. The busy hum of the industrious hive was hushed in a moment. Apollo rose, and modestly approaching, dropped on one knee, and asked his father's benediction. Jupiter patted his golden locks, and condescendingly said, "How's your mother?"

"With the exception of a slight touch of the rheumatism," said the son of Latona, "pretty well I thank you."

"I hope he gets on well, Chiron?"

"He's a rising scholar," was the answer. "This morning he was here before I was up."

"You must give Mercury a half-holiday to-day," said Jupiter, "I want him to go on an errand."

"Why, really," remonstrated Chiron, "he's a forward boy, and—"

"So much the better!" cried Jupiter. "You can better spare him from his studies than a backward one."

"Well, well," said Chiron, "take him."

Jupiter beckoned Mercury to follow him; and they went out together.

"My dear Mercury," said Jupiter, "I am about to employ you in a delicate enquiry. I know I may confide in your discretion, for you never do any thing by halves,"—and he slipped half a crown into his palm.

"Then pray don't set me a bad example," said Mercury, twiddling the coin in his fingers.

"What mean you?"

"Make it a crown," replied Mercury. Jupiter smiled at the conceit, and did as required.

"You must know that Acrisius has a beautiful daughter," began Jupiter; "and that, when I looked upon her, she gave me encouragement."

"Then did she give you that, which, under favour, you did not want?"

"No matter," replied Jupiter. "Danae is no longer at her father's court. He has clandestinely carried her away, and concealed her—confined her most probably against her inclination."

"Say certainly," said Mercury, "for I am confident there was no maiden more inclined to be free than Miss Danae. But to the point,—you have not found her at home, and you wish me to find her out."

"Exactly!" cried Jupiter.

"Say no more," said Mercury. "It shall be done."

"Give her this tender billet, and meet me here to-morrow at dawn," returned Jupiter.

At night, while Danae was sitting very melancholy in her apartment in the brazen tower, and the old woman was slumbering in another room, a voice was heard at the foot of the edifice.

"Lovely Danae," said the voice, "look down upon Love's messenger."

"By whom sent?" demanded the trembling maid.

"By Jupiter."

"By Jupiter, 'tis well!" cried Danae.

"From him I bear a long letter," cried Mercury.

Danae threw an equally long yarn out of the window, and Mercury fastened the note to it, exclaiming, "truly this line from your hands, fair lady, answers most admirably. What message shall I bear back to Jupiter?"

"I am not free to answer," said Danae, "but if he will make free—"

"There is no fear of that!" said Mercury.

"If he will make free the poor prisoner," continued Danae, "I shall hold myself his eternal debtor."

"I understand," said Mercury. "And I'll tell him that, although you were above speaking, you spoke encouragingly. Farewell!"

The old woman was awake in the morning, by a fearful noise on the top of the tower. She ran into Miss Danae's room, exclaiming, "What a storm! I verily believe it will turn all the beer sour! How it rattles against the tower! Save us—it has split the roof!" she added, dropping upon her knees. And sure enough it had; and down poured such a shower of fine gold through the chasm as nearly overwhelmed the old woman. Danae's fears were however soon put to flight by the appearance of Jupiter, who lowered himself through the aperture into the apartment.

"My sweet love!" said he, embracing the nymph.

"My deliverer!" cried Danae.

"Gadzooks! here's a pretty kettle of fish!" ejaculated the old woman. "I protest that it rains men!"

"Peace, old fool!" cried Jupiter.

"Old fool! Let me tell you that this lady is my charge!"

"Well, whatever your charge may be, I think there is gold enough to settle it," returned Jupiter.

"Oh! that alters the whole affair," exclaimed the old crone. "My lady, your lover is so sweet a gentleman—and I am so interested in the business—I would not for the world betray you. By my troth, he's a lad of mettle; and it is really impossible to deny a youth any thing, when he comes down so handsomely!"

This is the true version of the history of Danae and the golden shower, and will serve to elucidate all the mystery with which it is enveloped in "Lempriere's Classical Dictionary."

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. VI.

There is a process going forward which is constantly reducing individuals below their proper grade in life. A gentleman, who is in the habit of drinking, neglects his affairs, his expenditure becomes extravagant, and he becomes involved in difficulties. Ruin at length seizes upon him; and he is compelled to accept of menial occupation at a desk or elsewhere. The tradesman, who drinks, neglects his business, and becomes reduced in circumstances and condition. Thus the lower orders have all the odium of this conduct thrown upon them, because so many drunkards amongst them have descended from higher spheres.

The general practice of all English social and domestic habits encourages drunkenness. If men meet upon business, they introduce strong drink; and if they want to reward labour, they frequently reward it with strong drink.

Nineteen out of twenty of the inmates of work-houses get there from either habits of drunkenness or their own or their connexions: it is wonderful, if we come to make a minute enquiry, to see what a frequent source of supplying inmates is drunkenness.

The great advantage of Teetotalism is the exposure which its advocates make of the causes and ruinous effects of drunkenness.

"The time is now come when preventive measures against crime are strongly called for. The crowded state of the prisons, the increase of offences as they respect the spoliation of property, the apparent inefficiency of secondary punishments to lessen them, with the immense debt thrown upon the country by prosecutions, are subjects which press for consideration."—Such were the words used by the Recorder in his address to the Grand Jury at Liverpool, seven or eight years ago: Teetotalism has since realized some of his wishes.

Malt liquors may be considered as a fatal and bewitching poison, which has actually debauched the minds and enervated the bodies of the common people to a very deplorable degree; but the effects of Geneva have been incomparably worse.

There is no female who takes spirits, that is not anxious to conceal the odour of them; and the various modes of attempting to suppress the smell, by taking caraway seeds and various other things, to disguise the breath, are in themselves a system of duplicity and falsehood very injurious to the female character. And the demoralization that is thus produced, does not here stop.

One of the chief effects of intemperance is that it destroys the advantages of high wages in the working population, making that an injury and an evil which would otherwise be a blessing.

It has been found that to pay wages on a Friday evening has a very good tendency; it has prevented a great many people from going to the public-house who used to do so.

In Turkey, in Persia, in Bokhara, and Samarcand, which have snow and ice during a large part of the year, and a climate more severe in many parts, during the winter, even than our own, the people use generally no stronger drinks than water, sherbet, and milk, without the least admixture of fermented or spirituous ingredients; and, in health, strength, and beauty, they rank first among the nations of the world. The pellavans, or athletes of Persia, as well as the wrestlers and quoit-players of Upper Hindoostan; are probably the most muscular and powerful men existing: stronger than the European would quail; and these drink stronger than water.

Five hundred and eighty nine medical men of the first eminence, in the principal towns of the kingdom, signed a document, in 1834, to the effect, that "ardent spirits cannot be regarded as a necessary, suitable, or nourishing article of diet, that they have not the property of preventing the accession of any complaints, but may be considered as the principal cause of the poverty, crime, and misery, which abound in this country; and that the entire disuse of them, except under medical direction, would materially tend to improve the health, amend the morals, and augment the comfort of the community."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE LEAF-FALL OF THE YEAR.

BY W. T. MONCRIEFF.

AUTHOR OF "DON GIOVANNI," "TOM AND JERRY," &c.

I never lov'd the falling,
I still shrink from the dead;
I woud the birthe and vernal,
From the stern and sad I fled.
But the young and gay have left me,
To mate with the worn and sere;
And 'tis this that makes me welcome
The leaf-fall of the year!
Hail! hail! declining autumn!
Take thine my pleasures die;
My summer hues have vanished,
My winter-time draws nigh.
I wander with heart blighted,
Akin to all that's drear;
And 'tis this that makes me welcome
The leaf-fall of the year!
Love's sweet spring time hath fled—
Home's promise-hours have flown;
My every joy has vanished,
And left despair alone.
I've lived to mourn their falsehood,
The treasure and the dear,
And 'tis this that makes me welcome
The leaf-fall of the year!

TO INEZ.

BY CRAVEN, EDITOR OF THE "SPORTING REVIEW."

I would not, if I might, recal the days
Ere I had learnt the magic of thine eyes:
I know the fascination of their rays,—
I feel the penalty, and still I gaze!—
I am not wise,
Soothly thou thinkest;—yet would I be near.
Where'er thou art, to linger round the spot;—
Better were death than absence, lady dear!
A brief wild hour of anguish'd rapture here—
Than see thee not!
Like eastern sunsets, fugitive as bright,
The burning moments flee when thou art nigh:
Spirit of loveliness, and joy, and light,
And the fierce transport of thy dazzling sight,
Thus let me die!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. K. K's lines are declined with thanks. This journal assumes no political aspect farther than the rights and privileges of the working-classes are concerned.

Reviews of "Sketches of Public Characters," "The Lion's Den," and "The Northern Temperance and Reckless Abstinence," in our next.

We recommend "The Felon's Cell and Drunkard's Hell," a broad sheet written by G. E. Smith, to all our Teetotal readers. "The Wonderful Advantages of Drunkenness" will be inserted as soon as possible.

M. C. H. Newson is thanked for his communication.

T. W. of Shrewsbury's hints shall be attended to.

Number II of "Sketches of our Advocates" is unavoidably postponed until next week.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the third Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1840.

THERE are periods in the history of every people in which old and new opinions conflict, and a concussion becomes unavoidable.

This truth has been several times manifested in the annals of our own country; and especially does its evidence appear in that epoch when the royal tyrant CHARLES I. endeavoured to maintain a portion of prerogative that had become incompatible with any theory of civil and religious liberty. CHARLES occupied the throne at a time when the development of the people's craving after liberty necessarily encountered the claims of royal prerogative; and the disinclination of this monarch to succumb to the sovereign will of the people laid the foundation for grand political events. CHARLES was executed at Whitehall; and OLIVER CROMWELL at once rose into power as a statesman and a general. With the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other, did Cromwell raise and rule the stormy elements of political and religious fanaticism. Thus did the concussion of opposite opinions at that epoch prepare the path of CHARLES to the scaffold, and make CROMWELL the lord of these kingdoms, the mightiest potentate in Europe, and the greatest man in an age of great men!

CROMWELL was a Puritan and a Republican. The Puritans obtained their power by adopting principles of self-denial and abstemiousness; they forswore all improper indulgence in wines and intoxicating liquors,—they were frugal and simple in their fare,—they avoided all places of amusement that were calculated to encourage evil passions or to give an impulse to immoral practices,—and they based all these new principles upon the salutary doctrines of Holy Writ. Thus was it that the Puritans became associated together in one grand fraternity; and as this mighty mass was all inspired, as it were, by one common soul, so did it rise as one man in the day when a nation's rights and liberties were to be vindicated and established. Like all other moral reformations, the doctrines of the Puritans emanated from the working classes; and the period of political revolution, by breaking down all the monopolies of the great, opened numerous avenues of honour and success to the footsteps of the bold, the talented, and the upright.

A similar concussion of opinions to that which deposed CHARLES and elevated the working classes, exists at the present epoch. The homely virtues taught by the Puritans, have long been absorbed in the grand vortex of luxury and dissipation, which, for upwards of two centuries, have menaced the country with the most irretrievable ruin; and those virtues are now again evoked by the good genius of Teetotalism. Identity of principles now links the Teetotalers together in one grand bond of fraternity, as it did the Puritans; and the votaries of this glorious doctrine of total abstinence, although they differ in details may still, be likened on a broad basis to the champions of liberty who fought beneath the banners of a HAMPTDEN and a CROMWELL.

The struggle against the government which was set on foot by the Puritans, was to establish the representative system on a firm basis; the demand now made upon the government by the Teetotalers is to adopt an immediate and a strenuous measure to abolish the encouragement it gives to intemperance. Very culpable are those legislators who do not exert heart and soul to suppress the sale of intoxicating liquors; but when that sale is encouraged upon plea that much of the kingdom's revenue depends upon it, this pretext is so utterly diabolical that a fool may understand how near is the financial ruin of that nation which adopts such a means of self-enrichment. The legislature should enact that those poisons which bear the name of intoxicating liquors, should become contraband articles altogether; and the government, which adopted this measure, would indeed manifest a parental solicitude on behalf of the people.

